PREFACE

IN issuing the second volume of the DICTIONARY OF CHRIST AND THE GOSPELS, the Editor desires, first of all, to thank his colleagues and contributors for the interest that they have taken in the work. He desires, further, to express his gratitude for the reception which the first volume has met with. All concerned in it are ready to confess that the task of producing a Dictionary which could be spoken of as really worthy of its subject has been beyond them. And they have felt this only the more as the work has proceeded. But reviewers have generously recognized the fact that no trouble has been spared to make the Dictionary as worthy as possible; and the public everywhere, but especially preachers of the Gospel, have responded. It is hoped that the second volume will be found to be not inferior to the first.

The Appendix belongs to the original idea. It was felt from the beginning that the articles which it contains should be placed in a group, apart from the general alphabetical order.

DICTIONARY OF CHRIST AND THE GOSPELS

L

LABOUR.—The verb κοπιᾶν in NT Greek signifies not only the weariness produced by constant toil (see Jn 4⁶ κεκοπιακώς), which is the idea attaching to the word in classical writings (cf. Liddell and Scott's Lex. s. v.); it also has reference to the toil itself (cf. Mt 6²³ 11²³, Lk 5³ 12²⁷, Jn 4³⁸), and sometimes to its result in the field of operations (ὁ οὐχ ὑμεῖς κεκοπιάκατε=τὸν κόπον in Jn 4³⁸). This extension in the use of the word is not confined, however, to the NT, and it is probable that it is borrowed from the LXX. We find it employed, for instance, in Joshua (24¹³). Nor is it unlikely that Jesus had in His mind this passage and was even conscious of a parallel between Himself and the warlike leader of Israel's armies, who brought the nation into a land on the development of which they spent no wearisome toil (ἐφ' ἧν οὐκ ἐκοπιάσατε, κ.τ.λ.). The perfection of Christ's human nature is emphasized by the use of this word in the Johannine narrative of the woman of Samaria (Jn 4⁹), and it is worthy of note that the record of this incident is peculiar to that writing (see Westcott's Gospel of St. John, ad loc.).

Closely allied to this word is ἐργάζεσθαι and its cognates, ἐργάτης which occurs frequently in the Gospels, and ἐργασία almost peculiar to the Lukan writings. The last mentioned word not only implies the business or trade by which men gain their livelihood (Ac 19²⁴), but includes in its meaning the resultant gain or profit accruing (see Ac 16^{16, 19}), and sometimes the trouble or toil involved in the pursuit of an object (Lk 12⁵³). An ethical content is imported into the word by St. Paul (Eph 4¹⁹), just as is done in St. Luke's Gospel where a Latinism (ὁδὸς ἐργασίαν) is employed to emphasize the warning of Jesus with respect to the conciliation of an adversary. 'In medical language it was used for the making of some mixture, the mixture itself—the work of digestion and that of the lungs,' etc. (Hobart, The Medical Language of St. Luke, p. 243). At the same time it must not be forgotten that this word is found in the LXX (cf. e.g. Wis 13¹⁹), where St. Luke may have become familiar with its uses. A similar spiritual significance frequently attaches to the words κοπιᾶν, κόπος, and ἐργάτης in the Gospel narratives (cf. Jn 4³⁸, Mt 9³⁷ = Lk 10², Mt 10¹⁰ = Lk 10⁷ 13²⁷).

Considerations like these show us clearly in what spirit Jesus claimed the active support of His followers. Theirs was to be no half-hearted allegiance. They were expected to work in His cause ceaselessly and in spite of weariness, for the field of operations was large and the toilers few (οἱ ἐργάται ὀλίγοι, ὁ θερισμὸς πολὺς, Mt 9³⁷ = Lk 10²). The conditions as to remuneration which obtained in the case of the ordinary field-labourer held good in the case of those who preached the Gospel (ἄξιος γὰρ ὁ ἐργάτης τῆς τροφῆς αὐτοῦ, Mt 10¹⁰, cf. Lk 10⁷). His disciples were reminded that they were the successors of a long line of toilers who sowed the seed, of which they were about to reap the fruit (ἄλλοι κεκοπιάκασιν, καὶ ὑμεῖς εἰς τὸν κόπον αὐτῶν εἰσεληλύθατε, Jn 4³⁸).

This is a thought which has a large place in the Pauline conception of Christian work, and the Christology of St. Paul enhances the dignity of, as it supplies the motive power which guides and strengthens, the toiler (cf. πολλὰ ἰκοπιᾶσιν ἐν Κυρίῳ, Ro 16¹²; see also 1 Co 15¹⁰, Gal 4¹¹, Ph 2¹⁶, Col 1²⁹, 1 Th 5¹²). With this conception of laborious effort as the norm of Christian life we may compare what is told of Rabbi Judah in the Midrash on Genesis, who sat labouring 'in the law' before the Babylonish synagogue in Zippor (Bereshith Rabba, § 33). We are reminded of the exhortation respecting those 'who labour (οἱ κοπιῶντες) in the word and in teaching' (1 Ti 5¹⁷). It may not be out of place to call attention here to those incidental statements which picture for us the Apostle of the Gentiles and his companions working day by day to supply their physical necessities (1 Co 4¹² κοπιῶμεν, cf. 9⁸, 1 Th 2⁹, 2 Th 3⁸).

Not only does the life of Jesus exhibit the great example of self-sacrificing labour for the sake of the souls of men; it furnishes, moreover, the principle that human life in all its phases is, at its best, a life of service. In its earliest stages obedience to parental authority (καὶ ἦν ὑποτασσόμενος αὐτοῖς, Lk 2⁵¹) leads the way to willing obedience to a primal and fundamental law which conditions man's living to the full his present life (see Gn 3¹⁹ ἐν ἰδρώτι τοῦ προσώπου σου φάγη τὸν ἄρτον σου, κ.τ.λ.).

The question of His Galilæan neighbours who were familiar with the circumstances of Jesus' early life, 'Is not this the worker in wood?' (ὁ τέκτων, Mk 6³), shows clearly how fully He adopted this principle as regulating the preparatory discipline of His young manhood. Nor must we forget that it was amongst that class which is dependent for its livelihood upon its capacity for physical labour and endurance that Jesus gained His most thoughtful, whole-hearted adherents (cf. Mk 1¹⁶⁻²⁰ = Mt 4¹⁸⁻²², Lk 5²⁷), while many of His most beautiful and effective similes are taken from the surroundings of the busy life (cf. Jn 4³⁵, Lk 10², Mt 9³⁷ 20¹⁻¹⁵ etc.). On the other hand, He reserved His profoundest commiseration for those upon whom superfluous wealth had imposed a selfish idleness (see Mt 19^{23f.} = Mk 10^{23f.}, Lk 16^{19f.}), and perhaps the most caustic remark in connexion with the life led by the unjust steward was that in which he confessed his inability for honest physical work (σκάπτειν οὐκ ἰσχύω, Lk 16³).

The remarkable apocryphal addition to Lk 6⁴ found in Codex Bezae (D), while primarily having reference to the Sabbath controversy, may not be without its bearing on this question. This passage relates that Jesus 'seeing a certain man working on the Sabbath day said to him, "O, man, if thou indeed knowest what thou art doing, thou art blessed; but if thou knowest not, thou art cursed, and art a transgressor of the law." Westcott believes that this saying 'rests on some real incident' (see his Introduction to the Study of the Gospels, App. C); and, indeed, the spirit underlying these words is not out of harmony with the general tenor of Christ's known attitude towards the active life of busy service. Whether any man's labour is a blessing or not to himself depends, of course, on whether he knows what he does and recognizes its bearing upon his whole life and character (cf. αὐτὸς ὁδὸς in the passage just quoted, where there is evidently a reference to the relation between the work done and the doer of that work [see Cremer's Biblico-Theol. Lexicon of NT Greek, p. 229]).

A charge, which has been brought again and again against the Christian religion, is that it is too exclusive in its other-worldliness to be of practical value in the midst of life's stern realities. Enough has been already said to show that such an accusation misinterprets completely the moving spirit of Christianity. At the same time, we must not forget that at a very early period of the Church's history there was a grave danger of professing Christians degenerating into idle dreamers and useless busybodies (περιεργοί, 1 Ti 5¹³, cf. 2 Th 3¹¹). Against this abuse St. Paul felt compelled repeatedly to contend (cf. Eph 4²⁸, 1 Th 4¹¹), while he set the example in his own life of unflinching industry (see Ac 18³ etc.). There can be no doubt that in his restatement of the law of social economics ('if any will not work, neither let him eat,' 2 Th 3¹⁰) St. Paul was profoundly influenced by the life as well as by the teaching of Jesus.

No thoughtful student of modern problems can fail to note how completely the future of the Christian Church is bound up with her attitude towards the labour question. Year by year that question assumes graver proportions as the danger of a complete breach between employer and employed becomes more formidable. Nor can there be any serious doubt in the mind of a loyal subject of 'the Kingdom of the Incarnation,' that in the true interests of Christian development and progress a real active harmony of aims and aspirations between capital and labour must be established. Representatives of both must be taught that the only solution of problems which seem to baffle them lies in the recognition of the truth that at bottom all human life is true and sacred according as it may be measured in terms of service. Jesus, who employed labourers in fields of activity selected by Himself (cf. Mt 10⁵), points out distinctly the complete identification of employer and employed as being the root idea underlying all vital progress (ὅς ἂν θέλῃ ἐν ὑμῖν εἶναι πρῶτος ἔσται ὑμῶν δούλος, Mt 20²⁷, cf. Mk 10⁴³). Nor is the Incarnation above the sphere of this universal law. The Son of Man Himself (ὥσπερ) came not to be served but to serve (διακονῆσαι), yielding up even His life for the sake of His fellow-men (λύτρον ἀντὶ πολλῶν, Mk 10⁴⁵ = Mt 20²⁸; cf. Lk 22^{26f.}).

'The labourer is worthy of his hire' (Lk 10⁷) is a basal principle both broad and deep. It does not mean either that the employer's liability to his servant is discharged when he has paid him his stipulated wage, or that the latter's duty to his master ends with the outward fulfilment of a set task. Personal relationship involving mutual responsibility forms an essential part in the Christian solution of this economic problem. For the labourer is no longer in the position of a bond-servant but of a friend, and is to be recognized as such (οὐκέτι λέγω ὑμᾶς δούλους . . . ὑμᾶς δὲ εἰρηκα φίλους, Jn 15¹⁵).

LAKE OF GENNESARET.—See SEA OF GALILEE.

LAMB.—See ANIMALS (vol. i. p. 64^a), NAMES AND TITLES OF CHRIST, and SHEEP.

LAME.—This word, perhaps originally meaning bruised, signifies a crippled or disabled condition caused by injury to or defect of a limb or limbs; specifically walking with difficulty, inefficient from injury or defect, unsound or impaired in strength. It is applied metaphorically to all kinds of inefficiency, such as inadequate excuses, or verses which offend against the laws of versification. The term embraces all varieties of defect in walking arising from various causes, and includes halt-ing and maimed (see artt.), which are separate and distinct species of lameness.

The Greek word is χαλός, from obsolete χάω or χαλάω (to loosen, slacken), which is tr. 'lame' in Mt 11⁵ 15³⁰, 31 21⁴, Lk 7²² 14¹³; but in other passages for no apparent reason the same word is translated 'halt.' In Jn 5³ χαλῶν is rendered 'halt' without any indication that a special species of lameness is intended, where the description is quite general as in the above passages. In Mk 9⁴³⁻⁴⁵ it is used synonymously with κυλλός, where ἀνάστροπος might have been expected in both cases, seeing that the injury referred to is the definite cutting off of the hand or foot. κυλλός is, however, most commonly associated with the hand, while χαλός more specifically has to do with lameness in the foot or feet. In Mt 18⁸ we have χαλὸν ἢ κυλλόν—transposed in the authorities followed by RV, making the correspondence between χέρον and κυλλόν, and τοῖς and χαλόν.

Healing of the lame was a characteristic work of Christ. Among the multitudes that gathered round Him seeking restoration for various ailments were probably sufferers from many different kinds of lameness (as Mt 15³⁰, Lk 7²²). Jn 5³ gives a comprehensive list of such sick persons, including the feeble, the blind, the lame, and the withered (πλήθος τῶν ἀσθενούντων, τυφλῶν, χαλῶν, ξηρῶν). Probably these miscellaneous cases would include those suffering from chronic rheumatism and from infirmities having a nervous origin, many of which resulted in a withering of the limbs and of the bodily frame. It is significant that Jesus is never said to have restored the ἀνάπηροι, the badly mutilated—deprived of their limbs (see MAIMED).

LAMECH.—Father of Noah, mentioned in our Lord's genealogy, Lk 3³⁸.

LAMENTATION (θρήνος, θρηνεῖν).—An expression of sorrow accompanied by wailing and other demonstrations of grief. It is associated in Jn 16²⁰ with weeping, and also in Lk 23²⁷, in the case of the women accompanying the Saviour to the Crucifixion. It is applied equally to sorrow for the dead and to grief for approaching disaster (Mt 2¹⁸, Jn 16²⁰, Lk 23²⁷), and it is referred to by the Lord as one of the common games of children.

When a death occurred, it was intimated at once by a loud wail which is described (Mk 5³⁸) as accompanied by a 'tumult,' and this lamentation was renewed at the grave of the deceased. Oriental demonstrations of grief are very vivid. Mourners hang over the lifeless form and beg for a response from its lips. When a young person dies unmarried, part of the ceremony of mourning is a form of marriage (see art. MOURNING). Lamentation for the dead was also accompanied by beating the breast and tearing the hair, as well as by rending the garments (see RENDING OF GARMENTS) and fasting.

W. H. RANKINE.

LAMP.—There are two words in the Gospels translated 'lamp,' λύχνος and λαμπάς. The former (RV 'lamp,' AV 'candle') is used Mt 5¹⁵, Mk 4²¹, Lk 8¹⁶ of the usual means of lighting a house. In Mt 6²² the eye, as the source of light, the organ by which light is appreciated, is called the lamp (RV; AV 'light') of the body. In Jn 5³⁵ the same word is applied to John the Baptist, who is not the eternal light (φῶς, Jn 1⁹), but the burning and shining lamp kindled by it and bearing witness to it.

The word λαμπάς occurs in Jn 18³, where it is rendered 'torch.' It is also used in the parable of the Ten Virgins, Mt 25, where it would be better translated 'torch.' In Eastern countries the torch, like the lamp, is fed with oil, which is carried in small vessels constructed for the purpose (ἀγγεῖον, Mt 25⁴). See CANDLE, LIGHT, TORCH.

LANGUAGE OF CHRIST.—Recent historical and critical research has narrowed the ground which it is necessary to cover in the discussion of the question as to the language spoken by Christ. It has ruled Hebrew out of court. The practically unanimous verdict of recent scholars is that, considerably before the time of Christ, though when is uncertain, Hebrew had ceased to be spoken in Palestine, and its place as the vernacular had been taken by Aramaic, the language represented in OT by Ezr 4⁸⁻¹⁶ 7¹²⁻²⁶, Jer 10¹¹, and Dn 2⁴⁻⁷ 28, and mistakenly named 'Chaldee.'

The transition from Hebrew to Aramaic involved no great linguistic revolution, as it was simply a transition from one Semitic language to another, and that a closely cognate one. It was, however, only very gradually effected, and was chiefly due to the predominance to which Aramaic attained in Western Asia during the Persian period, coming, as it did, to be, with dialectical differences, the lingua communis from the Euphrates to the Mediterranean. While, however, Aramaic thus gradually superseded Hebrew as the living tongue of Palestine, and by the time of Alexander the Great had probably reached a position of ascendancy, if it had not gained entire possession of the field, yet Hebrew remained, though with some loss of its ancient purity, the language of sacred literature, the language in which Prophet and Psalmist wrote, and as the language of the books ultimately embraced in the OT Canon, continued to be read, with an accompanying translation into Aramaic, in the synagogues, and to be diligently studied by the professional interpreters of the Scriptures. It is, therefore, quite possible that Christ possessed a knowledge of Hebrew, and had thus access to the Scriptures in the original.

With Alexander the Great, however, there came a fresh disturbance of the linguistic situation. Thenceforward Greek entered into competition with Aramaic. And though, as a non-Semitic language, the adoption of Greek could not come so readily to the Jews as Aramaic, yet the circumstances were such as to tend in no small degree to counterbalance the disadvantage under which Greek thus lay. For not only was it the official language alike of the Lagid, Seleucid, and, after the Maccabæan interregnum, of the Idumæan-Roman rulers to whom the Jews were successively subject; but its cause was furthered by the Hellenizing policy which these rulers generally followed, and by the existence, more or less, all through of a party among the Jews themselves favourable to that policy. The result on the linguistic situation of the political conditions thus obtaining cannot be certainly determined from the historical data bearing directly thereon. It is, however, clear that whatever headway Greek may have made before the Maccabæan revolt,—which was a revolt against the Hellenizing policy referred to, as pushed to extremes by Antiochus Epiphanes,—it suffered a decided set-back, and was practically expelled the country during the Maccabæan régime. And though it had again made considerable progress by the time of Christ, and especially through the influence of Herod the Great, who particularly affected Greek culture, there is nothing to show that the political conditions were such as to secure for it the ascendancy claimed by some scholars, and notably by Dr. Roberts in his book, Greek the Language of Christ and His Apostles.

At the time of Christ, then, Palestine was bilingual, Greek as well as Aramaic being, to some extent at least, spoken. The question, therefore, to be answered is, Which of these languages did Christ speak, or, if He knew and spoke both, which of them did He mainly, if not exclusively, employ as the vehicle of His teaching? Consideration need be given to the question only in its latter form. For, as undoubtedly spoken by some of the Palestinian Jews, as the language of perhaps the great majority of His countrymen scattered throughout the Roman world, as the predominant language of the representatives of the Gentile world in Palestine and of that Gentile world itself, which, though wide, was not yet wider than He conceived the scope of His mission to be, and as, besides, the language of the Septuagint Version of the OT, which had no doubt acquired considerable popularity, it may reasonably be assumed that Christ would acquire some knowledge of Greek, and be able, in some measure at least, to speak it. Was it, then, Aramaic or Greek that Christ habitually employed in His public ministry? The question resolves itself into that of the relative prevalence of the two languages in the country at the time, so far as that can be determined by such evidence, direct and indirect, as is available. And this evidence, though somewhat meagre, is decisive for Aramaic. That furnished by the reported words of Christ Himself does not go very far, but yet goes some length towards that conclusion. All that it certainly establishes is that Christ knew Aramaic, and, apart from His employment of Aramaic terms and proper names, on which perhaps little stress is to be laid, as these terms and proper names may have formed part of the ordinary vocabulary of Greek-speaking Jews, expressed Himself in Aramaic on three different occasions. The three expressions are: (1) ταλεια κόλυ, the Gr. transliteration of the Aram. ܟܘܠܝܘܢ or ܟܘܠܝܘܢ Mk 5⁴¹; (2) ἐφθαθά, euphonic for the Aram. ܫܘܒܗܐ Mk 7³⁴; and (3) ἦλει ἦλει λαμὰ σαβαχθανει (Mt 27⁴⁶), or according to Mk 15³⁴ ἐλωί, ἐλωί, λεμὰ σαβαχθανει, the Aram. ܘܨܪܒܫܐ ܟܘܠܝܘܢܝܐ ܝܗܠܐ ܝܗܠܐ. How these three Aramaic expressions alone came to be preserved is matter of conjecture. An obvious explanation is that they alone were preserved because they were exceptional, Greek being the language for the most part used by Christ. That, however, is not the only possible explanation. More probable is it that they alone were preserved because associated with moments of exceptional emotion on Christ's part, and therefore felt to be exceptionally precious. The cry upon the cross was peculiarly a cry de profundis. In the case of the deaf and dumb man, Christ, for some reason or other, was unwontedly moved, for it is said that 'he looked up to heaven and sighed.' And, though it is not stated, the spectacle of Jairus' child-daughter lying cold yet beautiful in death, was calculated to touch profoundly the heart of the great Child-Lover.

The two main sources of direct evidence conclusively proving the predominance of Aramaic as the popular language, are the Book of Acts and the Works of Josephus.

1. In Ac 1¹⁹ it is said with reference to the suicide of Judas in the field which he had purchased 'with the reward of iniquity,' 'And it was known unto all the dwellers at Jerusalem; inasmuch as that field is called in their own tongue (τῇ διαλέκτῳ αὐτῶν) Akeldama.' Now Akeldama is the Aram. אקלדמא, and points not only to the fact that Aramaic had superseded Hebrew as the vernacular, but that at the time of Christ it was the popular language, even of the inhabitants of Jerusalem. Equally conclusive on the latter point are two other passages in the Acts. In describing his conversion to Agrippa, St. Paul said, 'And when we were all fallen to the earth, I heard a voice speaking unto me, and saying, in the Hebrew tongue' (τῇ Ἑβραϊδὶ διαλέκτῳ), Ac 26¹⁴. By 'Hebrew' St. Paul undoubtedly meant Aramaic. The terms Ἑβραϊδὶ and Ἑβραϊστὶ, as is generally admitted, are used both in the NT and by Josephus when not Hebrew but Aramaic is meant. Thus in Jn 19¹³ it is said that 'Pilate sat down in the judgment-seat in a place that is called the Pavement, but in the Hebrew Gabbatha' (Ἑβραϊστὶ δὲ Γαββαθά); and Γαββαθά is not Hebrew, but Aramaic. That the ascended Christ should have spoken to Saul in Aramaic is unintelligible except on the supposition that that had been the language which He had spoken when on earth, and that it was the prevailing language of Palestine.

Quite as significant is the circumstance mentioned in Ac 22² that Paul addressed the infuriated Jerusalemites in Aramaic, and that when they ascertained from his opening words that he was to speak to them in that language, 'they kept the more silence' (μᾶλλον παρέσχον ἥσυχίαν), the reference being to the fact that Paul had not attempted to speak until by a gesture indicative of his desire to be heard he had stilled the uproar, and, as it is said, 'there was made a great silence.' It does not necessarily follow, as has been maintained, that the people expected Paul to address them in Greek, and that the fact that they were prepared to give him a hearing when they expected him to speak in that language, proves that they were familiar with it. The simple fact that, as his gesture indicated, Paul was going to address them was in itself sufficient to secure their quiet attention. And in any case, even though they had expected to be addressed in Greek, the deeper silence into which they settled when they found that they were to be addressed in Aramaic, proves that they were more familiar with the latter language than the former, and that the latter was the language generally spoken by them.

2. The evidence of Josephus is as direct and conclusive as that furnished by the Acts of the predominance of Aramaic. In BJ v. vi. 3, Josephus records how during the siege of Jerusalem the Jewish watchmen warned their compatriots of the discharge of the Roman missiles by crying out in their native tongue (τῇ πατριῷ γλώσσῃ), ὁ ἰδὸς ἔρχεται. In the same work, vi. ii. 1, he tells how in his capacity of intermediary during the same siege he communicated the proposals of Titus to the besieged in their native tongue (τῇ πατριῷ γλώσσῃ). In the preface to BJ he records how that work was at first written in Aramaic and afterwards translated into Greek.

The passage runs: 'I have proposed to myself, for the sake of such as live under the government of the Romans, to translate these books into the Greek tongue, which I formerly composed in the language of our own country, and sent to the Upper Barbarians, i.e. to the Aramaic-speaking peoples, whom he describes in the following paragraph as 'the Parthians, Babylonians, the remotest Arabians, and those of our nation beyond Euphrates, with the Adiabeni.'

That a Palestinian Jew such as Josephus, who was of a distinguished priestly family, who received a careful rabbinic education and studied in the various schools of the Pharisees, Sadducees, and Essenes, should not only characterize Aramaic as 'the language of our own country,' but should write his first book in that language, is in itself conclusive proof that Aramaic had not then been materially driven from its position as the vernacular of Palestine. Suggestive also in this connexion, and giving added weight to the case for Aramaic, is Josephus' own confession of the difficulty he experienced in acquiring such mastery of Greek as that which he ultimately attained. In the preface to his Antiquities he tells how he found the writing of that work a hard and wearisome task, 'it being,' as he says, 'a large subject, and a difficult thing to translate our history into a foreign and to us unaccustomed language' (εἰς ἀλλοδαπὴν ἡμῶν καὶ ξένην διάλεκτον συνθέσθαι), and how he was able to continue and accomplish the task only by the encouragement and help of a friend, Epaphroditus. To the same difficulty he refers in the closing paragraphs of the Antiquities:

'I am so bold as to say, now that I have completed the task set before me, that no other person, either Jew or Greek, with whatever good intentions, would have been able to set forth this history to the Greeks as accurately as I have done; for I am acknowledged by my countrymen to excel them far in our national learning. I also did my best to obtain a knowledge of Greek by practising myself in the grammar, though native habit prevented me from attaining accuracy in its use.'

Josephus' difficulty with Greek is very significant. For if that difficulty obtained with him, what of his countrymen generally? Stress has been laid, as, e.g., by Dr. Roberts, upon the attainments in Greek of such men as Peter and James and John, as shown in the speeches or writings attributed to them, and it has been argued therefrom that a knowledge of Greek must have been common among the rank and file. But even though Peter and James and John were the authors of the speeches and writings referred to, and did speak or write such Greek as is found therein, which is open to question, they cannot fairly be regarded as representative of the people generally in this respect. The very fact of their not only being of the number of the Twelve, but forming the inner group of that favoured circle, differentiates them from the crowd. 'Unlearned and ignorant men,' the Council at Jerusalem dubbed them (Ac 4¹³); but the contemptuous epithets were but the expression of a twofold prejudice, the prejudice of antagonism and the prejudice of the Schools. In virtue of their discipleship, Peter and James and John have to be placed in a different category from the mass of the people of their social rank, who, as compared with them, must have been 'unlearned and ignorant' in the broader sense of the terms.

3. The case for Aramaic as the prevailing language of Palestine in the time of Christ, and the language, therefore, which Christ must necessarily have employed generally in His teaching, is thus incontestably established by the direct evidence of the Acts and of Josephus. And though less direct and certain, there is other evidence to the same effect to which reference may be made, and specially that furnished by the Targums and what is known as The Aramaic Gospel.

(a) The Targums are Aramaic translations or paraphrases of the OT books, and cover the whole of those books with the exception of Daniel, Ezra, and Nehemiah. The two principal Targums are (1) that on the Pentateuch, known as the Targum of Onkelos, which is characterized by its almost slavish literalism; and (2) that of Jonathan ben-Uzzel on the Prophets, i.e. the Historical books and the Prophets properly so called, which is largely paraphrastic. The dates of these Targums are uncertain, and by scholars they have been made to range from the end of the 1st to that of the 4th cent. A.D. The important point, however, is that they undoubtedly embody material from a much earlier time, and were the outcome of the practice, originating in the gradual disuse of Hebrew as the vernacular, of translating the synagogue readings of the OT into Aramaic for the benefit of the people generally. Written Targums were at first forbidden. The translation was required to be oral, the translator (תרגמן) giving his translation after each verse of the Pentateuch and every three verses of the Prophets. Whether the rule which forbade written Targums had fallen into desuetude by the time of Christ cannot be definitely determined. Probably it had. But even though it had not, and there were no written Targums till a later date, yet the existence of written Targums at that later date points conclusively to the prevalence of the practice of the oral translation of the synagogue lessons into Aramaic, and therefore to the prevalence of that language as the vernacular.

As against this, the supporters of Greek hold that the Septuagint version was in such general use that it may be described as the 'People's Bible.' The special arguments in favour of this theory are: (1) that copies of the Septuagint could be had at a much smaller cost than Hebrew or Aramaic MSS, that indeed the price of the latter was prohibitive so far as the people generally were concerned; and (2) that the OT quotations in the NT point to a very general familiarity with the Septuagint, inasmuch as the majority of them are verbatim or practically verbatim, or show unmistakable traces of the Septuagint, and particularly as in some cases the Septuagint is followed when it differs from the Hebrew. The price argument scarcely deserves notice, and very little weight is to be attached to the quotation argument. For while it must be admitted that those who were responsible for the quotations were familiar with the Septuagint, it by no means follows that such familiarity obtained with the people generally. And while it was to be expected that the writers of the NT books would not only be familiar with the Septuagint, but in quoting from the OT would take advantage of a translation ready to hand, it is yet a significant fact that that translation was not always taken advantage of, not a few of the quotations showing an entire independence of the Septuagint.

(b) The question of an Aramaic Gospel (Ur-Evangelium), while important chiefly in connexion with the Synoptic problem, bears closely upon that of the language spoken by Christ. If Christ spoke Aramaic, such a Gospel was to be expected, and at the same time its existence would furnish weighty proof at once of the prevalence of Aramaic and of the use of that language by our Lord. And the labours of recent critical scholars, if they have not conclusively established the existence of an Aramaic Ur-Evangelium, have at least made it much less open to question. Of special interest in this connexion is the series of articles in the Expositor (Ser. IV.), by Professor Marshall, on 'The Aramaic Gospel.' The theory which Professor Marshall in these articles works out with great ability and skill is that the variant Greek words in parallel passages of the Synoptic Gospels can be traced to one original Aramaic word; and the result of the application of his theory is that the Aramaic Gospel contained, speaking generally, the ministry of Christ in Galilee. That Professor Marshall's theory will ever find anything like general acceptance is perhaps unlikely. But whether or not it may be possible by his or any other method to recover with certainty and to any extent the precise Aramaic words used by our Lord, there can be no doubt that Aramaic had the supreme honour of being the language in which He gave expression to His imperishable thoughts.

LAST DAY.—See DAY OF JUDGMENT.

LAST SUPPER.—Although the relation of the Last Supper to the Jewish Passover is treated with more or less fulness elsewhere (see DATES, vol. i. p. 413 ff., and LORD'S SUPPER (I.)), it appears advisable to handle the whole subject in a special article.

The Paschal controversy, which agitated the first ages of Christianity (see CALENDAR), has only a general connexion with the inquiry on which we are entering. We note* that the trend of opinion at first was towards the view that Christ was crucified on the 14th day of the Jewish month Nisan, and therefore on the day on which the Paschal lamb was killed; from which it follows that the Last Supper (whatever was its nature) preceded the Jewish Passover by several hours. In the 3rd cent. the view that our Lord kept the Passover with the Jews on the 14th, and was crucified on the 15th, began to come into favour. When we approach the sacred records, we find that the first three Evangelists so express themselves, that, in the opinion of some, they represent our Lord as eating the Paschal Supper with His disciples on the night of His betrayal. It is certain that St. John (18²⁸) represents some of the Jews as not having eaten the Passover several hours later. On these premises, there appears to be a discrepancy between the accounts in the sacred narratives. When an honest attempt is made to arrive at a conclusion, a great authority on the history of Christ's ministry is compelled to confess his inability to solve the enigma.† By some it has been thought that Christ anticipated the day of the Paschal Supper, in order to eat it with His disciples;‡ by others, that the heads of the Jewish people deferred their Passover in order to have time to apprehend and condemn Jesus.§ The object of this article is to show that the first three Gospels preclude the notion that the † See Sanday, art. 'Jesus Christ' in DB ii. 634 b.

‡ This seems to be the view which Dr. Sanday, on the whole, favours; see art. quoted in preceding note. For the view that the Last Supper was an anticipated Passover meal, resembling the ordinary Passover in form and order, and held before the statutory date, see art. 'Jesus Christus' (Zöckler) in *PRE*³, ix. p. 32; 'Eucharist' (J. Armitage Robinson) in EBI, col. 1419. A good summary of arguments and opinions is given by Ellicott in Lectures on the Life of our Lord, pp. 322, 323, nn.

§ The Passover might be deferred for a month for those who were legally debarred from observing it on the proper day (Nu 9⁹⁻¹²), but there is no provision in the Law for postponing it for one day; this explanation of the action of the rulers is improbable in itself, and contrary to their expressed intention (Mt 26⁵); further notice of it is superfluous.

Last Supper was a Passover, and therefore, as St. John certainly seems to represent the Passover as still to come while the Supper was proceeding,* that there is no discrepancy in the accounts.†

1. In examining the evidence afforded by the four accounts, we find, with satisfaction, that they have been handed down to us intact, and that no attempt was made to harmonize the records, as by the omission of the words τὸ πάσχα from Lk 22¹⁵, which seem at variance with the statements in St. John. There is one critical problem in St. Luke—the retention, or omission, of the mention of a second cup, and the order of the Bread and the Cup in the Institution;‡ but the solution of this problem will not affect the chief thesis in our position. Herein is another proof, if proof be needed, of the honesty and faithfulness of the ancient scribes, who, in the midst of one of the greatest controversies of the early Church, resisted the temptation to accommodate the records to particular views of the event.

2. The five following indications of time may be collected from the several accounts:

(1) When Jesus had finished His great eschatological discourse, and the rulers were forming a plan for His apprehension and condemnation, it wanted two days to the commencement of the Paschal Feast—μετὰ δύο ἡμέρας τὸ πάσχα γίνεται (Mt 26², Mk 14¹, Lk 22¹). 'After two days' must be interpreted according to the reckoning which makes 'after three days' equivalent to 'on the third day.' This Jewish usage is well known, and is found, e.g., in Mt 20¹⁹ parallel with Mk 10³⁴ and Lk 18³³, where τῆ τρίτῃ ἡμέρᾳ in the First and Third corresponds to μετὰ τρεῖς ἡμέρας in the Second Evangelist.§ Now the Passover was slain late in the afternoon of the 14th Nisan, and some hours earlier leaven was put out of the houses, in preparation for the 'days of unleavened bread,' which, strictly speaking, began with the eating of the lamb in the early hours of 15th Nisan.¶ The terminus ad quem of the 'two days' must be the last hours of 14th Nisan. The terminus a quo may be any hour after 12th Nisan had been succeeded by the 13th.

(2) In arranging for the apprehension of Jesus, the rulers decided that it should not be attempted on the Feast Day (Mt 26³, Mk 14²). If they carried out their intention, it follows that the night of the apprehension and trial was before the slaying of the Passover; and that the Last Supper, whatever it was, did not coincide with the Paschal Feast.

* Jn 13²⁹. Edersheim (Life and Times, ii. 566 ff.) explains the φαγὴν τὸ πάσχα of Jn 18²⁸ as referring to sacrifices of the Paschal season. The opinion of such a writer demands respectful consideration, and a similar explanation is adopted by many. From 2 Ch 35 we learn that other sacrifices were offered at the Paschal season besides the lambs; see vv. 7. 8. 13.

† The position maintained in this article is identical with the explanation given by the late G. Wildon Peiritz in The Gospels from the Rabbinical point of view, 1873. By birth a Jew, of German nationality, a Cambridge graduate, and an Anglican priest, of wide reading and profound learning, Peiritz had, to an exceptional extent, the ability to form a correct opinion on the problem before us.

‡ The Received Text of Lk 22^{19, 20} is read in 'codd. Græc. et verss. fere omni.' (Nov. Test., Lloyd-Sanday, Append. p. 121)—i.e. it has the very highest diplomatic attestation, including the old uncials. It can be rejected only on a priori grounds. The case illustrates the difference between two schools of criticism—those who follow the testimony of ancient MSS, and those who are influenced by subjective considerations. Dr. Sanday (l.c. 636^b) says: 'We cannot doubt that both these types of text existed early in the 2nd cent. Either may be original. And this is just one of those cases where internal evidence is strongly in favour of the text which we call Western. The temptation to expand was much stronger than to contract; and the double mention of the Cup raises real difficulties of the kind which suggest interpolation.' See also a full discussion of the Lukan account of the Institution by Mr. Blakiston, in JThSt, July 1903, p. 548 f. Dr. Lambert (ib. Jan. 1903) well sums up the arguments and authorities for adhering to the Received Text.

§ As there is a v.l. harmonizing the text of Mk. with that of Mt. and Lk., we may compare Mt 27⁶³, where the text is certain.

The hurried proceedings of the night suggest an attempt to secure a condemnation within a limited time. This is intelligible if the Feast had not begun; otherwise it is hard to see why men who were, in that case, willing to try a prisoner on the first day should have scrupled about extending the proceedings to any necessary length.

(3) The third indication of time presents some difficulty. On a day called 'the first day of Azuma' preparations were made for the Feast, according to Mt. (26¹⁷) and Mk. (14¹²), at the suggestion of the Twelve; according to all three (Mt 26^{18, 19}, Mk 14¹⁰⁻¹⁶, Lk 22⁷⁻¹³), with the consent and at the command of the Master. Strictly speaking, the πρώτη τῶν ἀζύμων would indicate the 15th Nisan, for the period during which leaven was prohibited commenced with the Paschal meal, following the slaying of the Paschal lamb in the closing hours of 14th Nisan. So late a date for the πρώτη is precluded by the circumstances of the narrative; but it is incredible that Mt. could make an erroneous statement in a matter connected with the greatest solemnity of the whole of the Jewish sacred year. The reasonable conclusion is, that, in a popular way of speaking, a day before the legal day had acquired the name of 'First day of Azuma,' and not unfitly, if on that day early arrangements were commenced for the complete exclusion of leaven from the houses.* Mk., bearing in mind, as often, the needs of non-Jewish readers, adds, ὅτε τὸ πάσχα ἔθνον. The point of time need not be pressed too strictly; the gloss is no more than an explanation that the season of Azuma was the time of the offering of the Passover. The expression in Lk. is more difficult. In 22⁷ we read, ἦλθεν δὲ ἡ ἡμέρα τῶν ἀζύμων, ἐν ᾗ ἔδει θύεσθαι τὸ πάσχα. But there was more than one day of Azuma. In v. 1 he had written ἤγγιζεν δὲ ἡ ἑορτή τ. ἀζ. It looks as if ἡμέρα below was equivalent to ἑορτή above—not 24 hours, but a period;‡ or else there is some little inexactitude in a mere reference to an observance which it was unnecessary for the purpose of the narrative to describe precisely.

(4) The fourth note of time is given by the ὄψις γενομένης of Mt 26³⁰ and Mk 14¹⁷.§ These verses immediately follow the statement that the disciples 'made ready the Passover.' The natural interpretation is to take them as indicative of the evening of the day when the Upper Room was engaged. We have therefore another date, from which we may argue backwards to the limitations of the πρώτη τ. ἀζ. It ended with sunset on the night of the Betrayal. It began with the preceding sunset. At any time during those 24 hours

* Wieseler, quoting from the Talmudical tract Pesachim, that the search for leaven in houses must be made in the night preceding 14th Nisan, in order that it might be put away by mid-day, and nothing leavened eaten afterwards, argues that the day before the Passover was made ready was reckoned as belonging to the Feast of Unleavened Bread. See Chronological Synopsis of the Four Gospels, tr. Venables, pp. 334, 335, and art. Passover in Hastings' DB (W. J. Moulton), vol. iii. p. 600. Peiritz (op. cit. pp. 28, 29, 33, 34) describes the arrangements made by Jews on the day before the legal Preparation day, and adds: 'There is a very intelligible reason why that Thursday should, in a subordinate sense, —loosely, we may allow,—be called the first day of unleavened bread.'

† It is omitted by some authorities; but the attestation is insufficient, nor would the omission affect the translation—'when it behoved,' or 'in which'; see Winer's Grammar, iii. § xxxi. 9, a.

‡ Many examples occur of the use of ἡμέρα for a period of long duration; but it is then regarded in contrast to conditions which may be described as 'night,'—e.g. Ro 13¹²; or as the time when certain conditions are realized,—e.g. 2 Co 6², to which latter sense belongs the oft-recurring expression 'day of the Lord,' or 'my day' (Jn 8⁵⁶); but there seems no exact parallel to the use we have supposed of ἡμέρα as equivalent to ἡμέραι. Yet, if we limit the term to the 'first day,' the remainder of the sentence is inexact, the lamb being slain before the legal 'first day' began. It seems impossible to treat the sentence as rigidly and historically accurate, in the terms in which the text has come to us.

§ Of the 'two evenings,' it is better to take this as the second, rather than the first, which would be our 'late afternoon.'

it is permissible to place the commencement by the disciples of preparations for a Passover which would be kept in circumstances they never anticipated. According to our present argument, the Master had passed into Paradise before the Passover was eaten. That would not prevent the disciples complying with the requirements of the Law, except in so far as some might have contracted ceremonial defilement during the events of Good Friday. But this would not apply to all; and here may be found the explanation of the preparations. The Master permitted the disciples to make ready for what was legally requisite; but He made this the occasion of suitable provision for the new Passover which He designed to provide, but of which they, as yet, knew nothing.

Parallel with the ὄψια of the first two Evangelists is an interesting expression in Lk 22¹⁴ ὅτε ἐγένετο ἡ ὥρα. While in itself absolutely vague, in connexion with the preceding words, 'they made ready the Passover,' it would naturally indicate the commencement of 15th Nisan, when the lamb was eaten; but in view of considerations already stated, we must reject such interpretation, and read the term in connexion with what follows, and is peculiar to Lk., 'with desire I have desired to eat this Passover with you before I suffer.' The ὥρα was the Master's time for one of the great acts of His incarnate life, not a particular division of a particular day in the Jewish calendar. So it is used in v.⁵³ below—ἡ ὥρα ὑμῶν ἐστὶν ἡ ὥρα, 'your time,' 'opportunity.'*

(5) The appellation paraskeuē affords yet another mark of time. There were paraskeuai before various days. In connexion with our present inquiry we note the Preparation of the Sabbath (Mk 15⁴², Lk 23⁵⁴), and the Preparation of the Passover (Jn 19¹⁴). On this latter paraskeuē our Lord stood before Pilate, and was condemned (Jn. l.c.). Therefore the Passover had not yet been eaten; much less could the day before have been the Day of the Passover. But the day of the condemnation and crucifixion was also the pro-sabbaton (Lk 23⁵⁴, cf. Mk 15⁴²). In that year the two paraskeuai coincided, and the first day of unleavened bread was also the Sabbath; hence St. John calls that Sabbath 'an high day' (19³¹). The paraskeuē was our Friday,† Nisan 14, and the day of the crucifixion.

3. (i.) St. John was one of the two disciples who were specially charged with the Paschal preparations. It is recognized that the evidence afforded by his narrative is absolutely plain and consistent. It has been said that he silently corrects the others.‡ From our point of view, as we hold that they preclude the notion that the Last Supper was a Passover, St. John adds the emphatic testimony of an eye-witness to our conclusion. The Supper was before the feast of the Passover (13¹); it was supposed that it might be necessary to buy what there was need of against the feast (13²⁹); several hours later some of the rulers had not yet eaten the Passover (18²⁸); § the following

* Cf. the same use of ὥρα by Christ at Cana (Jn 2⁴), and a similar sense in 1 Jn 2¹⁸.

† Paraskeuē is rendered in the Pesh. by 'arubhta, which is from a root meaning to set (of the sun). It became the name of Friday in the use of the Syrians, 'because on that day the sun set and darkness reigned' (see Payne-Smith, Theo. Syr. col. 2984). Herein is preserved a tradition of the day of the Crucifixion, accepted with such confidence that from it the sixth day derived its name, as the first day has been known from earliest times as the Lord's day, because it was the day of the Resurrection. Cf. Mr. Turner's remarks, l.c. p. 411 f.

‡ So Mr. Turner in art. quoted above.
§ The Passover, which was slain 'between the evenings' of Nisan 14, was usually eaten in the early hours of the night following, for time must be allowed for taking the lamb to the house and roasting it. This would be the commencement of Nisan 15 (see Ex 12⁸). But Ex 12¹⁰, Nu 9¹², and Dt 16⁴ suggest the possibility of extending the time of eating, provided all was day, when Jesus was crucified, was the preparation of the Passover (19¹⁴). Language could hardly be more distinct; and some evidence, which seems to support a different view, can be explained. Taking St. John's words in their natural sense, and reading them without prejudice, no one would gather from them that the Supper described by him was the Passover. It seems reasonable to demand that the less distinct and somewhat inexact language of the other three should be interpreted in the light of the last account.

(ii.) It has been claimed by some that the account of the meal in the three Evangelists agrees with the ritual of a Passover; by others, that no trace of a Passover can be found in it. To us, we confess, it seems that the details of a Paschal celebration have been discovered after the importation of ideas which are not on the surface of the narrative. The initial statement that Jesus sat down with the Twelve (ἀνέκειτο, Mt 26²⁰; ἀνέπεσεν, Lk 22¹⁴) is against the usual interpretation of the directions given in Ex 12¹¹: it is supposed that a change of posture had been admitted in later times. The two cups of wine are regarded as two of the four or five which were handed round at the feast; but in view of the serious difference of opinion amongst critics as to the genuineness of the reading in Lk., which gives the notice of a second cup, it seems unfair to press this identification. The dish in which the sop was dipped is identified with the dish of haroseth, a kind of sauce,* which was an adjunct of the Paschal meal; but this is an assumption, rather than a deduction from evidence. The hymn sung on leaving the upper chamber is identified with the Hallel (Pss. 115–118) sung at the conclusion of the Passover ritual; but ὕμνεῖν (Mt 26³⁰, Mk 14²⁶) does not necessarily denote the use of a particular composition, and in Eph 5¹⁹, Col 3¹⁶, ὕμνοι are distinguished from ψαλμοί.

(iii.) Those who fail to discover traces of a Passover meal in the accounts of the Last Supper, who point to the absence of allusion to a lamb, and generally to the weakness of the evidence adduced, may reasonably claim an argument e silentio for what that is worth. It may be added that the supposition of the disciples, that the preparations for the feast were not complete (Jn 13²⁹), seems strange indeed if they were already keeping the feast. Preparation for the Passover was so important in the eyes of the Jews, that the day preceding had derived its appellation of paraskeuē from their scrupulous care; see Mt 27⁶².

4. We can now tabulate the order of the sacred days in accordance with the conclusions at which we have arrived. It will be convenient to use the modern names for the days. In the early morning of Sunday our Lord rose. This tradition is universally accepted, and further discussion would be superfluous. The Saturday was the 'first day of unleavened bread' (for the eating of unleavened bread began legally with the Paschal meal),† and was Nisan 15. Friday, Nisan 14, was the official Preparation Day. Between it and the commencement of Nisan 15 the lamb was slain and eaten. Thursday evening was the beginning of the paraskeuē, and some hours before that the exclusion of leaven commenced, from which custom, as we have suggested, the day had acquired the popular appellation of 'first day of Azuma.' This was the 13th consumed before morning light. But it was already morning (Mt 27:2) when the Jews objected to enter the Judgment Hall (Jn 19²⁸) lest they should be debarred from eating the Passover. Therefore they could not have contemplated eating of a lamb slain the afternoon before. They must have anticipated a Passover in the hours to follow. Every scrap of evidence tends to confirm the view for which we contend.

* Its nature is described in Buxtorf, Lex. Talmud. col. 831.

† Ex 12⁸; but in later practice, for greater strictness, leaven was excluded earlier. See note *, p. 6^b above.

of Nisan, and began with sunset on Wednesday evening. During the 24 hours which followed Wednesday afternoon, the disciples began to make ready for the Passover. On Thursday evening (Mt 26²⁹, Mk 14¹⁷) Jesus sat down with them for the Last Supper; and this, according to St. John (13¹), was before the Passover.

5. But our Lord called that Thursday evening meal a 'passover'—ταῦτο τὸ πάσχα, Lk 22¹⁵. As we have shown that the meal preceded the legal Passover by some 24 hours, there are but two explanations of the words recorded by St. Luke—(i.) an anticipatory celebration was held, or (ii.) πάσχα is used in a mystical sense.

(i.) An anticipation of the Passover might have been either (a) from a desire to keep with the disciples a rite which, on the legal and customary day, would be precluded by the crucifixion; or (b) with the intention of reverting to a more exact date, and correcting an error in time which had crept into the Jewish calculations.* The impossibility of procuring the sacrifice of a lamb except on the day commonly observed, would have been fatal to any such plan. (1) Our Lord was not a householder, but a guest. It would be usual, perhaps, in such a case, to share in the lamb offered by the householder. This would require the assent of the householder to an abnormal, and apparently illegal, arrangement. Or if (2) we suppose that the thirteen were to constitute a family, and have their lamb to themselves, there would still be, as there would be in the former case also, the insuperable difficulty of getting the lamb killed by the priests before the legal day. (3) It has been supposed that there was a difference of opinion between Jewish schools as to the date of the Passover; but this argument, if it has, which is doubtful, any foundation, is of no value in the present inquiry. One party only was paramount at a time; there is no proof that there was a choice of dates for the celebration.† If, however, by an 'anticipatory Passover' is meant an imitative meal, with herbs and unleavened bread and wine, but without a lamb,‡ this is not forbidden by the second explanation of our Lord's words; yet we doubt whether such an imitation of the reality would have been contemplated. It seems so utterly alien to Jewish sentiment,§ as to be inconceivable for the deliberate act of One who held the Law in honour. Moreover, the act could hardly have been kept secret, even if the 'goodman of the house' had respectfully submitted to what would have greatly shocked his religious sentiments. Some rumour must have reached the ears of those who were willing to bear witness

* The Rev. Matthew Power, S.J., in his learned and elaborate essay, Anglo-Jewish Calendar for every day in the Gospels, says, 'Our Lord, keeping to the lunar-legal computation, partook of His last supper on Thursday evening, Nisan 14. . . . The Jews, in obedience to the popular reckoning, had their Paschal Supper on Friday evening. . . . The Synoptists adopt, like our Lord, the strict lunar-legal mode of reckoning; the Fourth Gospel elects to follow the popular style.' Even if the rule of Badhu was already in force, as Father Matthew supposes, there remains the difficulty, which writers shirk, of any one obtaining the sacrifice of the lamb before the hour appointed by the priests. Stapfer is one of the few who recognize the difficulty; but he overcomes it by rejecting the Johanne account and accepting the others. See Palestine in the time of Christ, p. 323f. Cl. JE ix. 553.

† Mt 26² and parallels compared with Jn 13¹ do not suggest any difference of practice as to the date of observing the anniversary.

‡ Caspari (Chron. Geogr. Einleit.), referring to Pesachim x., supposes the Supper to have been a Mazoth meal, of which the essential element was unleavened cakes (mazoth), with or without a lamb, eaten everywhere, and by all—for all were required to eat unleavened bread, though only the ceremonially clean were permitted to partake of the lamb—such meals being still observed in the present age.

§ Jews . . . would consider it a shocking piece of profanation to enact anything resembling the great Paschal meal the evening before its time.' Peiritz (himself a Jew), op. cit. p. 30.

against Jesus. On such evidence a most damaging charge could have been founded; yet not a word of such charge is found in the records of the trial.*

(ii.) Seeing then that a literal interpretation of πάσχα in our Lord's words to the Twelve is precluded by the conditions of the occasion, we adopt the alternative, and understand 'passover' to be here used in a mystical sense.† In such sense undoubtedly He spoke when He called the bread His body, and the wine His blood. Whatever opinion may be held of the nature of the presence in the Eucharist, the bread and the wine were then before His sacrifice, as they are now after His resurrection, His body and His blood in a mystical and spiritual sense. His promise to drink wine with them in the Kingdom of God (Mt 26²⁹, Mk 14²⁵, Lk 22¹⁸) was conveyed in the same terms of mystery; for in the kingdom of redemption there is no place for the Jewish Passover,—that has waxed old and vanished,—and still less can a literal fulfilment be conceived as having hereafter a place in the kingdom of glory. Yet in that kingdom there will be a feast, the mystical and spiritual supper of the Lamb, where the host will be the real Passover, of which the annual victims were the figures; He who is therefore called by St. Paul, 'Christ our passover.'‡

6. It has been thought that the Last Supper, while not an imitation, was celebrated with some outward features which connected it with the annual Passover, although the chief characteristic, the lamb, was absent.§ It may have been so. Perhaps there was unleavened bread, and the dish of bitter herbs; but the narratives contain not a word to favour such a supposition. They seem to describe an ordinary Eastern meal,|| with the one dish in the centre, into which all the guests put their hands. The usual custom of giving the complimentary sop was observed, and wine was passed round. We believe that the Last Supper was in form only an ordinary repast, but that it was attended by the exceptional circumstances of the washing of the feet by the host, the mystic acts with bread and wine, and the strange, prophetic, and spiritual utterances of a long discourse. As we attempt to portray the scene, the outlines

* The Rev. G. H. Box has contended with much ability in an article in JThSt, April 1902, that not the Passover, but the weekly Kiddush, which preceded the meal on the eve of the Sabbath, is the antecedent of the Eucharist. In this case our Lord must have celebrated it 24 hours earlier; but Mr. Box supposes that He often celebrated Kiddush; there was Kiddush of Passover and of Pentecost, and other occasions, besides the weekly Sanctification. In the January number of JThSt the Rev. Dr. Lambert, replying to Mr. Box's argument, that the evidence of the first three Evangelists is self-contradictory, follows Chwolson by supposing an error in the text. We make no supposition, but offer an explanation of the traditional evidence.

† Dr. J. Armitage Robinson expresses himself in harmony with our view: 'The Eucharist had, in its earliest form, an element in common with the ordinary Jewish meal, which was sanctified by thanksgivings uttered over the bread and over the cup. . . . Our conception of the original institution must not be dominated by the consideration of the elaborate ceremonial of the Passover celebration. Such a consideration belongs rather to the subsequent development of the Eucharist as a Christian rite' (art. 'Eucharist' in Encyc. Bibl. coll. 1419, 1420).

‡ Our Lord was pleased to veil the meaning of His words in many ways. Besides prophecies of His death, which were misunderstood (Mk 9³²), and parables, which were not explained to all (Mt 13¹¹), and figures, as sleep for death (Jn 11¹¹), He spoke in mystery of His body as a temple (Jn 2¹⁹), of birth by water and the Spirit (3⁵), of eating His flesh and drinking His blood (6⁵³). So, we believe, He called the Supper 'this Passover,' not in the literal, but in a mystical sense.

§ This title of the Saviour, although of such frequent occurrence in ecclesiastical and theological language, occurs in the NT only at 1 Co 5⁷, the writer being St. Paul, who was intimately associated with the only Evangelist who records (Lk 22¹⁵) that our Lord spoke of His Last Supper as ταῦτο τὸ πάσχα.

are simple, homely, ordinary; but the whole is pervaded by an air of mystery. It was not the Passover of Moses, but it was the initiation of the Passover of Christ.* But see PASSOVER (II.).

7. When we pass from the sacred narratives to Patristic tradition, we encounter controversy about the date of Easter which lasted for several generations, but produced no decision as to the nature of the Last Supper. The early separation of the Church from the Synagogue, although inevitable, was a loss to the former. Gentile converts found themselves the inheritors of rites and Scriptures derived from Jewish believers whose language and ideas they understood but imperfectly; hence the opinion obtained some credence, that Christ celebrated an anticipatory Passover; for they overlooked the insuperable hindrances to such an act which the Jewish customs would present. But one tradition has an important bearing on our inquiry. The Primitive Church had no scruple about the use of leavened bread in the Eucharist. Such has been the immemorial custom of the unchanging East; while in the West (as few would now deny), the use of unleavened wafers was brought in during the Middle Ages. If our Lord instituted the Sacrament at a Paschal Supper, He used, of necessity, unleavened bread. The desire to imitate His acts would, surely, if He had consecrated in unleavened, have found expression in an opinion that ordinary bread was inadmissible. There is no ancient tradition, of universal acceptance, that the sacramental bread must be unleavened. The use of ordinary bread is an unconscious admission that the Last Supper was not a Passover.†

8. The discussion of this question is not merely academical. The practice of some Christians has been affected by the views entertained of the nature of the Last Supper. On the supposition that it was a Passover, it has been contended that the use of unleavened bread is obligatory in the Eucharist. The teetotaler extends the exclusion of leaven to the chalice, and demands the use of unfermented wine. Many love to think that they can find the words sung after the Supper in the Psalms of the Paschal Hallel. But the conclusions at which we have arrived lend no authority to the exclusion of leaven from the Lord's Table, and are inconsistent with many expressions in well-known Communion Hymns, and in books of Sacramental devotion.‡ There may be practical reasons for the use of wafers in preference to cubes of ordinary bread. As to what is called 'unfermented wine,' a previous question arises, whether mere grape juice is true wine. But whatever may be deemed most suitable for the sacramental elements in present-day use, our contention is that the Holy Mysteries were first administered at an ordinary meal, and with ordinary bread and wine for their outward and visible form.

LAUGHTER.

The two words found in NT for 'laughter' correspond almost exactly in significance with the two commonly occurring in OT. καταγελᾶω (Mt 9²⁴ || Mk 5⁴⁰ and Lk 8⁵³) = 227, which always means scornful, derisive laughter (c.g. Pr 17⁵, Is 37²², Ps 24). On the other hand, γελᾶω (Lk 6²¹) = 227, which is the more general term, and while sometimes implying derision (as in Job 30¹, Pr 12⁶), is more usually found in the sense of merry laughter, as opposed to the gloom of sadness (c.g. Pr 20⁹, Ec 3⁴ 22 10¹⁹, Pr 14¹³). But, while in OT these words and others denoting mirth and gleefulness are often found, their parallels are very rare in NT. Beyond the two passages already mentioned, there is only one (Ja 4⁹) in which laughter is referred to,—and this is obviously a reminiscence of Christ's sayings as reported in Lk 6²¹, 25,—and one other in which jesting (εὐτραπέλιᾶ) * is forbidden to the Christian by St. Paul (Eph 5⁴). The word which does occur in NT, and which is characteristic of it, is χαρά (53 times), χαίρω (6 times); but this is almost always a restrained and chastened joy rather than one which breaks out into laughter—describing the condition of the mind rather than the expression of the emotions. A stronger word, implying more emotional demonstration, is ἀγαλλίαω; see esp. Lk 10²¹, where it seems to be implied that Jesus manifested His joy by outward signs; the word in 14⁴⁴ 6²³ (σκιρτάω) is stronger still, and can hardly be used except where almost extravagant demonstrations of pleasure are intended.

It has been too readily inferred from the comparative absence in NT of allusions to mirth, that Jesus was characterized by a certain sobriety of demeanour which precludes us from thinking of Him as ever laughing or even smiling, and that Christianity from the first discouraged anything in the form of laughter-provoking mirth. Thus the statements—'We are never told that (Jesus) laughed, while we are once told that He wept' (Farrar, Life of Christ, p. 242); 'we never read that Jesus laughed, and but once that He rejoiced in spirit' (Jer. Taylor), and similar statements are based on nothing more than a dim and untrustworthy tradition,† and convey an impression which is far from being warranted by the general tenor of the Gospel narrative. The common use of the title 'Man of Sorrows,' dictated no doubt by the deepest motives, and the conventional portraits of Christ, showing Him always pensive and often sorrowful, have been responsible for fostering the thought of a Christ who was constantly grave, if not sad. A writer like Renan goes to the opposite extreme; but there is at least as much support for his representation of a teacher whose 'sweet gaiety constantly found expression in lively reflexions and kindly pleasantries.'‡ What evidence there is, indeed, is on the whole against the traditional view. Jesus definitely dissociated Himself from the austere school of His time (Lk 5^{30ff.}, Mt 9¹⁴, Mk 2¹⁸); He made it a habit to enter convivial assemblies, and was a guest at feasts where laughter, jest, and song were a part of the order of the day; § He watched, if He did not join in, the merry games of children (Lk 7³²), and loved their company. He chose, as an analogy for the joy of God over a redeemed soul, the exuberant merry-making (Lk 15^{23, 25}) of a father to whom his son was restored,* and in bidding His disciples rejoice in their very tribulations, uses a word which suggests vehement demonstrations of joy (Lk 6²³). There is nothing in the Gospels to encourage the supposition that He frowned upon innocent mirth or checked its exhibition in His followers. On the contrary, on one occasion at least, He declined to interfere with a spontaneous outburst of exhilaration on their part (Lk 19³⁷). He bade them, even when they fasted, not be of a sad countenance (Mt 6¹⁶), and His chief concern was not so much to regulate the manner of their joy as to purify its motive (Lk 10²⁰).

Against the a priori view that Jesus never laughed, a view which is based upon a misdirected reverence and a one-sided conception of His nature, has to be set the consideration that such a view tends to dehumanize the 'Son of Man.' The faculty for laughter, as recent psychologists have shown, is eminently human, and its absence is a defect.† There may be saintly men to whom anything like boisterous hilarity is impossible, but he whose face is never lit with a smile, and whose voice never has the infectious ring of joy, is lacking in full-orbed humanity (cf. Carlyle, Sartor, ad init.). If Jesus showed the natural emotions of sorrow, there is every reason to suppose that He showed those of joy.

There is as little support for the view that the NT encourages a religion in which laughter finds no legitimate place. The first disciples of Jesus, like those of St. Francis, who became known as joculatores Domini, appear to have shown a vivacity and cheerfulness in complete contrast to the rigid and frigid demeanour engendered by Pharisaism; and this attitude was encouraged by their Master, who did not expect 'the sons of the bride-chamber' to mourn so long as the 'bridegroom' was with them (Mt 9¹⁵, cf. 15¹⁻²).

But there is more to be said. Nearly all the world's greatest teachers have employed laughter, in one or other of its subtler forms, as a means of gaining a hearing for the truth they had to deliver. Was Jesus an exception to this rule? Is there any real reason for refusing to apply to His case the saying, Evidentem dicere verum quid vetat? Can it be said that He never used the Socratic method of proving the reasonableness of His teaching by showing the incongruous and even ridiculous position in which those who rejected it involved themselves? It has been very generally assumed that such a method was beneath the dignity, or foreign to the nature of the Son of God. Thus it is said, 'He brought peace wherever He came, but He never awakened mirth . . . The inquiry whether Jesus had the sense of humour is not simply trivial and irreverent; it betrays a fundamental misconception of that holy life of redeeming love.'‡ The question, however, cannot be so easily disposed of. In the Gospels there are sayings of Jesus which a rational exegesis finds it almost impossible to explain apart from the assumption that they show a vein of humour. Indeed, the writer just quoted admits that Jesus 'deigned to make use of the quaint and often humorous maxims so dear to the common folk.' It is allowed by writers of the most orthodox school that irony and satire were used by Jesus upon occasion; if He saw fit to employ these sterner weapons, the gentler one of humour would not be beneath Him. When Jesus says to the Jews, 'Many good works have I showed you from my Father; for which of these works do ye stone me?' the touch of irony is unmistakable (Jn 10³²),* as it is also in the expression 'everlasting tents' (Lk 16⁹). When He says to His disciples, 'Sleep on now' (Mk 14⁴¹), it is in a tone of gentle raillery; † and His conversation with the Syro-phœnician woman is in the same tone (7^{25ff.}). His answer to the lawyer, 'This do and thou shalt live,' seems to be most naturally interpreted as ironical (Lk 10²⁸). The reply to His critics, 'I came not to call the righteous, but sinners' (Mk 2¹⁷), is in the same vein, as is the passage, 'Full well (καλῶς) do ye reject the commandment of God' (7⁹). In Mt 6², literalists have sought in vain to prove that it was a practice among Pharisaic almsgivers to 'sound a trumpet'; obviously the passage is satirical. The element of satire runs through the scathing denunciations of the Pharisees and scribes (23, etc.). But the crucial instance is the parable of the Unjust Steward (Lk 16¹⁻⁹). Commentators have exhausted their ingenuity in devising all possible and impossible explanations of Christ's commendation of the steward, through failing to see that the whole passage is sarcastic, pouring laughter upon the futile trust that men put in the power of mammon; v. 9 in particular is 'a sudden turn of the sublimest and most crushing irony.' ‡

But if it was in keeping with the mission of Jesus that He should use irony, still more natural was it that humour (wh. see) should enter into His speech. Humour is in its nature both human and humane. The greatest humorists have been the best lovers of men and the most endowed with sympathy (e.g. 'gentle' Shakspeare and Charles Lamb). The foremost religious teachers have almost invariably been possessed of humour, and have proved the truth of Milton's dictum (Preface to Animadversions upon the Remonstrant) that 'the vein of laughing hath ofttimes a strong and sinewy force in teaching and confuting.' It is probable that the reluctance, which has existed from early times, to admit any tone of raillery or playfulness in Christ's teaching, has been responsible for the loss of the original force of some of His sayings. Jesus has suffered from His reporters. Yet enough passages remain to show that this element was often present. The pictures of a man endeavouring to serve two masters at once (Mt 6²⁴), of another who feeds swine with pearls (7⁸), of a camel trying to get through a needle's eye (19²⁴), of a light being put under a bushel (5¹⁵), of him who sees a splinter in his brother's eye, but fails to notice the beam in his own (7³), of Beelzebub at variance with Beelzebub (12^{24ff.}), of men who have eyes but do not see (Mk 8¹⁸), of one blind man guiding another (Mt 15¹⁴), of a father who should give his son a stone instead of a loaf (7⁹)—these are all instances of that perception of the incongruous which is the soul of humour.§ We know that Jesus sometimes used words with a play upon their meaning (Lk 5¹⁰, Mt 4¹⁰, Lk 9⁶⁰). The ready way in which He answers a question by propounding another which at first seems irrelevant (Mt 20²² 21²⁴), His unexpected manner of turning the tables upon a critic (Lk 7^{36ff.}), His use of illustrations which would cause, by their homely aptness, an involuntary smile (Mk 2²¹, Lk 11⁵), His epigrammatic way of putting a truth so as to give a sudden satisfaction (Mk 2²⁷), and His use of daring hyperbole (Lk 19⁴⁰),|| are indications that Jesus thought it not beneath Him to laugh with those that laugh.

On this whole subject nothing can be more just than the words of A. B. Bruce (Parabolic Teaching of Christ, p. 149) :

'With pathos often goes humour, and so it is in the parables. . . . The spirit of Jesus was too earnest to indulge in idle mirth; but just because He was so earnest and so sympathetic, He expressed Himself at times in a manner which provokes a smile; laughter and tears, as it were, mingling in His eyes as He spake. It were a false propriety which took for granted that an expositor was necessarily off the track, because in his interpretation of these parables an element of holy playfulness appears blended with the deep seriousness which pervades them throughout.'

LAW.—The question of Christ's relation to the Jewish law is one of fundamental importance for the origin of Christianity, but at the same time one of peculiar difficulty. The difficulty arises, to some extent, from the fact that His own teaching marks a period of transition, when the old was already antiquated, while the new was still unborn. A further difficulty is created by the relation in which the actual conduct of Jesus stood to the principles which He laid down. Moreover, the question arises whether His attitude remained the same through the whole course of His ministry, or whether He came to realize that His fundamental principles carried Him further than He had at first anticipated. Lastly, when we remember how bitter was the strife which this very question aroused in the primitive Church, the misgiving is certainly not unreasonable, that this may have been reflected back into the life of the Founder, and sayings placed in His mouth endorsing one of the later partisan views. Our present subject is that of the Ceremonial Law.

It must be clearly recognized that the distinction between moral and ceremonial law is not one sanctioned in the Law itself. All its parts alike were the command of God. The distinction has maintained its vitality in virtue of a praiseworthy ethical interest. The antinomianism of St. Paul seemed to endanger morality, and those who could not rise to his point of view, that it was precisely in this way that morality was secured, turned Christianity into a new legalism, and explained his doctrine that the Law was abolished to mean that Christians were no longer compelled to practise Jewish ceremonies. This was, of course, to reduce much that he said to the unmeaning. It is precisely the moral law that St. Paul had chiefly in mind. The Decalogue is described as 'the ministration of death written and engraven on stones' (2 Co 37 RV); and, to illustrate the sin-producing effects of the Law, St. Paul quotes one of the Ten Commandments (Ro 7). His doctrine was unquestionably that the Law as a whole was done away for all who were in Christ, inasmuch as they had crucified the flesh, which was the home of sin, and thus had lost everything to which the Law could appeal as provocation to sin, while they had escaped into the freedom of the Spirit, and could therefore no longer be under the constraint of the Law. But even St. Paul was forced to recognize that his magnificent idealism was not milk for babes, hence moral exhortation found a large place in his Epistles, side by side with the loftiest assertions of a Christian's freedom from sin, flesh, and the Law. But St. Paul is quite explicit that this freedom is to be strenuously maintained in the sphere of Jewish ceremonies, especially circumcision, and sacred days and seasons. On the other hand, a party in the Early Church insisted passionately on the permanent validity of the Law, and especially of circumcision, as essential to salvation. It lies beyond our limits to trace the history of this controversy, but a reference to it is necessary for the reason already indicated.

Jesus was Himself born into a Jewish home, and the rites prescribed by the Jewish law were scrupulously fulfilled in His case. His parents did not belong to the ranks of the Pharisees, hence His early training was healthier than that of St. Paul; but He, like His great Apostle, was born under the Law (Gal 4), and initiated by circumcision into the Covenant on the eighth day (Lk 2²¹). His mother presented Him as her firstborn male child to the Lord in the Temple, and offered the sacrifice of purification prescribed in the Law (Lk 2²²⁻²⁴), and thus 'accomplished all things that were according to the law of the Lord' (Lk 2³⁹). Joseph and Mary went up each year to the feast of the Passover at Jerusalem (Lk 2⁴¹). So far as we can see, Jesus Himself was a strict observer of the Law. Whatever His attitude towards it during His ministry, we may assume without question that, till He was conscious of His Messianic vocation, His obedience to the Law was scrupulously and heartily rendered. It lay in the nature of the case, however, that the old bottles of Judaism should be unfit to receive the new wine of the Kingdom with which He knew Himself to be intrusted. The question whether this was clear to Him from the first, or whether it became clear only in the course of His controversy with the scribes, cannot be answered with certainty, in view of the doubt which hangs over the chronology of the ministry. And His conduct here was regulated by much the same need for reserve as He practised in reference to His self-revelation as Messiah. A premature declaration would have created an extremely difficult situation. All He could do was to utter His principles and leave the practical inferences to be drawn, when the time was ripe, by those who shared His spirit.

On one great branch of this question, however, Jesus expressed Himself clearly and without compromise. The morbid anxiety of the scribes to make a hedge about the Law so that all possible approaches to its violation might be blocked, added to the hair-splitting casuistry in which moralists of their type delighted, and the lawyer's instinct for precise and exhaustive definition, had led to the elaboration of the precepts in the Law into a vast system of tradition. Moreover, the heavier the burden grew, the greater grew the temptation to find a literal fulfilment which should be an escape from the spirit. All this apparatus of piety demanded leisure to master and perform, such leisure as no man with his daily bread to earn could command; hence arose a morality unfitted for the normal human life. Against all this tradition Jesus entered an emphatic protest. His attitude towards it was wholly different from that which He assumed towards the written Law. The scribes made void by their tradition the word of God, and every plant which His heavenly Father had not planted He said should be rooted up. Nevertheless, in vindicating the Law against the tradition, He enunciated principles which pointed forward to the abolition of both. The points on which He came into conflict with Jewish ceremonialism were Fasting, the law of Uncleanness, the Temple service, and the cancelling of primary human duties by feigned respect for duties to God.

1. If the order of incidents in the Gospel of St. Mark could be accepted as chronological, the first collision of Jesus with the representatives of the tradition was occasioned by His eating with publicans and sinners at the house of Levi (Mk 2^{15ff.}). Although stress cannot be laid on the order in which the incidents are narrated, this furnishes us with an excellent illustration of the way in which the fundamental ideas of Jesus brought Him into conflict with the religious prejudices of His time. His doctrine of the Fatherhood of God and of the incomparable value of the human soul were fundamental convictions. To this was added the consciousness of His own mission to restore the lost children to their Father. Hence He met the criticism of His conduct in associating with the degraded by the explanation that He was a physician, and where was the physician's place but in the midst of the sick? There is indeed a terrible irony in the words, for there were none whose moral and religious health was, to the eyes of Jesus, in a more desperate condition than that of His critics. But scandalized as they might be by conduct so unprofessional on the part of a teacher, there was an obvious conclusiveness in the reply of Jesus which could have been evaded only by the assertion that the salvation of such people was not desirable. The two types of holiness emerge in clear contradiction—the type which seeks to avoid all contact with the contaminating in order that personal purity may not be compromised, and the type that is entirely forgetful of self in its zeal for the regeneration of others. It is in connexion with a similar accusation that St. Luke relates the parables of the Lost Sheep, the Lost Drachma, and the Lost Son (Lk 15). Similarly Christ's lodging with Zacchæus the publican gave rise to criticism; and here again Jesus explained His action by His mission: 'The Son of Man came to seek and to save that which was lost' (Lk 19¹⁰).

2. The second point in which the new type displayed a contrast with the old was in the matter of Fasting. Wonder was excited that, while the Pharisees and the disciples of the Baptist fasted, the disciples of Jesus neglected this religious exercise. The Pharisees fasted twice in the week, on Monday and Thursday. What fasts were observed by the disciples of John we do not know. But the distinction was not one simply between disciples, it went back to the leaders. The Baptist was an ascetic, clothed in camel's hair and a leathern girdle, with locusts and wild honey for his food; his congenial home was the desert, his message one of judgment to come, the axe already lying at the root of the tree. He came neither eating nor drinking, and this unsocial disposition called forth the charge that he had a devil. Jesus, on the other hand, was no ascetic; so little of an ascetic, in fact, that His enemies taxed Him with over-indulgence: 'The Son of Man came eating and drinking, and they say, Behold a gluttonous man and a winebibber, a friend of publicans and sinners' (Mt 11¹⁹). Jesus defends His disciples against the criticism implied in the question, 'Why do John's disciples and the disciples of the Pharisees fast, but thy disciples fast not?' (Mk 2¹⁸) by the answer, 'Can the sons of the bride-chamber fast while the bridegroom is with them? as long as they have the bridegroom with them they cannot fast.' The principle underlying this is that the external practice must be a spontaneous expression of the inward feeling. Fasting is out of place in their present circumstances, they have the bridegroom with them, therefore all is joy and festivity. It would be a piece of unreality to introduce into their present religious life an element so incongruous. But He proceeds: 'The days will come, when the bridegroom shall be taken away from them, and then will they fast in that day.' The reference is to His own death; and possibly the foreboding expressed should lead us to assign this incident to His later ministry, after the declaration of Messiahship had been made and the prediction of death had been uttered. On the other hand, the veiled allusion makes it possible that those who heard it would not catch His meaning, and we can, in that case, assign it to a late date only if we are clear that Jesus Himself became conscious at a comparatively late period in His ministry of the death that awaited Him. The incident itself rather makes the impression that it belongs to the earlier period of Christ's activity. This was one of the respects in which failure to conform to conventional piety would early attract attention.

Wellhausen regards the incident as unauthentic. He points to the curious fact that the question is one between the disciples of the Baptist and of Jesus, and draws the inference that it is a justification for the deviation of the later practice of Christ's followers from that of Jesus Himself, who in practice conformed strictly to the Judaism of His time. He confirms this by pointing out that as a matter of fact the bridegroom is not taken away from wedding festivities, and here therefore the choice of expression has been determined by the actual fact of Christ's removal by death. However plausible this suggestion may be, the sayings bear rather the stamp of Jesus than of the early Apostolic Church. The criticism of the disciples rather than of Jesus has its parallel in the incident of the plucking of the ears of corn on the Sabbath and the disciples eating with unwashed hands, and the temper of the Master was much freer than that of the timidly legalistic disciples.

In the Sermon on the Mount fasting is recognized as a fitting religious exercise; but, as in the case of prayer and almsgiving, it is essential, for its true religious quality to be preserved, that it should be practised without ostentation. The religious self-advertisement which characterized the Pharisees eviscerated these exercises of all their value. They were to be a secret between a man and his God. In the most rigorous fasts washing and anointing were forbidden (Taanith, i. 6), while they were allowed in the less severe (ib. i. 4 f.). Jesus bids His followers anoint the head and wash the face when they fast, that no one may be able to detect that they are fasting (Mt 6¹⁶⁻¹⁸). See FASTING.

Immediately following the defence of the disciples for not fasting, we have in all the Synoptics (Mt 9^{16f.}, Mk 2^{21f.}, Lk 5^{36f.}) the sayings about the undressed cloth and the new wine in the old wine-skins. The parables are difficult; the lesson taught is clearly the incompatibility of the new with the old, and the disaster that will inevitably follow any attempt to combine them. But it is by no means clear with what 'old' and 'new' should be identified, nor again can we assume that both parables express the same truth. It is possible, though improbable, that Jesus may intend by 'the old' the ancient piety of the Old Testament, and by 'the new' the new-fangled regulations of the scribes, His sense being that the old Divinely-given mode of life is being ruined by the tradition of men. But it is more likely that the usual view is right, according to which 'the old' is Judaism and 'the new' is the gospel. Even so, however, various interpretations are possible. Usually it has been thought that in both sayings Jesus is defending the attitude of His disciples: you cannot expect the new spirit of the gospel to be cast in the old moulds of Judaism; the new spirit must create new forms for itself. Weiss, however, considers that both parables constitute a defence of the attitude of John's disciples, they cannot be expected to combine the spirit of the Gospel with their legalist and ascetic habit of life (Bibl. Theol. of NT, i. 112). It is possible, however, that Beyschlag is correct in thinking that the parable of the undressed cloth on the old garment is a justification of John's disciples in fasting, while the parable of the new wine in the old bottles is a justification of the disciples of Jesus for refusing to follow their example (NT Theol. i. 114). The two sayings are connected by 'and,' it is true, but this conjunction has in the Synoptics a wider range of meaning than in English. Wellhausen finds the sayings difficult. He is not disposed to question their authenticity, though, as already mentioned, he strikes out the sayings immediately preceding.

3. Another point in which Jesus came into conflict with the tradition was that of Ablutions (Mk 7^{1ff.}). To secure that nothing ceremonially unclean should be eaten, the Jews were very scrupulous in washing the hands before meals. The laws of cleanness and uncleanness touch life so much more closely than any others, that the casuistry of the scribes naturally finds in this matter a large field of exercise. The largest of the six books of the Mishna is given up to this topic. The purification of vessels alone occupies thirty chapters of this book. The Pentateuch itself exhibits more than the usual tendency to casuistry in this matter, but the tradition left the Law out of sight in the elaborateness of its regulations. In the time of Jesus tradition had become very strict with reference to the washing of the hands. The practice originated with the Pharisees, but was adopted by almost all the Jews. Even when the hands were ceremonially clean it was necessary to wash them, no doubt to guard against the possibility of unconscious defilement. If they were known to be unclean, they had to be washed twice before a meal; they were also washed after food; and some Pharisees washed even between the courses. The hands were held with the fingers up, so that the uncleanness might be washed down from them; and for the ceremony to be effectual it was necessary that the water should run down to the wrist (though we should probably not translate πρὸς τὴν ῥαδίαν, Mk 7³, 'to the wrist'; see Swete, ad loc.). In Jn 2⁶ we read of the six stone water-pots for the water of purification at the marriage in Cana; and the same Gospel tells us how the Jews purified themselves for the Passover (11³⁰), or took precautions against defilement which would disqualify them from eating it (18²⁸).

It was therefore natural that the neglect of some of the disciples should evoke criticism; and this criticism was uttered by officials from Jerusalem who had come down to watch the new movement (Mk 7¹). No mention is made here of any violation of the tradition on the part of Jesus Himself; though in Lk 11³⁸ we are told that the Pharisee, at whose house Jesus was eating, was surprised that He neglected this ceremony. Jesus defended His disciples by a complete repudiation of the tradition. He pointed out that its effect was to nullify the Law rather than to establish it; and He illustrated this from the practice of dedicating to God that which ought to have been used by a man for the support of his parents. To this point it will be necessary to return. But in connexion with the question of hand-washing Jesus enunciated a principle of far-reaching importance which not only set aside the tradition, but even abrogated a large section of the Law. He asserted that not that which is without a man can, by going into him, defile him, but the things which proceed out of the man. The heart is the essential thing, food cannot come into contact with that; but it is in it that evil thoughts, words, or actions have their rise, and it is these that make a man unclean. Not what a man eats, but what he is, determines the question of his purity. Thus Jesus lifted the whole conception of cleanness and uncleanness out of the ceremonial into the ethical domain. But it is plain that this carried with it revolutionary conclusions, not only as to the tradition, but as to the Law; for much of the Law was occupied precisely with the uncleanness created by external things, and it is not improbable that St. Mark has definitely drawn this inference in his Gospel.

It is possible that the usual view taken of the passage, according to which the words 'making all meats clean' (Mk 7¹⁹) are the concluding words of Jesus, should be accepted. This involves, however, a grammatical irregularity, and we ought perhaps to adopt the view taken by Origen, Gregory Thaumaturgus, and Chrysostom, ably defended by Field (Notes on the Translation of the NT, pp. 31, 32) and adopted by RV, Weissäcker, Swete, Gould, Salmond, that they are the comment of the Evangelist, and that we should translate 'this he said, making all meats clean.' On the other hand, the notes of Menzies and Wellhausen on the passage may be consulted.

The evasion of the Law by the Tradition here asserted by Jesus has been affirmed by some Jewish scholars not to have existed. (The reader may consult an appendix on 'Legal Evasions of the Law,' by Dr. Schechter in Montefiore's Hibbert Lectures, pp. 557-563; an article by Montefiore on 'Jewish Scholarship and Christian Silence' in the Hibbert Journal for Jan. 1903; the rejoinder to this by Menzies in July 1903, with a further rejoinder by Montefiore in Oct. 1903.) It is urged that the reference in the Jewish treatise Nedarim does not confirm the statement in St. Mark about Corban. Dr. Menzies accepts this; but when that is said, the matter is by no means ended. To the present writer it seems that the evidence of St. Mark is quite good evidence for the contemporary Judaism. If the assertion about Corban is untrue, of course it cannot be ascribed to Jesus, who could not have quoted, as a conclusive proof that the Jews cancelled the Law by their tradition, an example which His hearers would know to have no existence. Accordingly, if the statement is mistaken, it would have to be put down to the account of the Evangelist, though how he should have hit upon it unless such a custom was actually in vogue would be difficult to understand. In forming our judgment on a question of this kind certain leading principles must be kept in mind. The contemporary Judaism is most imperfectly known to us, and the documents which we have to use as our sources of information are, in many instances, centuries later than the rise of Christianity. Further, the stereotyping of Judaism must not be blindly accepted as if it guaranteed that doctrines or practices for which we have only late literary attestation were already developed in the time of Christ. We must remember that Judaism did not live in an intellectual vacuum, but in an atmosphere saturated with Christian germs. Especially, we cannot forget that controversy went on between Jews and Christians; and under its pressure it is by no means unreasonable to believe that Judaism may have undergone a considerable modification, above all, in the elimination of matter which proved susceptible to criticism. In the light of these principles the present writer has no hesitation in regarding the statement in St. Mark as good evidence for the existence of the practice of Corban in the time of Christ.

4. The next question touches Christ's relation to the Temple. His personal attitude towards it was that of a loyal Jew. Not only did He as a boy of twelve years recognize it as His Father's house (Lk 2⁴⁹), but, after He had entered on His ministry, He cleansed it by driving out the money-changers, and overturning the stalls of the traders (Mt 21^{12ff.}). According to the Fourth Gospel, His visits to Jerusalem were largely connected with the feasts. In His Sermon on the Mount He assumes that His disciples will offer sacrifice, and only requires that, before he offers, a man shall be reconciled to his brother (Mt 5^{23ff.}). In His great indictment of the scribes and Pharisees He rebukes them for their ruling that an oath by the temple or by the altar counts for nothing, while an oath by the gold of the temple, or a gift at the altar, is binding. The temple is greater than its gold, and makes it holy; and similarly it is by the altar that the gift is sanctified. To swear by the altar is to swear not only by it, but by the offering placed upon it; while to swear by the temple is to swear not only by it and all that it contains, but by Him who dwells therein (Mt 23^{16ff.}). But all this loyal recognition of the place filled by the temple and the honour due to it was combined with an inward detachment from it, which was a presage of the ultimate deliverance of Christianity from its connexion with it. This comes out very clearly in the story of the stater in the fish's mouth (Mt 17^{24ff.}). The very doubt which was implied in the question whether Jesus paid the half-shekel which was levied as a temple-tax is most significant as to the drift towards freedom, which was already detected in His teaching. That He had not repudiated the toll, Peter is aware; but the reason for His obedience comes out plainly in the conversation He has with Peter on the subject. Taxes are taken by monarchs not from their sons, but from strangers. Therefore, since Jesus knows that He and His disciples are not aliens to God, but His children, the inference is that no payment of the tax can be legitimately expected from the children of the Kingdom. Jesus, however, bids Peter pay the tax for both, to avoid giving offence. In other words, Jesus regarded Himself and members of His Kingdom as released from every obligation to pay the half-shekel for the service of the temple, even if, in tender concession to the feelings of others, they did not avail themselves of their liberty. The temple-due in question was not definitely commanded in the Law, though it was a not unnatural deduction from Ex 30¹³, which was itself a development of the rule of Nehemiah that there should be an annual payment of a third of a shekel for the temple service (Neh 10^{32, 33}). The temple itself, Christ predicted, would be destroyed. However we may explain the saying, 'Destroy this temple, and I will build it up in three days' (Jn 2¹⁹), He certainly foretold in His eschatological discourse (Mt 24²) the overthrow of the literal temple, and therewith naturally the cessation of the Jewish cultus.

It is not improbable that the saying, 'Destroy this temple,' should be similarly interpreted. The authenticity of the utterance is guaranteed by the use made of it in the trial of Jesus (Mk 14⁵⁸), and the similar accusation at the trial of Stephen (Ac 6¹⁴), as well as the taunt addressed to Jesus on the cross (Mk 15²⁹). It is true that the author of the Fourth Gospel interprets the saying as a reference to the body of Christ, fulfilled in the death and the resurrection. But this interpretation did not at the time occur either to the Jews or to the disciples. The retort of the former showed that they understood the reference to be to the literal temple, while the Evangelist expressly says that the interpretation he adopts occurred to the disciples only after the resurrection. It is, in fact, very difficult to believe that the saying referred to the death and resurrection of Jesus. In its connexion with the desecration and cleansing of the actual temple the allusion could naturally be nothing less than to its destruction, unless Jesus made His meaning clear by pointing to His body. But in that case the misunderstanding on the part of the Jews and the disciples would have been impossible, even if we leave aside the objection that so unveiled an allusion to His death and resurrection at this early period is most unlikely. Moreover, the contrast with the temple made with hands (Mk 14⁵⁸) does not at all suit the human body. A difficulty, however, is raised by the Johannine version of the saying. We may, perhaps, assume that the latter is to be preferred to the version of the witnesses at the trial, in that it refers the work of destruction not to Jesus Himself, but to the Jews. Their present course of desecration, if they persist in it, will lead to the destruction of the temple. But it is not easy to believe that Jesus can have said that He would rebuild the temple that had been destroyed. Here the version of the witnesses is intrinsically the more credible, that He would build another temple in its place. And the contrast between the temple made with hands and the temple made without hands bears also the stamp of authenticity; the new is not simply to be a reproduction of the old, it is to be not a material, but a spiritual, structure. We may therefore conclude with some confidence that Jesus definitely anticipated the destruction of the centre of Jewish worship and the substitution of a spiritual temple in its place.

In the conversation with the woman of Samaria (Jn 4), Jesus is represented as dealing specifically with the question of the legitimate sanctuary as against the Samaritan temple (vv. 20-24). He gives His verdict in favour of the temple at Jerusalem, but He asserts that the hour has already come for both sanctuaries to lose whatever exclusive legitimacy they may possess. The true worship of God transcends all local limitations; for God is spirit, and as such cannot be localized; and the worship He desires is a worship in spirit and in truth. There is no reason whatever for supposing that here the Evangelist is putting his own doctrine into the mouth of Jesus. The pregnant aphoristic form and penetrating insight of the saying stamp it as authentic. Moreover, it is quite in the line of the other teachings of Jesus with reference to the temple. He recognizes that the temple is His Father's house, and yet looks forward to its destruction; and similarly here He asserts the legitimacy of the Jewish as against the Samaritan temple, and yet looks forward to the speedy termination of worship in it.

5. It is certainly a very striking fact, in view of the immense importance attached in Judaism to the rite, that Jesus nowhere raises the question of the permanence of Circumcision. Had He pronounced upon it, the bitter controversy excited by the question in the primitive Church could hardly have arisen. But, naturally, occasion for discussing it did not so readily arise, and it was part of the method of Jesus to leave questions of practice to be settled by His disciples under the guidance of the Spirit and in the light of principles with which He had imbued them. There can be no reasonable doubt that St. Paul drew the true Christian inference. The great principle, that the external was unimportant in comparison with the inward, expressed in the abolition by Jesus of the Levitical laws as to unclean food, and in His doctrine that for worship in the material temple there was to be substituted worship in spirit and in truth, carried with it the conclusion that as a purely external rite circumcision could have no place in the religion of the spirit. Moreover, it was the sign of the Old Covenant; but Jesus knew that His blood consecrated a New Covenant. This implied the abolition of the Old Covenant, and naturally the abolition of circumcision, which was its sign. Indeed, the Old Testament itself was on the way to this, not simply in Jeremiah's prediction (31^{31ff.}) of the New Covenant, but in the prophetic demand for a circumcision of the heart (Jer 4¹ 9²⁶; cf. Ezk 44⁷, Lv 26⁴¹). Here, as elsewhere, the attitude of Jesus linked itself closely to that previously taken by the prophets. Nor must we forget that Jesus contemplated that His religion would become universal. This in itself suggested the abolition of a rite which possessed no spiritual value, and was at the same time an almost insuperable barrier to the wide acceptance among the cultured of a religion that required it for full membership. See, further, art. CIRCUMCISION.

6. We have left till the last the much-debated passage Mt 5¹⁷⁻²⁰, since it is helpful in our interpretation of it to have before us the application of the principle in detail. The opening words of the passage, 'Think not that I am come to destroy the law or the prophets,' show clearly that Jesus was conscious that His teaching might not unjustifiably seem to carry this implication with it. There was an element which suggested a revolutionary attitude, but it was a mistaken inference that He meant to destroy the Law or the Prophets; it was His intention to fulfil them. It is important to observe here and elsewhere the way in which Jesus combines the Prophets with the Law. Unlike the current theology of His time, His teaching brought the Prophets into equal prominence with the Law; and it is of the OT system as a whole that He is thinking, and not simply of the legal enactments which constituted for the Rabbis almost the whole of religion. Yet it would be a mistake to infer that the Levitical requirements are here left out of sight. It is true that both the Rabbis and Jesus recognized degrees of importance among the laws, though their emphasis was very differently placed. Yet the Levitical laws were equally with others regarded by Jesus as laws of God, so that, in a comprehensive statement of the relation of His teaching to the religion of the OT, He could not leave them out of account. Now, we have already seen that the teaching of Jesus came into conflict not simply with the Tradition of the Elders, but with the Levitical laws of purity; that He explicitly abolished the laws of clean and unclean food, and looked forward to the cessation of the temple worship. Accordingly, we must give such a sense to His words as will harmonize the explanation of His intention not to destroy the Law with the fact that He did abolish some of its precepts, and contemplate the impossibility, through the destruction of the temple, of a large part of its injunctions. The unifying conception is contained in the word 'fulfil' (πληρῶσαι). Jesus does not mean that He came to render a perfect obedience to the Law and the Prophets in His own life. The fulfilment forms an antithesis to the destruction. The destruction was such as would be accomplished by His teaching, not by His action, and similarly the fulfilment is something effected by His teaching. Besides, it is very difficult to believe that with the freedom of His principles, Jesus should have attached any importance to the perfect carrying out in action of the Law and the Prophets. What is meant is that, to use a familiar illustration, the gospel fulfils the Law as the flower fulfils the bud. Jesus sees in the Law a Divinely ordained system, but He is conscious that it is stamped with immaturity and defect. His function is to bring out its intrinsic significance by disengaging and carrying to perfection the principles entangled in it. Thus He does not abrogate the Law, but He transcends it, and, in doing so, antiquates it. In Beyschlag's words, it is 'confirmed and transformed in one breath.' What this means is admirably explained by Stevens in the following words: 'Jesus fulfils the OT system by rounding out into entire completeness what is incomplete in that system. In this process of fulfilment all that is imperfect, provisional, temporary, or, for any reason, needless to the perfect religion, falls away of its own accord, and all that is essential and permanent is conserved and embodied in Christianity' (The Theology of the New Testament, p. 19).

The two following verses (Mt 5^{18, 19}) create much difficulty. They seem to assert a permanence of the Law and its minutest details, and to affirm the insignificant place assigned in the Kingdom to any who should set aside one of the minor commandments. In view of the attitude adopted by Jesus towards the law of uncleanness, the Sabbath, and divorce, it is not surprising that doubts have been expressed as to the genuineness of the saying. It is out of the question to argue with Wendt that 'the law' is not a written law but an ideal law, for the reference to the jot and tittle implies a written law, and there is nothing to indicate that 'the law' is used here in two different senses. Beyschlag argues for the genuineness of the saying, which is also attested by Lk 16¹⁷ 'It is easier for heaven and earth to pass away, than for one tittle of the law to fail.' If it is genuine, the best explanation is that given by Beyschlag, that we must explain here of spiritual fulfilments. No commandment, even the most trifling, is a mere empty husk; each has a Divine thought which must come to its rights before the husk of the letter is allowed to perish (NT Theol. i. 110 f.). It is, however, very difficult to believe that this interpretation is correct, inasmuch as it would be hard to understand what Divine idea Jesus could think was latent in innumerable trifling details of the Law. The immediate impression made by the words is surely that the Law, to its minutest details, was to be regarded as permanent. When we remember how bitter was the controversy created by the question of the Law in the Early Church, it is not easy to avoid the conclusion that here we have an expression from a Jewish-Christian point of view, according to which Jesus is made explicitly to disavow the movement led by St. Paul, not indeed that St. Paul is regarded as outside the Kingdom, but as one of the least in it. It would, however, be perhaps too far-fetched to connect the words 'least in the kingdom of heaven' with St. Paul's designation of himself as the 'least of the apostles.'

LITERATURE.—The subject is discussed in the New Testament Theologies, the treatises on the Teaching of Jesus, and in the Lives of Christ and the commentaries. A very able monograph by E. Mackintosh, Christ and the Jewish Law, is devoted to the subject. Other works that may be mentioned are: Schürer, Die Predigt Jesu in ihrem Verhältniss zum alten Testament und zum Judenthum (1882); Bousset, Jesu Predigt in ihrem Gegensatz zum Judenthum (1892); Jacob, Jesu Stellung zum mosaischen Gesetz (1893); also the section 'Christus und das mosaische Gesetz' in Ritschl's *Die Entstehung der altkatholischen Kirche*² (1857); cf. also Hastings' DB iii. 73-76, and Extra Vol. p. 22 ff.

LAW OF GOD.—We are not entitled to gather from the teaching of Jesus in the Gospels that He made any formal distinction between the Law of Moses and the Law of God. His mission being not to destroy but to fulfil the Law and the Prophets (Mt 5¹⁷), so far from saying anything in disparagement of the Law of Moses or from encouraging His disciples to assume an attitude of independence with regard to it, He expressly recognized the authority of the Law of Moses as such, and of the Pharisees as its official interpreters (Mt 23¹⁻³).

One great aim of His teaching being, however, to counteract the influence of the Pharisaism of the time, under which zeal for the Law had degenerated into a pedantic legalism, which made outward conformity to the letter all-important and caused the true interests of religion and morality to be lost sight of amid the Shibboleths of national ritualism, He sought to concentrate the attention of His hearers upon the true meaning of the Law. In doing this He practically ignored the distinctions of the scribes between greater and lesser commandments of the Law, and between the Law, the Prophets, and the Psalms (or 'the Writings'), and insisted upon the authority of Scripture as the word of God. What God says in Scripture, the inspired record of Revelation, is for Jesus the final court of appeal. 'The Scripture cannot be broken' (Jn 10³⁵) is a principle never once lost sight of in any controversy.

At the same time, as Jesus Himself taught as One who had authority (Mt 7²⁹ || Mk 1²²), quietly but none the less emphatically asserting His right to explain the spirit and meaning of the Divine word, He did distinguish and teach His disciples to distinguish between letter and spirit, that which was permanent and universal in the Law and that which was partial and temporary. It is therefore possible, and even almost necessary, with a view to a clear understanding of Christ's attitude towards the Law, to distinguish between the Law of God, meaning by the term that which is of universal validity, and those elements in the Law of Moses which are merely associated with a particular dispensation, a temporary manifestation of God's will.

1. A typical illustration of the propriety of such a distinction is found in that passage in which Jesus, dealing with the question of marriage and divorce, treats the Mosaic law on the subject as an instance of accommodation to an imperfect state of society (Mt 19³⁻⁸ || Mk 10²⁻⁹). 'For the hardness of your heart he wrote you this precept. But from the beginning of the creation God made them male and female,' etc. (Mk 10⁵⁻⁶). Here we see at once a distinction made between the Mosaic precept and the Divine law. The former allowed divorce upon certain well-understood grounds. The Pharisees put their own lax interpretation upon this precept, and multiplied the causes of divorce to an extent far beyond what the precept actually justified. Christ's reply to the question of His adversaries on this point was simply to remind them of the original Divine ordinance, according to which the marriage bond was made indissoluble. The Law of Moses permitted divorce, but the Law of God maintained the sanctity of the marriage bond, and this represented the point of view from which the whole question ought to be regarded. 'They twain shall be one flesh. What therefore God hath joined together let not man put asunder.' In this connexion the Law of God and the Law of Moses are to one another in the relation of the spirit to the letter. This typical instance illustrates the principle upon which Jesus proceeded in His interpretation of the Divine law. His aim throughout was to call attention to the true spirit and purpose of the Law, to that in it which was of essential and permanent value. That the spirit of the Law, of which the letter is but the necessarily inadequate expression, is the Law of God, the manifestation of the Father's will for the moral and spiritual good of His children.

2. The attitude which Jesus adopted towards the whole question of the Law, considered as the Law of God, is well exemplified in the Sermon on the Mount, and in particular in those words which may be fitly taken as the motto of His teaching: 'Think not that I am come to destroy the law or the prophets. I am not come to destroy, but to fulfil' (Mt 5¹⁷; see preced. art.). In the contrast between what 'was said by them of old time' and His own emphatic 'But I say unto you,' we find the distinction between the Law of Moses and the Law of God. In the latter case He clearly speaks as God's representative, and we are reminded of John the Baptist's illustration of the difference between Christ and himself, the last of the Prophets: 'He whom God hath sent speaketh the words of God; for God giveth not the Spirit by measure [unto him]' (Jn 3³⁴). In the one case, the statute which Jesus quotes, we have to do with the letter of the Law, that with which alone the scribes occupied themselves and upon which they founded their casuistical refinements. In the other case, the words 'But I say unto you' bid us go behind the letter and get at the root of the matter, 'for the letter killeth, but the Spirit giveth life' (2 Co 3⁶). Thus, in proceeding to apply the principle which He has just laid down (Mt 5¹⁷), Jesus starts with the comprehensive statement of v. 20 'For I say unto you, That except your righteousness shall exceed the righteousness of the scribes and Pharisees, ye shall in no case enter into the kingdom of heaven.'

From this point He goes on to deal with typical instances of the difference between letter and spirit in the Law. He begins with a commandment of the Decalogue, the Sixth, coupled with a corresponding passage from the Mosaic legislation, 'and whosoever shall kill, shall be in danger of the judgment' (5²¹). He says in effect, 'The spirit of the commandment is this: Anger is murder. I say unto you, That whosoever is angry with his brother . . . shall be in danger of the judgment' (v. 22). And then, as if still further to emphasize the point that the Law is not satisfied by negative or formal obedience, Jesus shows that brethren at variance must give effect to the positive law of love before they can render acceptable worship at God's altar (Mt 5²³⁻²⁶). Nor is this enough. At a later point in His discourse, in connexion with the law of retaliation, He returns to the subject and insists upon the Divine principle of love, showing that the aim of God's Law is to make man resemble God Himself. The law of love leaves no room for enemies. A Christian has no enemies; for by loving and praying for them he makes them friends (vv. 38-45).

So again, in another place, Jesus shows that the neighbour to whom the Law of God refers is any one in need whom one can help (Lk 10²⁹⁻³⁷). Again Jesus takes up the Seventh Commandment. According to the letter it forbids the sin of unchastity, unchaste actions, unlawful intercourse between the sexes. The spirit of the commandment has a far higher aim. It is only one aspect of the grand law of purity. It demands purity of heart. Every impure thought, every unchaste look, are transgressions of this law of God (Mt 5²⁷⁻³²). Jesus deals with the Ninth Commandment upon the same principle. According to the letter, it forbids false swearing. According to the spirit, it is just a form of the law of sincerity and truthfulness.

Its real meaning is that God desireth truth in the inward parts (vv. 33-37).

Proceeding (Mt 6^{1ff.}) to the subject of religious exercises, Jesus shows that questions of ritual and outward form, upon which the Pharisees founded their ideas of 'righteousness' (δικαιοσύνην . . . ποιεῖν, v. 1) and meritorious service, are of trifling importance in comparison with the question of the heart's approach to God. Religion is not a performance, to be judged by what men can see and pronounce their opinions upon, and involving such trivial points as ritual, excellency of speech, propriety of form, reverence and decorum of posture. It is a matter of communion of spirit with spirit, needy souls, humbly conscious of their needs, confessing their wants and desires to One who seeth in secret, the poor in spirit hungering and thirsting after righteousness, and so convinced of their entire dependence upon the forgiveness and compassion of the All-Merciful as to feel that for them to claim the mercy and grace of God is to bind themselves by the law of love to the duty of forgiving as they would themselves be forgiven. From this point of view the essence of worship is prayer,—not sacrifice and offering—the humble, fervent outpouring of contrite hearts (cf. Lk 18¹⁰⁻¹⁴), and cordial surrender to the will of God—not questions of posture or of such material things as rich gifts (Lk 21^{3, 4}, Jn 4^{23, 24}). Prayer is the kernel; all external ordinances, whole burnt-offerings, sacrifices and the like, are but the husk (Mt 6¹⁻¹⁸). So the prayers even of the Gentiles are of infinitely more consequence than the temple offerings, and God's house is a house of prayer for all people (Mt 21^{12ff.} || Mk 11¹⁷ || Lk 19^{45, 46}, cf. Jn 2¹⁴⁻¹⁶).

In connexion with Christ's teaching on the subject of heart religion and morality, and the true meaning of the Law considered as the Law of God, an interesting case suggests itself, in which Jesus seems to anticipate the abrogation of the Old Covenant with its laws and ordinances. It is that of His controversy with the Pharisees with reference to the ceremonial ablutions which the disciples were accused of neglecting (Mt 15¹⁻²⁰ || Mk 7¹⁻²³). Jesus defends His disciples by turning the tables upon the Pharisees, whom He taxes with setting their traditions above the express commandments of God Himself, and with neglecting in the interest of mere technicalities the weightier matters of the Law (cf. His denunciation of Pharisaic scrupulosity in Mt 23⁴⁻³⁰ || Lk 11³⁷⁻⁴⁷), and cites as an instance their treatment of the Fifth Commandment and the law of filial affection. But what calls for notice is, in particular, the circumstance that what specially offended the Pharisees, and startled even Christ's own disciples, was His pronouncement upon the point immediately in dispute, the question of ceremonial ablutions, and the whole Levitical legislation on the subject of the clean and the unclean. In view of the fact that a large portion of the Mosaic law is taken up with and deals minutely with these very points, in view also of the fact that the controversies in the Early Church itself between Jewish and Gentile Christians turned upon these things, our Lord's treatment of the question is very remarkable, and illustrates clearly the nature of the distinction which, in His revision of the Law, He emphasized between letter and spirit. He practically teaches that the principle of those Levitical precepts is simply the Divine law of holiness. Rightly understood, they only restate in another form the command, 'Be holy, as the Lord your God is holy'; and they are truly obeyed only by those whose hearts are renewed in every thought by the Spirit of God. The scribes who, forgetting the teaching of the prophets (for here Jesus made no essential addition to Jeremiah's doctrine of the New Covenant or Ezekiel's doctrine of the renewed heart and the washing of regeneration, Jer 31^{31a}, Ezk 36²⁵⁻²⁷), made the external ritual everything, and took no account of heart-religion, were on that account compared to those who should cleanse the outside of the cup and the platter, and be utterly careless as to the condition of the inside. If, on the other hand, the heart were purged from evil thoughts and wicked inclinations, then the life would correspond, as the tree is known by its fruit, and God's law would be fulfilled in the spirit of it. The Law of God appeared thus as the perfect law of liberty, the worship of God in spirit and in truth. In a word, true religion and true morality, the teaching of which in all their particulars is the grand purpose of the Law of God, are from first to last a matter of the heart. Let the heart be pure. Let it be truly turned to God, in simple faith casting aside every care and anxious thought of the world and things of time, and trusting that God will deny His children no good thing, temporal or spiritual, of which, as their Father, He knows them to stand in need, and there is the secret of the fulfilling of the Law. All else follows from that. The pure in heart see God, the poor in spirit are already inheritors of the Kingdom of heaven (Mt 6¹⁹⁻³⁴ 7¹⁵⁻²⁷).

Jesus taught essentially the same truth when, in controversy with the Pharisees, He summarized the teaching of the Law and the Prophets. So far from repudiating as a mere matter of Pharisaic casuistry the question often agitated among the scribes as to whether there were any commandments which in themselves summed up the teaching of the whole Law, He was ready to discuss such questions with them; and when, in response to His definition of love to God and one's neighbour as the essential commandment of the Law, a scribe commended His answer, and said that such love was 'more than all whole burnt-offerings and sacrifices,' He declared that he was not far from the Kingdom of God (Mk 12²⁸⁻³⁴).

On the same principle, Jesus at once defended His disciples against the charge of Sabbath-breaking, and vindicated His right to perform works of beneficence on the Sabbath day, by appealing to the spirit of the ordinance. Like other parts of the Law, He showed that this was only an expression of God's beneficent will for the good of man, a provision for his temporal and spiritual welfare. Therefore in the case of the cripple at Bethesda, He declared that, as God's providential government of the world recognized no distinction between the Sabbath and other days, so Christ Himself, as Son of God, must, like the Father, seek man's benefit even on the Sabbath. Again, as Son of Man, He no less emphatically asserted His right to interpret the Sabbath law in the interest of man, for whose benefit it was framed (Jn 5^{17a}, Mt 12¹⁻⁸ || Mk 2²³⁻²⁸ || Lk 6¹⁻⁵). LAWLESSNESS.—The service of God becomes perfect freedom through the work of the Holy Spirit restoring the Divine image more and more in the heart of man. This liberty cannot therefore be a licence for lawlessness. St. Augustine's maxim, 'Love, and do as you like,' derives its truth from the principle that love is not the abolition but the recapitulation of all the Divine law for mankind. The love of God and the love of man constitute the essence of the Law's demands and the Prophets' promises (Mt 22⁴⁰). It is not the Law which Christ denounces, but traditional excrescences and empty forms (Mk 7¹³). These traditional excrescences gave opportunities for hypocrisy, a condition detested by the Lord (Mt 15⁷⁻⁹). The empty forms distracted attention from vital concerns (Mk 7⁴). The scribes and Pharisees were losing all sense of proportion in the duties of the religious life (Mt 23²³, Lk 11⁴²). The exponents of the Law were erring, yet the Law itself stood as a Divine ordinance (Mt 23³, Lk 16¹⁷). The commandments are necessary to eternal life (Lk 18²⁰). Nay, not one tittle can pass away from the Law (Mt 5¹⁸). Perfect and complete obedience will be demanded of men (Mt 5¹⁹). Not less but more will be expected of the disciples of Christ (Mt 5). And yet Christ's yoke is to be easy (Mt 11³⁰). So there is a paradox, the solution of which lies in the recapitulation of the entire Law as consisting in the love of God and the love of one's fellow-man. The revelation of the guiding principle summing up the Law renders light a burden which the Pharisees made heavy (Lk 11⁴⁶). Mechanical conformity to a legal code is thus avoided. The conscience of man finds exercise and discipline. This point is emphasized in the Western addition to Lk 6⁴ 'O man, blessed art thou if thou knowest what thou doest.' In His technical breaches of the Sabbath the Lord knew what He did (Lk 14⁵). Yet the legalists took advantage of these to charge Him with lawlessness (Jn 9¹⁶). Nevertheless, He came fulfilling all righteousness (Mt 3¹⁵), and appealing to the Law in the face of temptation (Mt 4⁴⁻¹⁰). When He cleansed the Temple, He vindicated His action from Scripture (Lk 19⁴⁶). There was no lawlessness in His pattern life of perfect obedience to God (Jn 15¹⁰). Lawless efforts at good, however strenuous, are not acceptable (Jn 10¹). Indeed, St. John sums up the matter in the words, 'Sin is lawlessness' (1 Jn 3⁴).

LAWYER (νομικός) or 'teacher (doctor) of the law' (νομοδιδάσκαλος) is found occasionally, almost exclusively in Lk., for the more usual 'scribe' (γραμματεὺς). The identity of these terms is shown by the following passages. 1. Lk 5¹⁷, Pharisees and doctors of the law are sitting by; but (v.²¹) the scribes and Pharisees begin to reason (so || Mt., Mk.). 2. Lk 11^{37a} is a denunciation first of Pharisees, then of lawyers; this is parallel to Mt 23 against scribes and Pharisees; and at its close (v.⁵³) 'the scribes and Pharisees began to urge him vehemently.' The TR reading (v.⁴⁴) 'scribes and Pharisees, hypocrites,' which, when compared with the next verse, might imply a difference between 'scribes' and 'lawyers,' is omitted by critical editors on the authority of NBCL Vulg. etc.; and is obviously an assimilation to Mt 23²⁷. 3. Mt 22²⁵, a lawyer questions Jesus as to the greatest commandment; in Mk 12²⁸ it is 'one of the scribes'; cf. also Lk 10²⁵ 'a certain lawyer.' 4. The martyr Eleazar is called in 2 Mac 6¹⁸ 'one of the principal scribes,' in 4 Mac 5⁴ he is a lawyer. Thus these titles are equivalent. γραμματεὺς ('scribe') is a literal translation of the Heb. סופר (a literary man or a student of Scripture), while νομικός ('lawyer,' 'jurist,' a regular term for Roman lawyers, Vulg. legis peritus), and, still better, νομοδιδάσκαλος, are more distinct descriptions of this class, explaining to Gentile readers their character and office. Hence their comparative frequency in Luke. 'Rabbi,' the title by which they were addressed, is perhaps for us their best designation.

Mt. has γραμματίς 23 times, νομικός once only (29³⁵, where Syr-Sin omits). Mk. has γραμματίς only, 21 times. Lk. has γραμματίς 14 times, besides (of Jewish scribes) twice in Acts; νομικός 6 times (7³⁰ 10²⁵ 11⁴⁵. 36. 52 14³), νομοδιδάσκαλος once (51⁷, and in Ac 5³⁴ of Gamaliel). Josephus also, while once using ἱερογραμματίς (BJ vi. v. 3), commonly uses phrases with more definite meaning for Gentile readers: σοφιστής (BJ i. xxxiii. 2, ii. xvii. 8) or ἰεργητής τῶν πατρῶν νόμων (Ant. xvii. vi. 2).

These titles show that the great sphere of their activity was the Law, whether contained in Scripture or handed down traditionally. They studied, of course, the other books of Scripture besides the Pentateuch, but these were regarded as merely supplementary to the Law of Moses, and as themselves presenting a revealed rule of life and conduct; so that the term 'Law' is applied sometimes in the NT to the whole of the OT (Jn 10³⁴ 15²⁵, 1 Co 14²¹). So also in the Mishna (see Buhl, Canon, § 3).

Their work, in all its departments, is sketched in the saying ascribed to the 'Men of the Great Synagogue,' their traditional predecessors: 'Be careful in judgment, raise up many disciples, and set a hedge about the Law' (Περὶ Αβόθ, I. i.). They acted as judges; they gave instruction in the Law, and trained disciples; and they interpreted and developed the Law. Though anyone might be a judge, the office was naturally most commonly held by those learned in the Law; and we find the leaders of the Scribes an integral part of the Sanhedrin (Mk 15¹ etc.). Their leaders gathered disciples round them, and taught them the traditional law, instructing them by discussing real or imagined legal cases; and they developed the Law, applying it to all actual and possible cases, and laying down rules to secure against its being broken. HAROLD SMITH.

LAZARUS.—A common Jewish name, meaning 'God hath helped'; a colloquial abbreviation of Eleazar (cf. Liezer for Eliezer)*.

1. Lazarus the beggar, who, in our Lord's parable (Lk 16¹⁰⁻³¹), lay, a mass of loathsome sores, at the gateway of the rich man, named traditionally Nineus (Euth. Zig.) or Phinees (Clem. Recogn.). The notion that he was a leper (whence lazar-house, lazzaretto) is impossible, since he must then have kept afar off, and durst not have lain at the rich man's gateway.

This has been pronounced no authentic parable of Jesus, but an 'evangelic discourse upon His words—'that which is exalted among men is an abomination in the sight of God'' (Lk 16¹⁵),† on the following grounds: (1) Its introduction of a proper name. Nowhere else in the Gospels is a parabolic personage named, and the idea prevailed in early times that this is not a parable but a story from real life (cf. Tert. de Anim. § 7; Iren. adv. Hær. iv. 3. 2).

(2) Its alleged Ebionism. The contrast between the two men on earth is not moral or religious. It is not said that the rich man got his wealth unrighteously, or that he treated Lazarus cruelly. The difference was merely that the one was rich and the other poor, and their dooms are a reversal of their earthly conditions. 'In this parable,' says Strauss, 'the measure of future recompense is not the amount of good done or wickedness perpetrated, but of evil endured and fortune enjoyed.'

(3) Its Jewish imagery. (a) 'The beggar died, and he was carried away by the angels.' It was a Jewish idea that the souls of the righteous were carried by angels to paradise (cf. Targ. on Ca 4² 'Non possunt ingredi Paradisum nisi justi, quorum anima eo feruntur per angelos.' (b) The Jews called the unseen world Sheol; and so closely identical was their conception thereof with that of the Greeks, that Sheol is rendered by the LXX Hades.* It was the common abode of all souls, good and bad alike, where they received the due reward of their deeds; and it was an aggravation of the misery of the wicked that they continually beheld the felicity of the righteous, knowing all the while that they were excluded from it. See Lightfoot and Wetstein on Lk 16²³; cf. Rev 14¹⁰. So in the parable 'the rich man in Hades lifts up his eyes, being in torments, and seeth Abraham from afar, and Lazarus in his bosom.' (c) There were three Jewish phrases descriptive of the state of the righteous after death: 'in the Garden of Eden' or 'Paradise'; 'under the throne of glory' (cf. Rev 6⁹ 7^{9, 15}); 'in Abraham's bosom.' The last appears in the parable (vv. 22, 23). The meaning is that Lazarus was a guest at the heavenly feast. Cf. Lk 14¹⁵ and the saying of R. Jacob: 'This world is like a vestibule before the world to come: prepare thyself at the vestibule, that thou mayest be admitted into the festal-chamber.' Lazarus occupied the place of honour, reclining on Abraham's breast, even as the beloved disciple at the Last Supper reclined on the Master's (Jn 13²³).

These objections, however, are by no means insurmountable. The name Lazarus is perhaps introduced significantly, defining the beggar's character. He was one who had found his help in God. It was not because he was poor, but because God had helped him, that the beggar was carried away into Abraham's bosom; and the rich man was doomed not simply because he had been rich, but because he had made a selfish use of his riches. The parable is an illustration and enforcement of the moral which Jesus deduces from the preceding parable of the Shrewd Factor: 'Make to yourselves friends by means of the mammon of unrighteousness (i.e. earthly riches, unsatisfying and unenduring), that, when it faileth, they may receive you into the eternal tents' (v. 9). Had the rich man befriended the beggar, he would have laid up for himself treasure in heaven. He would have bound Lazarus to himself, and would have been welcomed by him on the threshold of the unseen world.

As for the Jewish imagery, it constitutes no argument against the authenticity of the parable. Jesus was accustomed to speak the language of His hearers in order to reach their understandings and hearts. He often spoke of the heavenly feast: cf. Mt 8^{11, 12} (Lk 13^{28, 29}), Lk 13²⁵⁻²⁷ (Mt 7^{22, 23}), Mt 22¹⁻¹⁴ (Lk 14¹⁶⁻²⁴), Mt 25¹⁻¹³, Lk 22¹⁸ = Mt 26²⁹ = Mk 14²⁵. And it is noteworthy how, when He employed Jewish imagery, He was wont to invest it with new significance. Thus, the Rabbis taught that the abodes of the righteous and the wicked in Hades were nigh to each other; according to one, there was only a span between them; according to another, the boundary was a wall (Midr. Kohel. 103. 2: 'Deus statuit hoc juxta illud (Ec 7¹⁴), id est, Gehennam et Paradisum. Quantum distant? Palmo. R. Jochanan dicit: Paries interponitur.') But what says Jesus? 'In all this region betwixt us and you a great chasm has been fixed, that they that wish to pass over from this side unto you may not be able, nor those on that side cross over unto us.' The sentence, He would indicate, is final, the separation eternal. See GULF.

2. Lazarus of Bethany, brother of Martha and Mary. There was a close and tender intimacy between Jesus and this household (cf. Jn 11^{3, 11, 36}). From the Feast of Tabernacles (October) until the Feast of Dedication (December) Jesus sojourned in Jerusalem, making His appeal to her rulers and people. The former proved obdurate, and finally proceeded to violence (Jn 10^{31, 39}). It was unsafe for Him to remain among them, and He retired to Bethany beyond Jordan (v. 40, cf. 1²⁸ RV). A crowd followed Him thither, and, undisturbed by His adversaries, He exercised a ministry which recalled, while it surpassed, the work of John the Baptist on the same spot three years earlier. All the while He was thinking of Jerusalem. He would fain win her even yet, and He prayed that God would bring about some crisis which might persuade her of His Messiahship or at least leave her without excuse (cf. Jn 11^{41, 42}). He saw not the way, but He was waiting for God to open it up; and suddenly a message reached Him from the other Bethany that Lazarus was sick (Jn 11³). He recognized in this turn of events God's answer to His prayer. It afforded Him just such an opportunity as He had craved. 'This sickness,' He said, 'is not unto death, but for the glory of God, that the Son of God (i.e. the Messiah) may be glorified thereby.' He did not hasten to Bethany and lay His hand upon the sick man, nor did He, abiding where He was, 'send forth His word and heal him,' as He had done to the courtier's son (Jn 4⁴⁶⁻⁵⁴) and the Syrophenician woman's daughter (Mt 15²¹⁻²⁸ = Mk 7²⁴⁻³⁰). He deliberately remained where He was for two days, and then set out for Judea. On His arrival at Bethany, Lazarus was dead and buried, and a large company, including many of the rulers from the adjacent capital (v. 19), had gathered, in accordance with Jewish custom, to testify their esteem for the good Lazarus and condole with his sisters. The situation favoured the Lord's design. He repaired to the sepulchre, which lay at least 2000 cubits outside the town,* and in presence of the assemblage recalled the dead man to life and summoned him forth in his cements.

It was an indubitable miracle. In the sultry East it was necessary that the dead should be buried immediately (cf. Ac 5^{5, 6}), and it sometimes happened that a swoon was mistaken for death, and the man awoke. The Jewish fancy was that for three days after death the soul hovered about the sepulchre, fain to re-enter and reanimate its tenement of clay; and the bereaved were wont to visit the sepulchre to see if haply their dead had come to life. After three days decomposition set in, and when they saw its ghastly disfigurement on the face, they abandoned hope.† Had Jesus arrived within three days after Lazarus' death, it might have been pronounced no miracle; but He arrived on the fourth day, when decomposition would have already set in (v. 39).

If anything could have conquered the unbelief of the rulers, this miracle must have done it; but they hardened their hearts, and all the more that the people were profoundly impressed. The Sanhedrin met under the presidency of Caiaphas the high priest, and resolved to put Jesus to death, at the same time publishing an order that, if any knew where He was, they should give information for His arrest. He did not venture into the city, but retired northward to Ephraim, near the Samaritan frontier. There He remained until the Passover was nigh, and then He went up to keep the Feast and to die. Six days before the Feast began, He reached Bethany, and in defiance of the Sanhedrin's order received an ovation from the townsfolk. They honoured Him with a banquet in the house of Simon, one of their leading men, who had been a leper, and had perhaps been healed by Jesus (see art. ANOINTING, I. 2.). Lazarus of course was present. The news that Jesus was at Bethany reached Jerusalem, and next day a great multitude thronged out to meet Him and escorted Him with Messianic honours into the city. It was the raising of Lazarus that had convinced them of the claims of Jesus (Jn 12^{17, 18}). The Triumphal Entry is a powerful evidence of the miracle. Without it such an outburst of enthusiasm is unaccountable.

It might be expected that Lazarus of all men should have stood by Jesus during the last dread ordeal; but he never appears after the banquet in Simon's house. His name is nowhere mentioned in the story of the Lord's Passion. What is the explanation? Enraged by the impression which the miracle made and the support which it brought to Jesus, the high priests plotted the death of Lazarus (Jn 12^{10, 11}); and it is probable that, ere the final crisis, he had been compelled to withdraw from the vicinity of Jerusalem.

It was a stupendous miracle, the greatest which Jesus ever wrought; yet it is not the supreme miracle of the Gospel-story. The Lord's own Resurrection holds that place, and one who is persuaded of His claims will hardly hesitate to believe in the raising of Lazarus. 'He raised the man,' says St. Augustine,* 'who made the man; for He is Himself the Father's only Son, through whom, as ye know, all things were made. If, therefore, all things were made through Him, what wonder if one rose from the dead through Him, when so many are daily born through Him? It is a greater thing to create men than to raise them.'

Naturalistic criticism, however, has assailed the miracle. Much has been made of the silence of the Synoptists, who must, it is alleged, have recorded it had they known of it, and must have known of it had it occurred. Their silence in this instance, however, is merely part of a larger problem—their silence regarding the Lord's Judean ministry generally, and their peculiar reticence regarding the family of Bethany.

It is no exaggeration to affirm that the desperation of the assaults which have been directed against it constitute a powerful apologetic for the miracle. (1) The earlier rationalists (Paulus, Venturini), in spite of the Evangelist's specific testimony to the contrary, supposed that Lazarus had not really died but only fallen into a trance. He had been buried alive, and he awoke to consciousness through the combined influences of the coolness of the cave, the pungent odour of the burial spices (cf. Jn 19⁴⁰), and the stream of warm air which rushed in when the stone was removed. Jesus, looking in, perceived that he was alive, and bade him come forth.

(2) According to Strauss, the story, like the two earlier stories of resuscitation (Mt 9^{18, 19, 23-25} = Mk 5^{21-24, 35-43} = Lk 8^{40-42, 49-56}; 7¹¹⁻¹⁷), is a myth, originating in the desire of the primitive Church that the Messiah should not only rival but surpass His great prototypes in the OT. Elijah and Elisha had wrought miracles of resuscitation (1 K 17^{17^{ss}}, 2 K 4^{8^{ss}}), and Jesus must do the like in a more wonderful manner.

(3) Renan regarded the miracle as an imposture. 'Tired of the cold reception which the Kingdom of God found in the capital, the friends of Jesus, wishing for a great miracle which should strike powerfully the incredulity of the Jerusalemites.'

* Lightfoot, ii. p. 424.

* In Joan. Ev. Tract. xlix. § 1.

And the sick Lazarus lent himself to their design. Pallid with disease, he let himself be wrapped in grave-clothes and shut up in the sepulchre; and when Jesus, believing that he was dead, came to take a last look at his friend's remains, Lazarus came forth in his bandages, his head covered with a winding-sheet. Jesus acquiesced in the fraud. 'Not by any fault of his own, but by that of others, his conscience had lost something of its original purity. Desperate and driven to extremity, he was no longer his own master. His mission overwhelmed him, and he yielded to the torrent. . . . He was no more able than St. Bernard or St. Francis to moderate the avidity for the marvellous displayed by the multitude, and even by his own disciples.'

(4) Later criticism is still more destructive. Not only was the miracle never wrought, but there was never such a man as Lazarus. The story is 'non-historical, like the History of the Creation in Genesis, and like the records of the other miracles in the Fourth Gospel; all of which are poetic developments.* Keim finds the germ of the story in the Ebionite parable of the Rich Man and the Beggar (Lk 16¹⁹⁻²¹). 'If,' says Abraham in the parable, 'to Moses and the prophets they do not hearken, not even if one rise from the dead will they be persuaded'; and the Johannine narrative is this saying converted into a history: a man rose from the dead, and the Jews did not believe. Lazarus full of corruption corresponds to the beggar full of sores. The story is thus doubly divorced from reality, being an unhistorical development of an unauthentic parable.

D. SMITH.

LEADING.—'Lead' is used in the Gospels in its ordinary senses: intransitively in the description of the ways that lead to life or destruction (Mt 7^{13, 14}), and transitively often. The OT metaphor of Jehovah as a Shepherd leading His people like a flock (Ps 23^{1, 80¹}) is repeated in the parables representing Christ as a Shepherd whose sheep recognize and obey Him (Jn 10^{3, 4, 27}). The general conception of God's leading His people, so frequent in the Psalms and in Deutero-Isaiah and elsewhere, is assumed in the petition 'Lead us not into temptation' (Mt 6¹³, Lk 11⁴); for the true life is along a right path wherein God leads His children.

The leadership of religious authorities is referred to in the description of scribes and Pharisees as 'blind guides' or 'blind leaders of the blind' (Mt 23^{16, 15¹⁴}); the metaphor being based on the sight, familiar in Eastern cities, of rows or files of blind persons each holding by the one in front. But, as this saying is placed by St. Luke (6³⁹) in immediate connexion with the appointment of the Twelve, it may be presumed that Jesus pressed on His disciples the necessity of their recognizing and qualifying for the duties of true leadership. They are required to have light and to let it shine, to be, in short, 'men of light and leading.'

The position of Jesus as a Leader is most frequently expressed in terms of following. The imperative 'Follow me' is addressed to individuals, as Peter and Andrew, James and John (Mt 4^{19, 21}), Matthew (Mt 9⁹), and Philip (Jn 1⁴³); and to unnamed disciples or listeners (Mt 8^{22, 19²¹}). It is repeated in the fundamental law of the Kingdom, where self-denial or cross-bearing is enjoined (Mt 16²⁴, Mk 8³⁴, Lk 9²³, Jn 12²⁶); but here the reference is to Jesus as a supreme example rather than a present guide, and the instruction is primarily spiritual. It may be said that during His whole public ministry Jesus was leading and training disciples to carry on His work; while the risen Christ is the Head of the Church and the Leader of the Christian army (Mt 28¹⁸⁻²⁰).

Four times the term 'Leader' (ἀρχηγός) is applied to Christ: in the EV phrases 'Prince of life,' 'Prince,' 'Captain (RV 'Author') of salvation,' 'Author of faith' (Ac 3^{15, 5³¹}, He 2^{10, 12²}); and a similar meaning is expressed by πρόδρομος, 'Fore-runner' (He 6²⁰). In these passages the leadership is through death from life on earth to life in heaven.

LEARNING.—To what extent did learning prevail in Palestine in the time of Christ? and is it correct to say that He Himself and His Apostles and disciples were illiterate?

Higher education existed at least in the collegiate institutions of the capital. From the restoration following the epoch of the Exile there was a class of men who are known to us as 'scribes' (σopherim). Their point of union was their knowledge of the Law, and Scriptures, and Traditions. So far they are parallel to the shastris, who are the authorities on Hindu literature. Ezra, the second founder of the theocracy and a man of priestly birth, is designated a scribe (Ezr 7⁶). From his date measures were taken, directed to the establishment and maintenance of the sacred authority of the Law. The scribe was an interpreter to the people. The period of higher inspiration was giving place to an age of didactic literature. And a succession of able scribes arose who expounded the sacred books, cherished and enlarged tradition, determined the details of religious observance, and wrote the Law in its exclusiveness on the minds of the people. They were at their best in the 4th or 3rd cent. B.C.; but they continued for many centuries. Pharisaism was a development of them, and they are also connected with the later books of Wisdom, while in the post-Christian period their chief men are the Rabbis. Part of their work consisted in the training of young scribes, and for this end schools or colleges were formed. In these the Scriptures formed a literary and theological basis, the Law, traditions, and national history were expounded, and judgment was given on the problems and practical questions of the time. This education was professional, and contained no secular culture; and it was intensely national or Jewish. Yet here as elsewhere there were varieties of opinion and diverging tendencies. The schools of Hillel and Shammai were rival institutions in the years preceding the birth of our Lord. A generation later Hillel was succeeded by his perhaps more liberal grandson, Gamaliel, to whose classroom St. Paul came from Asia Minor to be trained in the Law.

Other schools less exclusively religious, more akin to Greek institutions, are known to have existed in Jerusalem and other towns, where especially the sons of men not opposed to the Roman occupation might be trained for public life. Jews of the Dispersion were at home in the Greek language, and had more immediate access to Greek literature. About the time of Christ several of the later apocryphal books were written. Culture was widespread, and at least two Jews belong to general literature: Philo the philosopher of Alexandria, who endeavoured to reconcile Hellenism and Judaism; and Josephus the historian, who was brought up in Jerusalem.

But the work of the scribes was not confined to

* E. A. Abbott, art. 'Lazarus,' § 4, in Encyc. Biblica.

'higher education.' In every village they had planted a synagogue, and in connexion with every synagogue an elementary school was ultimately opened. For many centuries the training of the young was a duty enjoined upon parents. About B.C. 75, Simon ben Shetach, a scribe and Pharisee, is said to have carried a law requiring boys to attend 'the elementary school.' Probably before that date a lower school system (such as was known to exist in the Greek world) was tentatively tried in all leading centres. Now education was made compulsory. The schoolroom, known as the 'house of the book,' was either part of the synagogue or of the teacher's house. The teacher, or hazzan, belonged to a humble rank of the fraternity of scribes. Lk (5⁷) refers to a gathering of teachers of the law (νομοδιδάκαλοι) from every city and village of the land. Whether or not schoolmasters are included, the reference implies a wide diffusion of education.

The instruction given in these schools is considered by Ramsay (Education of Christ) superior to that of Greece or any other ancient land. The subjects of study and methods of teaching were calculated to call forth and develop the best mental faculties of the boys. In the choice of subjects the theoretical and practical were successfully combined; and pupils were taught both to think and to act, while maxims of duty were graven on their memories. The standard of average intelligence was therefore high. And while in most cases no regular secondary education followed, it is to be remembered that the synagogue remained a place of instruction rather than of formal worship, and also that talented young men could carry reading and study farther than public provision was made for. Whether any of the leading disciples were educated in Jerusalem cannot be definitely known. But they were not ignorant. On the contrary, they were men of keen intelligence and ardent spirit, who had been cherishing the Messianic hope and found in Jesus the realization of their dreams.

Ancient literature was mainly religious; and learning is founded on literature. But though the circle of learning had religion as its centre, it included some study of all the obvious phenomena of nature. Modern discovery is proving that not only famous countries such as Egypt or Babylonia, but also peoples whose very names were formerly unknown, had a developed civilization and system of thought. Amongst the Israelites Moses and Solomon are credited (Ac 7²², 1 K 4²⁹⁻³⁴) with all the knowledge the world then possessed; and to the latter are attributed not only poetry and philosophy, but also an exhaustive knowledge of Natural History. The people were skilled in music and in works of architecture. But while Israel was producing its prophets, the imaginative genius of Greece was creating a secular literature and founding sciences. Gradually Greek influence extended to all lands. It was felt in Jerusalem even in the days of greatest exclusiveness. Greek was the language of the Hellenistic Jews, and the Septuagint was their Bible. Greek ideas were thus diffused over the surface of Hebraic religion, and helped to enrich the thought and life of the planters of Christianity. Of the NT writings it may confidently be said that they are not the work of unlearned men. St. Paul was probably much more learned than his letters show (Ac 26^{3, 24}). The Johannine writings are artistically conceived, and studded with gems of thought and expression. The Epistles to the Hebrews and Ephesians show an imaginative scope and a rhetorical power scarcely surpassed. St. Luke had a literary faculty rare amongst physicians. It is true that Peter and John are styled 'unlearned'

(Ac 4¹³); yet this is but the technical description (ἀγράμματοι καὶ ἰδιῶται) of men who had not graduated in the colleges of the scribes. If not many noble were called (1 Co 1²⁶), there were at least some who combined spiritual insight with literary culture, and who were able to express the new ideas in forms whose beauty is partially hidden by their Divineness.

Of Jesus Himself His enemies asked (Jn 7¹⁵), 'How knoweth this man letters (γράμματα), having never learned?' No doubt it was true that He had never studied Jewish theology at any of the great Rabbinical schools. But not only did He have a thorough knowledge of the letter of the OT, as He repeatedly showed (see, c.g., Mt 5²¹⁻⁴³ 12^{3ff.} 40^{ff.} 13^{14f.} 15^{4, 7f.} 19^{1ff.} 17^{ff.} 21^{13, 16, 42} 22^{22, 37ff.} 43^{ff.} 24^{15, 37ff.} 26⁵⁴ 27⁴⁶), but He revealed an insight into Scripture and an expository skill (and this was what the Jews specially meant by His 'knowing letters') at which they were compelled to marvel (Jn 7^{15a}). This 'learning' of Jesus, for γράμματα in Gr. (like Lat. literæ, Eng. 'letters') is synonymous with 'learning,' had its human side without doubt. His education in Scripture would begin in the family circle, and most probably be continued in a synagogue school. In early youth He showed His interest in the synagogal instruction (Lk 2⁴⁶), and ever afterwards it was His 'custom' to frequent those services of the synagogue at which Moses and the Prophets were read and explained (Lk 4¹⁵). But His 'learning' and consequent 'teaching,' on the spiritual side, as He Himself declared, came from an inward and Divine spring (Jn 7^{16, 17}), a saying which helps to explain the statement of two of the Synoptists (Mt 7²⁹ || Mk 1²²), 'He taught them as one having authority, and not as the scribes' (γραμματεῖς). LEAVEN.—The effect of leaven upon dough to which it is added is due to minute living organisms disseminated through it in great numbers. These organisms are one or more species of yeast-fungi. They are the most important agents of the alcoholic fermentation, which they produce in dough as well as in solutions of sugar. Whether lodged in sour dough (leaven) or collected free out of fermenting vats (compressed yeast), they cause the same effect when introduced into bread sponge. At the present time leaven is not so much used for the lightening of bread as yeast, because it is apt to impart to bread a sour taste and a disagreeable odour.

Yeast-fungi were first recognized (1680) by the Dutch naturalist Leuwenhök in the scum floating on the surface of fermenting beer. With his imperfect lenses he was able to observe little of their structure beyond the fact that they were very small globules. They are now known to be single-celled plants, having for the most part an oval or ellipsoidal shape. The individual yeast-cell consists of a mass of protoplasm enclosed in a delicate wall of cellulose. The protoplasm, as in the case of all the fungi, contains no chlorophyll, and is, accordingly, dependent upon organic matter for its nourishment. It is granular, and usually shows one large non-contractile vacuole or several small vacuoles containing water. It has also a nucleus, which, however, can be brought into view only after special treatment. The size of the yeast-cell varies from 1.5 microns to 15 microns in diameter. (The micron equals $\frac{1}{25,000}$ inch). During the inactive stage the cells are isolated, but in an actively fermenting medium they occur in groups or families, organically united and consisting of from two to six or eight members in varying stages of development. When the members reach maturity, they separate from one another, each one having the capacity to produce a new group. This is the method by which the plant propagates itself. An isolated cell sends out a little pimple or bud on the surface. The bud is destined to become an independent cell of the same size as the cell which produced it; but, before it is mature, it may itself form a bud which in turn may form another bud of its own, the mother-cell in the meantime forming a second bud at a different point. A sort of chain of sprouts, usually curved, is formed as the result of this process of budding or gemmation. The successive buds round up and finally separate themselves as independent individuals. Pasteur, to whose elaborate investigations we are deeply indebted for our knowledge of the agents and the process of fermentation, found that two cells produced eight in two hours at a temperature of 13 degrees C. The multiplication is more rapid at a higher temperature.

Yeast-fungi secure their food for the most part from weak solutions of grape-sugar. They convert grape-sugar into alcohol and carbon dioxide. This conversion is known as the alcoholic fermentation. The same action takes place in moistened wheat-flour when yeast is mixed with it. The wheat grain contains a ferment, diastase, whose function is the conversion of the insoluble starch of the grain into soluble grape-sugar for the nourishment of the embryo when the grain germinates. Diastase is present, of course, in wheat-flour, and when the conditions of moisture and temperature are supplied, as in a gently heated bread sponge, it effects the same conversion as under natural conditions in the germinating grain. Some of the flour starch is changed into grape-sugar, in which the yeast-cells excite the alcoholic fermentation. The bubbles of the gas carbon dioxide produced in the fermentation are entangled in the glutinous sponge, and, expanded by heat, puff it up or lighten it. If, now, more flour is thoroughly mixed with this sponge so as to scatter the yeast-cells of the sponge throughout the mass, the whole will shortly be leavened by the gas which continues to be given off by the agency of the rapidly multiplying cells. A practically indefinite quantity of flour so treated can be leavened by 'a little leaven.'

The week which began with the Passover is called 'the days of unleavened bread' (Mt 26¹⁷, Mk 14¹², Lk 22⁷), from the practice enjoined in Ex 23¹⁵, Lv 23⁶, Dt 16³⁻⁸.

The effect of leaven in raising a mass of dough (see above) is the basis of our Lord's parable of the Leaven (Mt 13³³, Lk 13^{20, 21}), which sets forth the gradual and pervasive influence of the Kingdom of God upon the whole of human society.

The fermentation produced by leaven was regarded as a species of putrefaction, and this, together with the tendency of leaven to spread, explains the figure in which 'the leaven of the Pharisees and Sadducees' stands for their corrupt teaching (Mt 16^{6, 11}, Mk 8¹⁵), or, as St. Luke puts it more specifically in the case of the Pharisees, their hypocrisy (Lk 12¹). 'The leaven of Herod' (Mk 8¹⁵) similarly denotes the policy of the Herodian party.

LEAVES.—The tree is often used in NT as a symbol of the life of a man. Leaves are the indication of the existence of life in the tree. The barren fig-tree was cursed by our Lord because it had leaves only (Mt 21¹⁹, Mk 11¹³) and no fruit. See FIG-TREE. We have here a type of religious profession unaccompanied by practice, a spiritual condition which always drew from our Lord the strongest condemnation.

The putting forth of leaves by the fig-tree is referred to by our Lord as one of the indications that summer is nigh (Mt 24³², Mk 13²⁸). See Robertson Nicoll, Ten Minute Sermons, 59.

LEBBÆUS.—The name 'Lebbæus' has completely disappeared from the RV; in the AV it occurs (Mt 10³) in the list of the Apostles: 'Lebbens, whose surname was Thaddæus.' [On this spelling see Scrivener's Paragraph Bible, p. lxxxii, note 3]. This is the reading of the Received Text, which is still maintained in the Patriarchal Edition of the Greek Testament (Constantinople, 1904), and supported by most of the Greek MSS, to which was added lately the Palimpsest of Cairo. The modern critical editions are unanimous in the omission of 'whose surname was,' but are divided about the name itself, reading either 'Thaddæus,' as Lachmann, Tregelles, WH, RV, or 'Lebbæus,' as Alford, Tischendorf, and WH in the margin. The question of reading is here of singular importance; for the name is one of the test passages of textual criticism in the NT. WH (§ 304) adduce the reading 'Thaddæus' found only in NB as proof of the unique excellence of these MSS, and are inclined to attribute the name 'Lebbæus' to an attempt to bring Levi (Mk 2¹⁴) within the number of the Twelve. But if so, why was this attempt not made in Mk 3¹⁸? There 'Lebbæus' is attested only by D and the Old Latin MSS a b d f f i q r, whereas in Mt. D has the support of at least one Greek minuscule (122), of k—the oldest Latin witness, spelt iebbæus [the others, a b g h gat, read in Mt. 'Judas Zelotes']—and of all witnesses for the TR. The reading of the latter is apparently a conflation of the name Lebbæus (Mt.) with the name Thaddæus (Mk.); while D, as is its custom, assimilated Mk. to Mt. Allen (EBi 5032) sees in 'Lebbæus' the 'Western' gloss of a copyist, who connected the name Thaddæus with thēdā=mamma, and wished to substitute a not dissimilar name, which should be more appropriate to an Apostle and less undignified.

A trace of the name 'Lebbæus' is also found in the list of the Apostles as given in Tatian's Diatessaron according to Ishodad; but here 'Lebbæus' is inserted between 'James' and 'son of Alphaï,' and Judas Jacobi is added afterwards (see Zahn's Com. on Mt., and Burkitt, Evangelion da-Mepharreshe, ii. 270). The Syriac lexicographer Bar Bahlul explained that Judas Thomas was called Lebbæus and Thaddæus on account of his wisdom. Very curious is the testimony of the MSS of the Evangelium Hierosolymitanum. The MSS AB give ליבוס הרין דתחקרי חאדי סימן ק'

C has ליבוס הרין דתחקרי סימן ק'
Here ליבוס seems to be a combination of 'Lebbæus' and 'Judas,' and תחקרי a confusion of 'Thaddæus' with 'was surnamed.' In the Ap. Const. vi. 14, cod. h spells Λεβαϊος, viii. 25, cod. d Λεβαϊος; it is a pity that the new edition of Funk does not contain the lists of the Apostles given by de Lagarde, p. 282 f. In Ap. Const. vii. 46, Judas Jacobi is mentioned as third bishop of Jerusalem. The list of Lag. p. 283, distinguishes Judas Jacobi as the tenth Apostle from Θαδδαϊος ὁ Λεβαϊος καὶ Ἰουδας as the eleventh. In the Synaxaries of the Greek Church (1) Judas (in Lk.), 'who is called by Mt. and Mk. Thaddæus and Lebbæus,' the brother of Jesus after the flesh, is celebrated on the 19th June, and, together with the other Apostles, on 30th June, as the last of them. From him is distinguished (2) the Apostle Thaddæus, who is also Lebbæus, one of the Seventy, celebrated on the 21st August; and (3) Judas Zelotes on the 22nd May.

As supplement to the art. JUDAS (i. 906), it may be stated that this strange combination 'Judas Zelotes,' mentioned above as the reading of the Old Latin MSS in Mt 10³, is attested for Rome by the chronographer of the year 334, by the list of the canonical books of the year 382; and for Ravenna by the mosaics of the great Baptistry (5th cent.). From the oldest MSS of the Martyrologium Hieronymianum it would appear that also in the name of the 28th Oct. 'SS. Simon and Jude App. MM.' the latter name is not an abbreviation of Judas Jacobi, but of Judas Zelotes.

The meaning of the name 'Lebbæus' is equally doubtful. The explanation corculum by Jerome (after the surname of Scipio Nasica) is not proved. For relationship with Levi the spelling Λεβαϊος and Λαββδ might be adduced, against it the double bb. A l at the beginning of a name may have the same origin as the L in Lulianus=Julianus, Lestus=Justus, etc. J. Lightfoot (Hor. Heb. 325) derived 'Lebbæus' from the home of the man, and so already Ishodad. Josephus (Ant. xiii. § 97) mentions a town Lebma in Moab, which he calls Libba (xiv. 17 [v.l. Libias]). Dalman (Words of Jesus, 50, *Grammatik*², 178) compares Phœn. לבא (CLS i. 147), and Sinaïtic לבא (Euting, Sin. Inschriften, 421) and denies affinity with Levi. Finally, the name Labbu (=Nebo) may be compared in the Syriac Doctrine of Addai.

That there was another Judas besides the traitor among the Twelve is attested by Jn 14²², and it is possible that later his name was less used to avoid remembrance of the traitor and confusion with him, and that his original name 'Judas' was replaced by 'Thaddæus' in Mk. and by 'Lebbæus' in Mt. (if this be the true reading for Mt.). In Ac 1³ we have three names—Joseph, Barsabbas, Justus; in a similar way we should get here three or even four—Judas, son of James, Lebbæus, Thaddæus. The testimony of Origen (c. Cels. i. 62 [Berlin ed. i. 113]) is rather confused. Against Celsus, who mentioned 'publicans and sailors' in the plural among the ten or eleven followers of Jesus, Origen says that by the sailors Celsus may mean the sons of Zebedee; but of publicans there was only Matthew among the Twelve. Even if the publican Λευῆς (so cod. A, Λευῆς P) followed Jesus, yet he was not of the number of the Twelve, εἰ μὴ κατὰ τινα τῶν ἀντιγράφων τοῦ κατὰ Μάρκον εὐαγγελίου. Did Origen know the reading of D and its Latin allies in Mk., and identify Lebbæus with Levi?*

LEGION (λεγιῶν [λεγεῶν], a loan-word from the Latin legio, which meant originally a 'gathering' of the citizen army of Rome).—The word 'legion' occurs in two contexts in the Gospels. One is in the scene at Gethsemane, when Peter cut off the ear of the high priest's slave (Mt 26⁵⁴); the other occurs in the narrative about the man with the unclean spirit in the country of the Gerasenes (Mk 5⁹⁻¹⁵, Lk 8³⁰; but not in Matthew's account, which gives two men). In both cases the reference is to the large number of persons who compose a legion: in the one case the legions of angels are at the disposal of Jesus, if He asks for them; in the other the great number of evil spirits can be described only by the name 'legion.' The present writer cannot recall any such use of the word 'legion' in non-Christian authors. It seems certain also that in the NT the word is not a translation of any Aramaic word. The conclusion is that, if Aramaic is behind the passages where the word occurs, the expression was imported into that language from Greek, and reveals the great impression made on the minds of Orientals by the vast organized unity of the Roman army, with which they had become acquainted since the Roman occupation of Syria by Pompey (B.C. 64-63). At least three and often more (see Hardy's Studies in Roman History, 181 ff.) legions were quartered in that province during the whole of the 1st cent. A.D., and the sight of these magnificent troops, as they marched in column along the great roads of the country, must have powerfully impressed the natives with the numbers and power of the Roman people. An innumerable number of persons came to be spoken of as a legion.

The full strength of a Roman legion was about 6000 men, or about that of a modern infantry division, but the subdivision was different. Instead of brigades, battalions, companies, and sections, there were 10 cohortes, each commanded by a tribunus militum, 3 manipuli in each cohort, and 2 centuriæ in each manipulus. The uniform of all ordinary legionaries was the same. The legion was commanded by a legatus legionis (lieutenant-general). See also BAND.

LEGS (Jn 19^{34f.}).—The breaking of the legs with a heavy club or bar (σκελοκοπία, crurifragium) was inflicted as a capital punishment on slaves and others who incurred the anger of irresponsible masters (for reff. see Westcott's note). The victim, with legs broken, hands cut off, and otherwise mutilated, was thrown still alive into a pit; often the deathblow was given in some other way ('fractis cruribus occiduntur,' Ammian Marcell. Hist. xiv. 9). Crurifragium formed no part of crucifixion itself, but was perhaps usually added in Judæa to secure a speedy death, as otherwise those crucified might linger for several days (cf. Lactantius, iv. 26, 'His executioners did not think it necessary to break His bones, as was their prevailing custom'). Death would then ensue in one of the following ways—(1) From shock; in which case it would be immediate. (2) From hæmorrhage; such blows given by a heavy bar might cause complete tearing of the skin, producing what is known as 'a compound fracture,' which would speedily result in bleeding to death owing to the tearing of the blood-vessels. This would be especially likely to occur from the upright position in which the victim was suspended. (3) From gangrene, which would ensue if neither shock nor hæmorrhage were fatal, and would make recovery impossible. Thus the bodies might be removed. Edersheim says (Life and Times, ii. 613): 'The breaking of the bones was always followed by a coup de grâce by sword, lance, or stroke (the perforatio or percussio sub alas), which immediately put an end to what remained of life. Thus the "breaking of the bones" was a sort of increase of punishment by way of compensation for its shortening by the final stroke that followed.' Cf. Quintilian, 'cruces succiduntur: percussos sepeliri carnifex non vetat.' But Meyer is of opinion that the addition of a finishing blow by which (and therefore not by crurifragium in itself) death was brought about, cannot be shown, and least of all from Jn 19³⁴. Crurifragium, as well as crucifixion, was abolished by Constantine, the first Christian emperor. The Jews did not make their request to Pilate with the desire to intensify the sufferings of Jesus and the robbers, but because only in this way could they have the bodies taken down. They had in view Dt 21²³ (though this law did not refer to crucifixion, a punishment unknown to the Israelites), more especially as they feared the pollution of the coming Sabbath, which was a high day (v. 31).

Jesus being crucified 'in the midst,' the soldiers would naturally begin with the robbers who were on either side, and so come last to Him. This is better than Bengel's explanation ('cui destinatum crurifragium distulerant, diuturnioris doloris causa'). His legs were not broken as He was already dead, but a soldier gave the spear-thrust to make sure. Thus the type of the Paschal lamb (Ex 12⁴⁶, Nu 9¹²), and the declaration of God's protection of the righteous (Ps 34²⁰), were remarkably fulfilled (Jn 19³⁶); and the sacred body of Christ, which had previously been subjected to insult and abuse, was preserved from the last indignity when once His work was finished. The omission of the crurifragium is very important, showing that the executioners were convinced of the reality of the death of Jesus. The Synoptists make no mention of the incident, probably (as Godet) because Jesus Himself was not affected by it and His Person alone was of consequence to them, not those of the two malefactors. Neither would St. John have mentioned it but for the relation of the fact to the prophecy which struck him so forcibly. 'To understand what John felt at the moment which he here recalls, we must suppose a believing Jew, familiar with the OT, seeing the soldiers approach who are to break the legs of the three victims. He asks himself anxiously what is to be done to the body of the Messiah, which is still more sacred than the Paschal lamb. And lo, simultaneously and in the most unexpected manner, this body is rescued from the brutal operation which threatened it, and receives the spear-thrust, thereby realizing the spectacle which repentant Israel is one day to behold.⁷

The so-called Gospel according to Peter has a curious perversion of the account, representing the crucifragium as omitted not in the case of Jesus, but in that of the penitent robber. 'One of the malefactors reproached them, saying, We have suffered this for the evils that we have done, but this man having become the Saviour of men, what wrong hath He done to you? And they, being angered at him, commanded that his legs should not be broken, that he might die in torment' (see Robinson and James, Gospel and Revelation of Peter; also the edd. by Swete (p. 7) and by the author of Supern. Rel. (p. 63)).

LEPROSY (λέπρα, Mk 1⁴², Lk 5¹²; and λεπρός, [leper] Mt 8² 10⁸ 11⁵ 26⁶, Mk 1⁴⁰ 14³, Lk 4²⁷ 7²² 17¹²).—The name of a disease common in Palestine in the time of Christ, for the cleansing of which many mighty works were performed. The great difficulty in knowing the exact nature of the disease from which the leper suffered lies in the fact that the word 'leprosy' is used as the English equivalent of three different foreign words—the Heb. נִצְרָא (zārā'ath), the Gr. λέπρα, and the Gr. ἐλέφας and ἐλεφαντίασις. And the subject is further complicated by the fact that the term last mentioned, elephantiasis, is used to-day for a disease of quite another nature from that described under that name by the early Greek medical writers.

(1) נִצְרָא (zārā'ath) is the word tr. in EV 'leprosy'; the root meaning is to smite. The symptoms of zārā'ath are fully described in Lv 13, and we have other scattered references to the disease in the OT. To enter into a full examination of OT leprosy would be out of place here, but it may be said that neither true leprosy (in the modern sense) nor any other known disease answers to all the signs described. We must either suppose, as is conceivable but not highly probable, that the disease described in Lv 13 has disappeared or greatly changed its character from new environment, or that the term zārā'ath included a great variety of skin diseases, some infectious in the modern sense, but all of them regarded in ancient times as rendering their victims ceremonially impure. Of these diseases, to take a few examples, we seem to be able to recognize psoriasis in the expression 'a leper white as snow'; favus (a common disease among Eastern Jews to-day) and perhaps 'ringworm' in the description of the 'plague of the head and the beard' (vv. 29-30); and the disease vitiligo in the symptom termed 'freckled spot' (דִּקְחָה, v. 39), the exactly equivalent word بَقَع (bohak) being used for this condition in Palestine and Arabia to-day. On the other hand, there are in the references to zārā'ath an extraordinary absence of the symptoms of true leprosy which will be mentioned lower down; the extremely slow process of this latter disease, and its practically hopeless outlook, ill tallies with either the frequent examinations—at intervals of seven days—or the elaborate directions, evidently meant for use, for restoration of a cured person to the community.

The history of medicine shows that in the undeveloped state of medical science many diseases which a later age learns to differentiate are classed as one disease; of no department has this been truer than of diseases affecting the skin. In the Middle Ages many persons affected with syphilis were put in the leper hospitals of Northern Europe through the mistaken idea that they were lepers.

(2) λέπρα (meaning 'rough' or 'scaly') was the name given by the Greek physicians to a disease known to-day as psoriasis. It is a non-contagious, irritating, but by no means fatal disease, in which white scales form on various parts of, and occasionally all over, the body. In such cases the expression 'a leper white as snow' might be not inappropriate. The disease is not hereditary nor in any marked degree repulsive, unless, as is unusual, the face is attacked; in this respect it is the very opposite of true leprosy, with which, moreover, it cannot be confused.

In the LXX λέπρα is used as the equivalent of zārā'ath; and as the former was well known, the translators apparently regarded this disease as the nearest equivalent to that described in the OT. In the same way the Synoptists, and among them Luke, the 'beloved physician,' in using λέπρα and λεπρός, were using words which had a definite meaning to the outside world.

(3) True leprosy—the ἐλεφαντίασις of the Greeks—is certainly no new disease, and references to it are found in Egyptian inscriptions many centuries before the Israelites left Egypt. It is also said that it was known in India at an equally primitive period. Hippocrates appears to refer to it under the name of the 'Phœnician disease,' and Galen under the name 'elephantiasis.' It is stated by Pliny that it was brought to Europe from Syria by the army of Ptolemy (61 B.C.). From this time references to it are common, but always under the name elephantiasis.

It is evident, therefore, that at the time of the Gospels, λέπρα—in the classical medical sense—was primarily the well-known skin disease psoriasis. At the same time it is highly probable that the disease elephantiasis—true leprosy—together with other skin affections, e.g. vitiligo, favus, etc., were, from the point of view of ceremonial uncleanness, included in the term lepra, the word having, as is usual with medical terms, a much wider signification among the lay public than among the medical authors. The fact that tradition has from the earliest period pointed to true leprosy as the disease of the Bible, certainly makes it probable that it at least was one of the diseases recognized by the Rabbis as zārā'ath; and doubtless its specially horrible and fatal character has caused it to gradually displace all others in the popular mind.

It might be thought that Rabbinical commentaries or existing Jewish custom might help to throw a light on the subject, but neither of these is any real help. The Talmud teaches that zārā'ath refers to any disease with cutaneous eruptions or sores, and indeed some references appear to demonstrate that the writers considered the disease non-contagious; as, for example, the rule that a bridegroom, suspecting himself affected, might wait till seven days after his marriage before reporting his condition. The Rabbinical comments, instead of correlating the Levitical description with known medical facts, are rather engaged in impressing the importance of a literal adherence to the text of the Mosaic law.

Modern custom among the Jews in the East does not seem to view true leprosy with the aversion of even Moslems and Christians. Of six cases of well-marked leprosy among the Jews of Jerusalem which the present writer can recall, only one of them, a stranger from India, was in any way isolated, and he only after he had been in the English Hospital for some days among all the other patients; when he could no longer be kept he was sent to the Leper Hospital, where he died. The other cases, a Russian Jewess, three Spanish Jewesses, and a Spanish Jewish boy, all lived at home and mixed freely with their friends; the boy, indeed, long after he had marked symptoms of anæsthetic leprosy, continued to attend a large Jewish boys' school without any sign of opposition or trouble. The Eastern Jews, on the other hand, manifest at times great fear of the contagiousness of tuberculous, or as they would popularly be called, 'scrofulous' affections of the skin and of the lymphatic glands. These seem by tradition to be recognized as contagious.

When it is remembered that it is only in very recent years, in the life of the present generation of medical men, that the true nature both of leprosy (elephantiasis) and of 'scrofula' has been discovered, it is difficult to believe that the Jews of Palestine, even in NT times, recognized the sharply-defined varieties of disease we do to-day. It is therefore probable that, while the leprosy of the NT certainly included some developments of the disease we now know as psoriasis and allied affections with a scaly eruption, and almost certainly a proportion of cases of 'true leprosy,' it may also have included cases of 'lupus,' 'scrofulous' (i.e. tuberculous) glands, and varieties of parasitic skin affections, such as 'ringworm' and favus, both of which are very common among the Jews of the East to-day.

True leprosy (elephantiasis) has for so many centuries been identified with the disease now called by that name, and, indeed, is likely to be for so many generations, that some description of this disease, especially as it occurs to-day in the Holy Land, is here not out of place. It is a disease of world-wide distribution, though apparently dying out of most European lands, where, as in England and France, it was once rampant. India, China, South Africa, and the Sandwich Islands are to-day the great habitats of leprosy. Climate appears to have no real effect on it. It is not hereditary; the children of lepers, if removed to healthy surroundings at an early age, seldom take the disease, while advance of the disease usually produces sterility. There is no doubt that it is contagious, but only by close personal contact; attendants on lepers run very little risk if they are careful; and they cannot, as was once supposed, carry the contagion to others. Although the almost world-wide custom of isolating lepers is founded upon the doubtful tradition of this being the special and peculiar disease described in the Mosaic law, yet from every point of view this is desirable both for the poor victims themselves, who are always to some degree incapacitated and suffering, and for the sake of their healthy neighbours. Although a leper in the street is no danger to the passer-by, he must in his home be a danger to his family, and no other disease reduces a human being for so many years to such a hideous wreck.

With respect to the ultimate cause of leprosy, Hansen has demonstrated (1871) that it is due to a special micro-organism, the bacillus lepræ, similar in appearance, and to some extent in the action on the human tissues, to the tubercle bacillus. How the poison enters the body is not known. The disease occurs so sporadically that there must be some cause other than contagion; but what this may be has never been proved. The theory recently revived by Mr. Jonathan Hutchinson, F.R.C.S., that the disease is due to a diet of fish, is not borne out by the facts. In Palestine, in particular, the great majority of the lepers have never eaten fish at all, as they come from inland villages: fish is very seldom eaten by the Moslems in Palestine, and the only people who eat it—the Jews regularly, and the Christians at their fasts when living in the cities—suffer least from this disease.

Leprosy manifests itself in three forms: (1) the tubercular or nodular, (2) the anæsthetic, and (3) the mixed. Chronic cases, however they begin, tend to assume in the later stages the third or mixed type.

(1) In the tubercular form, after a prodromal period of indefinite duration during which there is a gradual loss of power and vivacity, obscure pains in the limbs and joints, feverish attacks and loss of appetite, the first definite signs to appear are symmetrical discoloured blotches, especially over the back. These blotches are at the first most marked during feverish attacks. Soon afterwards, definite tubercles, at first pink but later brownish, arise; the skin in these places is thickened and found to be infiltrated. The tubercles have a special tendency to form on the folds of the cheek, the nose, the lips, and the forehead. At this time some amount of ulceration about the soft palate often assists the diagnosis. The nodules enlarge and from time to time ulcerate and become encrusted with discharge. In cases where the face is particularly attacked the expression is entirely altered, and a most characteristic 'lion-like' or 'satyr-like' expression is developed. The leontiasis of Aretæus and the satyriasis (= satyriasis) of Aristotle (de Gen. Animal. IV. iii. 22) are both supposed on these grounds to have been true leprosy. As a rule the eyebrows fall out, and the eyes, in addition to suffering from keratitis, become staring in appearance through scarring about the eyelids. The voice is often hoarse, and the breathing loud and wheezing through ulceration of the vocal chords. The hands and feet, sometimes the first to suffer, always in time become ulcerated, though the most severe changes in them are probably secondary to nerve lesions. The disease from first to last has an average duration of nine years; if it runs its full course and is not terminated, as is usual, by the onset of tuberculosis, it leads to gradual mental decay, coma, and death.

(2) The anæsthetic variety, if not complicated, is not nearly so horrible nor so fatal. Here the incidence of the disease falls on the nerve trunks, which may quite early in the disease be felt thickened from inflammation due to bacterial infection. The prodromal symptoms are similar to those described, but the onset of the disease is often not remarked until the patient finds that certain parts of the body are without sensation. Thus it is narrated of Father Damien that, although he had vague symptoms which made him suspicious, he was not convinced that he was a leper until he found he had placed his feet in scalding water without feeling the heat. As the disease progresses, the nerve lesions cause various discoloured patches and blisters on the skin, wasting of muscles and contraction of the tendons, a peculiar claw-like appearance of the hands,—the result of partial paralysis,—disfigurement of the nails, deep chronic ulceration of the foot, and finally progressive loss of various fingers and toes, and even of the feet and occasionally of the hands. Many of these later changes also occur in the tubercular form as the nerves become affected. An anæsthetic case which keeps to this type may last 20, 30, or even more years, and some such cases become 'cured,' that is, the disease actually ceases to progress, though the results of its work can never be remedied.

(3) In Palestine, as has been already suggested, the great majority of cases are of the mixed form; cases of pure anæsthetic type are exceptional.

Leprosy in modern Palestine is not a common disease, but is prominently to the front from three causes: firstly, because of the interest excited in Christians of all Churches, and the special appeal made to their charitable feelings from the traditional view that these sufferers are the veritable lepers of the OT and NT; secondly, because its results are so manifest and repulsive, and its progress so slow, that a comparatively small number of cases are very much in evidence; and, lastly, because practically all the lepers in the land are segregated together by order of the Government in a few chief towns, all resorted to by travellers. There the lepers, being unable to work for a living, sit in groups in prominent places, and endeavor by an exhibition of the miseries of their condition to touch the sympathy of the passer-by. In Jerusalem, at any rate, they collect in this way large sums for their community. They live in huts provided by the Government at Silwân (near Jerusalem), Ramleh, and Nâblus. At Damascus also there is a community, some members of which are also drawn from Palestine, but the majority from Syria and around Damascus; the traditional 'House of Naaman' is their home. In addition to these, there is the voluntary community—now numbering nearly 60—at the excellent Moravian Hospital in Jerusalem; the patients there are not allowed to go begging, and are employed in various ways on the premises. Including these last, there must be between 100 and 120 lepers in Jerusalem, some 25 at Ramleh, about 40 at Nâblus; altogether, allowing for some Palestine lepers in the Damascus community, there are not more than 200 known victims of this disease in the country. It is quite possible that sometimes cases may be hidden away, as with the Jewish cases above mentioned, by their relatives; but this cannot often happen in the villages, as the village sheikhs are very prompt in detecting early signs of the disease, and a suspected case is soon expelled from the community. Sometimes the heads of the village make mistakes; cases of this sort have come to the medical officer of the Leper Hospital in Jerusalem, and their friends learning that they have been mistaken, they have been restored to their rights.

It has been mentioned that one of the striking things about leprosy is that it occurs so sporadically. It is not the rule in Palestine, at any rate, that whole villages or families become leprosy, but a case arises here and there. To illustrate this, we give a list of villages from which came some 60 cases that were in the Moravian Hospital during 1903. They are as follows:—From Ramallah and 'Ain Arik, 3 cases each; from Zeta, Bait Ammar, Nahalîn, Saidna Ali, ed-Dir, Deir Diwân, and Nazareth, 2 cases each; from Abu Dîs, 'Ain Kairem, Bîr Zait, Bait Ummar, Bait Jebrîn, Bettîr, Beita, Biddu, Bait Hanîna, Bait Jala, Bait Safafa, 'Asireh, Dîra, Jerusalem, Feddar, Yasîneh, 'Allâr, Mesar'a, Fara'un, Marassa, Kefrenji, Kefr Akâb, Kefr Hâris, Shafât, es-Salt, and Jummain, 1 each. In addition there were 3 Bedawîn from scattered tribes, one gipsy, one case from Mosul, and two from Greece. Any one who will consult a map of modern Palestine will appreciate from how wide an area, both W. and E. of the Jordan, these cases come. Probably there is no district that does not furnish cases at some time.

The only kind of treatment that can alleviate the disease is a well-managed Leper Home. In the Jerusalem Leper Hospital (founded in 1867 and formally taken over by the Moravian Brethren in 1881) all that medical science and Christian kindness can accomplish is done.

LEPROSY IN THE GOSPELS.—It has been often pointed out that, whereas the cure of disease in general is called 'healing' (îâsθai), that of the lepers is called 'cleansing' (καθαρίζειν). This was, no doubt, appropriate on account of the very evident restoration of cleanness of skin, but primarily because the miracle enabled the leper to become ceremonially clean. Doubtless the lepers drifting about the land had intractable skin diseases, and as they were shut out from the temple, the synagogues, certainly in all the towns, and to a large extent from the social life of their fellow-beings, their lot was truly pitiable. Their 'cleansing' meant much more than getting rid of a disagreeable and often, doubtless, painful disease, repulsive to all their fellow-men; it meant restoration to the worship and service of God.

Of lepers mentioned in the NT we have but one named, Simon of Bethany (Mt 26⁶, Mk 14³), probably a grateful recipient of the Saviour's mercy. Tradition has made the Lazarns of the parable a leper, and the terms lazzaro for leper and lazzar-house for leper hospital were a result of this. Also the order of the Knights of Lazarus, founded during the Crusades, made the care of lepers one of their special duties, and they had always a leper as their Grand Master. But though Lazarus was 'full of sores,' the very account in the parable that he lay in such intimate contact with passers-by would, apart from the express omission of the statement in the parable, make his being a leper highly improbable.

In spite of the great prominence given to the cleansing of lepers both in Jesus' account of His own works (Mt 11⁵, Lk 7²²) and in His directions to His disciples (Mt 10⁸), we have only two actual incidents described. (1) The incident of the man whom Jesus touched, with the words, 'I will, be thou clean,' and whose grateful excess of zeal prevented Jesus from entering that 'certain city,' and drove Him to seek seclusion in the wilderness (Mt 8² || Mk 1⁴² || Lk 5¹²). (2) The story of the nine thankless lepers and the grateful tenth, who was a Samaritan (Lk 17^{11ff.}). It is noticeable that he turned back because he was healed (îâsθai); but he was not yet finally cleansed (καθαρίζειν), because he had not yet been to the priest; unless, indeed, it is because he was a Samaritan that he is spoken of as healed rather than cleansed.

LETTERS.—The word γράμματα (Jn 7¹⁵) may be intended to indicate literature in general, as it might do in Ac 26³¹. But to the ordinary Jew γρ. were practically constituted exclusively by the Sacred Scriptures, certain esteemed Apocryphal books, and the Rabbinical commentaries upon them. The surprise of the question recorded in the reference suggests consideration of the amount of human learning Jesus possessed.

With the rudiments of the Law every Jew was made thoroughly and intimately conversant from his earliest intelligent years (see EDUCATION). The education of the Jewish child had the primary purpose of enabling him to read the passages which it was essential for him to know for the proper discharge of his religious duties. Beyond this elementary knowledge comparatively few carried their studies. It was, indeed, the ideal of Judaism that every Israelite should have a professional acquaintance with the Law in its details. But only a small fraction attended the schools of the scribes at which advanced instruction was given in its more recondite matters and the commentaries upon them contained in the Midrash and other Rabbinic books. It would seem from the surprise expressed in this question that Jesus had not prosecuted such studies, at least in the recognized schools, whether from disinclination or from poverty which prevented Him from paying the fees exacted in spite of the understanding that such instruction should be gratuitous. There are convincing indications, however, that Jesus was to some extent familiar with the literature studied in the schools, both from His direct reference to passages contained in it, and from striking parallelisms in language and thought between various sayings of His and maxims of uncanonical books such as Sirach and the Wisdom of Solomon.* He is also evidently acquainted with the kind of teaching supplied by the scribes. In the apocryphal Gospel of the Infancy, Jesus is credited with an intimate and astounding acquaintance with 'learning,' partly derived from the reading of books. The bestowal of the title 'Rabbi' upon Him implies that, though not having studied after the usual manner, He was recognized to possess learning. But He Himself in His reply accepts the implication of the question that His teaching was not derived from any human source, but was the immediate communication from His heavenly Father. LEVELLING.—1. In mountainous countries like Palestine landslips are not uncommon, and in this way roads are blocked, or obstructed by falling débris. The drenching rains loosen the stones on the hillsides and send them rolling down to the plains, and the swollen burns and torrents cut new channels for themselves, and dam up old ones, so that familiar paths not infrequently become obliterated. Besides that, the farmers in some places are in the habit of gathering the stones from the fields and throwing them out on the highway, thus making the roads both dangerous and uncomfortable for travellers. It was needful, therefore, to have the roads restored by removing the obstacles and filling up the inequalities. When a sovereign rode forth, a company always went before him to clear the way: hence, 'Prepare ye the way of the people: cast up, cast up the highway: gather out the stones' (Is 62¹⁰), and, 'A voice crying in the wilderness, Prepare ye the way of the Lord, make his paths straight' (Mt 3³, adapted from Is 40³). When Ibrahim Pasha proposed to visit certain places in Lebanon, the emirs and sheikhs sent out a general proclamation commanding the people to prepare the way. The same took place in 1845 when the Sultan visited Brusa.

2. Of the Temple, Jesus said, 'There shall not be left one stone upon another, that shall not be thrown down' (Mt 24², Mk 13², Lk 21⁶). This prophecy was fulfilled when the Temple was destroyed in 70 A.D. With the levelling of the sacred building to the ground there came an end to the Ceremonial Law so long cherished by the Jews, and this paved the way for a wider acceptance of the gospel of Christ (Ro 5¹², 1 Co 3²³).

LEVIRATE LAW (Lat. levir, 'a husband's brother') regulated the marriage of a man with his dead brother's widow. In the story of Tamar and Judah (Gn 38) there is record of a marriage of this type, and at certain stages of civilization the Levirate marriage was a widespread custom.† Among the Jews the law was laid down that 'if brethren dwell together, and one of them die, and have no child (son), the wife of the dead shall not marry without unto a stranger: her husband's brother . . . shall take her to him to wife' (Dt 25⁵). It almost seems, however, that the Levirate custom was not permitted by later legislation (Lv 18¹⁶ 20²¹); but it has been suggested (1) that the forbidden marriage of that legislation was one between a man and the wife of his living brother; * and (2) that the custom consecrated in Dt. was the exception to the general law set forth in Leviticus.† The object of the Levirate marriage (Dt 25⁶) was to secure that the firstborn of the new union should succeed in the name of the dead brother, whose name thereby might not be blotted out from Israel. In the earlier ages of Judaism there was no clear conception of personal immortality; and the Levirate law was doubtless framed so that there might be the survival through posterity of the name of the representative of a family.

For the statement of a problem regarding the resurrection, propounded to Jesus (Mt 22²³⁻³³, Mk 12¹⁸⁻²⁷, Lk 20²⁷⁻³⁸), the Levirate law was used by the Sadducees, who are described by the Synoptists as saying that there is no resurrection, and by Josephus (Ant. XVIII. i. 4) as holding 'that souls die with the bodies.' Regarding as obligatory only those observances which are found in the written word, they rejected those derived from the traditions of their forefathers. The Pharisees, on the other hand, accepted such traditions, and with them a belief in the doctrine of the resurrection (cf. Jos. Ant. XIII. x. 6). This doctrine, taught clearly in Dn 12, was made popular in Jewish theological discussions by the Book of Enoch,‡ and suggested the problem set forth by the Sadducees, who evidently sought by the authority of Moses to discredit a doctrine held by the Pharisees and taught by Jesus. In stating their problem they brought forward a case of seven brothers who one after the other married the same woman. It is not necessary to take the case as one of actual fact, since the phrase παρ' ἡμῶν in Mt. may have been used merely for literary effect.

In each of the Synoptics the setting forth of the problem is prefaced by a statement of the Levirate law as spoken or written by Moses (Mt. has Μωϋσῆς εἶπε, but in Mk. and Lk. it is Μωϋσῆς ἐγραψεν ἡμῖν). In none of the three statements are the ipsissima verba of Dt 25⁵ used, and Mt. borrows the words ἐπιγαμβρεύσει καὶ ἀναστήσει σπέρμα from the LXX version of Gn 38⁸.

The problem propounded by the Sadducees may be thus stated:—The Levirate law was enacted by Moses, and there was a case of seven brothers who in obedience to it married, one after the other, the same woman, who herself died after the death of the last of the seven. In the resurrection, since they all had her, whose wife shall she be of the seven? Jesus in His answer to the Sadducees did not discuss the justice or injustice of the Levirate law, or examine the purpose of Moses in decreeing it; but, asserting that they had erred, not knowing the Scriptures or the power of God, He showed them that in the resurrection men neither marry nor are given in marriage, but are as the angels of God in heaven; and then He proceeded to declare that belief in immortality is involved in our consciousness of the being of God. LEVITES.—According to one line of tradition, the Levites were appointed to assist the priests (Nu 3⁹ 8¹⁹ 18¹⁻⁶), but were not themselves, like Aaron and his sons, to approach unto the most holy things (4¹⁹); yet according to another representation the priesthood belonged to them as an inheritance (Dt 33⁸⁻¹¹, Jos 18⁷). Whatever may have been the origin and date of the distinction between priest and Levite, it existed in the post-exilic period, since it was recognized in NT times. The Levites are to be classed among the Temple officials, and to their office with its specific duties (Nu 1⁵⁰, 51³³) they were formally set apart (8⁶, 7). Among their duties was the instruction of the people* (Neh 8⁹, 2 Ch 30²² 35³) and 'the killing of the passovers for every one that was not clean,' as also the handing of the blood to the priests to be sprinkled by them according to the Law † (2 Ch 30¹⁶, 17).

The relation of assistantship which associated the Levites with the priests was similar to that which connected deacons with bishops in the Christian Church; and it is not improbable that that connexion was suggested by the arrangement of the functions of the Temple officers with which the Jewish converts to Christianity were familiar. ‡

In the Gospels there are only two places where the word 'Levite' is found. In the first of these, the parable of the Good Samaritan (Lk 10³⁰⁻³⁵), a priest and a Levite, representatives of the religion of Israel and at the same time examples of Jewish traditionalism, are unfavourably contrasted with a Samaritan, one of a people with whom the Jews had no dealings. The parable is the answer of Jesus to the lawyer who asked, 'Who is my neighbour?' and it seems evident that the Levite, described by Jesus, when he looked on the wounded man and passed by on the other side, recognized that he was not a Jew, and therefore not a neighbour to be humanely treated according to the commandment, 'Thou shalt love thy neighbour as thyself' (Lv 19¹⁸). The Levite, it may be concluded, accepted a Jewish traditional conception of 'neighbour' which excluded all those who were not of Israel. Clement of Alexandria wrote that Jesus, 'on His interlocutor inquiring, "Who is my neighbour?" did not, in the same way with the Jews, specify the blood-relation, or the fellow-citizen, or the proselyte, or him that had been similarly circumcised, or the man who uses one and the same law.' §

In the Fourth Gospel (1¹⁹) the distinction between priest and Levite is made by naming together the representatives of these classes, who were sent from Jerusalem to ask John the question, 'Who art thou?' The Levites, as teachers of the people, would be deemed qualified to judge of claims of Messiahship (so Hengstenberg and Godet, but see B. Weiss, ad loc.); but it is significant that the mission to John of priests and Levites, who were officially connected with the Passover ceremonies, is recorded, and in it alone, in the Gospel which, according to the theory held by many critics, identifies Christ with the Paschal lamb. They were told by John that he was not the Christ; and immediately after the account of their interview with him there is the statement that he, seeing Jesus, said, 'Behold the Lamb of God, which taketh away the sin of the world' (Jn 1²⁹).

LIBERALITY.—1. This may be considered to begin when the requirements of the Law have been fulfilled. Thus the payment of tithe, which in our Lord's time was evidently regarded as an ideal (cf. Lk 18¹²), cannot be described as liberality, though it seems certain that many of the wealthier among the 'dispersed' regarded it as a duty to send, by way of Temple tribute, generous and even munificent contributions, far in excess of the legal requirement. These were collected at different centres abroad, and then sent by certain specially appointed 'ambassadors' to Jerusalem, where they were placed in three large chests within the Temple, which were opened with great solemnity at certain seasons of the year. Apart from the Temple tribute, the treasury was enriched by voluntary offerings of different kinds; and out of this grew the abuse which our Lord denounces in Mt 15⁵⁻⁶. It seems probable that the faithful rarely visited the Temple, at least on Sabbaths and feasts, without making some contribution to its revenues. Though votive offerings cannot be regarded, strictly speaking, as instances of liberality, and led to abuses against which the more devout Rabbis protested, the motives which prompted them may not infrequently have been generous and sincere.

In the Court of the Women, within the Temple, were the shopharoth, or 'trumpets,' vessels whose shape is indicated by their name, in which contributions for religious purposes and for charitable objects might be placed. The contents of these were at fixed times placed in the treasury; and in addition to these there was a chamber where donations to be applied to the maintenance and education of poor children might be given. There is reason to believe that, whatever the motives in individual cases might be, there was a constant flow of liberality through these channels (cf. Mk 12⁴¹, Lk 21¹). On the wealth of the Temple treasury and the pious purposes for which it was partly intended, cf. 2 Mac 3⁶⁻¹⁰. Whatever may have been the greedy and grasping spirit of the Pharisees, whose extortions our Lord denounces (Mt 23¹⁴), it is probable that the Deuteronomic precept (Dt 15⁷⁻¹¹) received a generous fulfilment among all classes.

2. Christ's teaching as to liberality.—(a) Of mind. The whole life and teaching of Christ may be regarded as a protest against prejudice and narrow-mindedness, and therefore as an appeal for liberality. His injunctions to love enemies (Mt 5⁴⁴, 45, 46, Lk 6²⁷⁻²⁸), to refrain from passing judgment on others (Mt 7¹⁻⁵, Lk 6³⁷), and indirectly, the parable of the Good Samaritan, afford instances in which He condemns the spirit of prejudice and inculcates an open mind and generous bearing towards others.

(b) In the use of wealth, etc. The claim to which no follower of Christ is to turn a deaf ear is that of need. Need, as evidenced by asking, is a sufficient ground for giving (Mt 5⁴²). The measure of our giving is to be in proportion to the extent of our own blessing (Lk 11⁴¹ 12³³), and although the command 'Freely ye have received, freely give' (Mt 10⁸) was spoken with reference to the use of the miraculous powers given to the disciples, we cannot doubt that it extends also to all endowments of wealth or talents wherewith God has blessed us. Liberality in the form of almsgiving is to be without ostentation (Mt 6^{1-2, 4}); its reward is the heavenly treasure 'that faileth not' (Lk 12³³), and a generous return, here or hereafter, for the right use of wealth (Lk 6³⁸ 16⁹). The complete bestowal of earthly possessions on the poor, accompanied by 'taking up the cross' and following Christ, which is required of the rich young ruler in addition to the observance of the commandments (Mt 19²¹, Mk 10²¹, Lk 18²²), is not necessarily a rule of universal obligation, but evidently intended to meet this special case; underlying it is the idea, never absent from our Lord's teaching as to the use of wealth, that wealth is a trust from God, and to be renounced when it becomes a hindrance to spiritual life. While liberality is assured of a reward, the reward, or even return, is not to be the object of the giver (Lk 6³⁵, where μηδὲν ἀπελπίζοντες may be 'hoping for nothing again,' as in AV; or 'never despairing,' as in RV; or, if read μηδένα, 'driving no one to despair,' or 'despairing of no man,' as in RVm).*

There are three utterances of our Lord with reference to liberality to the Temple and the purposes connected therewith. The gift is to be brought to the altar only after reconciliation to an offended brother (Mt 5^{23, 24}); outward liberality being thus shown to be unacceptable to God unless the heart be filled with the spirit of love. Natural duties are not to be set aside by a liberality which becomes sinful (Mt 15⁵) in devoting to the Temple what ought to be given to the support of parents. The teaching of the incident of the widow's two mites is best summed up in the words of Ambrose: 'It is not considered how much is given, but how much remains behind.' The answer of John the Baptist (Lk 3¹¹) may be quoted as in accordance with the teaching of our Lord: liberality is here shown to be an evidence of repentance, and a practical testimony to a change of heart. LIBERTY.—Christ and His first disciples clearly regarded liberty as an essential of the highest religious life. He begins His mission at Nazareth with the words of Isaiah that His work was 'to set at liberty them that are bruised' (Lk 4¹⁸). By His contrast of the Mosaic law with His own 'I say unto you' of Mt 5^{22, 28, 39}, He declares His disciples to be free of the ancient law; their worship no longer fettered by place (Jn 4²¹); their very Sabbath, which had held them together in the Captivity, an institution to be sanely used for any kind of good work and any sinless pleasure (Mk 2²⁷, Mt 12⁸, Lk 5¹⁻⁵). New wine-skins must be made for the new wine (Mk 2²², Lk 6³⁸). The disciple must hold himself entirely at liberty from the things of the world for the world's sake; he must stand 'with loins girded about and lamp burning' (Lk 12³⁵), unhindered by multitudinous possessions (Lk 12¹⁵), not anxious as to the lesser matters of clothing, food, and shelter (Mt 6²⁵, Lk 12²²), taking 'no bread, no wallet, no money,' whereon he may come to depend too much (Lk 9³ 10⁴, Mt 10⁹, Mk 6⁵). If the rich young man would be perfect, he must learn to be the free master of his riches, not their slave, even though he may have entirely to disperse them in order to assure himself of his spiritual liberty (Mt 19²¹, Lk 18²²). In all things the disciple must be absolutely free for his mission, and 'leave the dead to bury their own dead' (Mt 8²², Lk 9⁶⁰). His utterance itself must partake of the same liberty, not crippled by the slow movement of the intellectual faculties, but made vivid by immediate contact with the Holy Spirit: 'Settle it therefore in your hearts not to meditate beforehand how to answer' (Lk 21¹⁴, Mk 13¹¹, Mt 10¹⁹). Christ promises that the disciple who prizes His word shall come to know the greater fulness of truth, and that revelation shall liberate him; he shall no longer be a bond-servant of sin (it would be impossible, having once seen the light); he shall be free with all the liberties of sonship (Jn 8^{32, 34-36}).

Jesus Himself exhibits the surprises which the 'law of liberty' (Ja 1²⁵) has within it. He tells of the master who, finding his servants alert and faithful, flings conventionality to the winds, 'girds himself, makes them sit down to meat, and himself serves them' (Lk 12³⁷). He tells His host that it were a higher thing to dare to invite, not his relatives and wealthy friends, but the poor, the lame, the blind, who could never recompense him (Lk 14¹²). In dealing with the woman taken in sin,* He takes the course of the moment, as novel as it is searching in its free way (Jn 8¹⁻¹¹). The cruse of precious ointment is looked at as the symbol of an affectionate impulse, more to be valued than a calculated act of philanthropy—selling and giving to the poor (Mk 14⁵, Mt 26⁶⁻¹², Jn 12⁵). Pharisees are startled at His frank intercourse with publicans and sinners (Mk 2¹⁶, Lk 5³⁰ 15²). In vain He likens the liberty of the Spirit to the wind 'that bloweth where it listeth' (Jn 3⁸); few can understand the variety of the workings of the Divine Spirit in man, Wisdom only being justified by 'all her children' (Mk 11¹⁹, Lk 7³⁵), to the confusion often of those who cannot comprehend a John the Baptist abstaining and the Son of man 'eating and drinking.' There are times when Christ seems deliberately to lead His hearers, and especially the formalists among them, into problems that find no solution in 'the Law,' but that compel an exercise of liberty of judgment, as in the 'Render unto Cæsar the things that are Cæsar's' (Lk 20²⁵, Mt 22²¹), 'the baptism of John, was it from heaven, or of men?' (Lk 20⁴), and the question, 'Is it lawful to heal on the Sabbath day, or not?' (Mk 3⁴, Lk 6⁹ 14³). The principle of true liberty, as our Lord taught and lived it, would go far in encouraging the believers in 'the reunion of Christendom,' especially such a command as 'Forbid him not: for he that is not against you is for you' (Lk 9⁵⁰).

That the Apostles so understood Christ can hardly be questioned. Throughout the NT liberty (λευτερία, and its even more confident form ἰζουρία) runs as a golden thread, distinguishing the New Dispensation from the Old. There is the same joyous exercise of the power of a new life that Christ foretold. The writers have met one of the deepest problems of philosophy (man's freedom of will), and have boldly pronounced upon it. St. Paul has no hesitation in asserting man's natural liberty in the light of the spiritual liberty now made known through Jesus Christ. He claims the right (ἰζουρία) of free action in the common affairs of life, in food, in marriage, in the pastor not necessarily labouring manually, but sharing in material provision in return for his spiritual toiling (1 Co 9^{4-5, 12 bis}), just as St. John will claim for the purified soul the same liberty (ἰζουρία) of approach to the tree of life and entry by the portals of the eternal city (Rev 22¹⁴). Perhaps this particular word is most suggestively used in 1 Co 8⁹ 'Take heed lest by any means this liberty of yours become a stumbling-block to the weak,' i.e. lest the very strength and assurance of the new-found liberty may lead you to flourish it boastfully, thus courting temptation yourself, and perhaps ruining the weaker brethren, who, seeing you able to join in certain practices unharmed, will be tempted to copy you, to their own hurt. It is clear that in the first days liberty was fundamental with the Christian. Each man has to 'work out his own salvation' (Ph 2¹²), to be 'fully assured in his own mind,' to 'give account of himself to God' (Ro 14^{5, 12}). Christians are the free citizens of the heavenly Jerusalem, children of liberty (Gal 4³⁶). For abiding freedom did Christ set them free (5¹), calling them into liberty (v. 13). Henceforth no Mosaic veil of past traditions, laws, rites, can bind them. When Moses is read, it shall be with no hindering timidities (2 Co 3^{15 et seq.}) of the letter, but in the reverent freedom of the spirit (vv. 6-8). The disciple feels himself freed from that yoke 'which neither we nor our fathers were able to bear' (Ac 15¹⁰). The Law has but led into a larger world, in which is prized 'the liberty which we have in Christ Jesus' (Gal 3²⁴ 2⁴). The escape has been from the bondage of a religion of fear into 'the liberty of a faith that discerns in God the Eternal Fatherhood' (Ro 8¹⁵). So St. Paul prays that the word may have 'free course,' may run (RV) (σπερμα), spreading the gospel abroad with a free unhindered spirit (2 Th 3¹), and leaving each worker to develop his own methods (1 Co 9¹) and rules of conduct—'Why is my liberty judged by another man's conscience?' (10²⁹). But this does not imply licence. That his liberty is Christian implies a limitation. He is to be 'as free, yet not using his liberty for a cloak of maliciousness, but as the bond-servant of God' (1 P 2¹⁶), having no part with those worldly ones so ready in 'promising liberty while they themselves are bond-servants of corruption' (2 P 2¹⁹). He knows that he will be judged in his speech and conduct by the law of liberty which has taken the place of the ancient law (Ja 2¹²). Being made free from sin he is still a servant, but of righteousness, a 'servant to God' (Ro 6^{18, 20, 22}), and from the 'bondage of corruption' has entered into the 'liberty of the glory of the children of God' (Ro 8²¹). This liberty has been the exchange of a hateful for a precious bondage. If you were actually a slave, you are now 'the Lord's freedman,' if you were free, you are now 'Christ's bond-servant' (1 Co 7^{21, 22}), and that service is the ministry of the brethren, a bondage into which St. Paul boasts and glories that he had brought himself (1 Co 9¹⁹). He has found a new law in place of the ancient prohibitory 'law of sin and of death,' and this 'law of the spirit of life in Christ Jesus' has made him free (Ro 8²). The practical comment of the Apostles upon this doctrine of the Gospels indicates also the immeasurable indebtedness of Christianity to that principle of liberty with which Christ inspired His disciples.*

LIFE (ζωή).—The term applied by Jesus, alike in the Synoptic and the Johannine records of His teaching, to the supreme blessing mediated by Him to men. Certain elements in the conception are common to the two records, but their differences are so marked that it will be necessary to consider them separately.

1. The idea of Life in the Synoptic teaching is substantially that of the OT, unfolded in all its potential wealth of meaning. Hebrew thought, averse to metaphysical speculation, conceived of life as the sum of energies which make up man's actual existence. The soul separated from the body did not cease to be, but it forfeited its portion in the true life. It either departed to the shadowy world of Sheol, or, according to the later view of Ecclesiastes, was reabsorbed (?) into the Divine Being,—'returned to God who gave it' (Ec 12⁷). Thus the highest good was simply 'length of days,'—the continuance of the bodily existence right on to its natural term. Two factors, however, were latent in the OT conception from the beginning, and became more and more prominent in the course of the after-development. (1) The radical element in life is activity. Mere physical being is distinguished from that essential 'life' which consists in the unrestricted play of all the energies, especially of the higher and more characteristic. In the loftier passages of the Psalms, more particularly, the idea of 'life' has almost always a pregnant sense. It is associated with joy, peace, prosperity, wisdom, righteousness; man 'lives' according as he has free scope for the activities which are distinctive of his spiritual nature. God Himself is emphatically the 'living One,' as contrasted with men in their limitation and helplessness. (2) Since God alone possesses life in the highest sense, fellowship with Him is the one condition on which men can obtain it. 'By every word of God doth man live' (Dt 8³). 'With thee is the fountain of life' (Ps 36⁹). In the higher regions of OT thought, life and communion with God are interchangeable ideas. The belief in immortality is never expressly stated, but, as Jesus Himself indicates, it was implicit in this conception of a God who was not the God of the dead but of the living. See art. LIVING.

Jesus accepted the idea of life as it had come to Him through the OT. To Him also life is primarily the physical existence (cf. Mt 6²⁵ 'Take no thought for your life, what ye shall eat and drink,' etc.), and He advances on this conception along ethical and religious lines, in the same manner as the Psalmists and Prophets. (1) He distinguishes between the essential 'life' and the outward subsidiary things with which it is so easily confused. 'The life is more than meat' (Lk 12²³). 'A man's life consisteth not in the abundance of the things which he possesseth' (v. 15). 'What shall it profit a man if he gain the whole world and lose his life?' (Mk 8³⁶). (2) Thus He arrives at the idea of something central and inalienable which constitutes the reality of life. This He discovers in the moral activity. The body with its manifold faculties is only the organ by which man accomplishes his true task of obedience to God. Meat, raiment, and all the rest are necessary, 'but seek first the kingdom of God and his righteousness.' (3) In this way He is led to the conception of a higher, spiritual life, gained through the sacrifice of the lower. 'If a man hate not his own life, he cannot be my disciple' (Lk 14²⁶). 'He that findeth his life shall lose it, and he that loseth his life for my sake shall find it' (Mt 10³⁹ 16²⁵).

Here, however, we become aware of the difficulty which meets us under different forms throughout our Lord's teaching. In His account of the supreme blessing for which lower things must be sacrificed, He seems to pass abruptly from ethical to eschatological ideas. 'Life' is a reward laid up for the righteous in the world to come. It is regarded sometimes as a new state of being (Mt 25⁴⁶), sometimes as a sort of prize that can be bestowed in the same manner as houses and goods and lands (Mk 10³⁰). The precise meaning to be attached to 'the world to come' in which this 'life' will be imparted, depends on our interpretation of the general conception of the Kingdom of God. Our Lord would appear to waver between the idea of a world beyond death and that of a Messianic age or æon, apocalyptically revealed on earth. In either case, however, He thinks of 'life' as of something still in the future, the peculiar blessing of the realized Kingdom of God.

This future possession is defined more particularly in several passages as 'eternal life,' and the epithet might appear at first sight to imply a distinction. We find, however, on closer examination that the term 'life' itself usually involves the emphatic meaning. 'This do and thou shalt live' (Lk 10²⁸) is our Lord's reply to the inquiry concerning 'eternal life.' So when He says, 'It is better to enter into life halt or maimed' (Mt 18⁸, Mk 9⁴³), or 'Narrow is the way that leadeth unto life' (Mt 7¹⁴), it is evidently the future blessing that is in His mind. There is good ground for the conjecture that Jesus Himself never used the expression 'eternal life.'

Since the ethical and eschatological ideas are denoted by the same word, we are justified in assuming that in the mind of Jesus they were bound up with one another. The 'life' which is projected into the future and described figuratively as a gift bestowed from without, is in the last resort the life of moral activity. This becomes more apparent when we take account of certain further elements in our Lord's teaching.

(a) The condition on which the future reward is given is faithful performance of the moral task in the present. Those shall 'live' who keep the commandments. The narrow way that leads to life is the way of obedience and sacrifice. By voluntary loss of earthly things in the cause of Christ, the disciples will gain 'life' (Mk 10³⁰). The apocalyptic imagery does not conceal from us the essential thought of Jesus, that the promised 'life' is nothing but the outcome and fulfilment of a moral obedience begun on earth.

(b) Life is not only a future fulfilment, but has a real beginning in the present. Thus in the saying, 'Follow me, and let the dead bury their dead' (Mt 8²²=Lk 9⁶⁰), Jesus implies that the disciples even now enter into possession of a new and higher life. They are the 'living' as opposed to the children of this world, who are spiritually dead. The same thought appears in the parable of the Prodigal Son: 'he was dead and is alive again' (Lk 15³²). Life in its full reality is the blessing of the world to come, but it will be different in degree, not in kind, from the present life of true discipleship.

(c) One element is common to the two types of 'life,' and marks their ultimate identity. The future consummation, described by Jesus in vivid pictorial language, is in its substance a closer fellowship with God. In the Kingdom which He anticipated, the pure in heart were to see God (Mt 5⁸); those who hungered and thirsted after righteousness were to be satisfied with God's presence (v. 6). This perfect communion with God is the supreme reward laid up for the believer. It constitutes the inner meaning and content of the future Life. In like manner the present life of moral obedience is in its essence a life of fellowship with God. The aim of Jesus is to bring His disciples even now into such a harmony with the Divine will that they may be children of their Father who is in heaven, resembling Him and holding real communion with Him. The eschatological idea of life thus resolves itself at its centre into the purely ethical and religious. The Kingdom is already come when God's will is done on earth as it is in heaven.

Jesus is Himself the Mediator of the new life. He imparts to His disciples His own consciousness of God's presence and Fatherhood. He inspires in them a faith and obedience which without Him would have been for ever impossible. Through knowledge of Him and participation in His spirit, they enter into that fellowship with God which is eternal life. See MEDIATOR.

2. In the Fourth Gospel the idea of Life is much more prominent than in the Synoptics. The Evangelist expressly states (20³¹) that he has 'written these things that believing ye may have life,' and this statement of his main intention is fully borne out by the detailed study of the Gospel. The teaching of Jesus, as he records it, centres wholly on the subject of Life.

This in itself need not be regarded as a breach with the authentic tradition. We have seen that in the Synoptics also the idea of Life lies at the heart of our Lord's teaching, since life is the peculiar blessing of the Kingdom of God. St. John, after his manner, detaches the essential thought from the eschatological framework. The future 'kingdom' becomes simply 'life.'

The idea of Life as a present possession (already implicit in the Synoptic teaching) becomes in the Fourth Gospel central and determinative. 'He that believeth on the Son hath (even now) everlasting life' (3³⁶). 'He that heareth my word . . . is passed out of death into life' (5²⁴). The whole purpose of the work of Christ, as conceived by the Evangelist, was to communicate to His disciples, here and now, the eternal life. To those who have received His gift the death of the body is only a physical incident, a 'falling asleep' (11¹¹). The true death is the state of sin and privation, out of which they have been delivered, once and for all, in the act of surrender to Christ.

Isolated passages in the Gospel might seem to conflict with this, the characteristic and prevailing view. In the 6th chapter more especially, the conception of Life as a spiritual possession in the present appears side by side with repeated allusions to a resurrection 'at the last day' (6³⁹, 44, 54). These allusions are partly to be explained as reminiscences of an earlier type of doctrine, not completely in harmony with the writer's own; such 'concessions' to a traditional belief meet us continually in this Gospel. At the same time, they serve to emphasize a real, though secondary, aspect of John's own teaching. He anticipates in the future world a full manifestation of the Life which under earthly conditions is necessarily hidden. For the believer, as for Christ Himself, the escape from this world and its limitations marks the entrance into a larger activity and 'glory' (cf. 14²⁻³).

The Evangelist nowhere attempts to define his conception of Life. The great saying, 'This is life eternal,' etc. (17³), cannot be construed as a definition. It only declares that the knowledge of God through Jesus Christ carries with it the assurance of life (cf. 'His commandment is life everlasting' [12⁵⁰]). The nature of the life is indicated only in vague and half-figurative terms. It is indestructible (6³⁸ 11²⁶), satisfies all spiritual thirst and hunger (6³⁵ 4¹⁴), is the source of light (1⁴ 8¹²). But, while little is said by way of express definition, the general import of the Johannine conception is sufficiently clear. The Life which Christ communicates is the absolute, Divine Life. 'As the Father has life in himself, so he hath given the Son to have life in himself' (5²⁶, cf. 1⁴). It is assumed that in God and in the Logos, who is one with Him, a life resides which is different in kind from that of men, and is the real, the 'eternal' Life.

The conception arises from the blending in the Fourth Gospel of Hebrew and early Christian with Greek-philosophical influences. Hebrew thought did not concern itself with questions regarding the ultimate nature of God. He was the 'living' God, who could be known only through His activity in the creation and moral government of the world. The Greek thinkers, on the other hand, tried to get behind His activity to His essential Being. He was the absolute and self-existent, over against the world of phenomena. His Life, so far as Life could be predicated of Him, was an energy of pure thought, abstracted from every form of sensible manifestation (cf. Arist. Metaph. xii. 7). The Fourth Evangelist, carrying out more fully the suggestion of Philo, combines the Hebrew and Greek ideas. He thinks of God as the 'only true' (17³), the absolute Being who is eternally separate from the world which He has created. Nevertheless He is a living and personal God. The Life which He possesses is analogous to the life in man, but of a higher order, spiritual instead of earthly.

It follows from this attempt to combine Hebrew with Greek ideas, that the ethical moment falls largely out of sight. The difference between the human and the Divine Life is one of essence. Till man has undergone a radical change, not in heart merely but in the very constitution of his being, there can be no thought of his participating in the life of God. St. John thus involves himself in a conception which may be described as semi-physical. The Divine life is regarded as a sort of higher substance inherent in the nature of God. How can man, who is 'born of flesh' (3⁶), become partaker in this substance, and so experience a new birth as a child of God? This is the religious problem as it presents itself to St. John.

The solution is afforded by the doctrine of the Incarnate Word. Jesus Christ, as the eternal Logos, possessed 'life in himself,' and yet assumed humanity and entered into our lower world. He therefore became the vehicle through which the life of God is imparted to men, or at least to those elect natures who are predisposed to receive it. He not only possesses, but is Himself the Life. To impart His gift He must also impart Himself, since life is inalienable from the living Person. This idea, which lies at the very centre of St. John's thinking, determines his theory of the communication of Life through Christ.

The subjective condition, apart from which the gift cannot be bestowed, is belief in Jesus as the Son of God. This belief is primarily an act of intellectual assent to the claim of Christ; but such an act implies a religious experience which has led up to it and gives it value. It runs back in the last resort to the 'drawing by the Father' (6⁴⁴), the work of God's Spirit in the heart. Through the act of belief a man is brought into such a relation to Christ that His power as Life-giver becomes operative.

Three means are indicated by which Christ imparts the gift to those who have believed. (1) It is conveyed through His word, regarded not simply as the medium of His message, but in the Hebrew sense as active and creative. The words spoken by Jesus are of the same nature as the quickening word of God. They are 'spirit and life,' carrying with them some portion of His own being. He can say indifferently, 'My word shall abide in you' and 'I shall abide in you' (15⁷). It is this imparting of Himself through His words that renders them 'words of eternal life.' (2) The gift is conveyed likewise in the Sacraments, more especially in the Lord's Supper. The Eucharistic reference in the 6th chapter appears to the present writer unmistakable, and, while the Supper is interpreted in a spiritual sense, its real validity is also emphasized. Ignatius, writing in the same age, describes the Eucharist as the φάρμακον ἀθανάσιον (Ephes. 20), and St. John accepts this current belief, and harmonizes it with his own doctrine of Life: 'Except ye eat the flesh of the Son of Man and drink his blood, ye have no life in you' (6⁵³). Since Jesus in His own Person is the Life, it can be given only through an actual incorporation of His 'flesh and blood,' and this is offered in the mystery of the Eucharist. The idea of Life as a semi-physical essence here comes to its sharpest expression. (3) In this same chapter, however, we have the indication of another and still more mysterious means by which the Life is imparted. The Eucharist, while it possesses in itself a real validity, is typical of an abiding union of the believer with Christ. He is like the vine (15^{17f.}), out of which the several branches draw their nourishment. He is united with His disciples in a relation so profound and intimate that they feel themselves to be one with Him. They abide in Him and He in them, and the life which He possesses becomes their life, springing up within them like a perennial well (4¹⁴). This doctrine of a mystical union with Christ in which He imparts His Divine life to the believer, contains the central and characteristic thought of the Fourth Gospel.

Thus far we have considered the Johannine idea of Life as it is determined by the Logos theory. It becomes apparent, however, the more we study the Gospel, that the writer is working throughout with two conceptions, essentially different from each other and never completely reconciled. The incarnate Logos is at the same time the historical Jesus, who revealed God and drew all men to Himself by the moral grandeur of His personality and life. Doctrines which are presented theologically on the lines of the Logos hypothesis are also capable of a purely religious interpretation. They require to be so interpreted if we are not to miss their underlying and vital import.

Life regarded from this other side bears a meaning substantially the same as in the Synoptic Gospels. Jesus was the Living One, inasmuch as He realized in His own Person the love and goodness and holiness which constitute the inmost nature of God. The life He sought to communicate was nothing else than His own Spirit, as it was revealed in the scene of the feet-washing (Jn 13), and in the subsequent discourse with His disciples. Even in the Eucharistic chapter in which the theological view of Life is expressed most forcibly, we can discern this other view in the background. To partake of Christ's flesh and blood is to become wholly conformed to Him, absorbing into oneself the very spirit by which He lived. We cannot read the chapter attentively without feeling that St. John is always passing from the metaphysical conception to this moral and religious one. Both are present in his mind, and he endeavours to fuse them, though such a fusion is in the nature of things impossible.

The cardinal doctrine of union with Christ assumes a new meaning in the light of this other aspect of St. John's thought. What is elsewhere described as a mystical indwelling becomes a moral fellowship. 'Henceforth I call you not servants, but friends; for the servant knoweth not what his lord doeth; but I have called you friends' (15¹⁵). The disciples are to enter into a perfect harmony of mind and will with their Master. His spirit is not to act on them from the outside, through set commandments, but inwardly and spontaneously. The relation of discipleship thus passes into one of 'friendship,'—a friendship so close that they lose all sense of separateness between themselves and Christ. He 'abides in them,' and replaces their will with His own.

To the Synoptic teaching St. John adds one element of priceless value. He perceives that the new Life proclaimed by Jesus was bound up indissolubly with His living Person. 'In him was life' (Jn 1⁴), and it is not enough to render some vague obedience to His teaching. There must be a real and personal communion with Christ, so that He may impart His very self to His disciple. In his presentation of this truth, John avails himself of metaphysical modes of thinking which are not wholly adequate to the Christian message. The conception of Christ as Logos obscures the true significance of His Person and of the higher life imparted through Him. But the essential thought of the Gospel is independent of the form, borrowed from an alien philosophy, in which it is expressed. Jesus Christ is not only the Life-giver, but is Himself the Life. He imparts His gift to those who know Him by an inward fellowship, and become one with Him in heart and will. See also LIVING.

LIGHT.—Apart from the ordinary use of this word to denote outward light (as in Lk 11³⁶, Mt 17² 24²⁹ etc.), there are three applications of the metaphor of light in the Synoptic Gospels which demand attention.

1. The first occurs in the figurative and somewhat enigmatic saying preserved in Mt 6²². 23 = Lk 11³⁴. 35, where the eye is called the lamp of the body, the symbolism pointing to sincerity of soul as the decisive feature of life. Each Evangelist gives the saying a different setting. In Mt.'s version of the Sermon on the Mount it occurs in a context laying stress upon the supreme need of the heavenly mind in religion; and as the main rival to God in man's affections is the world, in the shape of material wealth, the pursuit of the single mind is naturally correlated with the avoidance of covetousness. This shade of meaning is reflected from vv. 18–21 and 24. 25 (see MAMMON) upon the intervening logion. The soul is to human life what the eye is to the body (so Philo, de Opif. Mundi, 17, 'reason [νοῦς] is to the soul what the eye is to the body'); it is a lamp, by means of which the way and work of life are illuminated. As the functions of the physical life depend largely upon the soundness of the organs of vision, by means of which men move safely and freely in the outside world, so the mental and moral health of man is bound up with the condition of his inner life. The inward disposition (cf. Jn 11¹⁰) is the key to all (cf. Ruskin's Queen of the Air, § 93; Eagle's Nest, §§ 106–110). The employment of 'light' in this connexion is thus one illustration of the inwardness of the teaching of Jesus. He brought men from the circumference to the centre, laid supreme stress on motive, and sought to emphasize—as in this saying—the vital importance of the inner spirit for conduct. The symbolism turns on the ethical meaning implied in 'single' (ἀπλοῦς) and 'evil' (πονηρός), the former suggesting 'liberality,' the latter 'niggardliness' in the moral sphere. Hence 'light' means that condition of life which is void of covetousness and the grasping spirit. Such a spirit confuses life by diverting it from the supreme inward and heavenly aim which is its true pursuit. The hoarding temper, which absorbs men in outward possessions, is pronounced by Jesus to be a flaw in the moral vision, a speck that blurs 'the light that is in thee,' i.e. the inner light of conscience, the heart, or the soul. When the latter is darkened by the intrusion of a divided affection, especially in the form of some appetite such as covetousness or worldliness, then 'how great is the darkness'! For religion, as Christ taught it, is not admitting God into life. It is putting Him first in life. Faith is not thinking Him good, but hailing Him as best. And nothing can be more ominous than when the soul, which is man's delicate faculty for seeing and choosing God, is diverted to double-mindedness or to an attempt to reconcile the competing interests of God and of the world. The outcome is compromise and its inevitable product, hypocrisy—that sin which a Frenchman once called the first-fruits of English society—ripening under the very breath of conventional religion.—The logion may be, as Brandt suggests, a Jewish aphorism based on Pr 20²⁷, which Jesus here quotes and applies.

The introduction of the saying in Lk 11³³⁻³⁶ is due to the key-word λίχνος. Here, as often, Lk. groups sayings together less from their internal correspondence than from some verbal common element. He sharpens the point of the saying by introducing v.³⁵. As eyes may become injured by the blinding glare and dust which make ophthalmia a prevalent complaint in the East, so, it is implied, the inner disposition lies exposed to risk and disease, against which it is a man's duty to guard. For if the heart rules the life, the life, on the other hand, can stain and spoil the heart. Yet the stress of the saying falls on attention to the inward life as determining the course and value of the outer. "Take care of the little things of life, and the great things will take care of themselves," is the maxim of the trader, which is sometimes, and with a certain degree of truth, applied to the service of God. But much more true is it in religion, that we should take care of the great things, and the trifles of life will take care of themselves. "If thine eye be single, thy whole body will be full of light." Christianity is not acquired, as an art, by long practice; it does not carve and polish human nature with a graving tool; it makes the whole man; first pouring out his soul before God, and then casting him in a mould' (Jowett's Paul, ii. 117).—The point of v.³⁶ is not easy to grasp. It seems a somewhat tautological expansion of v.^{34b} (so Blass). D, Syr^{cur} etc., omit it, while Syr^{sin} has a different form of it; yet, as Wellhausen observes, it does not read like an interpolation, and probably we must be content to suspect, with Westcott and Hort, e.g., and J. Weiss (in Meyer⁸, pp. 476-477), some primitive corruption of the text.

2. The connexion of v.³³ with the saying is not immediate. Lk 11³³ is simply an equivalent of Mk 5¹⁴⁻¹⁶, which is incorporated here under the rubric of 'light,' and Luke has already more appropriately used it in 8¹⁶ (=Mk 4²¹) in the second phase of the light-symbolism in the Gospels, viz. that of influence. The disciples are cautioned against the tendency, whether due to modesty or to cowardice, to refrain from letting their faith tell upon the world. In Lk 11³³ it is impossible to trace any very obvious connexion between this and what precedes, any more than between it and what follows, unless the idea of the editor is that Solomon's wisdom and Jonah's preaching were frank and open to the world (hence v.³³), while no sign (v.²⁹) is needed if the inner heart be pure and true (vv.³⁴⁻³⁶). The context in Mt 5 is much more congenial. Jesus is warning His disciples that while their relation to the outside world is often full of annoyance and suffering, yet this bitter experience (v.^{10f.}) must not drive them into a parochial and secluded attitude of negative protest. 'You are the light of the world,' He urges. You owe it a duty. Your faith lays you under an obligation to let your life tell upon your environment (cf. Ebi, 4377, 4384-4385), instead of weakly relapsing into some esoteric or Essene-like seclusion. The allusion to good works is peculiar to Matthew. It emphasizes that frankness of spirit and necessity of good conduct which the saying upon light advocates as the sole reasonable position for Christian disciples to assume. The vocation of a Christian is to be visible. And visibility means influence. The reference is not to Apostles but to Christians in general, nor is preaching in view. What Jesus inculcates is an attitude of consistent goodness, void of monasticism and ostentation alike, as corresponding to the nature of His Kingdom, whose property and destiny it is to become manifest to the world (cf. Mozley's Parochial and Occasional Sermons, p. 212 f.).

This latter idea, without the moral counsel, is reproduced by Mk 4²¹ (=Lk 8¹⁶) as a sequel to the interpretation of the parable of the Seeds, as if to suggest that such knowledge as had just been imparted to the disciples was not to be kept to themselves but to be diffused like light (cf. Menzies, Earliest Gospel, pp. 112-114), the placing of the lamp in its proper position perhaps corresponding (so Jülicher) to the fruitful and useful qualities of the good seed in the good soil (v.²⁰). Others, like Wrede (das Messiasgeheimnis, p. 68 f.), prefer to read the saying in the light of the Apostolic age, as if it meant that after the Resurrection all reserve upon the Christian mysteries was to be thrown aside (v.¹¹). This, however, cannot be the original sense of the saying, and there is no reason why one should give up the interpretation which makes the lamp here equivalent to the teaching of Jesus or the knowledge of the gospel (see Expos. Nov. 1900, on 'The Peril and the Comfort of Exposure'). The point is less general than in Mt 5¹⁴⁻¹⁶. But the essential bearing of the saying is the same, viz. that as the function of light is to radiate, so Christian privileges imply the duty of propaganda. Similarly, Mt 10²⁷=Lk 12³ (cf. Jülicher's Gleichnisreden, ii. 86 f.). In the fourth of the New Oxyrhynchus Logia, we have the words: 'for there is nothing hidden which shall not be made manifest, nor buried which shall not be raised.'

3. If Christians, however, are to arise and shine, it must be because their light has come. Consequently revelation is also embraced under the light-symbolism of the Gospels, in Mt 4¹⁶, Lk 1⁷⁹ [Is 9²]²⁹², where the reference, based on OT quotations, is to the redeeming life of Christ. This semi-mystical application, which associates light with the Divine effluence, runs far back into human history. 'Heaven means both the world of light above us and the world of hope within us, and the earliest name of the Divine beings is simply "the bright ones." Such names are more than metaphors. But if they were simply metaphors, they would show how closely the world without is adapted to express and render definite the yearnings and the fears of the world within' (J. Wedgwood, The Moral Ideal, pp. 6, 7). It is needless to illustrate from ancient thought how light was almost invariably, if variously, allied to the conception of heaven and the Divine nature, the latter being conceived as radiant and glorious. The gradual evolution of the religious idea slowly purified the symbolism, especially in the deeper reaches of faith within the later Judaism (notably in the Book of Enoch). The semi-physical element, though not entirely excluded even from the NT idea of glory and spiritual phenomena, came to be subordinated to the moral and mystical. The purity, the noiseless energy, the streaming rays of light, all suggested religious qualities to the mind, until the light of God came to be an expression for the healing influence and vitalizing power exercised by Him over human life. The light of Christ, the Messiah, was thus His ministry (see Bruce's Galilean Gospel, p. 13f.). His person formed the creative power in the life of the human soul. Through work and word alike, His being operated with quickening effect upon the responsive hearts of His own people.

This application of the metaphor of light to the Divine revelation in Jesus is developed especially in the Fourth Gospel, where 'light' is reserved almost exclusively for this purpose. John the Baptist is indeed described once as 'the burning and shining lamp,' in whose light (cf. 1⁷⁻⁸) the Jews were 'willing to rejoice for a season' (5³⁵, cf. Sir 48¹), with all a shallow nature's delight in transient impressions (see Martensen's Individual Ethics, p. 385). And Christians are incidentally called 'sons of light' (12³⁶, cf. Lk 16⁸). But, if John the Baptist is the lamp, Jesus is the Light; if Christians become sons of light, it is by believing on the Light. It is not Christians but Christ, the incarnate Logos, who is the Light of the world (1⁴ 8¹² 9⁵ 12⁴⁶). Already in the ancient mind the supreme God had been frequently defined as the God of light, and the later Judaism had expressed its profounder consciousness of this truth in the collocation of life and light (e.g. Ps 36⁹, En 58³) and in the employment of 'light' as a summary expression not only for cosmic vitality, but for the bliss of mankind, chiefly, though not solely, in the future (cf. Volz, Jüdische Eschatologie, 328f.). In the Fourth Gospel, however, this idea is developed with singular precision and breadth. The Logos-Christ is defined in the Prologue not only as Logos but as Life and Light, the former category being confined to Christ's being as a Divine factor in the creation and in the essence of God (1¹⁻³), as well as to His incarnation (1¹⁴⁻¹⁸), after which it is dropped. The intervening paragraph (1⁴⁻¹³), dealing with the Logos-Christ as a historical phenomenon, is subsumed under the category of Light and Life, which afterwards dominates the entire Gospel, except (curiously enough) the closing speeches (14-17), where the symbolism of Light is entirely absent. 'In him was life, and the life was the light of men.' This profound sentence really gives the keynote to the Gospel, in which Christ as the Light represents the essential Truth of God as revealed to human knowledge. The Messiah (e.g. En 48⁴) and the Logos (as in Philo) had already been hailed as Light. But here the metaphor of light denotes much more than the self-revelation of God in the person of Jesus (Weiss); it describes the transcendent life streaming out on men, the absolute nature of God as truth, as the supreme reality for man to believe in, and by his belief to share. In sharp antithesis to this Light is the Darkness, by which the writer symbolizes all that is contrary to God in human life, whether unbelief or disobedience, all that resists the true Life which it is the function of the Light to produce in humanity, all the ignorance and wilful rejection of Christ which issue in practical consequences of confusion and rebellion. Historically, this opposition emerged during Christ's lifetime in the Jews' rejection of His mission. But, as the present tense φαίει seems to imply, the truth is general; the same enmity pervades every age—a conception to which there is a remarkable parallel in the Logos-teaching of Heraclitus (cf. Pfeiderer's Urchrist. 2 ii. 339). This antithesis means more, however, than a metaphysical dualism running through the world. The hostility of men to the Light is described as their own choice and fault (3^{19, 20}), and this conception naturally permeates the entire Gospel. The determinism is apparent rather than real. Whether positive or negative, the attitude of men to God in Christ is run back to their own wills, although the writer makes no attempt to correlate this strictly with Divine prescience. Nor, again, is the conception purely intellectual, though the terminology would seem occasionally to suggest this view. Light and darkness represent moral good and evil as these are presented in the spiritual order introduced by Christ. To love the light (3¹⁹⁻²¹) is not a theoretical attitude, but a practical, equivalent to doing the truth. The light has to be followed (8¹², cf. 12^{35f.}); Christ's revelation is an appeal to the reason and conscience of mankind as the controlling principle of conduct; 'the light of life' is the light which brings life, and life is more than mere intellectualism (17³). To walk in or by the light is to have one's character and conduct determined by the influence of Christ, the latter being as indispensable to vitality in the moral and religious sphere as light is to physical growth (cf. 2 S 23⁴, Ps 49¹⁰ 56¹³ etc.). See, further, art. TRUTH.

These and other applications of this metaphor throughout the Fourth Gospel are all suggested in the somewhat abstract language of the Prologue. Three further points may be selected as typical of this mode of thought.

(a) The function of Christ as the Light is described as bearing not only upon the creation of the Universe, but on the spiritual and moral life of men (vv. 3-4). In this sphere it encounters an obstacle in the error and evil of man's nature, but encounters it successfully. This is proleptically described in v. 5 (cf. 1 Jn 2⁵), where οὐ κατέλαβεν probably means 'failed to overpower, or extinguish' (cf. 12³⁵, Sir 15⁷); despite the opposition of man's ignorance and corruption, the true Light makes its way. The climax of this triumph in history is then described. It was heralded by the prophetic mission of John the Baptist, the allusion to whom is, like 5³⁵, carefully phrased in order to bring out the transient and subordinate character of his ministry (cf. Lightfoot's Colossians, p. 401); whereupon the historic functions of the real Light are resumed in v. 9⁶. 'The true light, which lightens every man, was coming into the world'; i.e. had arrived, even when the Baptist was preaching (cf. v. 26). Later on, this is frankly stated by Jesus Himself at the feast of Tabernacles, when brilliant illuminations were held every night—a symbolism which may have suggested the cry, 'I am the light of the world' (8¹²; cf. Is 60¹). The description in 1⁹ is probably an echo of Test. Levi 13⁴ ('the light of the Lord was given to lighten every man').

(b) While the Light is the Christian revelation, it is implied that already (3²¹), not merely in Judaism but throughout humanity (cf. 11⁵² 12^{21f.}), there were individuals whose honesty and sincerity had prepared them to receive the truth of God (1¹¹⁻¹²) mentally and morally. When the light fell on those who sat in darkness, some were content to sit still. But others rose to welcome the fuller knowledge of God in the perfect revelation of Christ's person, men like Nathanael and the Greeks. For it is characteristic of the Fourth

Gospel that good people, rather than sinners (as in the Synoptic narratives), flock to Christ. The Logos, as Hausrath puts it, draws God's children to the light as a magnet attracts metals, while mere stones are left unmoved by its presence. And God's children are those who respond to Christ by the exercise of their moral instincts and religious affections. Unlike Philo, the author refuses to trace back this lack of susceptibility towards God to any source in the material constitution of mankind (cf. 8⁴⁴); but the semi-Gnostic idea of a special class remains.

(c) Upon the other hand, Christ, the Light, came to His own people; and there are repeated allusions to the brief opportunity of the Jews (9⁴ 11⁹, 10 12^{35, 36}), in sayings which warn the nation against trifling with its privilege,—a privilege soon to be taken from its unworthy keeping. Here the author is reflecting the period in which he writes, when the Jews' day of grace had passed, with tragic consequences to themselves. 'Light, accept the blessed light, if you will have it when Heaven vouchsafes. You refuse? Very well: the "light" is more and more withdrawn, . . . and furthermore, by due sequence, infallible as the foundations of the universe and Nature's oldest law, the light returns on you, this time, with lightning' (Carlyle's Letter-Day Pamphlets, iii, ad fin.).

LIGHTNING (ἀστραπή).—There are 3 references to lightning in the Gospels, one of these being duplicated (in Mt. and Lk.).

1. Lk 10¹⁸ 'I beheld Satan fallen as lightning from heaven.' The word 'beheld' (εθεώρουν), being in the impf., indicates a continuous contemplation. Taken in conjunction with the aorist participle 'fallen' (so RV, not 'fall' as in AV, the Gr. being πεσόντα), this cannot mean that in a pre-existent state Jesus beheld the fall of Satan taking place, i.e. when the devil was cast out of heaven, as described in Paradise Lost. The meaning of the expression should be arrived at through the context, where we read of the Seventy returning to Jesus with joy, and exclaiming, 'Lord, even the demons are subject unto us in thy name' (v. 17), in reference to their successful exorcism. This meaning seems to be that the news brought to Jesus by His disciples did not take Him by surprise, because at the very time when they were carrying on their successful work He was looking at the prince of the demons lying fallen (so Holtzmann, Plummer, etc.),—a highly figurative expression which need not point to an actual vision. Jesus had the intuitive assurance that His arch-enemy was defeated already. Therefore the disciples were able to cast out the demons. The situation may be illustrated by the parable of the strong man bound by a stronger so that his house can be robbed (Mk 3²⁷), Satan being the strong man, Christ the stronger, the demons the vessels that are taken from the house, which may be either the world or the possessed victims. There is no indication when Satan fell (as perhaps at the Temptation of Jesus). He is contemplated as fallen. Still the aorist points to a definite action, and the comparison with lightning emphasizes this point. Possibly our Lord was alluding to Is 14¹². A similar idea appears in Rev 12⁹. Wellhausen regards the verse in Lk. as apocryphal; but Jesus frequently used apocalyptic imagery. In the Koran (Sura 72) the demons are cast out of heaven at the coming of Mohammed, the angels bombarding them with stars.

2. Mt 24²⁷ 'For as the lightning cometh forth from the east, and is seen even unto the west; so shall be the coming of the Son of Man' (cf. Lk 17²⁴). The idea seems to be that of widespread and unmistakable evidence. The coming of the Son of Man will be seen everywhere, and that very manifestly (so Plummer, Wellhausen, etc.). A second thought, the suddenness of the flash (Plummer), is not so apparent, if it is even present at all, in this application of the idea of lightning to the Parousia. For the apparent contradiction between this thought and that in Lk 17²⁰ see OBSERVATION.

3. The one other Gospel reference to lightning is in the description of the angel of the Resurrection (Mt 28³), whose appearance is 'as lightning,' the idea being dazzling brightness.

LILY.—The lily (λίανθ., κήρυβανθ., κρίνον) is mentioned by various OT writers (1 K 7¹⁹, 2 Ch 4⁵, Ca 2¹ etc., Hos 14⁵). In the NT there is but one reference (Mt 6²⁸ and || Lk 12²⁷). From the expression 'lilies of the field,' we gather that they were wild flowers, while the comparison of them with the regal robes of Solomon (Mt 6²⁹) implies that they were not white, but coloured (cf. Ca 5¹³). The plant that best accords with these conditions is the scarlet anemone (A. coronaria), with which, in the spring of the year, the Galilean hillsides are clothed. (See Tristram, Fauna and Flora of Palestine, p. 208; Nat. Hist. of Bible, p. 462). The nature of the reference might, however, favour the supposition that our Lord used the term 'lilies' in a very general way, and that it should be taken as comprising a variety of flowers, such as anemones, poppies, and tulips.

LINEN (βύσσος, σινδών).—Cloth of various kinds prepared from the fibre of flax was largely used in Egypt and Palestine for under-garments. It was preferred to cotton or wool, as being cleaner and cooler in the hot climate. It formed an important element in priestly dress, and in the Temple hangings. Worn together with purple it constituted the characteristic clothing of the wealthy (Est 8¹⁵, Lk 16¹⁹), and probably of royalty (Gn 41⁴²). Linen was used in Egypt to prepare the bodies of both men and animals for burial, and in Palestine it was the common wrapping of the dead. Wool was avoided, the belief being that it tended to breed worms. To this day linen is used for these purposes in Palestine by all who can afford it. Coarser cloth was made in the country, but the finer sorts were imported, the products of Egypt being held in high esteem. As an article of merchandise, linen ranked with gold, silver, precious stones, silk, etc. (Rev 18¹²).

σινδών (Mk 14^{51, 52}) probably corresponds to the Rabbinic sadin or sedina, a linen cloth, or loose linen wrapper; although possibly it may also mean a night-dress (Edersheim, Life and Times of Jesus, 1900, ii. 545). In this garment the body of Jesus was wrapped when taken from the cross (Mt 27⁵⁹). It may have been torn into strips to form the θήβνια in which, with the spices, the body was bound (Jn 19⁴⁰ 20^{56f.}). Probably, however, these were the bandages fastening the σινδών.

LIP.—This word, in the plural, is found in the Gospels only in Mt 15⁸ || Mk 7⁹, where it stands for χεῖλεσιν in a free quotation from the LXX. It is rendered by AV, 'This people honoureth me with their lips, but their heart is far from me' (cf. Is 29¹³). St. Matthew, who quotes oftenest from the LXX, does so here (v. 8¹), even though it departs considerably from the Hebrew. But he modifies its phraseology so as to improve it, and to bring out the prophet's thought more clearly than would be done by a literal translation of the Hebrew. (See Toy, NT Quotations from the OT). The expression 'honoureth me with their lips' is explained by some as an allusion to the Jewish custom of putting the tassel of the tallith to the lips during worship, as a sign that the Law was accepted, not as of duty only, but as the enthusiastic preference of the heart (cf. Job 31²⁷, where putting the hand to the lips is an act of astral worship; and the Oriental salutations in which putting the hand to the lips is supposed to have been originally a sign and assurance of sincerity; see Jewish Encyc. art. 'Lip'). Others explain this clause, in relation to the entire passage, as intended to put in sharp contrast a worship of God, or a form of religion, that is taught of men (cf. 'teaching teachings which are precepts of men,' v. 9), and a worship that is really according to the teachings of God's word, i.e. which springs from a devout and trusting heart (cf. 'But their heart is far from me, v. 8, with the suggestion of emptiness in v. 9 'In vain do they worship me,' etc.).

It would seem from the OT that the lips had come to be regarded as a sort of originating centre of life and morals. We read of 'lying lips' (Ps 31³), of 'the lip of truth' (Pr 12¹⁹), of 'unclean lips' (Is 6⁵), and of 'the poison of asps' as 'under the lips' (quoted in Ro 3¹³); and in the NT also, of 'the fruit of the lips' (He 13¹⁵), and of 'lips that speak no guile' (1 P 3¹⁰), etc.

But whatever be the implied allusion or exact meaning of the words here, this much is certain, that our Lord in speaking to His own contemporaries said, 'This prophecy of Isaiah was concerning you'—language that would seem to require us to interpret the passage so as to make it include and describe the unbelieving Jews of His day, and, probably, all people of all times who were, or are, or will yet be, guilty of offering to God a worship in which they do not draw near to Him in heart.

LITTLE ONES.—The phrase 'one of these little ones' occurs in the records of our Lord's discourses in the Synoptic Gospels six times (Mt 10⁴² 18^{6, 10, 14}, Mk 9⁴², Lk 17²), although, to satisfy these references, it need not have been employed by our Lord on more than two or three different occasions. It seems to have been used with marked solemnity and to be charged with high emotion. To understand its implications, we shall need to inquire whom our Lord designates as 'little ones,' whence the designation was derived, and what its significance is.

1. It seems to be quite generally assumed that at least in some of the instances of its occurrence the phrase designates, quite simply, actual children. Thus, multitudes of Christians appear to be accustomed to read Mt 18¹⁰ as a declaration that the 'angels of children' (whatever these 'angels' may be) hold a particularly exalted place in heaven. The connexion of this whole passage with the opening verses of the chapter, where a 'little child' is presented as a type of the children of the Kingdom, seems to many to require this interpretation, and the parallel passages, Mk 9^{37, 42}, Lk 9⁴⁸ 17² to add their support to it. A careful scrutiny of the passages in which the phrase occurs, however, will show that its reference is never to actual children, but in every case to our Lord's disciples.

The earliest recorded employment of the phrase is reported in Mt 10⁴⁰⁻⁴². Our Lord is here bringing to a close His instructions to His Apostles as He sent them forth on their first, their trial, evangelistic tour. His words are words of highest encouragement. 'He that receiveth you,' He says, 'receiveth me; and he that receiveth me, receiveth him that sent me.' Our Lord makes common cause with His messengers: that is the general declaration. Then comes the enforcement by illustration. It was a matter of common understanding that 'he that receiveth a prophet in the name of a prophet'—that is, not in the name of another prophet, but on this sole ground, that he is a prophet, or, as we should say in our English idiom, as a prophet—'shall receive a prophet's reward; and he that receiveth a righteous man in the name of a righteous man'—that is, again, merely because he is a righteous man—'shall receive a righteous man's reward.' The broad principle, then, is that the receiver shall be put, in the matter of reward, on the level of the received; by his reception of the prophet or righteous man, he takes his place by his side and becomes sharer in his reward. Now comes the application, marked as such (and not the continuation of the examples) by a change of construction. 'And whosoever'—perhaps we might paraphrase 'Likewise whosoever'—'shall give to drink unto one of these little ones a cup of cold water only in the name of a disciple, verily I say unto you, he shall in no wise lose his reward.' The parallelism of the clauses here with those in the preceding sentences compels us to read 'one of these little ones' as a synonym of 'a disciple.' The sense is, as the receiver of the prophet shall share the prophet's reward, and the receiver of the righteous man the righteous man's reward, so the receiver of the disciple shall share the disciple's reward. The general purport of the declaration, moreover, demands this sense. Its object was to hearten and encourage the Apostles on their mission. For that, they needed assurance, not that goodness to children would be marked and rewarded, but that they, the Apostles, were under Divine care. The very variations from the phraseology of the earlier sentences which are introduced into the application have their part to play in emphasizing this needed lesson. These variations are five in number. In the first place, instead of the simple 'he that' receiveth, we have here the emphasized universal 'whosoever'; there is no danger of failure here. Next, instead of the simple, comprehensive 'receiveth,' the least conceivable benefit is here specified—'shall give to drink a cup of cold water only': the slightest goodness to the disciples shall be noted and rewarded. Next, instead of the simple statement that the benefiter shall share the reward of the benefited, we have a solemn asseveration that in no case will a due reward be missed: the nature of the reward is left in large vagueness, and it is hinted only that it shall be appropriate, treated as of obligation, and surely given. Lastly, instead of the cold 'disciple,' we have the tender 'one of these little ones.' The disciples our Lord has in mind are His own disciples: His own disciples He cherishes with a devoted love; and this love is pledged to their protection. The effect of these variations from the formally exact parallel is to raise the saying to its emotional climax. The lesson conveyed is that Christ's disciples are under the watchful care of His jealous love.

The case is similar with that in the paragraph Mt 18⁵⁻¹⁴. It is important that the relation of this paragraph to the preceding one (18¹⁻⁴), and the nature of the transition made at v. 5 be correctly apprehended. The Apostles had been disputing about their relative claims to greatness in the Kingdom of heaven; and the Lord teaches them a much needed lesson in humility by the example of a little child. Setting a little child in their midst, He exhorts them to see in it a type of the children of the Kingdom, and to seek to become like it if they would be greatest in that Kingdom (cf. art. CHILDREN, vol. i. p. 304). With v.⁴, however, this incident closes, and the lesson from it is concluded. The discussion that follows in the succeeding verses is no longer an inculcation of humility. It is an exhilarating pledge of the whole Divine power to the sustaining, protection, and glorification of Christ's disciples. The connexion between the two paragraphs seems to turn on the idea that, though men enter the Kingdom like helpless infants, they are not therefore abandoned to the adverse forces of the world: the power of God is outstretched for their salvation. 'Such little children' (v.⁵) God takes under His own protection, rewarding those who do them benefits, and visiting with the severest punishment those who evil-entreat them; their angels ever behold the Father's face in heaven; if they go astray everything is left that they may be recovered; the Father's will is pledged that no one of them shall perish. The force of these great assurances is indefinitely enhanced by the individual note that is thrown into them. Throughout, the stress is laid upon the individual, as distinguished from the class, as the object of the Divine love (vv.^{5, 6, 10, 12, 14}): not a single one of them shall be without the Father's care, no single one of them shall perish. The passage is in effect just the Synoptic parallel of the seventeenth chapter of John, or the Evangelic parallel of the eighth chapter of Romans. Christ's 'little ones' in it are, in short, just 'those that believe on him,' of whom 'it is not the will of the Father that one should perish,' whose 'angels in heaven do always behold the face of the Father which is in heaven.'

The declaration of Mk 9⁴² is parallel with that of Mt 18⁶, and is immediately preceded by a verse the thought of which is parallel with that of Mt 10⁴². This passage gives us thus afresh in a single context the two primary statements we have met with in Matthew. The variations of the phraseology in v.⁴¹ from what we have seen in Mt 10⁴² supply commentaries on the meaning of the phrases in the latter. 'Little ones' in the one becomes 'you,' that is, Christ's disciples, in the other: 'in the name of a disciple' in the one, 'in the name that ye are Christ's' in the other. Thus the interpretation suggested of the passage in Matthew is confirmed by the very language of the passage in Mark. But this language in v.⁴¹ settles the meaning also of the phrases in the succeeding verse. The 'you,' i.e. the disciples, of v.⁴¹ is replaced in v.⁴² by 'these little ones that believe,' which must, therefore, mean the same thing. This indeed would be independently true, since these 'little ones' are specifically defined here not as 'little ones' simply, but as those 'little ones' 'that have faith.' It is quite clear, therefore, that 'these little ones' in this passage means not children, but believers.

The only other passage in which the phrase occurs, Lk 17², is parallel in its assertion with Mt 18⁶ and Mk 9⁴², and repeats in effect their language. There is no allusion to children in the entire context, in which our Lord simply warns His 'disciples' against sins against their brethren. In this and the parallel passage in Mk., in other words, we have merely renewed manifestations of the Saviour's concern for those He calls 'these little ones.' He pronounces the sin of causing those for whom His love was thus pledged to stumble, almost too great to be expressed in words.

On every occasion of its occurrence, therefore, the phrase 'these little ones' evinces itself independently a designation, not of children, but of the disciples of Christ. In these circumstances, we cannot permit doubt to be thrown on its meaning in the palmary passage, Mt 18⁶, by the circumstance that certain passages in Mark (9³³⁻³⁷) and Luke (9⁴⁶⁻⁴⁸) which are parallel to Mt 18¹⁻⁵ might easily be so read as to make literal children the subject of their declarations (Mk 9³⁷, Lk 9⁴⁸) parallel to Mt 18⁵. The account in Matthew is the fuller, and permits the connexion of the clauses to be more exactly estimated. It seems as if it were merely the compression of Mark's and Luke's reports which tempts to the identification of the 'little child' of the earlier verses with the 'one of such little children' (Mk.), or 'this little child' (Lk.) of the closing verse: and the pressing of this language literally is not free from difficulties of its own. In any event, we cannot permit any difficulties that we may feel in explaining Mk 9³⁷, Lk 9⁴⁸ to affect the determination of the meaning of a phrase which does not occur in them, when we meet it in other passages where its sense seems clearly indicated.

We may take it as established, then, that the phrase 'these little ones' on the Master's lips means not 'children,' but distinctly and always 'my disciples.' The question still remains open, however, whether our Lord means by it all His disciples, or only a specially designated class of them. The latter has been quite commonly supposed, and interpreters have busied themselves defining the characteristic qualities of the particularly designated class. Hahn, for example, argues strenuously that the disciples at large cannot be meant; but that the designation presupposes gradations among the disciples (cf. Lk 7²⁸), and the essence of the exhortation in Lk 17² at least is that the greater must not despise the lesser. Godet similarly supposes that the 'little ones' are 'beginners in the faith,' 'those yet weak in the faith.' Surely, however, such distinctions are foreign to the contexts in which these phrases occur, and even inconsistent with them. In Mt 10⁴², for example, the broad identification of 'one of these little ones' with 'a disciple' excludes from thought all divisions within the body of disciples; and the definition of 'these' as the disciples to whom our Lord was speaking, as He spoke of them as 'these little ones,' looks in the same direction. In Mk 9⁴², again, the phrase 'these little ones' takes up broadly the 'you' of the preceding verse, and therefore designates just the disciples at large. 'These little ones' are, moreover, defined here as 'these that believe,' that is to say, as 'believers,' in their essential characteristics as such. Much the same may be said of Lk 17², in the context of which there is a distinction between brother and brother but no discrimination between greater and lesser, while the whole drift of Mt 18⁵⁻¹⁴ is to exalt the 'little ones' and to identify them with that body of chosen ones to whose salvation the will of the Father is pledged. It may be taken as exegetically certain, then, that by 'these little ones' our Lord does not intend to single out a certain section of His disciples,—whether the weakest in faith or the more advanced in that humility of spirit which is the fruit of a great faith,—but means the whole body of His disciples. This is therefore just one of the somewhat numerous general designations which He gives to His disciples by which to express His conception of their character and estate, and the nature of His feelings towards them.

2. Whence this particular designation of His disciples was derived by our Lord remains indeed somewhat obscure. It used to be quite generally supposed that in it He had simply adopted and applied to His own disciples an ordinary designation for their pupils current in the Rabbinical schools. This idea seems traceable to J. J. Wet-stein, who illustrates the phrase on its first occurrence (Mt 10⁴²) by the following quotation from the Bereshith Rabba (xlii. 4):

'Where there are no little ones, there are no disciples; where there are no disciples, there are no sages; where there are no sages, there are no elders; where there are no elders, there are no prophets; where there is no prophet, there is no God.'

Following this suggestion, commentators like Bolten, Kuinoel, Bloomfield, Fritzsche have accordingly explained the phrase as simply a Hebraism for 'disciples.'

It was early pointed out, however (e.g. by Meyer, ed. 2, p. 215 note; Bruno Bauer, ii. 241), that the currency in the Rabbinical schools of such an employment of 'little ones' as a designation for 'disciples' is neither shown by the citation from the Bereshith Rabba nor supported by any other evidence. Accordingly this notion has quite generally died out (cf. Meyer-Weiss, ed. 8, 1890). Its place has been largely taken by the very natural supposition that our Lord has done for Himself what the Rabbis had been supposed to have done for Him,—applied affectionately to His disciples a designation appropriate literally only to children. The difficulty of this supposition, otherwise most satisfactory, is that the particular designation in question—'little ones'—is not a Biblical designation of children, and not one which would readily suggest itself as a term of affection. Neither the Hebrew (קטן) nor the Greek (μικρός) lent itself readily to adoption as a term of tenderness; and accordingly neither in the Hebrew nor in the Greek Bible does the term 'little ones' (קטנים, οἱ μικροί) ever occur as a periphrasis for children. Where we read of 'little ones' in the English Bible in the sense of children, this is an imposition of an English idea upon a totally divergent Hebrew conception (קטן Gn 34²⁹ 43⁸ 46⁸ etc.). It is quite true that in Rabbinical Hebrew קטנים has become a standing term for children; but not as a term of affectionate feeling so much as with the simple implication of immaturity. The katan and lētanna were to the Rabbis merely the 'boy' and 'girl' as undeveloped and unripe, in opposition to the mature man and woman. And although this term was occasionally transferred by them metaphorically to their pupils, it was not, if we can trust the lexicographers, in a very pleasant sense. The 'little one' among the disciples was just an 'abortion'—one who disregarded his teacher and set his immaturity against his master's ripe learning; or one who, while yet fit only to be a learner, wished to set himself up prematurely as a teacher (cf. Levy or Jastrow, sub voce קטן, quoting the tract Sota 22a; but consult Sota 24b, where we are told that Samuel was surnamed קטן 'the Little,'—cf. 'James the Little' in the NT, and 'Kleigenes the Little' in Xenophon,—because he made himself little, that is, bore himself humbly; here a good sense seems to be attached to the metaphorical use of the word). It was assuredly not from this circle of ideas that our Lord derived His use of the phrase, even if we may suppose that this Rabbinical use of it was already developed in His day.

Only two OT passages suggest themselves as offering natural points of departure for the framing of such a phrase as our Lord employs. The one of these is Is 60²² and the other Zec 13⁷. In the former, the terms employed, from which our Lord's phrase may have been derived, are קטן in the first clause and קטני in the second. In the latter the Hebrew term employed is קטני, translated in the LXX οἱ μικροί. Both passages are Messianic, though only Zec 13⁷ is adduced in the NT and given explicit application to Christ (Mt 26³¹, Mk 14²⁷). In neither is there any allusion to children; but in both the reference of the diminutive term is to the smallness of the beginnings out of which the Lord in the days of the coming blessing shall recreate His Church. If we may believe that the Master had these passages in mind when He called His disciples 'these little ones,' then the application of the term to them obviously meant to point them out as those 'little ones' who, Zechariah had promised, should be refined as silver and tried as gold, only that they might for ever become the Lord's people; who, Isaiah had promised, should be the unassuming nucleus out of which by gracious expansion should be developed the newly created city of God which should be to Him an everlasting possession. The consonance of this implication of the term with all the allusions of the contexts in which it occurs, and with all the declarations concerning His 'little ones' which our Lord makes, lies on the face of things. And on its assumption all the peculiarities of the form and use of the phrase at once find an adequate explanation.

3. If, now, we ask why and with what meaning our Lord designated His disciples 'these little ones,' a twofold answer seems indicated. It is on the one side His chief Messianic designation of His followers: it is on the other side the chief of His hypocoristic designations of them. Other designations of each order exist. When Jesus speaks of His followers as 'children of the kingdom,' for example, He is applying to them a Messianic designation; or, to confine ourselves to the circle of ideas most closely related to the passages of the Old Testament supposed to be in His mind in the instance holding our attention, when He calls them His 'sheep' (Mt 26³¹) or more pointedly His 'little flock' (Lk 12³²), these are Messianic designations which He is applying to them. Similarly His language with reference to them was full of hypocoristics. They were not merely His 'children' (Mk 10²⁴, Jn 21⁵), but His 'little children' (Jn 13³³). They were not merely His 'flock' (Mt 26³¹, Jn 10¹⁶), but His 'little flock' (Lk 12³²). They were not merely His 'sheep' (Mt 10⁶), but His 'little sheep' (Jn 10⁷⁻¹⁶); not merely His 'lambs' (Lk 10³), but His 'little lambs' (Jn 21¹⁵). In the designation 'little ones' both these lines of expression reach their height. In calling His disciples the 'little ones' of Is 60²², Zec 13⁷, He points to them as the true seed of the Kingdom, the branch of God's planting, the work of His hands in which He shall be glorified (cf. Schwartzkopff, The Prophecies of Jesus Christ, pp. 199-202). In calling them 'little ones' (οἱ μικροί) He applies to them the hypocoristic by way of eminence,—so pure a hypocoristic that the very substantive is lacking, and nothing persists but the bare endearing diminutive. There is combined, therefore, in this designation the expression of our Lord's deep-reaching tenderness for His disciples and the declaration of His protecting care over them as 'the remnant of Jacob.' The ordinary suggestions of the meaning of the phrase as applied to the disciples may doubtless be neglected as artificial. Reuss, for example, thinks they were called 'little ones' because they were drawn from the most humble, the least distinguished section of society; de Wette, because they were despised and meanly esteemed for Christ's sake; Dr. Riddle, in recognition of their weakness in themselves in the midst of the persecution of the world. These are all secondary ideas. Primarily our Lord's disciples were called by Him 'little ones' because this was the natural utterance of the tenderness of Jesus' love for them, and the strongest mode of expressing the glorious destiny that was in store for them. The passages in which the epithet occurs are full of the note of pledged protection, and they run up into that marvellous declaration that no man and no thing can snatch them out of the Father's hand. We shall not go far wrong, then, if we say simply that our Saviour calls His disciples 'these little ones' because He thinks of them as the peculiar objects of His protecting care, and sees in them already of the travail of His soul that He may be satisfied. The greatness of His love for them, the greatness of their significance as the seed of the Kingdom,—these are the two ideas that combine in this designation.

BENJAMIN B. WARFIELD.

LIVING.—1. Bios = 'livelihood,' 'means of living.' It is often used in this sense in class. Gr., e.g. τὸν βίον κτᾶσθαι, ποιῆσθαι, etc.; Plato, Gorg. 486 D, (men) οἷς ἐστί καὶ βίος καὶ δόξα καὶ ἄλλα πολλὰ ἀγαθὰ; Phocylides, Frag. 10, ed. Bergk, διζήσθαι βιοτήν, ἀρετὴν δ' ὅταν ἡ βίος ἦδῃ (like Hor. Ep. I. i. 53, 'quærenda pecunia primum est, virtus post nummos'). It is rendered 'living' in four passages in the Gospels. (1) Mk 12⁴⁴ (|| Lk 21⁴) ἐβαλεν ὄλον τὸν βίον αὐτῆς, Vulg. totum victum suum = 'all that she had to live upon until more should be earned' (Swete). Jesus knew that this was the case, and that she might have retained one of the λεπτά when she cast in both (Nestle, Expos. Times, xiii. 562, who adds that 2 Co 8¹² looks like the moral drawn from this passage; cf. Holtzmann, Hand-Commentar, 256). Compare the praise of the virtuous woman, Pr 31¹⁴ (LXX συναίγει δὲ αὐτὴ τὸν βίον). (2) Lk 8³³ ἰατροῖς προσαναλώσασα ὄλον τὸν βίον, Vulg. omnem substantiam suam: the πρὸς implying that besides what she had suffered, she had expended all her means of subsistence (cf. Plummer, 234; Holtzmann, 157; Hastings' DB iii. 322ⁿ). Ca 8⁷ LXX, ἐὰν δὲ ἀνὴρ πάντα τὸν βίον αὐτοῦ ἐν τῇ ἀγάπῃ, ἐξουθενώσει ἐξουθενώσουσιν αὐτόν, forms a suggestive parallel. (3) Lk 15¹² διεῖλεν αὐτοῖς τὸν βίον, Vulg. divisit illis substantiam: ὁ βίος being equivalent to ἡ οὐσία ('his estate'). Such a division of property in the father's lifetime was perhaps not uncommon. What precise rights the father retained after the division is not clear. The words πάντα τὰ ἐμὰ σὰ ἐστίν (v. 31) are not spoken in a legal sense, but are an expression of fatherly affection (cf. Plummer, 372; Simeon, Expositor, 1889, ii. 124, 127). τὸ ἐπιβάλλον μέρος was a technical formula, as appears from the papyrus (Deissmann, Bible Studies, 230). The share of the younger son would be a third (Dt 21¹⁷, cf. Jülicher, Gleichnisreden, 338). (4) Lk 15³⁰ ὁ καταφαγῶν σου τὸν βίον. Plummer thinks there may be bitterness in the σου, when αὐτοῦ might have been more fairly used. But the σου τὸν βίον may have been due to correct feeling; the elder son not regarding the share which he himself had received as being absolutely his own as long as his father lived (cf. Jülicher, Gleichnisreden, 337). bios is used in the same sense: 1 Jn 3¹⁷ ὅς δ' ἂν ἔχη τὸν βίον τοῦ κόσμου, where it is rendered 'this world's good' (AV), 'goods' (RV), and includes 'all the endowments which make up our earthly riches, wealth, station, intellect' (Westcott, in loc.). For the distinction between ζωὴ and βίος, in NT and in the writings of the Apostolic Fathers (ζωὴ the principle of life, vita qua vivimus; βίος the process, the circumstances, the accidents of life, in its social relations, vita quam vivimus; cf. Lk 8¹⁴), see the valuable note of Lightfoot, Ignat. ad Rom. vii. 3 (Apostolic Fathers, second part, ii. 1, 225-226) and cf. Haupt on 1 Jn 2¹⁶, and Trench, Synon. xxvii.

2. Ζῶν.—(1) as applied to God: by St. Peter, Mt 16¹⁶ ὁ υἱὸς τοῦ θεοῦ τοῦ ζῶντος; by the high priest, Mt 26⁶³ ἐξορκίζω σε κατὰ τοῦ θ. τ. ζ.; by Christ Himself, Jn 6⁵⁷ ὁ ζῶν πατήρ.

The title 'the living God' occurs in OT in the following passages: יְיָ אֱלֹהֵינוּ Dt 5²³ (26), 1 S 17²⁶⁻³⁶, Jer 10¹⁰ 23³⁶; יְיָ אֱלֹהֵינוּ 2 K 19⁴⁻¹⁶ (|| Is 37⁴⁻¹⁷); יְיָ אֱלֹהֵינוּ Jos 3¹⁰, Hos 2¹ (110), Ps 42³ (2) 84³ (2); אֱלֹהֵינוּ Dn 3²¹ (20) 27 (26). It is found besides (in LXX) Dt 4³⁸, To 13¹, Est 6¹³, Dn 4¹⁹ 5²³ 12⁷, Bel 7, 3 Mac 6²⁸. A study of the OT passages shows that God is called 'the living God,' not only as contrasted with the dead idols of the heathen, but also as the God of active Providence, as Israel's Protector and Helper, as He who is Life, and the never-failing Source of spiritual life to men. It is perhaps the title of God that comes nearest in significance to Jahweh, and it seems to have been used at times of great emotion as a substitute for it, particularly when the name Jahweh had disappeared from popular use (cf. Dalman, Words of Jesus, 195). Sanday (BL, 1893, p. 153, cf. 124) justly calls attention to the richness and depth of this prophetic title as compared with modern terminology: 'the Absolute, the Infinite, the Unconditioned, the First Cause, the Moral Governor,' and so on (cf. Flint, Sermons and Addresses, 170).*

'The living God' occurs often in NT, and the writer of Hebrews uses it with special force and emphasis (see A. B. Davidson, note on He 3¹²). On the lips of St. Peter (Mt 16¹⁶) it amounts to a confession that the living God is now revealed in Christ, who thus becomes the Source of eternal life to His followers (Jn 6⁶⁸; cf. Hastings' DB iv. 574^b). The high priest's use of the title adds a certain dignity to his adoration; and Jesus answered on being thus solemnly appealed to. 'The living Father' (Jn 6⁶⁷) is a remarkable expression, combining as it does all that was signified by 'the living God' in the OT with Christ's revelation of God as the Father who sent His Son (or, of God as the Source of life on the side of love). The meaning of this verse may be briefly stated as follows: our Lord's words, 'I live by (διὰ, RV 'because of') the Father' are to be referred to the personal life of human weakness and suffering now in progress. In living this life Jesus is dependent upon the support and sustenance which He is receiving at every moment from the Father who sent Him. A like dependence exists in our case upon Jesus Himself. Being Himself strengthened, He becomes the source of strength to us. It is the very fact of His coming and living this life of human weakness and suffering on earth that puts it within our power to take Him for our spiritual support and sustenance. When we take home the truth of His self-humbling love for our sake, and assimilate it to ourselves as the bread we eat, we receive into our souls the true life that cannot die (cf. Beyschlag, NT Theol. i. 272; and for a similar profound saying as to the relation between the Father and the Son and believers, see Jn 10^{14, 15}).

(2) As applied to the Risen Lord: Lk 24⁵ τί ζητεῖτε τὸν ζῶντα μετὰ τῶν νεκρῶν; the angels' question conveyed a reproof to the women who were come to the place where the dead was laid, bringing the spices which they had prepared: it was like asking them, 'Where is your faith?' They had heard the announcement Christ made to the circle of His followers before leaving Galilee, that He would rise again the third day (vv. 6-7). At the same time, the question was spoken sympathetically, and conveyed to them the first intimation of the astonishing truth, οὐκ ἐστιν ὧδε, ἀλλὰ ἤγερθη. Here ὁ ζῶν simply implies that Jesus lives, and is not now to be sought in the place where the dead are, i.e. continues no longer under the power of death (cf. v. 23 ἀγγέλων . . . οἱ λέγουσιν αὐτὸν ζῆν). But as spoken at the empty sepulchre, it undoubtedly has something of the exaltation of meaning with which it was afterwards used by our Lord in His glorified state (Rev 1¹⁸ ἐγὼ εἰμι . . . ὁ ζῶν 'the Living one,' RV). There is comprehended in it the completeness of that triumph over death which was afterwards so richly unfolded to the mind of the Church by the Holy Spirit, as, for example, when St. Paul used the exultant language of Ro 6⁹⁻¹⁰, or spoke of Christ as a πνεῦμα ζωοποιῶν (1 Co 15⁴⁵).

(3) As applied to Water and Bread in the Fourth

* 'O Thou Infinite, Amen,' was the form of prayer Tennyson used in times of trouble and sorrow (Memoir by his Son, i. 324). The language of the founder of the Gifford Lectureship may also be recalled.

Gospel: Jn 4^{10, 11} ὕδωρ ζῶν; 7³⁸ ποταμοὶ ὕδατος ζῶντος; 6⁵¹ ἐγὼ εἰμι ὁ ἄριστος ὁ ζῶν.—a. Jn 4^{10, 11}. 'Living water' is spring water, as contrasted with that collected in a well or cistern. It is the צֶמַח הַיַּיִן of the OT (Gn 26¹⁹ [see Driver's note], Lv 14^{5, 6, 50-52}, Ca 4¹⁵, Jer 2¹³ 17¹³, Zec 14⁸; also LXX Gn 21¹⁹, Nu 5⁷). The woman of Samaria was familiar with the expression, and her question was quite natural and appropriate, 'Art thou greater than our father Jacob?' 'Here is an ordinary man offering to supply better water, spring water, in the place where the patriarch Jacob had been obliged to content himself with building a cistern and drinking cistern water' (Wendt, St. John's Gospel, 124). The water in Jacob's Well (wh. see) is believed to be due to 'percolation and rainfall' (cf. Hastings' DB ii. 536, Encyc. Bibl. iv. 4829, Smith's *DB*² ii. 1503). Jer 2¹³ especially illustrates the difference between the spring or fountain, gushing forth with its unstinted and unailing supply, 'overflowing, ever-flowing,' and the cistern, so liable to be destroyed by cracking (Land and Book, 287), which at the best cannot afford a refreshing draught like that of the bubbling spring, and which cannot permanently retain the water collected in it. Christ does not call Himself 'the Living water,' as He calls Himself 'the Living bread.' What He means by 'the living water' is the word of salvation which He preaches (cf. vv. 41, 42). This word, He says (v. 14), enters into the inner personal life, and becomes there a gushing spring, a perennial fountain (πηγή ὕδατος), 'springing up into eternal life,' i.e. persisting to flow upwards till we reach our end of full communion with God. C. Wesley's 'Spring Thou up within my heart, Rise to all eternity,' is quite in harmony with Israel's water-drawing song, in which the spring is addressed as a living being (Nu 21¹⁷, cf. Encyc. Bibl. i. 515, iv. 4778).

b. Jn 7³⁸.—'Pouring out water before the Lord' was a primitive ritual practice, of which the origin is uncertain. It was 'in all probability a survival from a time when water (in the desert) was considered an article of value' (Kautzsch in Hastings' DB, Ext. Vol. 620^a). It is mentioned as a prayer-offering, 1 S 7⁸; as a thank-offering, 2 S 23¹⁶. There are no traces of it beyond the time of David (a reference to it in 1 K 18³⁸ is not probable); but the practice of pouring out water as a drink-offering continued to be observed, or was revived, in connexion with the Feast of Tabernacles. Every morning during the seven days of the feast water was drawn from the spring of Siloam in a golden pitcher, and was poured into a basin at the top of the altar (Encyc. Bibl. iv. 4213). The libation of water was probably a prayer-offering for abundant rain for the new seed-time (ib. iv. 4880, cf. iii. 3354). Rain was an emblem of Messianic blessings (2 S 23⁴, Ps 72⁶, cf. Hos 6³); and we may well believe that the symbolic act of pouring out water gave occasion to our Lord's looking forward to the abundant showers with which He was soon to water the earth.—Further, this joyous festival brought to our Lord's mind the Rock at Horeb (Ex 17⁶, Nu 20¹¹, cf. 1 Co 10⁴), and perhaps more especially those OT sayings in which it had been predicted that living water should flow out from Jerusalem, or from the House of the Lord (Ezk 47¹⁻¹², Zec 14⁸, Jl 3¹⁸, cf. Ps 87⁷). What was the precise connecting link of thought between these predictions and the phrase ἐκ τῆς κοιλίας αἵτου, it is difficult to say. But may it not be the case that, in our Lord's view, what had been spoken concerning Jerusalem and the Temple was now to be applied to the inner personal life of the believer, enriched by the entrance of His word, and renewed by His Holy Spirit? This sanctified personal life was what now answered to the sanctuary from which it had been foretold that living waters should flow out. Our Lord's application of the term κοιλία to it was in keeping with the use of קַיִלָּה in certain passages of the OT, where it denotes the whole of man's emotional nature and sympathetic affections (Pr 20^{27, 30}, Hab 3¹⁶, cf. Sir 19¹² 51²¹; cf. also the expression 'his bowels yearned,' Gn 43³⁰, 1 K 3²⁶). The words καθὼς εἶπεν ἡ γραφή, κ.τ.λ., are thus a terse and eloquent paraphrase of the scope of the passages above referred to. It need hardly be said that the clause καθὼς εἶπεν ἡ γραφή cannot possibly be connected with the preceding ὁ πιστεύων εἰς ἐμέ ('there are not different ways of believing,' Principal Campbell, The Four Gospels, in loc.). This saying of our Lord supplements and extends that of 4¹⁴. The word of salvation which becomes a gushing spring when received into the inner personal life of the believer, and rises up there unto eternal life, Jesus now announces, is to become a rushing stream, and is to flow out from the believer in rivers of blessing to others (ποταμοὶ ἐκάλεσεν, οὐχ ἓνα ποταμὸν, ἀλλὰ ἀφάτους, Chrys. in loc.). The limitations to its diffusion that at present exist will be removed when Christ shall have entered into His glory. His sending His Holy Spirit upon the company of believers will enable them to proclaim His word with full power, and will make their holy lives a means of spiritual replenishment to all mankind. The saying was fulfilled after Pentecost, when 'rivers of living water' flowed out from the Lord's witnesses 'unto the uttermost part of the earth,' 'beginning at Jerusalem' (cf. Dykes, Expositor, 1890 (i.) p. 127 ff.). When the water from Siloam was brought to the Temple, priests and people sang the words, 'Therefore with joy shall ye draw water out of the wells of salvation' (Is 12³). But in the verses following (vv. 4-6), it was implied that the water so drawn was not to be Israel's exclusive possession, but that the salvation which it symbolized was to be communicated to other nations (v. 5 'let this be known in all the earth,' RV). With the leading thought of Jn 7³⁸ may be compared what St. Paul says about Christians first receiving and then giving forth 'the light of the knowledge of the glory of God in the face of Jesus Christ' (2 Co 4⁶).

c. Jn 6⁵¹.—Two things—the manna and the bread of the miracle which He had just wrought—were present to our Lord's mind when He preached at Capernaum, and also to the minds of His hearers. They had said, after His feeding the five thousand, 'This is of a truth the Prophet that cometh into the world' (v. 14). But the earthly and material good which they expected to follow not being immediately forthcoming, and the first favourable impression produced by the miracle having worn off, they began to criticise and find fault. 'After all, His multiplying the loaves is not anything so very wonderful. Can He "rain down manna upon us to eat, and give us of the corn of heaven" (Ps 78²⁴), that we may see and believe Him (v. 30)? The manna,' said they, 'supplied the wants of all the hosts of Israel for forty years, but He has furnished us with no more than one meal.' This led Jesus to set forth the difference between the manna and 'the true bread from heaven' (v. 32). Inasmuch as the manna was sent down from above, and was continually renewed, it was a type of the true bread. But that bread it was not, being simply a provision which was made for a special purpose, and which lasted only until that purpose had been fulfilled (cf. Jos 5¹²); nor had their fathers' having eaten it eventually delivered them from the power of death (v.⁴⁹). Jesus also showed that His hearers had failed to perceive the true purpose of the miracle He had wrought. The bread of the miracle was intended for 'a sign' (v.²⁶), which they had not had faith to discern (v.³⁶), that He could supply them with the true bread of the soul. Inasmuch as the multiplying of the loaves was due to His love, and involved the repeated action of that love in the gift of a satisfying meal to each of them severally (cf. Swete, St. Mark, 127^b), it was 'a sign' that should have led them to believe that He could give them the true bread. But they had sought Him at Capernaum, not hungering for this bread, but hankering after more earthly good, like that which they had already received. Accordingly, Jesus spoke of the bread of the miracle as 'the meat which perisheth,' and contrasted it with 'the meat which endureth unto eternal life' (v.²⁷). These distinctions of the bread of the miracle as well as the manna from the true bread of the soul are important and vital, and they assist us to lay hold of our Lord's meaning when He said, 'I am the living bread.' This expression has no parallel in the OT, but it is in close affinity with the 'living water' in ch. 4. As 'living water' is water that never ceases to gush forth, so 'living bread' is bread that Jesus never ceases to multiply for the supply of our spiritual wants,—bread, therefore, by which our spiritual sustenance is perpetually renewed (cf. Dods, Expositor's Bible, in loc.). It is bread in ever-multiplying, unmeasured store, that can never be exhausted by the famishing. As Jesus speaks of 'giving' this bread (v.²⁷), it must mean, in the first instance, the same thing as the better water which He also spoke of 'giving,' namely, His word. This view is in agreement with the teaching of vv.³⁻⁶⁸, and is also supported by our Lord's use of Dt 8³ (Mt 4⁴, Lk 4⁴). But He not only speaks of 'giving' bread, He also says, 'I am the living bread.' The key to His meaning is found in the Prologue. Jesus not only utters the word of God, but is 'from eternity the very Word of God, by which God manifests Himself. He is not one who leads to the way, but Himself the Way; not one who preaches truth, but Himself the Truth' (1¹ 14⁶; Hibbert Journal, Oct. 1905, p. 6). So here Jesus not only gives the bread, but is Himself 'the living bread,'—the actual source of nutrition.' He 'speaks of Himself not as resembling, but as being the veritable vine, the veritable bread, the veritable light of the world; implying that He is the absolute truth of all these things; the supreme reality which they partially manifest in their several spheres' (Illingworth, *Divine Immanence*², 135, cf. 137). Jesus adds, 'which came down from heaven.' As in the physical realm, so, too, in the spiritual, the food that sustains us comes down from heaven, and to procure it is beyond the reach of our own powers (Is 55¹⁰⁻¹¹). As the heaven-given bread which feeds our bodies ultimately assumes the humble form of the baked loaf, which, inasmuch as it nourishes life, retains the life of the living wheat, and can impart it, so Jesus, in order to feed our souls, must humble Himself and 'be found in fashion as a man,' be born, and that in a low condition (v.⁴²), undergo the miseries of this life, and at the end of His earthly course even 'give his flesh for the life of the world.' The power of this truth of His self-humbling love for our sake enters into our inner personal life, and we are enabled to assimilate it to ourselves as the food we eat, by means of His word. His word is the 'bread which strengtheneth man's heart' (Ps 104¹⁵), because it is the embodiment of Him who, having humbled Himself to death, now for ever lives. Through it the repeated action of His love still ministers the gift to each hungering soul. The Bread of heaven, in heaven itself, will be the word which Jesus speaks to His people.—It is the same truth respecting Christ as our Living Food and Strength that is 'represented, sealed, and applied' to us in the Lord's Supper.

(4) As applied to the Patriarchs: Mk 12²⁷ (|| Mt 22³², Lk 20³⁸) οὐκ ἔστιν θεὸς νεκρῶν, ἀλλὰ ζώντων.— In expounding this cardinal saying, we have first to inquire what doctrine our Lord is here vindicating. Religious minds among the Jews had already arrived at the clearly defined hope of a future life (Driver, Sermons on OT, 92), which life they conceived of as comprehending 'the deliverance of an existent personality from Sheol, and its re-endowment with life in all its powers and activities' (Hastings' DB iv. 232^a). Sadduceeism, which represented the old Jewish standpoint, rejected these doctrines. The Sadducees were hostile to our Lord's whole teaching respecting 'the kingdom of God,' which carried the consummation of the Kingdom into a future life, and accordingly implied that there would be a resurrection of the dead. It was with reference to the resurrection that they chose their line of attack on His teaching. In His discussion with them, it was our Lord's object not only to maintain that there is a life after death, but also to reveal what deliverance from death really implied. Had He made use of Ex 3 simply to prove the continued existence of men after death, He would not have met the objections of His opponents. It was their attack on the resurrection that He successfully repelled (cf. Wendt, Teaching of Jesus, i. 222). The Sadducees, although not actually rejecting the other books of the OT, considered them as being very inferior in value to the five books of Moses (cf. Encyc. Bibl. iv. 4240). It was from the latter, accordingly, that they drew their objection to the resurrection. Founding on the law of the Levirate marriage (see LEVIRATE LAW), they thought to put our Lord in an embarrassing position by propounding the case of seven brethren, who, after having married the same wife in succession, had all died childless, and then asking, 'In the resurrection, when they shall rise, whose wife shall she be of the seven?' The story of Glaphyra (Jos. Ant. xvii. xiii. 4; cf. Addison, Spectator, No. 110) was probably much canvassed about that time (Holtzmann, Hand-Commentar, 245); and in it the marriage-relation was conceived of as still standing in the world beyond death. Our Lord took the opportunity afforded Him by the disputation which had arisen to set free the doctrine of the resurrection from such grossly materialistic notions as these, and to show that the resurrection life is not a continuation of the present life of the body, or of human relations as they now exist (v.²⁵). As to the main point at issue, He met the Sadducees on their own ground. He directed their attention to a passage which they had overlooked in one of their revered books, and prefacing the quotation with the words, 'As touching the dead that they rise,'—thus showing that it was the resurrection He was vindicating,—He asked them, 'Have you considered the bearing of this passage upon the doctrine in question?' As to our Lord's use of this passage of the OT, all that need be said here is that the revelation given to Moses at Horeb, and made by him the ground of his appeal to the Hebrew tribes,—the revelation, namely, of Jahweh as the God of their fathers,—lies at the very root of Israel's religion (cf. W. R. Smith, *Proph.*¹ 32, *OTJC*² 303; Kautzsch in Hastings' DB, Ext. Vol. 624, 625^a). Our Lord's argument, based on the passage quoted, may be stated as follows:—The words of Ex 3⁶⁻¹³, 15¹⁶ spoke of the relation of the patriarchs to God as a still existing relation, and set forth a fellowship with God in which they, being dead, yet lived. But their fellowship with God contained in itself the promise and the pledge of a more complete life and more perfect fellowship which should hereafter be granted them by God. It followed, by an inner principle of necessity, from their being united to Him who is 'the God of the living,' that He would not leave any part of their being for ever under the destructive power of death, but would in the end awaken them to a heavenly life with Himself (Wendt, l.c. i. 223; cf. Bengel, note on Mt 22³²; Salmon, *Chr. Doctr. of Immortality*³, 366; Swete, St. Mark, 266). Or, to state the argument in a more compact form:—God is Life. The patriarchs are in God, therefore they partake of life. But life cannot die, therefore they must continue living for ever. But a purely incorporeal existence does not give the full conception of life in man's case. Each patriarch is soul plus body. Therefore the body, as well as the soul, is secured in an everlasting life. Compare the remarkable treatise on the Resurrection by the apologist Athenagoras (c. A.D. 177), especially chs. 14–17 (Donaldson, A Critical History of Chr. Lit. and Doctr. iii. 116, 136 ff.). The ground of the resurrection-hope which our Lord found in this passage was beyond question contained in it, seeing that He found it there and set it forth. He could see all that God meant when He called Himself 'the God of Abraham, and the God of Isaac, and the God of Jacob.' He could discern the full witness borne by this title to the certainty of the hope which He defended. 'He who spoke in the OT was God, and from the first that which He spoke about was the consummation which filled His thought' (A. B. Davidson, Expositor, 1900 (i.), 15; cf. OT Prophecy, 14). Further, in the Resurrection of Christ Himself we have the conclusive proof that communion with God involves the restitution of the whole of our personal being. What the proper view of the resurrection body is we find later on from St. Paul, whose doctrine of a σῶμα πνευματικόν as contrasted with a σῶμα ψυχικόν (1 Co 15⁴⁴), and of a σῶμα τῆς δόξης αὐτοῦ as contrasted with a σῶμα τῆς ταπεινώσεως ἡμῶν (Ph 3²¹), was no doubt evolved from our Lord's saying.

(5) As applied to the manner or course of life: Lk 15¹³ ζῶν ἀσώτως, 'with riotous living' (cf. Jos. Ant. XII. iv. 8, ἀσώτως ζῆν). Contrast 'holy living.' From this phrase is derived the title ὁ ἀσώτως υἱός, filius prodigus, by which this parable is generally known (Trench, *Par.*³ 393; Jülicher, Gleichnisr. 337, 341).* See also art. LIFE.

LOAF (ἀpros).—The Eastern loaf is not at all like the bread in use among ourselves. The Pass-over loaf—a large round thin cake—probably preserves the shape of the loaf in use among the Jews of our Lord's time. The same shape of loaf is found to-day among the Bedawin and fellahin as well as in many villages and towns. The loaves are of considerable size, —18 in. or more in diameter, —and are of an extreme tenuity and of a peculiar but not unpleasant toughness. They are baked usually on a convex girdle, very often on the implement which is used for roasting coffee—hence the name 'girdle bread.' They may also be baked on heated stones or on the outside of a jar within which a fire has been kindled. Such without doubt would be the kind of bread baked by the children of Israel in their desert wanderings. And at the present time one may see this loaf in almost every part of Palestine. Even where other kinds of bread are used, this is still highly relished. If there is a guest in a native house, the loaves are often folded up in quarter size and laid beside his plate, and more than one European traveller has mistaken them, when so placed, for table napkins!

In all probability the loaves in Mk 6³⁸ 8⁶, etc., were of this kind, inasmuch as such bread is almost always carried on a journey, and by workmen, because of its keeping properties. The loaf is never cut; it is broken or torn asunder. Small scoops are made of the portions, with which the meat, rice, or leben (curdled milk) is scooped up—spoon and contents being eaten together. A man will eat three or four of these loaves at a meal (Lk 11⁵).

Another loaf in common use at the present day is smaller in circumference and considerably thicker, and very much resembles in appearance the 'scones,' baked on a girdle, so common in some parts of Scotland. Bread of this kind is found only in towns where there are public ovens. See also art. BREAD. J. SOUTAR.

LOANS.—There are frequent references to money, and many illustrations suggested by financial obligations, in the teaching of Jesus. These have been gathered together as indications of 'the economic background of the Evangelical history' (Haurath, NT Times, i. p. 188 f., quoted also in full by Bruce in Parabolic Teaching, p. 243 f.). We learn from Tacitus that the year 17 was marked by great discontent in Judea and throughout Syria, on account of the burdensome taxation, and that the year 33 was one of financial crisis throughout the Empire. There is thus full justification for the numerous Gospel intimations of hardship and debt, and impoverishment generally. See DEBT.

But the relation of debtor and creditor is so obviously adaptable to moral obligations, that under any social condition the use of this figure is to be expected. The very terms for financial obligations are freely used to express the obligations of moral life. Thus the same Gr. verb (ὀφείλω) is variously rendered in the RV 'owed,' 'owest,' 'that was due' (Mt 18²⁸, 30, 34, Lk 7⁴¹ 16⁵, 7 of financial obligation); 'debtor' (Mt 23¹⁶, 18 [AV 'guilty']), 'duty' (Lk 17¹⁰), 'ought' (Jn 13¹⁴ 19⁷), 'indebted' (Lk 11⁴; all of moral obligation); and the noun (ὀφειλέτης) is translated 'owed' (Mt 18²⁴ of money debt), 'debtors' (Mt 6¹² of moral debts), 'offenders' (Lk 13⁴ [AV 'sinners'] of guilt before God). Financial obligations afford also a ready measure of moral indebtedness; our sins against one another are as debts of £50 or £5 (Lk 7⁴¹), but our sin against God runs into 'millions sterling' (Mt 18²⁴).

The very naturalness of these illustrative uses of money values and financial relations makes it obviously wrong to press them into the support of economic theories, e.g. the justification of commercial loans from 'Thou oughtest therefore to have put my money to the bankers, and then at my coming I should have received back mine own with interest' (Mt 25²⁷ = Lk 19²³). In parables any relations may hold which the story demands. In Christian economics only moral relations are to be tolerated. Because then, in the Gospel narratives, debtors and creditors, borrowers and lenders figure largely, we are not able to say that the teaching of Jesus either supports or condemns modern commercial arrangements. The true basis of Christian economics must be found in the ethical teaching of the Gospels as a whole.

Apart from incidental references in parables, there is one saying of Jesus which calls for fuller notice. 'If ye lend (δανείζω, lend upon interest); contrast κίχρημα, of a friendly loan, Lk 11⁵ only) to them of whom ye hope to receive, what thank have ye? even sinners lend to sinners, to receive again as much. But love your enemies, and do them good, and lend, never despairing; and your reward shall be great, and ye shall be sons of the Most High: for he is kind toward the unthankful and evil' (Lk 6^{34c}, cf. Mt 5⁴²). The difficulty, in part one of textual reading, but mainly of interpretation, finds adequate representation in 'hoping for nothing again' (AV), 'never despairing' (RV), 'despairing of no man' (RVm). This uncertainty cannot, however, affect the meaning, which is determined by the preceding verses, and though the rendering of the AV must be rejected on critical grounds, it may well stand as an adequate gloss. On the authority of this saying the unlawfulness for Christians of receiving interest on loans has been based; and, rightly understood and applied, the inference is just. The commandment is one of benevolence. Christian charity is not to be by way of loans at interest. It is the duty of giving Jesus teaches, as if He said, 'Let your lending be giving'—a rule of charity which experience justifies, and which, from the would-be borrower's side, receives support in St. Paul's saying, 'Owe no man anything, save to love one another' (Ro 13⁸).

LOCUST.—1. Zoological description.—Locusts belong to the natural order Orthoptera. The members of this order are insects which undergo only a partial metamorphosis; the larva is scarcely distinguishable from the adult, unless by its smaller form and by the atrophy of its wings, which develop only gradually in proportion to its growth. Excepting this difference, it has the same form and the same habits as the adult. In its perfect state, the first pair of wings, though remaining supple, have a certain consistency. They cover the hind wings, which are membranous and transparent, and folded under the upper wings in the form of a fan. The mouth is of shape suitable for mastication, and the jaws act like a pair of scissors. Formerly the Orthoptera were divided into runners and leapers, but this division has been abandoned. Locusts were classed among the leapers. According to the present nomenclature, we must class them among the Orthoptera genuina. Among these appear among others (a) the family of Locustodæ, to which the European grasshoppers (the sub-family of the Locustidæ) belong; and also (b) the family of Acridioidæ, which includes in its various sub-families the principal locusts of Palestine. It is of the highest importance to avoid the confusion which may arise from this misleading terminology, according to which the 'locusts' of the Bible do not belong to the scientific family Locustodæ.

We are, then, to treat of the family Acridioidæ. Their antennæ are relatively short, scarcely exceeding the length of the head, whereas the antennæ of the Locustodæ are very long, as long as their bodies. Their hind legs, adapted for leaping, have very strong thighs furnished with indentations, which are easily seen if slightly magnified. The head is vertical. The first pair of wings are more leathery than the second, but both present the same reticulated appearance. The rapid brushing of the thighs of the hind legs, furnished with indentations, against the nervures of the front wings produces, when the insect is at rest, a stridulation, the tone and height of which vary according to the species. The Acridioidæ are generally diurnal, and their food is essentially herbaceous. In the females the abdomen ends in a pair of short pincers, whereas in the Locustodæ this appendage is greatly prolonged like the blade of a sabre. These pincers serve to bury in the earth, one by one, the eggs, which are disposed in cylindrical masses and held together by a frothy secretion.

The insect moults six times, but the principal stages of its development are only two—larva and imago (perfect state). The intermediate state (pupa) which we find in other orders of insects is imperceptible in the Orthoptera. In their state of larvæ, locusts, having no wings, or more correctly, merely the rudiments of wings, hop on the ground; even at this stage they are extremely destructive. Later, with the succeeding moultings, the wings develop, but remain enclosed in a membranous case; the insects now advance walking. At last, at their sixth moulting, which takes place from six to seven weeks after their coming out of the egg, locusts attain to their perfect state, and, unfolding their wings, fly through the air, producing what travellers describe as 'a hissing or a buzzing noise.'

In Palestine as many as forty different species of Acridioidæ have been noted. The most important of these belong to the sub-families of the Tryxalidæ, the Ædipodidæ, and the Acridiidæ properly so called. The commonest species, those which are rightly associated with the locusts mentioned in the Bible, are the Pachytylus migratorius (formerly called Ædipoda migratoria) and the Schistocerca peregrina (formerly called Acridium peregrinum). The colour of these insects is generally brown bordering on green, but with a bluish tint round the mouth, and with black spots on the body and green spots on the wings. The males are coloured differently from the females. In regard to their dimensions, locusts are as much as three or even four inches long when they are full grown.

Locusts are migratory insects, as the qualifying words, migratoria, peregrina, applied to them denote. They are produced chiefly in desert regions on the lofty plateaux of the East, and, carried by their wings and driven on by the east wind, they invade western Palestine in compact bodies.

2. Biblical names.—The OT mentions locusts under at least nine different names. These are (1) אַרְבֵּעַ 'arbeh, Ex 10^{4, 12-14, 19}, Lv 11²², Dt 28³⁸, Jg 6^{5, 7, 12}, 1 K 8³⁷, 2 Ch 6³⁸, Job 39²⁰, Ps 78⁴⁶, 105³⁴, 109²³, Pr 30²⁷, Jer 46²³, Jl 1^{4, 25}, Nah 3^{15, 17}. (2) חָגָב hagab, Lv 11²², Nu 13³³, 2 Ch 7¹³, Ec 12⁵, Is 40²². (3) סּוּלָמַי solam, Lv 11²². (4) חָרְגוֹל hargol, Lv 11²². (5) יַעֲלֵק yalek, Ps 105³⁴, Jer 51^{14, 27}, Jl 1^{4, 25}, Nah 3^{15c}. (6) חַשִּׁיל hasil, 1 K 8³⁷, 2 Ch 6³⁸, Ps 78⁴⁶, Is 33⁴, Jl 1^{4, 25}. (7) גִּזְזָאִים gizaim, Jl 1^{4, 25}, Am 4⁹. (8) גֹּב, גִּב, גִּבֵּי gob, gob, gobai, Is 33⁴, Am 7¹, Nah 3¹⁷. (9) זֵלְזָל zélzal, Dt 28⁴².

It would naturally be a matter of the greatest interest to know if these various names correspond with as many different species. But before replying to this question, (a) we should have to be certain that the ancients, the Easterns, the Hebrews in particular, were capable of making a distinction similar to that of genus and species used by modern scholars; (b) we should have to be equally certain that Biblical writers employed the terms in their language in a strict and rigorous fashion (a thing which even modern writers do not always do); and (c) we should require sufficient data to enable us to assign such and such a Hebrew name to such and such a particular species. Now these three conditions cannot be fulfilled, and in such a case it may well seem chimerical to demand a systematic classification, in accordance with present zoological principles, of the various locusts mentioned in the Bible. We must remember that Oriental languages, such as Hebrew and Arabic, possess a considerable choice of synonyms to denote one and the same animal. We note that the LXX proceeds on no regular system. It translates the Hebrew by using the terms ἀρίς, βροῦχος, κάμπη, ἀππῆλαβος (ἀππέλεβος), ἐρυσίβη (ἐρυσύβη), ἀπτάκης, ὄφιωμαχης, etc., in a purely arbitrary and, it would appear, conjectural manner, without taking the least care always to translate the same Hebrew by the same Greek word. The same is true of the version of Jerome and of translations into modern languages. The EV has had no better success with its varying use of 'locust,' 'grasshopper,' 'canker-worm,' 'palmer-worm,' 'caterpillar,' and even 'beetle' (for hāgāb, manifestly a false translation).

We must also avoid the error of thinking that the various terms employed, for example, by Joel and Nahum refer to locusts at various stages in their development. The fact that the order of the four terms gāzām, 'arbeh, yelek, hāsīl in J1 14 is followed in 2²⁵ by the order 'arbeh, yelek, hāsīl, gāzām, in itself disproves this theory. Besides, it would be difficult to perceive in the development of the Orthopterous insect four stages easily distinguishable by every observer, since, as we have seen, the insect changes very little from moulting to moulting.* We must add to the passages of the canonical OT cited above J1h 2²⁰, Wis 16⁹, Sir 43¹⁷. The term used in these three texts is akpis; the Hebrew Sirach has 'arbeh.

The names that the Hebrew language gives to locusts prove that these insects were peculiarly feared (a) on account of their great numbers, and (b) on account of their voracity and their power of destruction. In fact, 'arbeh probably goes back to a root meaning to be numerous, to multiply. On the other hand, gāzām, hāsīl, yelek, and solām all have the sense of destruction (literally to clip, to cut, to devour, to swallow).† The sense of gōb (gōb, gōbai) and of hāgāb is a problem. Hargōl appears to signify one who gallops, and zēlāgal is a more harmless term, referring to the humming of the locust's wings, or rather to the stridulation it makes when it is at rest (a word akin to this is used to denote cymbals).

3. Locusts in the OT.—In the books of the OT the locust is sometimes used figuratively to denote smallness (Nu 13³³, Is 40²²), lightness (Ee 12⁵, but the passage is obscure and in dispute), and great numbers (Jg 6⁹ 7¹², Jer 46²³). But, as a rule, when locusts are mentioned, it is usually as an instrument of destruction or as food.

The former of these last two usages is much the more frequent in the OT. Particularly forcible, vivid, and picturesque descriptions of the destructive power of the locust are given in the passages quoted above from Exodus, Joel, Amos, and Nahum. The fear-inspiring character of these insect invaders, as they advance in regular companies (Pr 30²⁷), is in no way exaggerated. Locusts are a veritable plague. We find graphic descriptions in the writings of travellers or residents in the Holy Land, such as Wilson, Tristram, Thomson, Van-Lennep, as well as of other writers in various countries. Their accounts have, among others, been collected by Driver (loc. cit. inf.). Van-Lennep even says of locusts (p. 314) that 'their voracity is such that in the neighbourhood of Broosa, in the year 1856, an infant having been left asleep in its cradle under some shady trees, was found not long after partly devoured by the locusts.' See also the singularly graphic passage in which Thomson relates

* Perhaps one might instance, to prove that the Hebrews had noticed the successive stages of development in the locust, the fact that in Jer 51²⁷ yelek is qualified by קָרָק sāmār (EV 'rough'); this might be understood to apply to the state of the insect before it has the use of its wings (?).

† It is striking to note, in view of these names of serious and even terrible import, that similar insects in Europe (the Locustidae) are tricked out with such innocent names as 'grasshopper' (German, Heuschrecke, from Heu, 'hay,' and the old word scricchan, 'to leap'; in French sauterelle); note also the German Heupferd and the Italian cavaletta, due to the resemblance of the grasshopper's head to a horse's.

his personal experiences (LB ii. p. 296 f.). On a sculptured stone found at Babylon is an exact representation (reproduced in Van-Lennep, l.c.) of two locusts devouring a bush. The present writer has seen on both sides of the Dead Sea, and also in the neighbourhood of Jericho and Gadara, locusts at the various stages of development devastating the country and making all verdure disappear in an instant. He has also been a witness of the efforts of the fellahin, under the direction of the officials of the Turkish Government, to check the advance of the insects by lighting along their track fires fed with petroleum. Another device is to compel the Bedawin, proportionally to the number of members of each family, to bring in a fixed weight of the eggs or larvae of locusts. The wind, which brings the swarms of locusts, also drives them hither and thither (cf. Ps 109²³), and sometimes carries them into the sea (Ex 10¹⁹, J1 2²⁰). One who has read, for example, J1 1-2, or has seen with his own eyes the ravages of the locusts, is not surprised to find in Rev 9³⁻¹¹ this insect playing an apocalyptic part and accomplishing a mission of destruction.

4. Locusts in the Gospels.—But in the Gospels—with which this Dictionary is principally concerned—locusts are never mentioned as devastating insects. In Mt 3⁴ and in the parallel passage Mk 1⁶ they appear only as an article of food. It is in this character, then, that we have chiefly to study them here. The word used is akpis; it is said that John the Baptist fed on 'locusts and wild honey' (see art. HONEY). An ancient tradition of the Christian Church held that the locusts eaten by the Baptist were not insects, but the pods or husks of a tree, the carob or locust tree (Ceratonia siliqua, Arab. Kharrāb). Curiously enough, this old interpretation has been resuscitated in our own times by Cheyne (Encyc. Bibl. ii. cols. 2136, 2499), who sees in the locusts of John the Baptist 'carob-beans,' but for reasons which do not seem to us convincing. In fact, locusts are a well-known food in Eastern countries. Herodotus mentions this (iv. 172); Thomson says (LB ii. p. 301): 'Locusts are not eaten in Syria by any but the Bedawin on the extreme frontier. By the natives, locusts are always spoken of as a very inferior article of food, and regarded by most with disgust—to be eaten only by the very poorest people. John the Baptist, however, was of that class . . . he also dwelt in "the wilderness" or desert, where such food was and is still used.' There are, according to travellers, several ways of preparing locusts for food. 'The Bedouins eat locusts,' says Burekhardt (p. 239), 'which are collected in great quantities in the beginning of April. After having been roasted a little upon the iron plate on which bread is baked, they are dried in the sun, and then put into large sacks, with the mixture of a little salt. They are never served up as a dish, but everyone takes a handful of them when hungry. The peasants of Syria do not eat locusts. . . . There are a few poor fellahs in the Haouran, however, who sometimes, pressed by hunger, make a meal of them; but they break off the head and take out the entrails before they dry them in the sun. The Bedouins swallow them entire.' 'The wings and legs are lopped off the body,' says Wilson (p. 330), 'and fried with salt and pepper.' 'They are roasted and eaten as butter upon loaves of bread,' says Van-Lennep (p. 319), 'resembling shrimps in taste, or they are boiled in water with a little salt, dried in the sun, and, being deprived of their wings and legs, are packed in bags for use. They are beaten to a powder, which is mixed with flour and water, made into little cakes, and used as a substitute for bread when flour is scarce. Dried locusts are generally exposed for sale in the markets of Medina, Bagdad, and even Damascus.

Palgrave goes so far as to say (p. 346), 'Locusts are here an article of food, nay, a dainty, and a good swarm of them is begged of Heaven in Arabia no less fervently than it would be deprecated in India or in Syria. . . . When boiled or fried they are said to be delicious, and boiled and fried accordingly they are to an incredible extent.' It would appear likewise, to judge from Thomson (l.c.), that occasionally dried, boiled, or fried locusts are eaten with honey. Even horses (Blunt, ii. p. 79) and camels (Daumas, p. 258) are fed on locusts.

The Law of Israel, which strictly forbade the eating of creeping things, insects, etc., made an exception in the case of locusts, which are mentioned under four different names, two of which (šol'am and hargol) are found only in this one passage (Lv 11²²). The Law characterizes them in this sentence: 'Yet these may ye eat of all winged creeping things that go upon all four, which have legs above their feet, to leap withal upon the earth.'

1. Ancient use of the term.—The Gr. λόγια is the plural of λόγιον 'a brief utterance,' 'apothegm,' 'saying' (so Schol. ad Aristoph. Ran. 969, 973). According to Liddell-Scott (Lex.) and Meyer (on Ro 3²), λόγιον is the neuter of λόγιος = 'learned,' 'rational,' and hence means 'a wise saying.' More correctly, according to Grimm-Thayer and others, it is a diminutive of λόγος 'word,' like βιβλίον from βιβλος 'book,' plur. τὰ βιβλία 'the (sacred) books,' Eng. 'Bible.' In secular writers (Herodotus, Thucyd., Aristoph., et al.) it is applied to the Divine oracles (because brief utterances), as those of the Sibyl of Dodona, of Delphi, etc. The same connotation of sacred utterances attaches to the use of the word as applied to the Hebrew Scriptures, as by Philo and Josephus. Thus the contents of the OT, as Divine utterances, are called τὰ λόγια τοῦ θεοῦ. In particular the Ten Words (Eng. 'Ten Commandments') are called by Philo τὰ δέκα λόγια (ed. Mangey ii. p. 180ff.). By NT writers the term is applied to the Scriptures generally, as 'oracles' of God, or to individual inspired utterances of prophets, pre-Christian or Christian (Ac 7³⁸, Ro 3², He 5¹², 1 P 4¹¹). In Ecclesiastical writers of the sub-Apostolic age τὰ λόγια τοῦ θεοῦ is used of the admonitions of God in Scripture (Clem. Rom. ad Cor. liii. 1, in parallel with αἱ ἱερὰ γραφαί), and τὰ λόγια τοῦ κυρίου, or simply τὰ λόγια, of the precepts of Jesus, not including embodying narrative. So especially Polycarp ad Phil. vii. 1, denouncing heretics, who 'pervert the precepts of the Lord (τὰ λόγια τοῦ κυρίου) to their own lusts, denying that there is either (bodily) resurrection or (day of) judgment' (cf. Hegesippus ap. Eus. HE ii. xxiii. 9); and Papias (ap. Euseb. HE iii. 39) who interpreted 'the oracles of the Lord' (λόγια κυριακά) in accordance with the tradition of elders who had been followers of the Apostles. In Papias the λόγια are made equivalent to 'the commandments (ἐντολαί) delivered by the Lord to the faith,' and stand in contrast with 'alien commandments' (ἑτερόκριτοι ἐντολαί) of heretical teachers, and the 'foquacity sought by the multitude' (οὐχ ὥσπερ οἱ πολλοὶ τοῖς τὰ πολλὰ λήγουσιν ἔχουσι). The true interpretation of these logia is matter of tradition transmitted through (1) the Apostles, (2) the Elders 'the disciples of these' (οἱ τοῦτον—sc. τῶν τοῦ κυρίου μαθητῶν—μαθηταί [see ARISTON-ARISTO], Iren. Hær. v. 1; οἱ πρώτοι οἱ ἀποστόλων [see ARISTON-ARISTO], Origen ap. Eus.: οἱ διάδοχοι τῶν ἀποστόλων). Compare Polycarp (l.c.), 'Wherefore leaving the vain talk (ματαιότητά) of the multitude and the false teachings (ψευδοδιδασκαλίας), let us turn to the word handed down by tradition from the beginning' (τὸν ἐξ ἀρχῆς ἡμῶν παραδεδωκεν λόγον). At a much later time the term τὰ λόγια is applied to NT Scripture generally in the same sense as to the OT (Ignatius, ad Smyrn. iii. [longer form in the interpolated matter]). See in general Grimm-Thayer, Lexicon, s.v. λόγιον, and Lightfoot, Contemp. Rev. for Aug. 1875, p. 399 ff. On Papias' use see Hall, Papias, 1899, p. 242.

2. The modern use of the term 'logia' is partly (a) conformed to the Patristic application to the precepts of Jesus conceived as 'brief and pithy apothegms' (Justin M. Apol. xiv.) of sacred authority; partly (b) designates a compilation, or compilations, antecedent to or parallel with the canonical Gospels, supposed to have been entitled or called τὰ λόγια; cf. the use of 'Bible' (Lat. Biblia = τὰ βιβλία), to mean 'the (sacred) books' of the Canon.

(a) Of the former (correct) use it is enough to say that science has no better designation for the apothegms of Jesus in the form wherein tradition has transmitted them, whether in the Synoptic Gospels or as uncanonical agrapha. The connotation of sacredness in the designation logion, if we have regard to the later period of transmission, is not inappropriate. The cherished utterances of Jesus soon obtained such currency independently of our Gospels (Ac 20³⁵, Clem. Rom. ad Cor. xiii. 1, xlvii. 7, Polyc. ad Phil. vii. 2) as rightly to deserve it. The term is appropriate therefore to the sacred apothegms of Jesus as preserved in the Synoptic Gospels or independently. As against the simple λόγοι, it is probably a later form involving tacit comparison with the (sacred) precepts of the OT. It is less common than λόγοι, and certainly much less applicable to the discourses of the Fourth Gospel, where, even if traditional logia are embodied, dialogue, the favourite form for philosophic and religious exposition, predominates, and the traditional interest is subordinated to that of expounding the Evangelist's Christology.

(b) The use of 'Logia' or 'the Logia' to designate a certain type of Gospel-composition is open to serious objection. The discovery by Grenfell and Hunt of papyri of the 2nd or 3rd century, in which Sayings attributed to Jesus are agglutinated with no more of narrative framework than the bare words, 'Jesus saith' (λέγει Ἰησοῦς), proves that such compilations actually circulated, fulfilling a function similar to the Pirke Aboth, or 'Sayings of the Fathers' in the contemporary and earlier Synagogue. But the later discovered superscription of the Oxyrhynchus collection itself (published 1904) condemns the editors' hasty application of the title Λόγια Ἰησοῦ to the fragment of 1897, by using the simple λόγοι (οἱ τοιοῦτοι οἱ λόγοι, κ. τ. λ.)* There is, in fact, absolutely no evidence that any book ever received the title λόγια, though there is a certain significance in the use of the word by Papias and Polycarp interchangeably with λόγοι to designate the precepts of Jesus, whether in literary embodiment or otherwise. For Papias these precepts are 'commandments delivered by the Lord to the faith' (ἐντολαὶ τῇ πίστει δεδομένα), and hence comparable with 'the oracles of God committed to Israel' (ἐπιστεύθησαν τὰ λόγια τοῦ θεοῦ, Ro 3²); but he refers to just the same precepts as λόγοι, when in a connected clause he declares that Peter had no ground of making a syntagma of the 'sayings' (οὐχ ὥσπερ σύνταξιν τῶν κυριακῶν ποιούμενος λόγων). Indeed, in all the earlier evidence we possess of the formation of such syntagmata, the expression used is always λόγοι, and never λόγια. Thus, besides the references already given to Acts, Clem. Rom. ad Cor., and Polycarp ad Phil., the Pastoral Epistles have two references to 'wholesome words' (ὀφθαλμοφαντοῦς λόγοι) which are more closely defined as 'sayings of the faith' (λόγοι τῆς πίστεως, cf. Papias, ἐντολαὶ τῇ πίστει δεδομένοι) 'of the excellent teaching,' and even explicitly as 'the sayings of our Lord Jesus Christ' (οἱ λόγοι τῆς πίστεως καὶ τῆς καλῆς διδασκαλίας, οἱ ὑγιαίνοντες λόγοι οἱ τοῦ κυρίου ἡμῶν Ἰησοῦ Χριστοῦ, καὶ ἡ κατ' εὐσέβειαν διδασκαλία, κ.τ.λ., 1 Ti 4⁶ 6³).

* This of course is ungrammatical. The editors propose to delete the first οἱ. Professor Swete prefers to read οὗτοι for οἱ τοιοῦτοι (see ExpT xv. [1904] p. 490).

More important for its bearing on the question of the name to be applied to the Matthaean syntagma are the structural phenomena of the canonical Mt., to be discussed later. At present we note only that, apart from the Markan narrative outline, the main framework of this Gospel consists of five great agglutinated discourses, each marked off by the resumption of the narrative in a stereotyped formula, 'And it came to pass when Jesus had finished these words.' In this formula the expression λόγοι is varied only by the expressions 'parables' and 'directions to the Twelve,' where the context requires (11¹ 13⁵⁰), while the final group concludes: 'And it came to pass when Jesus had finished all these words' (πάντας τοὺς λόγους ποίτους, Mt 26¹), in spite of the fact that the narrative continues: 'he said to his disciples.'

In view of this earlier evidence it is manifestly unwarrantable to infer from the use by Papias of the term λόγια alongside of λόγοι, that 'he refers to three documents, (1) St. Mark's version of St. Peter's teaching, (2) an anonymous collection of Sayings of the Lord, (3) the Logia of St. Matthew' (K. Lake, Hibbert Journ. iii. 2 [Jan. 1905], p. 337). Papias is defining his authority for 'the commandments given by the Lord to the faith.' If he refers to these now, with 1 Ti 4⁶ 6³, as 'sayings,' of which Peter might have made a syntagma but did not, and now, with Polycarp ad Phil. vii., as 'oracles,' of which Matthew did make a syntagma, the difference is only that in the latter embodiment they seemed to him comparable with the 'oracles of God' given to Israel (Ac 7³⁸, Ro 3², He 5¹², 1 P 4¹¹).

The relatively late date of Papias (145-160 A.D.) makes it certain that for him, if not already for Polycarp, τὰ λόγια meant the precepts of Jesus as embodied in narrative Gospels, pre-eminently in canonical Matthew. In later authorities, who take over the tradition, the term is gradually extended to cover the embodying narrative as well, until with Irenæus and Tertullian the Divine utterance is coextensive with the canonical Gospel ('ait Spiritus Sanctus per Matthæum,' applied by Irenæus to utterances of the Evangelist). Whether at a stage anterior to its adoption by Papias the tradition regarding the λόγια had a narrower application, must be settled by a consideration of the expression in its context.

3. Tradition on transmission of the Sayings.—The fragments from the preface (προοίμιον) of Papias' work in five books, entitled Exposition(s?) of the Oracles of the Lord, as given by Eusebius (HE III. xxxix. 2. 16), are closely related to one another, and to the passage already referred to in the Epistle of Polycarp, Papias' earlier contemporary and friend. As regards the 'commandments' which Papias sought to hear and to expound as 'oracles,' the fragment states as a tradition (probably from the same authority, 'John the Elder,' who gave that regarding Mark) that 'Matthew made a compend (συντάξατο, v.l. συνεγράφατο) of the logia in the Hebrew (Aramaic?) tongue, and every man translated them as he was able.' For Papias, and a fortiori for the later authorities who repeat the tradition in partly independent forms, it was a testimony to our canonical Matthew. This to them represented the syntagma of which the tradition spoke, though it was admitted not to be identical with it. That was in 'Hebrew,' this in Greek. Possibly a difference of contents as regards the narrative framework was also recognized, since Papias has no scruple in contradicting Mt 27³⁻¹⁰ (cf. Lightfoot-Harmer, Apost. Fathers, Frgt. xviii.), and Jerome recognizes the independence of what he regarded as the ipsium Hebraicum, and which was in his day 'called by most the authentic Gospel of Matthew,' by translating it anew into both Greek and Latin. Surviving fragments, however, prove this work, the so-called Gospel according to the Hebrews, to have been another and much later product. In Papias' time the Hebrew syntagma had disappeared from use (ἠρμήνευσεν), if ever known in his region; his idea of its relation to canonical Mt. was probably as vague as his successors'. He valued the tradition because it gave him Apostolic authority for the Gospel on which he relies in all known instances for his logia of the Lord (Frgt. xi. ibid. is not related, as Lightfoot supposed, to Lk 10¹⁸, but to Mt 12²²⁻²⁹; see Heads against Caius, Frgt. v., and cf. Apollinaris, Frgt. ii. in Chron. Pasch.). It also gave him a convenient explanation for their variation of form in the Greek Gospels current in his own day (Mt., Lk.); both went back to a common Apostolic original, but were more or less perfectly translated.

4. Criticism of the tradition.—Modern critics attribute great value to the tradition reported by Papias, partly because of its inapplicability to canonical Mt., which shows it to be in his hands an heirloom, not a manufacture; partly because it is independently attested; partly because it seems to be connected internally with the tradition concerning Mark explicitly ascribed to 'the Elder' (John of Jerusalem [d. A.D. 117]), and in that relation becomes both intelligible and historically probable in view of known conditions in the Palestinian Church.

Its inapplicability to canonical Mt. appears in that our Mt. is not a translation, whether from Hebrew or Aramaic; not (strictly) a syntagma of the Oracles; and, as concerns derivation from immediate 'followers of the Lord,' less authentic in its 'order' than Mk., since practically its entire historical outline is borrowed from our Second Gospel with arbitrary alteration (in chs. 1-14) of the order (see the Introductions to NT). The tradition is also attested, however, by Pantæus (ap. Eus. HE v. x. 3), Irenæus, Origen, Cyril of Jerusalem, Eusebius, Chrysostom, Theophylact, Jerome, Augustine, and Euthymius Zigabenus. Not all of these can have derived all their data from Papias, so that the tradition cannot be his invention, although he clearly adapts it to his own use (cf. ὡς ἔφη in the Mk. fragment, referring probably to an inference of his own from 1 P 5¹³ [Eus. HE II. xv. 2. III. xxxix. 16]). Finally, the internal evidence of the tradition itself indicates a close relation to the testimony of 'the Elder' as to Mk., and agrees with known conditions in the Palestinian Church.

(a) Holsten has pointed out (Drei urspr. Evang., ad imit.) that the original motive of the Mark fragment is apologetic and harmonistic. It accounts for the incompleteness and lack of system in Mk. by contrast with some other writing which could be regarded as a complete σύνταξις τῶν κυριακῶν λόγων. No such compendium did Mark make, but only a transcript of certain discourses of Peter, accurate and complete so far as secondary testimony could go, but suffering from the inevitable limitations of one who had been a follower, not of the Lord (like Matthew), but, 'as I (Papias) said, of Peter, afterward.' The result was a mingled account of narratives about Christ, now a saying, now something done (ἡ λεχθέντα, ἡ πραχθέντα), incomplete (ἐνια, ὅσα ἐμνημόνευσε) and without system (οὐ μέντοι τάξει), because Peter's preaching, Mark's only source of knowledge, had brought out the material in such irregular order as the occasion demanded (πρὸς τὴν χρείαν).

Our first concern must be with the motive of this conception of Mk., reserving the question of its historicity. Clearly, while unwilling to reject the narrative Gospel, it contends for the superiority of some other, whose characteristics may easily be inferred from what is denied to its rival. This authority of superior standing in the region whence Papias obtained his traditions (Palestine) emanated from one who had been a follower of the Lord Himself, not (like Mark) of an Apostle. It was more complete, and afforded a systematic, not necessarily chronological, arrangement of the Lord's words (σύνταξιν τῶν τοῦ κυρίου λόγων, συντάξεν τὰ λόγια, οὐ μέντοι τάξει) serviceable to those in search of the 'commandments given by the Lord to the faith.' For, as soon as the general point of view is considered, the real significance of the complaint against Mk., so puzzling to modern critics, and perhaps not clear to Papias himself, becomes intelligible. The deficient τάξις of Mk. is explained by the contrasting statements regarding Peter and Matthew respectively, the former of whom did not aim at a σύνταξιν τῶν κυριακῶν λόγων [v.l. λογίων], whereas the latter actually made such a compend (συνετάξατο [v.l. συνεγράφατο] τὰ λόγια). The two fragments are parts of a single tradition, and the general point of view is that of a church to which the Gospel was primarily a new Torah, wherein the object of system (τάξις) is completeness in presenting 'the commandments given to the faith.' The historian-evangelist's idea of 'order' as chronological sequence in the biography (καθεξῆς Lk 1³) is not that in consideration. In short, the tradition of Papias reflects the attitude of the Palestinian Church towards the rival claims of its own autochthonous Matthaean tradition, and the Petrine or Roman. It aims to adjust the two with recognition of the merits of the latter, while holding to the superiority of the former, just as the appendix to the Fourth Gospel (Jn 21) adjusts the secondary Petrine to its own primary authority, the Johannine (Asiatic).

Looked at thus, from the point of view suggested by its own internal relations, the tradition of Papias becomes not only intelligible but probable. It defines (no doubt correctly) the primary authority for the λόγια κυριακά which Papias proposed to expound in the light of the traditional authorities. If the Gospel of Lk. does not come into Papias' consideration, and Mk. is treated as quite subordinate, it is because the object in view is the ἐντολαί delivered by the Lord, and tradition and Church usage were at one in pointing to Matthew as the fountain-head for such purposes.

Nor does the tradition stand alone in its distinction of syntagma of the Logia of the Lord from Gospels of the Markan type. Ac 1¹ refers to its author's 'former treatise' as relating what 'Jesus began both to do and to teach' (ποιεῖν τε καὶ διδάσκειν), thereby properly classing Lk. with Mk. and similar Gospels made up of 'both works and teachings' (ἢ λεχθέντα ἢ πραχθέντα). Moreover, the implied distinction from syntagma of the Sayings is precisely what we should expect in a church whose institutions and traditions were almost invariably based on the practice of the Synagogue. The teaching of the Synagogue was divided into (1) Halacha, i.e. 'the Way,' authoritative applications of the Mosaic law, precepts of life, and (2) Haggada, i.e. 'tales,' unauthoritative preaching, based mainly on OT narrative. Just so in the primitive Palestinian Church we soon find two types of Gospel composition—(1) the catechetical, for the converted, generally connected with the name of Matthew. Then (2) the evangelistic, for the unconverted, similarly associated with the name of Peter. To the latter type would belong the 'testimony of the cross' (τὸ μαρτύριον τοῦ σταυροῦ) rejected by the opponents of Polycarp (l.c.); to the former not only the 'Sayings of the faith' or 'of the Lord Jesus' (1 Ti 4⁶ 6³) compiled by Matthew and others, but examples of Christian catechesis, such as the little manuals of ethics or 'teachings of baptisms' which survive to us under such titles as 'the Two Ways,' or the 'Teaching' (Διδαχή, Διδασκαλία) of the Apostles. These were primarily of Jewish origin, and were intended for the instruction of neophytes and catechumens. Such writings, on the other hand, as the Preaching of Peter, of the apologetic or evangelistic type, are clearly addressed to the unconverted, and if we go back to the examples furnished in Acts of this evangelistic preaching, still attributed to 'Peter,' we may identify the already stereotyped outline of Synoptic story in Ac 10³⁸⁻⁴¹, the so-called 'lesser Gospel of Mark.' Long ago the resemblance of this Synoptic outline to the haggadic type was observed by Jewish scholars such as Wünsche and Hirsch. Both types accordingly were current in the Palestinian Church. We might, in fact, presuppose it from the nature of the situation. But both would not there be equally esteemed. The indigenous product, adapted to the requirements of a church more given to the perpetuation than to the propagation of the gospel, a church where Jesus was pre-eminently the 'Prophet like unto Moses,' giver of 'the perfect law of liberty,' would be the authoritative syntagma of the Lord's Sayings, halachic in the fundamental sense of the term. The Greek version of the Preaching of Peter, imported probably from Rome, would be received; but it would stand upon the lower footing of haggadic narrative. The lateness of the combination is attested not only by the reluctance manifest in the tradition, but by the fact that when Mk. was added to the Matthaean syntagma, the editor had so little else to add.

The correspondence of Papias' tradition of the Matthaean syntagma with known Palestinian conditions is strongly confirmatory both of the tradition itself and of that interpretation of it which emphasizes the distinction between catechetical works and Gospels of the evangelistic type. It is characteristic of the Gospels which continued to circulate in Palestine independently of the canonical four so late as the time of Jerome and Epiphanius, that, while they conflate material drawn from the Greek Gospels with their own, they continue to represent their tradition in all cases as delivered by the Apostle Matthew (Preuschen, Antilegomena, Frgs. 2. 3. 12 of Ev. Hebr. and 6 of Ev. Naz.).

(b) The internal evidence of our Synoptic Gospels is the decisive factor in the question of the historicity and meaning of the tradition. Here we have only to subtract the material coincident with Mk. from Mt. and Lk. respectively, to see that what is left is in Lk. to a great extent, in Mt. almost exclusively, a mass of discourse-material, much of it reproduced in common by the two. So convincing is this general result of an application of the representations of early tradition to the actual structure of our Synoptic Gospels, that since the time of Schleiermacher the so-called 'two-document' theory of the Synoptic Gospels, which rests upon it, has won wider and wider assent, and is to-day in its general outline an almost universally accepted canon of criticism (see art. GOSPELS). Synoptic tradition consists in the main of the Markan story, filled out and expanded by masses of discourse-material which are otherwise almost devoid of historical setting.

But there is a great and significant difference in result when the subtraction is made from Mt. and when it is made from Luke. Subtract Mk. from Mt. and the narrative material which remains is exceedingly meagre in amount, somewhat apocryphal in character, and unconnected with any other source. It includes the Genealogy and Birth-stories (chs. 1, 2), Peter's walking on the sea (14²⁸⁻³¹), the stater in the fish's mouth (17²⁴⁻²⁷), and a few traits in the story of the Passion and Resurrection—the suicide of Judas (27³⁻¹³), Pilate's wife's dream, and his washing of his hands (vv. 10-24), the earthquake (vv. 51-53), watch at the tomb (vv. 62-66 28¹¹⁻¹⁵), and appearance to the women and to the Eleven in Galilee (28^{9-10, 16-20}). A few other apparent Matthean additions to the narrative of Mk. are illusive. The story of the centurion's son (8^{5-10, 13}) is the one great exception in character and attestation, being shared not only by Lk. (7²⁻¹⁰), but even by Jn. (4⁴⁶⁻⁵⁴). The real surplus of Mt. over Mk. consists pre-eminently in great aggregations of discourse-material, grouped in the five principal masses already referred to. These groups of agglutinated λόγοι consist of (1) the Sermon on the Mount (chs. 5-7), showing the new Way of Righteousness; (2) the Mission of the Disciples (ch. 10), showing the duty of Witness-bearing; (3) the Parables (ch. 13), treated as fulfilling the Scripture Is 6⁹⁷ against a generation which had rejected both the Baptist and Christ; (4) Rules of conduct towards brethren in 'the church' (ch. 18); (5) Warnings of the Judgment (ch. 25) attached to the eschatological chapter (24) parallel to Mk 13. Each of the five groups is marked off by the formula καὶ ἐγένετο ὅτε ἐτέλεσεν ὁ Ἰησοῦς, κ.τ.λ., where the narrative is resumed; but groups (3) and (5) are enlarged by prefixing the two denunciatory sections (chs. 11-12 and 23), which are unaccompanied by the formula, and expand the total number of discourses to seven (cf. the seven parables of ch. 13, seven woes of ch. 23, seven petitions of the Lord's Prayer expanded from five of Lk.). Thus our First Gospel, minus the Markan biographic outline and the few late narrative accretions, really consists of a systematic compendium of the teachings of the Lord, once framed in the favourite pentad structure of Torah, Psalm-book, and the Christian Διδαχὴ, but later expanded to a sevenfold form.

The same process applied to Lk. yields a very different but equally enlightening result. The subtraction of Mk. leaves a much more considerable narrative element, including, besides the Centurion's Son, a whole series of incidents elsewhere unknown, of kindred animus. Such are the Penitent Harlot and Penitent Thief, Zacchæus, the Ministering Women, the Samaritan Leper, the Crooked Woman, the Widow of Nain. But more important than the new incidents is a series of parables and teachings in the same vein, of which the Prodigal Son, Good Samaritan, Rich Man and Lazarus, Pharisee and Publican, are examples. The so-called Infancy chapters of Luke show the same favour towards the lowly, and partake otherwise to so high a degree of the linguistic and stylistic peculiarities of this material, that we must either suppose Luke to have had at command a 'special source' equally abundant in narrative and discourse-material, and characterized by the humanitarian interest so manifest here, or else ascribe to him an extremely one-sided selection from a much more copious stream of tradition than would seem probable from Matthew and Mark. Thus the great outstanding difference in structure between the non-Markan element in Mt. and in Lk. is that in the former it is almost exclusively the λόγοι, arranged in groups as such; whereas in Lk. the logian material does not stand apart from narrative, but is connected with and framed into a narrative independent of Mk. and found in no other Gospel. Moreover, the combination of discourse with narrative in Lk. is not, as sometimes stated, a mere adaptation by the Evangelist of logian material to narrative settings of his own composition. There are examples (14¹⁻⁷) of such fictitious settings, but who would dream of so describing the incident of the Repentant Harlot (Lk 7³⁶⁻⁵⁰), which-forms the setting of the parable of the Two Debtors? No explanation will here suffice but an admission that narrative and discourse have come down together from the earliest and most authentic sources. The same conclusion must be reached when the relation of this 'pre-canonical Luke' to Mk. and to the added sections of Mt. (11 f. and 23) is studied (see art. WISDOM). Priority will be found to belong in both cases to the Lukan source.

Luke's distribution of his discourse-material under various heads of narrative description, and his disposition of the non-Markan material at various points of a shorter and longer journey (Lk 6^{12-8³ 9⁵¹-18¹⁴}), indicate in what sense we should take his proposal to write 'in order' (καθεξῆς, 13). He aims, like the historian that he is, at chronological sequence; but certainly not without some better authority than his own conjecture. For while his discourse-material is sometimes without true connexion, it has a basis of order which indicates that, in the region whence this Gospel is derived, narrative and teaching had been combined at a much earlier time and with better resources than in our Matthew.

Critics who have attempted to reconstruct the Logia from Mt. and Lk. have unfortunately neglected this fundamental distinction, reconstructing their ultimate source, without regard for the difference in type (with Mt 28²⁰ cf. Lk 1⁴, Ac 1¹), from the mere coincidence of Mt. and Lk. in a certain part of the discourse-material. This ultimate source, however, cannot be reached from the side of Lk. without first taking account of the so-called 'special source' from which some elements seem to have passed into Mt. (e.g. 37-12 41-11 619-34 85-10 111-27), and can even be shown with great probability to have affected canonical Mk. (With Mk 12²⁻⁵¹, cf. Lk 7^{24-27, 33f.}; with Mk 1¹³, Lk 4²⁻¹²; with Mk 2¹⁻²², Lk 7^{33f.}; with Mk 3²²⁻³⁰, Lk 11¹⁴⁻²²; with Mk 7¹⁻²³, Lk 11³⁷⁻⁵⁴). Comparison with Mt. will in all these cases prove dependence by Mk. upon the source more fully recoverable from Mt. and Lk.). But the elements most naturally to be sought in a purely logian common source, such as the Sermon on the Mount and the Parables, display a very different degree of resemblance in Mt. and Lk. respectively. Instead of the exact verbal identity of long sentences in the sections outside the Matthean pentad, there is within it for the most part an extreme divergence from the Lukan parallels. In general it would be difficult, if not impossible, to prove from this material any direct acquaintance with the Logia on the part of our Third Evangelist.

5. Conjectural reconstructions of the source.—Lost works have nevertheless been so frequently reconstructed in modern times by process of extraction from later documents into which they had been independently incorporated, as to offer a standing challenge in this supreme instance of the Matthean Logia. If Krawutzky (to cite a single example) could reconstruct the Teaching of the Twelve from the Apostolic Constitutions and Apostolic Epitome, in advance of its discovery by Bryennios, why should not our First and Third Gospels yield up out of their common discourse-material the substance of the lost Logia? There have been thus far but two notable attempts to meet this challenge. Wendt's Lehre Jesu (1886) presents in the first (untranslated) volume the author's attempted reconstruction from Mt. and Lk. of the (Greek) Logia of Matthew. Unfortunately no account is taken of the third factor, Luke's 'special source,' which certainly afforded much discourse-material not likely to have been connected with the Matthaean Logia, and may even have contained all that Luke shares with Matthew. Equally unfortunate was the failure to distinguish the difference in point of view between a 'syn-tagma of the Lord's commandments' in which 'order' must be topical, and a διήγησις καθεξής such as Luke's, where the λόγοι are λόγοι τῆς χάριτος (Lk 4²²) illustrative of the message of the Divine wisdom. The problem must not be treated as if a mere question of arithmetic: Elements common to Mt. and Lk., minus Mk.=the Logia. As a pioneer in the field, Wendt deserves credit for his work, but a process so simple could not be expected to solve so complicated a problem. Wendt himself could find no place for a non-Markan διήγησις such as the Centurion's Son, Lk 7²⁻¹⁰=Mt 8⁵⁻¹³=Jn 4⁴⁶⁻⁵⁴, which could not naturally be connected with the Matthaean Logia, but falls into place at once when account is taken of its relation to the Lukan context. Wendt's results were not unjustly pronounced 'a heap of interesting ruins, without beginning, without conclusion, without connexion' (Resch).

A much more elaborate and detailed analysis is that of Alfred Resch, Die Logia Jesu nach dem griechischen und hebräischen Text wiederhergestellt, Leipzig, 1898 (Hebrew text separately לְשׁוֹן מַתְתִּיָּא: דִּבְרֵי יֵשׁוּעַ בְּרֵךְ יְהוָה: רַבֵּי יֵשׁוּעַ הַמְּדִינָה: תַּא לֹגְיָא יֵשׁוּעַ). Here the attempt is made to restore the original Apostolic source not only in the Greek form assumed to be utilized in common by Mt. and Lk., but to retranslate into the Hebrew (sic) assumed to have been employed by the Apostle as the classical religious language in preference to the colloquial Aramaic spoken by Jesus Himself. Resch brings to his task an immense amount of learning and patience, especially in the accumulation of all possible (and many impossible) traces of extra-canonical logia. Unfortunately the process is again vitiated, not only by an extremely indiscriminate use of unsifted material, but by highly uncritical assumptions. Of these one of the most fatal is that the order of Lk. must be nearest that of the Logia because, in Resch's judgment, nearest the historical; while another, wherein may be traced the influence of B. Weiss, attributes to the Logia the features of a narrative-Gospel. As will be apparent from our criticism of the tradition, and criticism of canonical Mt., all the evidence we possess should commend precisely the reverse principle. The Apostolic syn-tagma of Matthew was not a narrative, and cannot have had a historian's order, and the structure of Mt. and Lk. respectively shows that in the one case the halachic, in the other the haggadic, principle was predominant from the first. On the other hand, Resch's gathering of the material was indispensable. His renewed consideration of the careful and scrupulous work of B. Weiss (Matthäusevangelium, 1876; Markusevangelium, 1872) looking toward an Apostolic(?) source utilized in common by these Gospels, did better justice to another factor not to be neglected, namely, use of the Logia (?) in Mk.; and his tracing of the tradition of Matthaean authorship to a direct claim embodied in at least one of the early Palestinian Gospels (Ev. Naz. Fig. 6 [Preusch.] σὲ τὸν Ματθαῖον), are contributions of permanent service. The experience of both Wendt and Resch, however, should warn against indiscriminate combination of Mt. and Lk., without regard for the structural evidence of the Gospels as we have them, or even for the avowed purpose of the Third Evangelist himself.

Besides Wendt and Resch, mention should be made of the disposition of material in the Greek Synopticon of A. Wright, who devotes Division 2 of his presentation to material supposedly derived from the Logia of Matthew. The arbitrariness of the dealing with the Lukan material is amply demonstrated by the two supplementary divisions which follow. The work is unfortunately affected by inadmissible presuppositions regarding oral tradition.

6. Conclusions.—These may be briefly summarized in the following outline:—

(1) The term logia was applied to the Sayings of Jesus early in the 2nd century by those who held them as Divine utterances, but not as displacing the earlier λόγοι.

(2) The same individuals report a tradition of Palestinian derivation which contrasts the Markan type of Gospel with another, of Matthaean origin, consisting of syn-tagmata of the Sayings.

(3) Our present representative of the Matthaean tradition, disembarassed of its Markan framework, displays this type-form, combining the teaching of Jesus in five agglutinations of Christian precepts corresponding to the five books of the Torah.

(4) Our Third Evangelist presents the discourse-material which he holds in common with Mt. from the historical point of view, and seems to have received it in a collection wherein narrative and discourse were intermingled from the first, the agglutination being effected with an eye to illustrate Jesus' mission of grace rather than to form a new Torah (see art. WISDOM).

(5) If the actual work of the Apostle Matthew (Matthias?) be not too remote for recovery, it should be sought primarily in, or rather under, the accumulated aggregations of logian material in the five discourse groups of our First Gospel, with secondary comparison of the added groups (chs. 3 f. 11 f. 23) which have special affinity by language and content with Lk., together with the rest of the Lukan material. It is not probable that the Matthaean syn-tagma can have been lost in any other way than through superimposition of new material. To extricate it from the mass of superimposed accretion is a task which still challenges the utmost skill of the critic.

LOGOS.—The conception of Christ as the Logos, or eternal Word, is peculiar to the Fourth Gospel. In the Epp. to Colossians and Hebrews (writings which are likewise touched with the Alexandrian influence) the Logos theory of Christ's Person is in some points implied (cf. Col 1¹⁵⁻¹⁸, He 1²⁻⁴). In Revelation (19¹³) the 'Word of God' is announced as the new and mysterious name which Christ bears when He comes forth to execute judgment. But only in the Fourth Gospel is the conception deliberately adopted and worked out in its full significance.

The idea of a Logos, an immanent Divine reason in the world, is one that meets us under various modifications in many ancient systems of thought, Indian, Egyptian, Persian. In view of the religious syncretism which prevailed in the 1st and 2nd centuries, it is barely possible that these extraneous theologies may have indirectly influenced the Evangelist; but there can be no doubt in regard to the main source from which his Logos doctrine was derived. It had come to him through Philo after its final elaboration in Greek philosophy.

In the 6th cent. B. C. Heraclitus first broke away from the purely physical conceptions of early Greek speculation, by discovering a λόγος, a principle of reason, at work in the cosmic process. From the obscure fragments of this philosopher that have come down to us we gather that he was chiefly interested in accounting for the æsthetic order of the visible universe. In the arrangement of natural phenomena, in the adaptation of means to ends, he discerned the working of a power analogous to the reasoning power in man. His speculation was still entangled with the physical hypotheses of earlier times, and on this account dropped out of sight, and had little influence on the greater systems of Greek thought. Plato and Aristotle were engaged in the development of the theory of ideas, with its absolute separation of the material world from the world of higher reality. Their work was of profound significance for the after history of Logos speculation, but belongs itself to a different philosophical movement. It was in the reaction from Platonic dualism that the Logos idea again asserted itself, and was worked out through all its implications in Stoicism.

The Stoics, animated chiefly by a practical interest, sought to connect the world of true being, as conceived by Plato, with the actual world of man's existence. They abandoned the theory of supersensible archetypes and fell back on the simpler hypothesis of Heraclitus, that the universe is pervaded in all its parts by an eternal Reason. Man in his individual life may raise himself above all that limits him, and realize his identity with this Logos, which resides in his own soul, and is also the governing principle of the world. The Stoic philosophy not only furnished the general conception of the Logos to later thinkers, but also emphasized the distinction which became of prime importance in the later development. The faculty of reason as it exists in man reveals itself in speech, which is denoted by the same Greek word, λόγος. To the universal λόγος Stoicism ascribed the two attributes that mark the reasoning power in man. On the one hand it is λόγος ἀδιάθετος,—reason in its inner movement and potentiality,—and on the other hand λόγος προφορικός,—reason projected and made concrete in the endless variety of the visible world.

1. Philo appropriates the main Stoic conception, but combines it with other elements borrowed eclectically from previous systems of thought. The Logos idea is loosened from its connexion with Stoic materialism and harmonized with a thoroughgoing Platonism, which regards the visible things as only the types and shadows of realities laid up in the higher world. It becomes identical in great measure with Plato's idea of the Good, except that it is further regarded as creatively active. Philo's grand innovation, however, is to press the Logos theory into the service of a theology derived from the OT. The same problem which Stoicism had tried to solve had in a different manner become urgent in Jewish thought. Here also all progress, alike in the moral and intellectual life, was like to be arrested by an overstrained dualism. The effort to conceive of God as absolutely transcendent had resulted in separating Him entirely from the world, of which He had yet to be regarded as the Creator and Governor. Already in the later books of the OT, much more in Rabbinical speculation, we can trace the idea of an intermediary between God and the world. 'Wisdom' is described in Job and Proverbs, with something more than a poetical personification, as God's agent and co-worker. Peculiar significance was attached by the later expositors to the various OT allusions to the 'word' of God. By His 'word' He had created heaven and earth and revealed Himself to the prophets. The actual hypostatizing of the Word in the doctrine of the Memra was subsequent to the time of Philo, but it was the outcome of a mode of thinking already prevalent in Jewish theology. God who was Himself the High and Holy One, of purer eyes than to behold iniquity, mediated His action through the Divine Word. It was natural for Philo, with his Hellenic and philosophical culture, to advance a step further and identify the Word of the OT with the Stoic λόγος.

The Logos of Philo requires to be understood in the light of this double descent from Greek and OT thought. The Stoic conception, as we have seen, took account of the two meanings of λόγος as reason and uttered speech, but the distinction was of little practical importance. What the Greek thinkers sought to affirm was the rationality of the world. The Logos under all its aspects was simply the principle of reason, informing the endless variety of things, and so maintaining the world-order. To Philo, on the other hand, the idea of reason is combined with that of the outgoing of Divine power. While describing his Logos in terms directly borrowed from Plato and the Stoics, he regards it as in the last resort dynamic, like the creative word in Genesis. This difference between Philo and the Greek thinkers is connected with another and still more vital one. To the Stoics the eternal Reason was itself an ultimate principle, and the necessity was not felt of explaining it as the reason of God. The doctrine of the Logos may, indeed, be regarded as an attempt, more or less conscious, to escape from the belief in a Divine Creator. Philo could not content himself with this notion of an absolute Logos. He started from the Hebrew belief in a supreme, self-existing God, to whom the immanent reason of the world must be related and subordinated. To this clashing of the primary Greek conception with the demands of Hebrew monotheism, we may largely attribute one of the most perplexing peculiarities of the Philonic doctrine. The Logos appears, sometimes as only an aspect of the activity of God, at other times as a 'second God,' an independent and, it might seem, a personal being. There can be little doubt that Philo, who never ceased to be an orthodox Jew, had no intention of maintaining the existence of two Divine agents; and the passages in which he appears to detach and personify the Logos must be explained mainly in a figurative sense. The Word which is described as speaking, acting, creating of itself, is the word of God, vividly realized by an imaginative thinker. But this separate existence assigned to the Logos may also be set down in some measure to the composite origin of the idea. The Stoical doctrine of an independent Reason could not be wholly reconciled with the Jewish belief in one supreme God.

2. The Fourth Gospel sets out from a conception of the Logos which to all appearance is closely similar to that of Philo. In the Prologue the main features of the Philonic doctrine are reproduced one by one;—the eternal existence of the Word, its Divine character (ἦν θεός), its relation to God as towards Him, and yet distinct (πρὸς τὸν θεόν), its creative activity, its function in the illumination and deliverance of men. The Evangelist assumes that the idea of the Logos is already a familiar one in Christian theology. It is introduced abruptly, as requiring no explanation, and its different aspects are lightly indicated, by way of reminding the reader of truths sufficiently known to him. We can thus infer that the conception of Philo had already naturalized itself in Christian thought, but there is reason to believe that the author of the Gospel was acquainted more or less directly with the Philonic writings and consciously derived from them.*

To what extent does the Logos idea of Philo change its character as it assimilates itself to the theology of the Gospel? Before an answer can be offered to this question, it is necessary to consider a preliminary difficulty with which Johannine criticism has been largely occupied since the appearance of Harnack's famous pamphlet.* Is the Prologue to be regarded as an integral portion of the Gospel, or is it, as Harnack contends, a mere preface written to conciliate the interest of a philosophical public? The idea of Christ as the Divine Logos is nowhere resumed in the body of the Gospel. Although the term Logos is constantly used, it always bears its ordinary sense of spoken discourse, while the categories of Light, Life, Love are substituted for the Logos of the Prologue. The work, as we have it, is no metaphysical treatise, such as we might expect from the opening verses, if they truly set forth its programme, but a historical document, the narrative of the earthly life of Christ. In spite, however, of Harnack's powerful argument, the almost unanimous voice of Johannine criticism has declared against him. The statement of his view has led to a closer examination of the Prologue in its connexion with the Gospel, resulting in multiplied proof that the ideas presented at the outset are woven in with the whole tissue of the work. The Prologue supplies the background, the atmosphere, which are necessary to a right contemplation of the history. Nevertheless, while Harnack's main argument cannot be accepted, it serves to remind us of one fact which cannot be emphasized too much. St. John is not concerned merely with the Word, but with the Word made flesh. After the first few verses, in which he treats of the pre-existent Logos, he passes to the historical Person of Jesus, who is more than the abstract Word. In Him it had become visible, and acted on men through a human Personality.

St. John therefore accepts the Philonic conception in order to assimilate it to his account of a historical Person, through whom the Word declared itself under the conditions of human life. It is evident that the conception could not be so adapted without submitting to profound modifications. (1) The Logos, which was to clothe itself in flesh and act on men with the force of a personality, must in its deepest ground be a personal Being. We have seen that Philo, partly in imaginative fashion, partly because of the composite origin of his thought, attributes a semi-independence to the Logos. This prepared the way for a complete personification; but Philo himself thinks only of a Divine principle, the creative reason of God. St. John, however, makes it an essential moment in his conception that the Logos has a ground of independent being within God (πρὸς τὸν θεόν, standing over against Him as a distinct Being). His view even of the pre-existent Logos is coloured by his knowledge of the ultimate Incarnation. (2) The creative activity of the Logos, which in Philo is central and all-determining, falls into the background. Only in 1³ ('All things were made by him') do we have any clear trace of this aspect of Logos doctrine, and the sequence of thought would still be complete if the brief allusion were omitted. It is thrown out, apparently, by way of acknowledgment of the recognized theory. Some reference to the cosmic significance of the Logos was necessary if any link with previous speculation was to be preserved. The Gospel, in point of fact, knows nothing of the absolute transcendence of God, which Philo's whole theory is designed to mitigate. It assumes that 'the world' is the direct object of God's love and providence (3¹⁶). It maintains that God acts immediately on the human soul and so makes possible the redeeming work of the Logos (6⁴ 17⁶). (3) In the Gospel, much more emphatically than in Philo, the term λόγος denotes Word as well as Reason. The Greek philosophical meaning is, indeed, discarded, or retained only as a faintly colouring element. The Word is regarded throughout as the expression of God's will and power, the self-revelation of His inward nature. It does not represent the Divine reason but the Divine energy. Its sovereign attribute is Life, the life which it derives from God and transmits to men. Under the form of Alexandrian speculation St. John preserves the essential Hebrew conception of the living, quickening Word.

Thus, in accepting the Philonic idea, St. John does not commit himself to the precise interpretation that Philo placed on it; on the contrary, whether consciously or not, he departs from the characteristic lines of Philo's thinking. The differences, however, do not alter the main fact that he rested his account of the Christian revelation on a hypothesis which was metaphysical rather than religious. The Jesus who had appeared in history was identified with the Logos of philosophy, and this identification involved an entirely new reading of His Person and life. St. John does not, indeed, press to its full extent his theory that the Logos became manifest in Christ. Behind his speculation there is always the remembrance of the actual life, which had arrested him as it had done the first disciples, and been to him the true revelation of God. His worship is directed in the last resort not to the Logos whom he discovers in Jesus, but to Jesus Himself. Nevertheless the acceptance of the Logos idea imposes on him a mode of thought which is often alien to his deeper religious instinct. On the one hand, he conceives of Jesus as revealing God to men and lifting them to a higher life by His ethical personality. On the other hand, he is compelled to interpret the work of Jesus in terms of metaphysic. God was manifest in Him because He was Himself the Logos, and the life He imparted was the Divine life, different in essence from that of man. The Gospel wavers throughout between these two parallel interpretations of the life of Christ,—that suggested by the history and that required by the Logos hypothesis. Superficially the two conceptions are drawn together, but they are disparate by their very nature and will not admit of a true reconciliation.

St. John does not concern himself with the questions that arose in later theology regarding the nature of the union between the Logos and the human Jesus. He assumes the union as a fact incapable of further definition. 'The Word became flesh,' appeared in Jesus as a human personality. How and when this Incarnation was effected, to what extent the Divine nature in Christ could be distinguished from the human,—these are questions which he does not try to answer, and which he probably never asked himself. His silence is mainly to be explained by the practical intention with which he wrote his Gospel. It was not his purpose to discuss the Divinity of Christ as a theological idea, but to impress it on his readers as a fact, by the knowledge of which 'they might have life' (20³¹). At the same time, the problems which came to light in the course of later controversy are all legitimately suggested by the simple thesis 'the Word became flesh.' From St. John's silence in regard to them we are compelled to infer that he did not reason out his doctrine with any fulness or clearness. He had set himself to combine ideas which in themselves were radically incompatible, and succeeded in doing so only by a certain confusion of thought.

3. The Evangelist, then, sets out from the fact that the historical Jesus was also the Divine Logos. In the body of the Gospel this hypothesis is never directly alluded to, but it is assumed throughout and modifies profoundly the whole picture of the earthly life of Jesus. (1) Peculiar stress is laid on His miracles as the 'signs' by which He 'manifested forth his glory.' The motive of compassion, to which the miracles are for the most part ascribed by the Synoptic writers, falls into the background. They are regarded as sheer exhibitions of power, intended by Jesus to inspire belief in His Divine claims. The marvellous element is uniformly heightened, in such a manner as to preclude all natural explanations. (2) Apart from direct works of miracle, certain attributes are assigned to Jesus which witness to His possession of the Logos nature. He partakes even on earth of the Divine omniscience (1⁴⁸ 2²⁵ 4¹⁷ 11¹⁴). He appears where He will, with something of a Divine omnipresence (6¹⁹ 8²⁹ 9²⁵). There is a majesty about His Person which quells and over-awes (7⁴⁶ 12²¹ 18⁶). An impression is borne home on us in every episode of the history that, while He dwelt with men, He was a heavenly being, who could exercise at will the prerogatives of God. (3) The aloofness of Jesus, as of one who belonged to a different world, is everywhere brought into strong relief. In the Synoptic narratives, what separates Him from other men is His matchless wisdom and moral purity. St. John ascribes to Him a radical difference of nature. He does not participate in human weaknesses and distresses (even His sorrow over Lazarus is that of a Divine being who stands apart and contemplates the tragedy of our mortal lot). In His intercourse with the disciples He is conscious all the time that He has come from God and returns to God (13³ 4). (4) A still more striking emphasis is laid on the absolute freedom, the self-determination of Jesus. While submitting for a time to earthly limitations, He vindicates His higher nature by acting in everything on His own sovereign will, without compulsion from without (2⁴ 6⁵ 6⁷ 7⁶ 11³³). From the beginning He has fixed His 'hour,' and Himself ordains all the conditions that will lead up to it. His enemies are impotent until the hour willed by Himself has come (7³⁰ 8²⁰), and meanwhile He goes about His work in perfect security (11⁹). In this well-marked strain of Johannine thought we have little difficulty in discerning the influence of the Logos idea, penetrating the actual reminiscence of the life of Christ. (5) The Logos character of Jesus, which is thus illustrated on various sides by His actions, comes to clear expression in His spoken words. These are concerned almost wholly with the assertion, under many different types and forms, of the Divine significance of the Speaker Himself. Hence the peculiar value which is ascribed to them (6⁶³ 68 15³). They convey more clearly and emphatically than actions could do the inner secret of our Lord's personality. Being Himself the Logos, one in essence with God, He had power to impart the higher life (see WORD).

In all these directions, therefore, St. John gives effect to the idea of the Prologue that the nature of Christ was a Logos nature. His acceptance of this doctrine involves him in a new reading of the Gospel history—a reading which in some respects is artificial and inadequate. The life of Jesus becomes that of a heavenly being, and all traces of moral struggle (as in the Temptation and the Agony) disappear from it. The attributes of faith in God and infinite sympathy with men are replaced by metaphysical attributes, which are supposed to belong more essentially to the Divine nature. Jesus is the revelation of God because He is the eternal Logos, who manifests in an earthly life the absolute being and self-dependence of God. This, however, is to divest the revelation of its real worth and meaning. What we desire to know and what was actually revealed to us in the life of Jesus, is the moral character of God, and of this the Logos doctrine can render no account. In so far as the Fourth Evangelist has subordinated his conception of Christ to a philosophical speculation, we cannot but feel that he defeats his own purpose. He desires so to assert the majesty of Christ that men may be drawn to believe in Him as the Son of God, and enter into life-giving fellowship with Him. But in the endeavour to exalt the Lord's Person by means of the Logos hypothesis, he obscures those very elements in the Divine life which constitute its true glory.

4. It is necessary at the same time to recognize that much was gained for Christian theology by the adoption of this hypothesis. (1) A middle term was discovered between Christianity and the forms of Hellenic thought, and a wider development was thus rendered possible. The new religion could now interpret itself to the Græco-Roman world, and assimilate whatever was congenial to its spirit in the intellectual life of the time. With the help of the categories which it henceforth borrowed from Greek philosophy, it was enabled in many ways to convey its message more clearly and adequately. (2) The claim of Christianity to be the absolute religion was definitely formulated in the Logos doctrine. Jesus was identified not merely with the Jewish Messiah, but with the eternal Word who had been with God from the beginning. His revelation was not one out of many, but the supreme and final revelation. This idea is prominent throughout the Prologue, in which the 'true Light' is contrasted with the manifestations of God through John the Baptist and Moses. These, although burning and shining lights, were only 'for a season' (5³⁸). (3) By identifying Him with the Logos, St. John declared, in a manner that could not be mistaken, the uniqueness of Jesus, and assigned Him His central place as the object of Christian faith. The Logos category was in itself insufficient, and tended to confuse Christianity with metaphysical issues which were alien to its real import. But it provided a form within which the innermost truth of the religion could maintain itself for ages following. Jesus Christ in His own Person is the revelation of God, and believing on Him we have life through His name.

5. The vital and permanent message of the Fourth Gospel is little affected by any estimate we may form of the value of the Logos hypothesis. It is evident that, while the Evangelist ostensibly sets out from a philosophical theory, he derives in reality from a religious experience. From the impression created in him by the earthly life of Jesus, still more from the knowledge he had received of Him in inward fellowship, he has arrived at the conviction that this is the Christ, the Son of God. He avails himself of the doctrine of the Logos, the highest that the thought of his time afforded him, in order to express this conviction, and in some measure explain it. But the speculative idea belongs to the form, not to the essence of St. John's teaching. It represents the attempt to interpret, in terms of an inadequate philosophy, a truth which has been grasped by faith. See also art. DIVINITY OF CHRIST, vol. i. p. 478^b.

LONELINESS.—To speak of the isolation of Christ would give a wrong impression as far as the everyday circumstances of His life are concerned. He was most often either in crowds, teaching and healing, or else seeking loneliness without success; He was lonely in the same sense as that in which Nazareth and Syria were lonely—placed close to the world's highways, yet living a life of their own (cf. G. A. Smith, HGHL, p. 432; Edersheim, Life and Times of Messiah, i. 147). We may notice four aspects of what may be called the loneliness of Christ.

1. Solitude for the purposes of prayer, meditation, and rest. The outstanding instances are—the Temptation in the Wilderness (Mt 4¹, Mk 1¹², Lk 4²), the retirement after the excitement consequent on the feeding of the five thousand (Mt 14²², Mk 6⁴⁵; cf. Jn 6¹⁵), and the retirement for prayer, soon interrupted (Mk 1³⁵; cf. also Lk 6¹², and 9¹⁸ where Mk 8²⁷ has 'in the way he asked his disciples'). It should be noted that at times of peculiar spiritual intensity Jesus withdrew from the other disciples, but kept by Him Peter and the sons of Zebedee, as at the Transfiguration (Mt 17¹, Mk 9², Lk 9²⁸), at the raising of Jairus' daughter (Mk 5³⁷), and at Gethsemane (Mt 26³⁷—'wath with me,'—Mk 14³⁵, Lk 22⁴³).

2. Retirement from possible persecution, or from unwished for notoriety: e.g. after the death of John the Baptist (Mt 14¹²; in Mk 6¹¹ this retirement immediately follows the return of the Twelve); from the opposition of the Pharisees (Mt 16¹³, Mk 8²⁷, Lk 9¹⁸; also Mt 15²¹, Mk 7²⁴). Similarly, He was extremely anxious that His miracles should not become known (Lk 5⁴³, Mt 8⁴, Mk 8²⁶ 9⁹); the chief exception, where there were special reasons, is in Mk 5¹⁹. The opposite reason for solitude and concealment is given in Jn 6¹⁵ ('perceiving that they were about to come and take him by force, to make him king'). On the other hand, it must be remembered that (a) Jesus was constantly accompanied, at least in Galilee and at the end in Jerusalem, by twelve friends and disciples specially appointed (Mt 10², Mk 3¹⁶, Lk 10¹ imply a larger circle from which to draw); to these we must add a number of women (Lk 8³; cf. Mt 27⁵⁵, Mk 15⁴⁰, Lk 23⁴⁹). In connexion with the visits to Jerusalem recounted in the Fourth Gospel, the disciples are hardly mentioned; Jn 7¹⁰, coupled with the absence of reference to the disciples in chs. 7 to 10, seems to make it certain that Jesus was alone; we find the disciples with Him again in Jn 11¹⁶. (b) In the earlier part of His ministry Jesus was constantly inconvenienced by the thronging of the vast crowds drawn to His side (cf. Mt 4²³ 8¹⁸ 9³⁵, Mk 1³⁷, Lk 4⁴² 12¹; see Swete, St. Mark, p. lxxx); in the last visit to Jerusalem He sought retirement at night by leaving the city either for Bethany or the Mount of Olives (Mt 21¹⁷, Mk 11¹⁹, Lk 21³⁷). (c) His conduct was social enough—as distinct from that of John and of the Essenes—to give rise to the slanders about 'a gluttonous man and a winebibber' (Mt 11¹⁹, Lk 7³⁴); He went to the marriage at Cana (Jn 2¹); He was found at the feast in Simon's house (Mt 26⁶, Mk 14³, also Lk 7³⁶); with Matthew (Mt 9¹⁰, Lk 5²⁹), and Zacchæus (Lk 19⁶); and contrasted Himself with John as one who 'comes eating and drinking' (Mt 11¹⁹, Lk 7³⁴).

3. The inevitable result of His own attitude. The question in Mt 12⁴⁸ seems to be that of one who wilfully cuts himself off from human ties; as He faced death more nearly, isolation could not but grow on Him (Mt 17¹², Mk 9³⁰, Lk 9²² 44, cf. also Mk 10³²); as early as the feeding of the five thousand, 'many of his disciples went back, and walked no more with him' (Jn 6⁶⁶). The disciples remained with Him till the end, when the arrest proved too much for their loyalty, although we find John, with the women, at the foot of the cross (Jn 19²⁵, 26, Mt 27⁵⁵, Mk 15⁴⁰).

4. The uniqueness of Christ's Person. This is emphasized chiefly in the Fourth Gospel; though that it was soon felt is shown in Lk 5⁸ ('Depart from me; for I am a sinful man, O Lord'); compare the timidity of the disciples in Jn 21¹²; and easily gathered from the manner in which the disciples misunderstood Him and His purposes for themselves (Mt 20²¹, Mk 10³⁷; cf. Lk 9⁵⁴, 55, and Mk 9³², Lk 9⁴⁶ 22²⁴). When Christ speaks of His own nearness to the Father, distance from mankind must naturally follow; see Jn 5^{18ff.} 8¹⁶ 27. 29 10³⁰ 20¹⁷. On the other hand, this special relation of Christ to the Father is one which is, through Christ, to be shared by His disciples (see Jn 10⁴, ch. 17 passim, and 20¹⁷). The extreme of loneliness, as it is heard in the cry upon the cross (Mt 27⁴⁶, Mk 15³⁴, cf. Lk 23⁴⁶, Jn 19³⁰), lasted, it would seem, but for a moment. See DERELICTION.

LONG-SUFFERING (μακροθυμία), like another fruit of the Spirit, love (ἀγάπη), has almost entirely non-pagan connexions. The Gr. word occurs 14 times in the NT, while its cognate verb is found 10 times, and the adverb only once (Ac 26³). Only the verb occurs in the Gospels: Mt 18²⁶, 29 (EV 'have patience'), Lk 18⁷ (AV 'bear long,' RV 'is long-suffering'). It is both a Divine attribute and a Christian virtue. The word 'long-tempered' as opposed to 'short-tempered' is not in ordinary English use, but it expresses with fair accuracy the central thought in μακροθυμία. The Latin equivalent is longanimitas (Vulg.), and Jeremy Taylor amongst others tried to transplant the word into English soil under the form of 'longanimity,' but without success.

OT use.—Long-suffering is one of God's noblest attributes, and is made the subject of a special revelation in Ex 34⁶. The Heb. phrase 'erek 'aph (עֵרֶךְ אָפַי) is found frequently in the books that follow, and Joel (2¹³), Jonah (4²), and Nahum (1³) specially dwell upon this element in God's character.

NT use.—It is significant that the word μακροθυμία is rare in pre-Christian Greek. In the NT it occurs several times in context with ὑπομονή (patience, endurance), from which it must be carefully distinguished (2 Co 6⁴, Col 1¹¹, 2 Ti 3¹⁰, Ja 5¹⁰, 11). Trench (Synonyms) says μακροθυμία is used of persons, and ὑπομονή of things. As regards NT usage alone, this is near the truth (but see Ja 5⁷, and cf. in OT Is 67¹⁵ LXX) and in Apoc. 1 Mac 8⁴). Perhaps we may more truly say that patience keeps a man from breaking down in despair, while long-suffering keeps him from breaking out in word or action because of some unsatisfied desire. This latter distinction is probably the key to several passages where μακροθυμία has been said to approximate to the meaning of ὑπομονή. In He 6¹² 15, for instance, Abraham not only waited patiently for the promise; he did not in heart or word break out into murmurs against God's delay, and this right attitude won him his reward. So in Ja 5⁷ the husbandman without patience would break down with despair, but if his long-suffering gave out he would probably break out into pulling up his tardy plants. Long-suffering, then, is a passive virtue, and waits God's time. It is the exact opposite of hasty action or hurried speech. Nevertheless, it is not carelessness. If God is long-suffering, He waits to give further opportunity for repentance, and this may not be presumed upon without risk (Ro 2⁴ 9²², 1 P 3²⁰, 2 P 3⁹).

1. Christ's long-suffering character.—The word itself is not often used of, or by, Christ Himself, but the virtue which it expresses is frequently exemplified in the Gospels. It was His long toleration of manifest injustice that puzzled John the Baptist (Mt 11³), and there is long-suffering too in His quiet reception of John's complaint (v. 4). In long-suffering He refused to call down fire from heaven on inhospitable Samaritans (Lk 9⁵⁴). It was long-suffering too that made Him yield to arrest without resistance (Mt 26⁵², 53, Ja 5⁶, 7), and refrain from returning scorn for scorn or threat for threat at His trial (Mt 27¹²). And after His ascension we see Him exhibiting the same long-suffering spirit towards those who persecuted the disciples as they had persecuted the Master (1 Ti 1¹⁶, Ac 9⁴; cf. 2 P 3¹⁵).

In His teaching He bids His people be partakers of His own long-suffering character. The tares are not rooted up, but grow together with the wheat until the harvest (Mt 13³⁰). In the parable of the Unmerciful Servant the prayer of that unworthy man was for long-suffering (Mt 18²⁶), but a full pardon was given instead, until his subsequent conduct caused the withdrawal of the boon (v. 29). In the parable of the Unjust Judge the word μακροθυμεί (Lk 18⁷) occurs in connexion with a difficult piece of interpretation, for the full discussion of which we have scarcely space here. Christ possibly had in mind a verse in Sir 35¹⁸ [Gr. 32²²]. If ἐπ' αὐτοῖς refers to the elect, we may say that μακροθυμεί here means the vindication of the cause rather than the punishment of the foe. But if we may refer the words to the enemies of the elect, the phrase will be parallel in thought to Ro 2⁴.

2. Long-suffering a Christian duty.—In Mt 18²⁶, 29 we noted the obligation resting on those who enjoy Christ's long-suffering to exhibit it to others. This habit we find enforced in the Epistles (1 Co 13⁴, 2 Co 6⁶, Gal 5²², 1 Th 5¹⁴, 2 Ti 3¹⁰). It is not a natural characteristic: it has to be acquired (Col 3¹²). In Eph 4² it is explained as forbearance, or cessation of hostilities (ἀνοχῆ). This implies that there may be wrong on both sides. But there is a power from without (Col 1¹¹, Gal 5²²), the Spirit of God, who will enable Christ's people to reproduce His long-suffering in face, for instance, of opposition to the truth they teach (2 Ti 4²). In Ja 5⁷⁻¹⁰ the word occurs four times. The Christian who is persecuted is to be as long-suffering towards his foe as the farmer who waits till the unproductive field bears a crop after fertilizing showers. There is, perhaps, in addition, a thought of man's attitude towards God in times of trial. Christ's long-suffering man refuses both to rail at his enemies and to question the dealings of his God.

LOOK (CHRIST'S).—The Gospels give no direct information as to the look of our Lord, if the word 'look' be regarded as a synonym for His outward appearance. The first natural request of a child—'You are going to tell me about Jesus, then tell me what He was like'—puts a question the Evangelists do not even begin to answer; and in a tale generally so frank and childlike this fact is not without significance. No description of Jesus' 'face' is ever given in the Gospels, except when, in the story of the Transfiguration, it is said that the fashion of His face was altered (ἐγένετο τὸ εἶδος τοῦ προσώπου αὐτοῦ ἕτερον, Lk 9²⁹). Even then, it is stated to have become like the sun (Mt 17²); and, as it happens, the figure is of something which, though it lights the world, is not in itself directly to be gazed upon (cf. Rev 1¹⁶). While it may be possible, therefore, to deduce from the Epistles a message figuratively termed 'the Gospel of the Face' (see Bushnell, Sermons on Living Subjects, 73 ff.), the Evangelists afford no opportunity of making this study of Christ 'after the flesh.' See art. CHRIST IN ART.

It is further to be observed, in the same connexion, that even the more vivid words for looking, as a synonym for 'seeing,' 'beholding,' are never used of Christ so as to draw attention to the manner of His look. Such a word, e.g., as ἀρενίζω, 'to gaze fixedly' (employed to describe a congregation gazing at Jesus, Lk 4²⁰; the maid staring at St. Peter, 22⁵⁶; St. Paul flashing an indignant look at Elymas the sorcerer, Ac 13⁹), is never associated with our Lord. Even διαβλέπω, a milder though still pictorial word, is not connected with Him. It is as though every mental image of Christ's outward appearance were designedly excluded. We must be content, therefore, to study Christ's look in the more objective sense in which it expresses simply the act of vision. Here we may roughly divide the references into four classes.

1. The look of Christ is sometimes disclosed as an upward look, expressing dependence on the Father. This uplifted glance is recorded on four occasions—during the miracle of the feeding of the 5000, while giving thanks and blessing the loaves (Mt 14¹⁹); in the healing of a man deaf and dumb, when Christ looked up to heaven and sighed (Mk 7³⁴ [in both passages ἀναβλέψας εἰς τὸν οὐρανόν]); in the raising of Lazarus (Jn 11⁴¹ ἤρεν τοὺς ὀφθαλμοὺς ἄνω); and during the great High-Priestly prayer (Jn 17¹ ἐπάρας τοὺς ὀφθαλμοὺς αὐτοῦ εἰς τὸν οὐρανόν). In all these instances the action and gesture must have imprinted themselves very deeply on the memory of the disciples. They were an outward sign of a lifelong inward attitude. They evidenced the direction of the appeal which Christ made in His human nature to God. Of Him the words are pre-eminently true, 'Mine eyes are ever toward the Lord' (Ps 25¹⁶).

2. The look of Christ is often disclosed as an outward look of calm clear-eyed discernment on the world around Him. 'He beheld (εθεώρει) how the people cast money into the treasury' (Mk 12⁴¹)—appreciating not only the matter of their gift, but the manner of it. He 'entered into the temple, and looked round about upon all things' (Mk 11¹¹ περιβλεψάμενος πάντα); and it appeared on the following day how piercing and comprehensive His glance had been (v. 15^{ff.}). 'He looked up' (ἀναβλέψας) and saw Zacchæus in his post in the tree (Lk 19⁵). When the scribes brought Him a crafty question, 'He perceived (κατονοήσας) their craftiness' (Lk 20²³)—'saw at a glance,' the word might be rendered. If there were space to offer a complete list of those things which Jesus is said in the Gospels to have beheld or seen, the impression would at least be strong that those calm eyes missed nothing. Retaining God continually in the field of vision, Jesus' sight was not thereby dimmed, but only purged and purified for all other exercise. On one occasion His disciples were permitted to share a deeper gaze into the world behind the veil—'And He said unto them, I beheld (εθεώρουν) Satan as lightning fall from heaven' (Lk 10¹⁸).

3. A special look of Christ is recorded as directed to a man or an audience during the utterance of some statement or address. The simplest record of this is when it is said that He 'looked round' before speaking (Mk 3³⁴ 10²³ περιβλεψάμενος); or that 'he beheld (εμβλέψας) them and said' (Mt 19²⁶); or when more fully St. Luke states in reporting the Sermon on the Mount, 'And he lifted up his eyes (ἐπάρας τοὺς ὀφθαλμοὺς) on his disciples, and said' (Lk 6²⁰). This is the look of the sower scrutinizing the field. It is a look adding personality to the word spoken. It is a silent 'Verily, verily, I say unto you.' More individual instances of this look are when Jesus 'beheld' (εμβλέψας) Peter, and said, 'Thou art Simon . . . thou shalt be called Cephas' (Jn 1⁴²)—a look sealing the new name upon Peter's heart; or when He 'beheld' (εμβλέψας) the chief priests and scribes, 'and said, What is this then that is written?' (Lk 20¹⁷)—a grave look of reproach, 'to add solemnity to His reference to their own Scriptures.' Christ and His words can never be separated. He is Himself the Word made flesh—the greatest utterance in the greatest Person; and the language of the Apostles is 'what we have seen and heard declare we unto you' (1 Jn 1³).

4. A few passages form a group by themselves, wherein strong feeling is expressed or implied as accompanying some look of Christ. The most notable instance of this is when 'the Lord turned and looked upon (ἐρέβλεψεν) Peter' (Lk 22⁶¹), 'No word, no gesture of reproach'; but

'Oh to render plain,
By help of having loved a little and mourned,
That look of sovran love and sovran pain'

(Mrs. Browning, Sonnets).

Akin to this is the look directed by Jesus upon the young ruler, 'And Jesus beholding (ἐμβλέψας) him loved him' (Mk 10²¹); or the look of the King upon Jerusalem, on 'what should have been the City's bridal day,' 'He beheld (ιδών) the city, and wept over it' (Lk 19⁴¹). As a last instance, though expressing a very different emotion, we may adduce Mk 3⁵ 'He looked round about on them (περιβλεψάμενος αὐτοῖς) with anger, being grieved for the hardness of their hearts.' Of Christ, too, might the words have been written, He 'loved well because he hated,

Hated wickedness that hinders loving' (Browning).

LORD.—This title is used as the translation of three different words in the Gr. Gospels: (1) ὁ δεσπότης. This word occurs only once in the Gospels, in the prayer of Simeon, 'Lord, now lettest thou thy servant depart in peace, according to thy word' (Lk 2²⁹). It is the proper correlative of δούλος. In thus addressing God, Simeon thinks of himself as His slave. (2) οἱ μεγιστάνες. This word also occurs but once in the Gospels, in Mk 6²¹ 'Herod . . . made a supper to his lords.' It describes the chief men or nobles of a city or kingdom. (3) κύριος, ὁ κύριος. Except in the above instances, this is the word which stands for 'Lord' and 'lord' in the Gospels. It occurs with great frequency. With or without the article, it is found at least 244 times. The frequency of its use is concealed from readers of the English versions. It is sometimes translated 'master' ('Yet the dogs eat of the crumbs which fall from their master's table,' Mt 15²⁷), or 'sir' ('I go, sir, and went not,' Mt 21³⁰), or 'owner' ('the owners therefore said, Why loose ye the colt?' Lk 19³³). Fundamentally the title describes one who has power or authority (ὁ ἔχων κύριος) over persons or things. Strictly speaking, it implies ownership, but it is also used as a title of reverence or courtesy. In the Gospels it is applied in a wide variety of relationship.

1. It is frequently used as a name for God.—(1) In most cases as a name for God, it is used without the article. It occurs in all 59 times (17 in Mt., 8 in Mk., 30 in Lk., and 4 in Jn.). It is found in quotations from the OT, as 'Thou shalt not tempt (the) Lord thy God' (Mt 4⁷); and in phrases of OT origin, as 'the angel of (the) Lord' (Mt 1²⁰ || Lk 1¹¹); 'the law of (the) Lord' (Lk 2²³); 'the power of (the) Lord' (Lk 5¹⁷). It is noteworthy that the only instances in the Gospels where the title is used in direct address to God, are found in the prayers of Jesus: 'I thank thee, Father, Lord of heaven and earth' (Mt 11²⁵ || Lk 10²¹). In both cases the title is found in exactly the same phrase. (2) The use of the name with the article is infrequent, occurring in all 11 times (twice in Mt., once in Mk., and 8 times in Lk.): e.g. 'Perform unto the Lord thine oaths' (Mt 5³³); 'Tell how great things the Lord hath done for thee' (Mk 5¹⁹); 'Pray ye therefore the Lord of the harvest' (Lk 10²). In the application of this name to God, with and without the article, the Gospels follow the usage of the LXX.

2. It is also used with great frequency as a general title of courtesy, or as a name for a master or owner. (1) Without the article, it is employed in direct address, as the salutation of a son to a father, 'I go, sir' (Mt 21³⁰); of servants to their master, 'Sir, didst not thou sow good seed in thy field?' (Mt 13²⁷); 'Lord, let it alone this year also' (Lk 13⁸); of the Greeks to Philip, 'Sir, we would see Jesus' (Jn 12²¹); of the Pharisees and priests to Pilate, 'Sir, we remember that this deceiver said' (Mt 27⁶³). This use of the title, as a general term of courtesy in direct address, is not found in Mk., but it occurs 9 times in Mt., 8 times in Lk., and twice in John. As the name for a master, without the article it is found only in Mt 6²⁴ 'No man can serve two masters,' and in Lk 16¹³, the parallel passage. (2) With the article, it is a frequent name for a master or owner, as 'the lord of the vineyard' (Mt 20⁸), 'the lord of that servant' (Lk 12⁴⁶), 'the servant knoweth not what his lord doeth' (Jn 15¹⁵). In Lk 16⁸ it is the 'lord' of the unjust steward who commended his dishonest method of providing for himself.

3. It is most frequently of all employed as a title of courtesy in direct address to, or as a name for Jesus.

(1) Without the article, it is used (a) by His disciples, as 'Lord, if it be thou, bid me come unto thee on the water' (Mt 14²⁸). This title in direct address to Jesus by disciples is never found in Mark. It is most frequent in Jn., as is to be expected, since he records most of the private intercourse between Jesus and His disciples. (b) By others than disciples, as 'Lord, if thou wilt, thou canst make me clean' (Mt 8²). In Mk. it is employed only once in this relation, by the Syro-phenician woman, 'Yes, Lord' (Mk 7²⁸). In most cases, the title as used by others than disciples is found in narratives of miracle. (c) By Jesus Himself, as 'Not every one that saith unto me, Lord, Lord, shall enter into the kingdom of heaven' (Mt 7²¹). (d) It is also found in the words of the angel to the shepherds, 'Unto you is born this day . . . a Saviour, who is Christ (the) Lord' (Lk 2¹¹). This phrase (χριστὸς κύριος) is found in Ps-Sol 17³⁶. Briggs (Messiah of the Gospels, pp. 34, 35, notes) says it is probably to be interpreted on the basis of ארני Ps 110¹ ('The LORD said unto my Lord'), but adds that Schürer, Ewald, Wellhausen, and W. R. Smith regard the phrase in Ps-Sol as a mistranslation of ששׁי יהוה ('Anointed of (the) Lord,'—a phrase which is found in Lk 2²⁶ '(the) Lord's Christ'). Dalman, on the other hand (Words of Jesus, T. & T. Clark, p. 303 f.), thinks it incredible that a translator should have made such a mistake. We agree with him in regarding κύριος (Lord) as a word added by the Evangelist to interpret the Jewish title Messiah (χριστός) to his Gentile readers. (The same necessity of interpretation accounts for the phrase 'Christ, a king' (Lk 23²), in the accusation made before Pilate. The claim that Jesus was 'the Christ' had no political significance to the Gentile governor. It had to be interpreted to him as 'king' before he could receive the charge as an accusation). In Ac 2³⁶ the phrase 'God hath made that same Jesus . . . both Lord and Christ' (κύριον καὶ χριστόν), is to be explained in the same way. 'Lord' is an addition by the Evangelist, to interpret 'Christ' to Gentile Christians. We may add that the same necessity of interpreting 'Christ' to Gentiles accounts for the curious phrase in the address of Peter to Cornelius, which has been found so difficult—'Jesus Christ (he is Lord of all, πάντων κύριος),' Ac 10³⁶. The clause in brackets is added to interpret the confessional title 'Christ.' It may be due to Lk., but it is more likely that it was added at the time by Peter. He was speaking to a Gentile, who, though he was 'a devout man and one that feared God,' may not have understood the confessional significance of the term 'Christ.' Without the addition of the interpretation, Cornelius might have regarded it as part of the name of Jesus. The title 'Christ' did become a proper name, but that use of the term did not arise till a later date.

If the interpretation was given by Peter when speaking to Cornelius, it provides an interesting illustration of the way in which the first preachers of Christianity adapted themselves to the new conditions in which they found themselves, when they began to preach to Gentiles. The Saviour of the world must not have a local or national confessional title, (cf. the words of Paul and Silas to the Philippian jailer as they are given in NAB, and accepted by Westcott and Hort, Tischendorf, and other critical editors, 'Believe on the Lord Jesus (i.e. believe on Jesus as Lord), and thou shalt be saved,' Ac 16³¹). Also, 'No man can say that Jesus is Lord but by the Holy Ghost' (1 Co 12³), and 'every tongue should confess that Jesus Christ is Lord, to the glory of God the Father,' Ph 2¹¹). To the Jewish Christian, Jesus was the 'Messiah,' to the Hellenistic Christian Jew He was 'the Christ,' and to the Gentile Christian He was 'the Lord.' The Hellenistic and Gentile terms are combined in our familiar name 'the Lord Jesus Christ.' The interpretation of 'Christ' as 'Lord' enables us to understand that the essential idea of the first term is that of Sovereignty or Lordship. The Saviour is the Lord, the Possessor and Ruler of the Kingdom of God.

This title readily acquired its highest significance as one of Divine honour among the Gentile Christians, especially in the East. 'Oriental religions are fond of expressing the relationship between the divinity and the devotee, as that of the "Lord" or "Lady" to a slave' (Deissmann). The higher significance of the title was most likely assisted also by the fact that among Hellenistic Jewish Christians κύριος was in use as a Divine title applied to God.

(2) With the article, the title is applied to Jesus (α) by Himself, directly, as 'Ye call me Master and Lord' (more literally, 'the Teacher and the Lord') (Jn 13¹³), and indirectly, as '(The) LORD said unto my Lord (τῷ κυρίῳ μου), Sit thou on my right hand till I make thine enemies thy footstool' (Mt 22⁴⁴). (β) The historical application of the title, with the article, to Jesus is specially significant. Tischendorf and Westcott-Hort omit the title in this form, in the only place where it is found in Mt. (28⁶). It occurs twice in Mk. (16^{19, 20}), i.e. in that part of the Gospel which is regarded by critical editors as not belonging to the original MSS. Therefore it is only in the Gospels of Lk. and Jn. that the title in this form is applied historically to Jesus. This is a strong argument for the earlier composition of Mt. and Mk., for the title became so common in the Apostolic Church that its absence from these Gospels can be explained only by their early date. The title occurs 18 times in Lk. and 12 times in John. Twelve of the instances in Lk. are found in passages which are peculiar to that Gospel, as 'the Lord appointed other seventy' (Lk 10¹). The other instances may be regarded as editorial additions (7¹³ 11³⁹ 12⁴² 17^{5, 6} 24³). Three of the instances in Jn., which are found in the early part of the Gospel, are plainly editorial additions (4¹ 6²³ 11²). The remaining instances are found in the last two chapters of the Gospel, and in passages which are peculiar to it. They deal with the risen life of Jesus, and were written at a time when the higher conceptions of His personality gave a deeper significance to the title, and when its confessional meaning was universally known. The adoring cry of Thomas, 'My Lord and my God' (ὁ κύριός μου καὶ ὁ θεός μου) Jn 20²⁸, is an illustration of how among Jewish Christians the title of respect addressed to a teacher became one of Divine honour. Yet, as Dalman says, 'it must . . . be remembered that the Aramaic-speaking Jews did not, save exceptionally, designate God as "Lord," so that in the Hebraic section of the Jewish Christians the expression "our Lord" was used in reference to Jesus only, and would be quite free from ambiguity' (p. 329).

4. In comparing parallel passages in which the title occurs, it is to be noticed that other titles are sometimes employed as equivalent terms in addressing Jesus.—

- i. Mt 8²⁵ (κύριε) 'Lord, save us: we perish.'
Mk 4³⁸ (διδάσκαλι) 'Teacher, carest thou not that we perish?'
Lk 8²⁴ (ἐπιστάτα) 'Master (teacher), we perish.'
- ii. Mt 17⁴ (κύριε) 'Lord, it is good for us to be here.'
Mk 9⁵ (Ραββεί) 'Rabbi, it is good for us to be here.'
Lk 9³³ (ἐπιστάτα) 'Master (teacher), it is good for us to be here.'
- iii. Mt 26²² (κύριε) 'Is it I, Lord?'
Mt 26²⁵ (Ραββεί) 'Is it I, Rabbi?'
Jn 13²⁵ (κύριε) 'Lord, who is it?'

The variety in the title used in addressing Jesus is not confined to the parallel passages. It is to be seen throughout each of the Gospels. Arranging the titles in the order of preference, Mt. uses κύριος, διδάσκαλος, and Ραββεί; Mk. διδάσκαλος, Ραββεί, Ραββονεί, and κύριος; Lk. κύριος, διδάσκαλος, and ἐπιστάτης; Jn. κύριος, Ραββεί, Ραββονεί, and διδάσκαλος. Sometimes the variety of the title is seen even in the same passage. It cannot be without intention or meaning that in (iii.) Mt. represents the eleven disciples as asking, 'Is it I, Lord?' while Judas, the traitor, says, 'Is it I, Rabbi?' (Mt 26^{22, 25}). Possibly Judas indicated his position of detachment or opposition by using 'Rabbi' instead of the title employed by the rest of the disciples. It is only by Judas that Jesus is addressed as 'Rabbi' in Mt. (26^{25, 49}). There must also be some difference of feeling in the use of different titles in Lk 5⁵ 'Master (teacher, ἐπιστάτα), we have toiled all night'; and Lk 5⁸, where Peter, after the miraculous draught of fishes, falls at the feet of Jesus with the cry, 'Depart from me; for I am a sinful man, O Lord' (κύριε). But it is possible that the variation of title in the parallel passages may have taken place in the process of oral transmission, or in translation from the Aramaic.

5. The variation of title in addressing Jesus suggests that in the original language of the Gospels at least two titles were employed. Of these Ραββεί was one, cf. 'ye call me Master (teacher) and Lord,' Jn 13¹³, and the frequent use of 'Rabbi' in the Gospels. Evidently 'teacher' (διδάσκαλος) is a translation of 'Rabbi' in some of its forms (רַבִּי, רַבִּי, רַבִּי). In 7 places Lk. uses ἐπιστάτης as a synonym for διδάσκαλος (5⁵ 8^{24 bis, 45} 9^{33, 49} 17¹³), and, without doubt, some form of רַבִּי lies behind this also. As to the title κύριος (Lord), which is used so frequently in addressing Jesus, it is most probably a translation of רַבִּי or אֲדֹנָי. It was a common name for a master, and was used as a title of courtesy. It was used by a servant to a master, by a debtor to a creditor, and by a layman to a learned man. It is possible, however, since many of the people of Palestine were bilingual, that κύριος was used by itself when one who knew Greek spoke to Jesus.

6. We thus suggest a twofold origin of the title as applied to Jesus. First, as the translation of the Aramaic titles in use among the disciples; and second, as the substitute for χριστός with confessional meaning among Gentiles. These distinctions of origin and meaning were soon lost in the gradual but rapid adoption of the title as one expressive of Divine honour. It is possible that this use of the title first became common among Eastern Christians.

7. In regard to the application of κύριος to God, it may be said that this was entirely due to the influence of Hellenistic Judaism. It is very unlikely that it was in use among Aramaic-speaking Jews at the time of our Lord. In reading the Scriptures in the synagogue in Hebrew, the name אֲדֹנָי (Lord) was read wherever the sacred name יהוה was found in the text. When it became necessary to translate the Scriptures into Aramaic in public reading, אֲדֹנָי still took the place of the sacred name.

In quoting from the Scriptures יהוה was not employed for the name of God, but שְׁמֵי (‘the Name’) in Hebrew, and ܫܡܝܐ in Aramaic. In phrases of OT origin like ‘the angel of (the) Lord,’ the name of God was entirely omitted or merely hinted at.

LORD'S DAY.—See CALENDAR (THE CHRISTIAN).

LORD'S PRAYER (I).—1. Place in NT.—Mt 6⁹⁻¹³, Lk 11¹⁻⁴. The former passage has been more influential in the later history of the Lord's Prayer, but the latter seems to give it in a more historical setting. In the Sermon on the Mount, the Prayer is, to all appearance, a later insertion; Lk. leads into the neighbourhood of Bethany (10³⁸⁻⁴²) or Gethsemane; see J. A. Robinson, ‘On the Locality in which the Lord's Prayer was given,’ in F. H. Chase, ‘The Lord's Prayer in Early Church’ (TS iii. [1891] pp. 123-125). Not far from the traditional site of Gethsemane, on the slope of the Mount of Olives, stands to-day the Church of the Paternoster, showing in the quadrangle the Lord's Prayer engraved in thirty-two languages.

The Lord's Prayer has been frequently published in Polyglot editions; the oldest at Rome, 1591, in 26 languages; then by H. Megiser, Frankfurt, 1593, in 40 [2nd ed., 1603, in 50; 3rd ed., Linz, 1616, in 52]; by Andr. Müller, 1660, in 100; Chamberlayne, 1715, in 150 languages. J. Adelung (Mithridates, 1804-1817) made the Lord's Prayer the basis of a scientific classification of languages. Further Polyglot editions by Bodoni (Parma), J. J. Marcel (Paris), Auer (Vienna), Dalton (St. Petersburg, 1870, in 108 languages of Russia), S. Apostolides (London, no date, in 100 languages, published for the benefit of the poor Cretan refugees now in Greece); The Lord's Prayer in Three Hundred Languages . . . with a Preface by Heinrich Rost, 1891; in 300 dialects of Africa, 1900. But most of these compilations lack scholarly supervision. A pleasant task would be for a united band of scholars to trace the historic development of those languages for which this is possible, on the basis of the Lord's Prayer, and to show the character of the rest on the same basis. The Lord's Prayer has also been frequently turned into metre and rhyme. Whether there exists a collection of this kind in English, is unknown to the present writer; in German, cf. Das Gebet des Herrn: Eine Sammlung metrischer Umschreibungen des Vaterunsers, Reutlingen, 1821; E. W. Scripture, ‘A Record of the Melody of the Lord's Prayer,’ in Die neueren Sprachen, ed. by W. Victor, x. 9.

For early English translations of the Lord's Prayer, see Albert S. Cook, ‘Study of the Lord's Prayer in English’ (Amer. Journ. Philol. vol. xii. pp. 59-66), and Biblical Quotations of Old English Prose Writers (London, 1898, pp. xxv, liii, lix, lxiv, 147 ff.). Cook refers to Wanley's Catalogus, where separate versions of the Lord's Prayer are either given or their existence noted, pp. 51, 160, 169, 197, 202, 221, 224, 239 (?), 240, 248. Cook gives the first from MS. Bodl. Jun. 121. Three poetical paraphrases of the Lord's Prayer of uncertain date are given by Greiss in his Bibliothek der Angelsächsischen Poesie, ii. 285-290 (new ed. ii. 227-238), the last two published by Wanley, Catalogus, pp. 48 and 147 f., and by Ettmüller, Scopas and Boceras, pp. 230-237; the first by Thorpe, Codex Eboracensis, p. 468 f. On p. 147, Cook gives the Lord's Prayer from Ælfric's Homilies, and an isolated quotation in Cnut's Laus (Schmid, Gesetze der Angelsachsen, p. 270). We may quote: ‘urne daeghwamlican hlāf, ‘ure gyltas, ‘on costunne;’ ‘fram yfele, ‘hlāf userne oferwistlic, ‘instondenlice, ‘scylda.’ (Cook, pp. liii, lix). For the expression ‘costunne,’ it is interesting to note that the corresponding German word ‘Bekorung,’ was declared by Luther better than the received ‘Versuchung.’

In the new and enlarged edition of The Lord's Prayer in Five Hundred Languages, comprising the Leading Languages and their Principal Dialects throughout the World, with the Places where Spoken; with a Preface by Reinhold Rost (London, Gilbert & Rivington, 1905), the Lord's Prayer is given in English in sixteen forms, namely: Charles II. Prayer-Book, 1662; Edward VI. Prayer-Book, 1549; as sent from Rome by Pope Adrian, an Englishman, about 1160; from two MSS of the 13th cent.; from Wyclif, about 1380; Tindale, 1534; Cranmer, 1575; Rheims Version, 1582; AV, 1611; RV, 1881; The Twentieth Century NT; further, in Anglo-Saxon.

A disciple—it is not said whether one of the Twelve—asked Jesus, as He was praying in a certain place, when He ceased, ‘Lord, teach us to pray, as John also taught his disciples.’ That the disciples of John were wont to make prayers or supplications, besides their fasting, is told by St.

Luke only (5³³). On a form of prayer ascribed to John, see ‘Lord's Prayer’ (by present writer) in EBi 2817, n. 6, and the Catalogue of the Syriac MSS preserved in the Library of the University of Cambridge (p. 529). There it begins: ‘Bright Morning, Jesus Christ, Who was sent by God the Father.’⁵ Where fixed forms of prayer are in use, as was the case, it seems, with the Jews in the time of Christ, it is but natural that petitions on particular subjects should be added to them; such additions are mentioned as made, for example, by R. Eliezer and by R. Johanan (see Lightfoot, Hor. Heb. on Mt 6, and art. ‘Schemone Esre’ in Hamburger, RE ii. [1883] 1098).

2. Sources.—The sources whence our Mt. and Lk. took the Lord's Prayer are quite unknown. The Gospel of Mk., which, according to the common view, was used by our Mt. and Lk., does not give it. On Mk 11^{24c}, where Mk. speaks about prayer, see A. Wright, Synopsis 2, 1903, p. 115, and Wellhausen, who thinks that Mk. may have known the Lord's Prayer as a prayer of the Church, but did not dare to refer it in its wording to Jesus; the expression (ὁ πατήρ ὑμῶν) ὁ ἐν τοῖς οὐρανοῖς, occurring there, is not found elsewhere in Mk. If the first Gospel was originally written in (Hebrew or) Aramaic, its author may have had the Lord's Prayer before him, written or oral, in (Hebrew or) Aramaic, and given it in one of these dialects; then the translator may have formed the Greek under the influence of Lk. (cf. the hapaxlegomenon ἐπιούσιος). This is the view especially of Th. Zahn. The opposite view, that ἐπιούσιος was first coined by Mt. or one of his fellow-workers, is maintained, for instance, by A. Wright, The Gospel acc. to Luke, 1900, p. 102.

3. Text of the Lord's Prayer.—As there are two traditions about the place of origin of the Lord's Prayer, so even its wording is given in two different forms. In the Received Text, it is true, they differ very little; in the AV, for instance, the variations are but four:

Matthew.	Luke.
(1) in earth as it is in heaven.	as in heaven, so in earth.
(2) this day.	day by day.
(3) debts, as we forgive our debtors.	sins, for we also forgive every one that is indebted to us.
(4) For thine . . . Amen.	omits.

In the Greek TR they differ even less, the first of the above variations has nothing to correspond in Greek. (In Mt. the AV preserved the order of the Pr. Bk. version, which differs both from Mt. and Lk. in the fifth petition, ‘trespasses’ against ‘debts’ and ‘sins’).

There can be no doubt that in the TR the form of Lk. has been assimilated to that of Mt. The modern critical editions agree almost to the letter; see the editions of Scrivener, Weymouth, Nestle. Weiss retained in Mt. the form ἐθέλω instead of ἐλάτω, and the article τῆς before γῆς. The critical apparatus of Tischendorf and WH [the 2nd ed. of 1896 is enriched by some additional notes] may be supplemented by the following notes:

(1) The Didache (8²) has the singular τῷ οὐρανῷ; the Apost. Const. in both places, 3¹⁸ and 7²⁴ (here reproducing the Didache), the plural.

(2) On the form ‘veni ad regnum tuum’ in the oldest Latin MS (Cod. Bobbiensis), see F. C. Burkitt (Cambr. Univ. Reporter, 5th March 1900).

(3) Syr^{cur} and the Syr. Acts of Thomas have the plural for ‘thy will’ as the first hand of Cod. N in Mt 7²¹ (τὰ θελήματα).

(4) On the article for ‘on earth,’ see EBi 2818; on the new punctuation of the third petition, see below.

(5) With τῶν ἀμαρτιῶν of the Didache cf. Mt 18³², and the difference of the singular and plural in the Apost. Const. give καρτερύματα = ‘trespasses,’ αὐτοῖς for αὐτῶν, and omit the verb. Syriac forms combine ‘debts’ and ‘sins’; see, besides EBi 2818, Burkitt in his ed. of the Evangelion da-Mepharreshe, Mrs. Gibson's ed. of the Didasalia, and Mrs. Lewis' MS of the Acts of Thomas.

(6) In some Oriental translations 'deliver' is rendered by different roots in Mt. and Lk., and then both are combined in liturgical use of the Lord's Prayer.

(7) Of the Doxology the Didache omits 'the kingdom and'; in the Apost. Const. (724) one MS, on the contrary, omits 'and the power and the glory'; and the same two clauses are omitted by another MS at 318, which with its ally ends 'of the Father, and the Son, and the Holy Ghost, for ever and ever.' In this connexion it is worth while to remark, that Funk, in his new edition of the Didascalia and Apost. Const., puts at 318 and 724 the final quotation marks after τοῦ πατρὸς, implying by this that he does not regard the Doxology as part of the quotation from the NT. Compare with this the above statement about the MSS of the Constitutions, and Brightman's Liturgies Eastern and Western, p. 353 f.

In Lk. the modern editions differ even less than in Mt.—only in a single letter, Weiss retaining here also the spelling ἐθέτω. With this unity contrast the judgment of Dean Burgon (The Revision Revised, pp. 34-36; The Traditional Text, p. 84):

"The five Old Uncials" (KABCD) falsify the Lord's Prayer as given by St. Luke in no less than forty-five words. But so little do they agree among themselves, that they throw themselves into six different combinations in their departures from the Traditional Text; and yet they are never able to agree among themselves as to one single various reading: while only once are more than two of them observed to stand together, and their grand point of union is no less than an omission of the article. Such is their eccentric tendency, that in respect of thirty-two out of the whole forty-five words they bear in turn solitary evidence."

Any one who is unwilling to believe that the TR of Lk. is due to assimilation with Mt. may compare the critical apparatus of the Latin Testament of Wordsworth-White, or of the pre-Lutheran German Bible as edited by Kurrelmeyer. There he can watch the same process for the German and the Latin texts. Even the Vulgate of Sixtus V. (1590) has the addition in Lk., Fiat voluntas tua sicut in caelo et in terra; but not the rest.

The chief question about the Lord's Prayer in Lk. is, What about the petition ἐθέτω τὸ ἅγιον πνεῦμά σου ἐφ' ἡμᾶς καὶ καθαρῶσαι ἡμᾶς, which is witnessed for Marcion and found since in one MS (604, or Scrivener's b, Gregory's 700, von Soden's ε 133, pub. by Hoskier, 1890). Perhaps a trace of it is found in D, which has ἁγιασθήτω νομὰ σου ἐφ' ἡμᾶς, ἐθέτω σου ἡ βασιλεία, etc. Another reading of Marcion is 'thy bread' for 'our'; whether he read the second clause of the fifth petition we do not know, the sixth (and last with him) had the form καὶ μὴ ἄφες ἡμᾶς εἰσενεχθῆναι εἰς πειρασμόν. The same or similar forms are found independently from Marcion down to the present day. Harnack (Sitzungsber. Acad. Berl. 21st Jan. 1904) was inclined to see in the petition, 'Thy holy spirit come (upon us) and cleanse us,' the original for Lk., comparing 11¹³ with Mt 7¹¹.

4. Arrangement of the Lord's Prayer.—Augustine tells us (Enchir. 116): 'Lucas in oratione dominica petitiones non septem sed quinque complexus est'; thus it became the custom in the West to count seven petitions; but Origen, Chrysostom, and the Reformed Churches count six, connecting 'but deliver us from evil' closely with what precedes. WH print in Mt. the Lord's Prayer in 2×3 stichi, in Lk. without strophical arrangement, seeing in 'as in heaven, so on earth' the common burden for the first triplet of single clauses; see § 421. This has been adopted now for the Pr. Bk. version by Parliamentary Papers, 1903, No. 53, removing the comma from behind 'on earth' to behind 'done.' For the AV, the editions of the Parallel NT give a comma after 'done' as well as after 'on earth'; but Scrivener's Paragraph Bible (1873), the Two Version Edition (1900), and the Interlinear Bible (1906) omit the first comma. Whether the RV agrees with WH is not quite clear from its comma (in this case we should have expected a colon). This arrangement was already put forward by the Opus imperfectum in

Mt. (Migne, lvi. 712): 'Communiter autem accipit debet quod ait, Sicut in caelo et in terra,' i.e.—

'Sanctificetur nomen tuum, sicut in caelo et in terra.

Adveniat regnum tuum, sicut in caelo et in terra. Fiat voluntas tua, sicut in caelo et in terra.'

On the fact that in mediæval explanations the beginning was construed 'Pater noster qui es. In cœlis sanctificetur nomen tuum,' see below.

5. Contents.—(a) The exordium.—The short πάτερ in Lk., the fuller πάτερ ἡμῶν in Mt., would both correspond to an Aram. אָבא, which is connected with ὁ πατήρ in Ro 8¹⁵, Gal 4⁶, Mk 14³⁶. Cf. J. H. Moulton's Prolegomena, pp. 10, 233, and art. ABBA in vol. i. That πάτερ ἡμῶν may also correspond to אָבא and does not necessarily presuppose the form with suffix (אָבֵינוּ in Heb., אָבֵינוּ in Aram., אָבֵינוּ in Galilean), is shown by Dalman, Worte Jesu, 157, though for the beginning of a prayer the more solemn form appears to him more probable. Among Jews it is customary to add אָבֵינוּ in Hebrew (אָבֵינוּ in Aramaic) to אָב where it is used of God, but the isolated אָבא is not unusual. In the NT ὁ ἐν τοῖς οὐρανοῖς is almost exclusively used in Matthew. On the question whether from Ro 8¹⁵, Gal 4⁶ an acquaintance of St. Paul and his churches with the Lord's Prayer may be concluded, see Gerh. Bindemann, Das Gebet um tägliche Vergebung der Sünden in der Heilsverkündigung Jesu und in den Briefen der Apostel, Gütersloh, 1902.

(b) On the imperatives ἁγιασθήτω, γενηθήτω, see Origen, de Orat. 24. 5; Blass, Grammar, § 20. 1; Moulton, Proleg. p. 172, who quotes from Gildersleeve on Justin Martyr, p. 137: 'As in the Lord's Prayer, so in the ancient Greek Liturgies the aor. imper. is almost exclusively used. It is the true tense for "instant" prayer.' Moulton adds: 'To God we are bidden, by our Lord's precept and example, to present the claim of faith in the simplest, directest, most urgent form with which language supplies us.'

(c) With the first petition cf. *SE 3, and the beginning of the Kaddish אָבֵינוּ אָבֵינוּ אָבֵינוּ אָבֵינוּ אָבֵינוּ; afterwards eight more such verbs are placed together about 'the name of holiness (Blessed be it).' A benediction without mentioning הַשֵּׁם (= יהוה) is no benediction at all (Ber. 40b).

(d) Likewise a benediction with no כְּלִכְח is no benediction at all (ib.; cf. SE 11, in opposition to 12, 14, 17, Kaddish).

(e) γενηθήτω is tr. אָבֵינוּ by Shemtob, Delitzsch, Salkinson-Ginsburg, Resch; אָבֵינוּ by Alexander (McCaul-Hoga), Margoliouth, by the old Syriac versions except the Syro-Palestinian; from SE cf. 13, אָבֵינוּ אָבֵינוּ; in the Kaddish: 'May your prayers be accepted, and may your petition be done.' To אָבֵינוּ of Biblical Hebrew would correspond אָבֵינוּ in post-Biblical Hebrew and Aramaic.

(f) For ἐπιούσιος the remark of Origen, de Orat. 27, still holds good, that the word is found nowhere else in the whole range of Greek literature. Jerome compares it with the LXX περιούσιος; but this stands almost everywhere for אָבֵינוּ (ap. Aquila, Gn 14²¹ for אָבֵינוּ, Ps 16⁴ for אָבֵינוּ). On περιούσιος, see Jerome's remark (Anecd. Mareds. iii. 1, p. 92): 'Verbo περιούσιος, i.e. substantialis, exceptis sanctis scripturis nullus foris disertorum usus est.' The Gospel according to the Hebrews had for ἐπ., as Jerome states, māhār (= אָבֵינוּ). His most explicit statement has been published by Morin, Anecd. Mareds. iii. 2, p. 262: 'In Hebraico evangelio secundum Matthæum ita habet: Panem nostrum crastinum da nobis hodie.' This lends a strong support to the view that ἐπιούσιος is formed from ἡ ἐπιούσα, 'the coming day,' even if this māhār were nothing but a retranslation of the Greek. But another view is that it is the original word used by Jesus and preserved by the Jewish-Christian communities. This is the view of Zahn, Gesch. Kan. ii. 193, 703, Einvl. ii. 312; Ambrose: 'Latinus hunc panem quotidianum dixit, quem Graeci dicunt advenientem, quia Graeci dicunt τὴν ἐπιούσαν ἡμέραν advenientem diem'; Athanasius: τὸν ἐ. ἀρ. τούτῃσι τὸν μέλλοντα; Cyril Alex.: οἱ μὲν εἶναι φασὶ τὸν ἡξοντά τε καὶ δοθησόμενον κατὰ τὸν αἰῶνα τὸν μέλλοντα; the Sahidic Version, on which see Lagarde, Mitt. ii. 374.

* SE, used hereafter as abbreviation for Shemone Esre, the daily Prayer of the Synagogue; see the edition in Dalman, Worte Jesu, p. 299 ff.; and cf. on it, e.g., Hirsch in JE x. 270-282.

But the Oriental versions took another view: Syr^{cur} אֲמִינָה אֲמִינָה, i.e. 'our continual bread,' in Luke Syr^{cur} sin and Acts of Thomas 'the continual bread' (אֲמִינָה אֲמִינָה); the same tradition seems to be followed by the cotidianus of the Latin, the sinceinan of the Gothic, especially by חֲבֵת חֲבֵת of Shemtob ben Shafrut, with which cf. Nu 47 לֶחֶם חֲבֵת 'the continual bread.' [The Armenian version of 2 Mac 1⁸ used for the shewbread the same expression as in the Lord's Prayer, wherefore Holmes-Parsons remarked: 'tres codices Sergii ἀπὸ τοῦ ἐπιούσιου,' which remark led Deissmann (Neue Bibelstudien, p. 41) and Hilgenfeld (in his Ztschr., 1899, p. 157) to the belief that ἐπιούσιος was actually found in some Greek MSS. This was corrected by the present writer in ZNTW i. 250, EBl 2820, n. 1; but it is repeated by Wellhausen in his Com. on Mt. and not recalled in that on Lk.]. The Vulgate (Jerome?) has supersubstantialis in Mt. and cotidianus in Lk. How the Peshitta (Rabula?) came to translate 'the bread of our need,' לחֶמֶת דְּחֵתֵנָּה, is not quite clear, while the translation 'our bread of richness' in the Syro-Palestinian version rests on confusion with περιούσιος.

The following is a conspectus of the different renderings that have been tried:

(1) Shemtob: חֲבֵת חֲבֵת. (2) J. B. Jona, Rome, 1668: לחֶמֶת עַל הַקֵּיץ, a literal rendering of the supersubstantialis of the Vulgate, as überstantlich in three editions of the pre-Lutheran German Bible. (3) Delitzsch, Salkinson, Resch: לֶחֶם הַיּוֹם, after Pr 30⁸. (4) Taylor: לֶחֶם חֲבֵת חֲבֵת אוֹרָא לֶחֶם חֲבֵת חֲבֵת. (5) Schultze: lahma di yorquina (=Pesh.). (6) Rönisch: לֶחֶם חֲבֵת חֲבֵת, like the Syro-Palestinian version. (7) Arn. Meyer: חֲבֵת (sufficient). (8) Chase: 'our (or the) bread of the day.' The Variorum Bible quotes the readings: 'our bread in sufficiency,' 'the bread proper for our sustenance,' 'the bread for the coming day,' 'needful bread,' or 'bread for the life to come.' Others tr. 'bread of second quality,' 'the bread that we shall need' (Twentieth Cent. NT); see on the word, ExpT ii. [1891] 184, 242, 254, iii. [1891-92] 24, 31, 77.

The meaning of the word is certainly not far from the ἐφήμερος τροφή of Ja 2¹⁵. The change of σήμερον into καθ' ἡμέραν (and of δός into δίδου) has been explained by the daily use of the prayer; but the Didache, which already enjoins the use of it three times a day, does use δός and σήμερον.

(g) In the fifth petition ὑπολείψασθαι is rather = שְׂמַחֲתֵי (Shemtob, Delitzsch, Margoliouth), not אֲשַׁמְחֵי (Salkinson, Resch). On the variant ὑπολείψου and the dogmatic changes of εἰσενέγκης, see above. In the Latin Church it became customary in the time of Jerome and Hilary to say 'in tentationem quam ferre (or, sufferre) non possumus.'

(h) The last ambiguity is πονηροῦ, malo, which also in Heb., Aram. and Syr. may be masculine or neuter. The tr. of Shemtob, בְּלֵךְ 'from all evil,' finds its parallel in Ethiopic (see Brightman's Liturgies, p. 234), 'Deliver us and rescue us from all evil,' while the Nestorian Liturgy equally combines the two verbs by which the Pesh. (not Sin^{cur}) renders ῥύσαι in Mt. and Lk., 'Save and deliver us,' but continues, 'from the Evil and his host.' The neuter is found (in a different connexion, 10⁵) already in the Didache: μὴ θῆσθαι, Κύριε, τῆς ἐκκλησίας σου, ῥύσασθαι αὐτὴν ἀπὸ παντὸς πονηροῦ. Nevertheless, it seems to the present writer, on the whole, more probable that it should be taken as masculine.

For the Greek NT see the exhaustive investigation of Chase, and cf. Ac 10³⁸ where διαβόλου (Cod. E σατανᾶ) is rendered (by Shemtob) שָׂטָן 'the Evil One.' The most decided view that the word is masculine is in the Clem. Hom., where Peter uses the passage as one of his proofs for the fact that his Master frequently spoke to them of the existence of an Evil One (19² ἐν ἣ παρέδωκεν ἡμῖν εὐχῆ ἔχομεν εἰρημένον ῥύσαι ἡμᾶς ἀπὸ τοῦ πονηροῦ, along with Mk 1³, Mt 12²⁶, Lk 10¹⁸, Mt 13³⁹ 5³⁷, as proof for the statement: πολλὰκις οἶδα τὸν διδάσκαλόν μου εἰπόντα εἶναι τὸν πονηρόν = τινὰ κακίας ἡγεμόνα). Zahn and Wellhausen take it as neuter, as in 5³⁷.

(i) That the Doxology formed no original part of the Lord's Prayer needs no longer to be proved, in spite of Dean Burgon. The very discovery of the oldest witness outside of the NT, the Didache, where it occurs, corroborates the view that it originated in liturgical use. Its peculiar form there does not agree with any of the forms known to occur in the authorities for the text of Matthew (see The NT in the Apostolic Fathers, by a Committee of the Oxford Society of Historical Theology, 1905, p. 28 f.). The statement of WH on the Doxology in the Apost. Const. must be supplemented as above from the new edition of Funk. See also art. DOXOLOGY in vol. i. p. 492.

6. The Lord's Prayer as a whole.—True prayer, says Wellhausen, is a creation of the Jews, and so the Lord's Prayer follows Jewish examples, though it is not a mere composition 'ex formulis Hebræorum.' On the latter exaggeration, put forward by Grotius, Wetstein, and others, and strongly maintained by modern Jewish writers, see The Lord's Prayer no Adaptation of existing Jewish Petitions, by the Rev. M. Margoliouth (London, Bagster, 1876). The Kaddish, which is justly quoted for comparison, does not begin with 'Abba,' but it, too, has as first petition, 'Hallowed be thy name,' with the addition, however, 'in the world to come.' The national, eschatological, or Messianic element which goes through the Kaddish and the SE from beginning to end is remarkably thrown into the background in the Lord's Prayer. A petition like 'Give us this day our daily bread' would be impossible in the Kaddish, though a similar petition is not wanting in SE.

It is, however, wrong to deny completely the eschatological character of the Lord's Prayer; see esp. the Com. of Th. Zahn, who insists on the force of the aorists ἀγιασθήτω, ἐλθάτω, γεννηθήτω. Even the first petition looks forward to the time when the name of God, which in this world is so much blasphemed, especially among the heathen, through the sins of Israel (Ro 2²⁴), shall be glorified, when He brings about the inward purification and outward restoration of His people, separating the goddess out of their midst. Zahn declares it erroneous to believe that the Lord's Prayer had a specifically Christian character. A Jew knowing nothing of Christ, and having no wish to have anything to do with Him, was able and is still able to-day to pray it. The saying of Mt 5¹⁷, that He 'came to fulfil,' is true also of the Lord's Prayer.

That the first three petitions touch God and the rest refer to man is too clear a point to be missed.* The second half may perhaps be arranged under the heads of present (daily bread), past (debts of the past), future (temptation and deliverance); but a reference to the last trial (Mt 24²²), the hour of temptation (Rev 3¹⁰) and deliverance from it, does not seem to be implied in the words.

'Thy kingdom come' is again the second petition in the Kaddish.

Instead of the third petition, which Wellhausen calls hard to understand, we have in the Kaddish,

* It is, however, wrong to accentuate the word 'thy'; only codex D has in Lk. the emphatic order of words, σου ἡ βασιλεία.

'Your petition be done.' Whether it was under the influence of the fact that it is missing in the true text of Luke or not, at all events it is remarkable that Luther, in his Catechism, gave to the third petition no contents of its own, but treated it as a mere combination of the first and second ('Wenn Gott allen bösen Rat und Willen bricht und hindert, so uns den Namen Gottes nicht heiligen und sein Reich nicht kommen lassen wollen,' etc.).

Dogmatics and Ethics seem to be combined in every one of these three petitions: That we do not dishonour the name of the Heavenly Father (1) by mistrust, (2) by disobedience; that His Kingdom may come (1) with its blessings, (2) with its tasks and duties; that we (1) gladly accept all that is God's will concerning us, and (2) willingly do what He demands of us. To take the fourth petition as merely spiritual, like Marcion and afterwards Luther in his monkish days, is certainly wrong.

The sixth petition reminds us much more of the temptation of Jesus Himself at the beginning and end of His work, in the wilderness and in Gethsemane. The Jewish morning prayer contains the petition לִירֵי נִסִּי . . . אֵל תְּבִיאֵנוּ 'Bring us not . . . into temptation'; but the age of this part is unknown. Jesus speaks, however, throughout in the second person, advising His disciples, not including Himself; on the other hand, He could not have taught them such a prayer if He had not Himself lived in that atmosphere which the prayer breathes. When He bids them pray after this manner (οὐτως), He gives them an example from which they might learn with few words to say to God what the pious soul has to say to Him, and He did not prescribe the use which was made very early of this prayer, so that it became, to use Luther's expression, the greatest martyr.

7. Later history of the Lord's Prayer.—Only a few hints can be given here. It is very sad to observe how early a mechanical use of the Lord's Prayer set in. The same Didache which turned the warning of Mt 6¹⁶ into the precept, 'Your fastings shall not be with the hypocrites, for they fast on Monday and Thursday, but you fast on Wednesday and Friday,' goes on to write: 'Nor do ye pray as the hypocrites, but as the Lord commanded in His Gospel, Our Father, etc. Thrice in the day do ye pray so.'

This was enforced by the Apost. Const. (iii. 18): προκατασκευάζοντες ἑαυτοὺς ἀξίους τῆς νιοθεσίας τοῦ πατρὸς, lest Mal 1⁶ and Is 52⁵ find application to the Christians. Tertullian styled the Lord's Prayer brevarium totius evangelii, and pronounced the judgment: 'Oratio hæc quantum substringitur verbis, tantum diffunditur sensibus.' Cyprian called it caelestis doctrine compendium; Origen wrote on it the treatise de Oratione (vol. ii. in the Berlin edition). On its use in the Liturgy, Brightman (p. 58) says: 'It occurs in all liturgies except Apost. Const. as the conclusion of the central action and summing up of the great prayer (533-534), and the transition to the communion, with a poem and a conclusion (Embolismos); it is also otherwise used.' For instance, in the liturgy of the Nestorians it is three times repeated.

Of mediæval explanations, the Glossa ordinaria draws a rather artificial parallel between the seven petitions of the Lord's Prayer and the seven gifts of the Holy Ghost (Is 11²) and the seven Beatitudes. The Com. of St. Thomas Aquinas has been translated from the Latin by Edw. Male (1893). Of special interest is the block-book of Henricus ex Pomerio (Henri van den Bogaarde, 1382-1441), Explanatio figuralis super Pater noster.

See on it Alvin in Bulletin de l'Académie R. de Belgique, 2 Ser. vol. xvii. 674-94; Monuments iconogr. et typogr. de la Bibliothèque R. de Belgique; and P. Weizsäcker in Christliches Kunstblatt, 42 (1900), Nos. 4, 5. It is characterized by joining in cælis with the first petition,* and a thoroughgoing tripartition ('in cælo tres sanctorum affectiones; in purgatorio tres animarum afflictiones; in sæculo tres virorum defectiones; tres panes in via necessarios (nature, gratia, gloria); triplex debitum (commissionis, omissionis, remissionis); triplex tentatio; dammmandorum triplex malum; salvandorum triplex bonum). The illustrations remind one of the task which has yet to be executed, of writing a monograph on the artistic illustrations to the Lord's Prayer.

LITERATURE.—The literature on the Lord's Prayer is immense. Strangely enough, an art. 'Lord's Day' is found in Smith, but not one on 'Lord's Prayer.' Under 'Paternoster,' Murray mentions that the first example of this term in English is one from about 1000. Of Queen Mary the saying is quoted that she 'got the crown by Our Father and held it by Pater noster.' The Latin designation was so frequently used, esp. in connexion with the rosary, that it was taken over into the language of architects, engineers, and anglers (see Murray). In German both its components in the form 'Patter' and 'Nuster' became expressions for collar-chains. As a measure of time, cf. a 'Paternoster cricket.'

Out of the literature on the Lord's Prayer, Th. LORD'S PRAYER (II).—This name for the prayer which Jesus taught His disciples (Mt 6⁹⁻¹³, Lk 11²⁻⁴), though used so generally by Christians, does not occur in the NT, and objection to it has sometimes been offered. It might suggest that the prayer was one which Jesus Himself employed, while not only is there no evidence of His having done so, but the petition for forgiveness is a sufficient assurance that He cannot have made it His own. 'When ye pray,' He said to His disciples, 'pray thus'; but His own manner of praying would be different—how different we may judge from the recollections preserved in the Fourth Gospel of one of His prayers (Jn 17). And so it has sometimes been suggested that we should speak not of 'The Lord's Prayer,' but of 'The Disciples' Prayer,' or that we should content ourselves with designating it by its first two words, calling it the 'Our Father,' just as German Protestants call it the 'Vaterunser' and Roman Catholics the 'Paternoster.' But apart from the consecration of long and hallowed use, the name is appropriate as giving expression to the fact that the prayer comes to us from the very lips of our Lord. In this sense it is the Lord's Prayer. When we use it, we are approaching God with no words of our own, but in the very words which our Master has taught us.

1. Occasion.—Of the two accounts, in Mt. and Lk. respectively, of the occasion when Christ gave the prayer, it is generally agreed that if we must choose between them, Lk.'s is to be preferred as the more historical. It may be that the author of the First Gospel, after recording the Lord's injunctions with regard to the spirit and manner of prayer (Mt 6⁸⁻⁹), thought this a suitable opportunity to set down the prayer-form which was really given at a different time. And yet there seems no positive reason why we should set aside Mt.'s statement as to the connexion at least in which the prayer was spoken. If Jesus gave a form of prayer at all, and meant it to be used as He gave it, it seems likely that He would repeat it, more especially when dealing with different sets of hearers. And if it was natural that He should impart it when one of His disciples, not necessarily one of the Twelve, asked to be taught to pray, it was also natural that, when He had just been warning His disciples against hypocrisy in prayer and the vain repetitions of the Gentiles, He should instruct them to pray after the brief, simple, and filial manner of this model of approach to God.

2. Structure.—This is exceedingly simple. Apart from the Doxology, which occurs only in Mt., and even there forms no part of the original, but is a later insertion due to liturgical usage, we have only an invocation and a series of six petitions. Since Augustine, the number of the petitions has commonly been reckoned at seven, the last clause in Mt.'s version being regarded as two separate requests. But the view that now commends itself to most scholars is that the two members of the sentence are to be taken as one and the same petition negatively and positively expressed. This view is confirmed by the fact that in the critical text of Lk. (see RV) the petition runs simply, 'Bring us not into temptation,' and it is further borne out by the RV rendering (almost certainly correct) of Mt.'s τοῦ πονηροῦ by 'the evil one' instead of 'evil.' The petition is that we may not be brought into temptation, but may be delivered from the Tempter; and these are two aspects of the selfsame request.

Looking now at the six petitions, we observe at once that the first three have a Godward, the second three a manward reference. Because of this the prayer has often been compared to the Decalogue with its summation of human duty first to God and then to man (cf. Mt 22⁴⁰, Mk 12³¹). But beneath this resemblance there lies a great difference between the Ten Words and the Lord's Prayer, the familiar difference between law and grace, between the Old Testament and the New. For while in the one case our debt to God and to man is laid upon us from above as a commandment that must be obeyed, in the other we look up to God, crying like Augustine, 'Da quod jubes, et jube quod vis' (Conf. x. 60).

When we examine the prayer more closely, a beautiful continuity and symmetry of thought becomes apparent. In the invocation God is addressed by His new name of 'Father'; and it is with a petition for the hallowing of this name that the prayer proper begins. If we take the three petitions of the first group, God appears to be addressed: (1) as the Father whose name must be hallowed, (2) as the King whose Kingdom is to come, (3) as the Lord of heaven and earth whose will must be fulfilled. And when we pass to the three petitions of the second group, the same threefold view of God may be traced, coming, too, in the same order, so that the successive clauses of this group correspond respectively to those of the first. For the prayer for bread naturally suggests the request of the child to the Father, the prayer for forgiveness the petition of the subject to the King, and the prayer for deliverance from the Tempter the cry of one who feels in the presence of the world's evil his utter dependence upon the strong and holy will of his Master and Lord.

3. Contents.—Without entering here into the questions raised by the twofold text (see preceding art.), we shall for convenience follow Mt.'s version as the one which has passed into general use in the Christian Church.

(a) The Invocation: 'Our Father which art in heaven.' These words mark a new epoch not only in the history of prayer, but in the history of revelation. In the OT, God is occasionally spoken of as the Father of the Jewish people (Dt 32⁶, Is 63¹⁶ etc.), but individuals do not venture to address Him by this name (Ps 103¹³ is only a comparison). And though in some of the extra-canonical writings there appears a dawning consciousness of a personal relation to God as a Father (Wis 2¹⁶, Sir 23¹⁻⁴ etc.), it was Jesus Christ who first turned the dim hope of pious hearts into the assured certainty of faith. 'Father' is the distinctive Christian name of God, the name which Christ taught us, and which, apart from Him, we have no proper right to use (cf. Jn 1¹², Gal 4⁶). The Fatherhood here appealed to is not the general Fatherhood of Creatorship, but the special Fatherhood of grace. It is for those who are the children of God by Christian faith that this prayer is meant, those who turn to Him with filial hearts, prepared to say: 'Hallowed be thy name. Thy kingdom come. Thy will be done.'

But God is called not 'Father' only, but 'Our Father,' and thus the invocation acknowledges the brotherhood of man as well as the Fatherhood of God. There is a human brotherhood which rests on the Divine Creatorship (cf. Mal 2¹⁰). But just as there is a special sonship, the sonship of believers, so there is a distinctive brotherhood, the brotherhood of saints; and it is this brotherhood that finds immediate expression in the invocation of the Lord's Prayer.

Our Father is 'in heaven.' The phrase speaks to us of His greatness and holiness, of the reverence we owe Him, of His power to bless. But it also reminds us that if we are the children of the heavenly Father, His home is the true home of our souls, and that, as always, so especially when we bow before His throne with our requests, we must set our mind on the things that are above.

(b) First Petition: 'Hallowed be thy name.' In the OT the 'name' of God is a constant expression for His revealed character (cf. Ps 9¹⁰ 20⁷, Pr 18¹⁰). Without doubt it is in this sense that the word is used by Jesus. But His immediate reference here must be to that character of Fatherhood under which He had just presented God to His disciples. It is our Father in heaven whose name is to be hallowed. To hallow that name is to set great store by it, to exalt it and revere it and glory in it. To pray that it may be hallowed is to pray that God as revealed to us by Christ may be accepted and honoured by ourselves and others—that we may turn to Him as our Father with loving, trustful hearts, and give Him the honour that is due.

(c) Second Petition: 'Thy kingdom come.' The Kingdom of God was the hope of Israel before Christ's advent, and when He came it formed the constant and central theme of His teaching. When we examine the Synoptic Gospels to learn what His teaching upon the subject was, we find Him speaking of the Kingdom of God in two ways. (1) It was a present reality set up on earth (Mt 12²⁸, Mk 1¹⁵, Lk 17²¹), gathering round His own person (Mt 13⁴¹ 16²⁸ 25³¹, 34 etc.), the coming of which meant its entrance (which is really His own entrance, Mt 8^{10ff.} 11²⁸⁻³⁰ etc.) into the individual heart (Lk 17^{20, 21}, Mt 13³³, Jn 3³), its steady growth (Mk 4²⁶⁻³²), and its gradual spread like heaven through society (Mt 13³³=Lk 13^{20ff.}). (2) But again it was a hope of the future, a Kingdom not realized as yet, but one day to be revealed in power by the Parousia of the Son of Man Himself (Mt 13⁴¹, 49f., 22¹³ 25³⁰). And so, when we pray for the coming of God's Kingdom, we are praying that Christ the King may enter into our hearts, that He may take full possession of them, that the gospel of the Kingdom may spread throughout the world, and that its principles may work in human society with subduing power. But we are praying also for the hour of the final consummation when the Lord Himself shall appear in His glory, when the kingdom of this world shall become the Kingdom of our Lord and of His Christ, when out of that Kingdom there shall be cast all things that offend, and God shall be all in all.

(d) Third Petition: 'Thy will be done.' This may be described as the dominant note of the Lord's Prayer. The petitions that precede lead up to this, and those that follow must be brought into harmony with it. We frequently use these words as if they were nothing more than a prayer of submission and resignation in the day of sorrow, an echo of the Saviour's cry in the Garden of Gethsemane (Mt 26³⁹ ||). And no doubt this is part of their meaning, and one of the uses to which they may be applied. They are a cry to God to enable us to bear what He sees fit to send, and to make us meek and patient under His chastening hand. But while this is implied in the petition, it is not its first intention. The added words, 'as in heaven, so on earth,' should keep us right here, since from heaven all sorrow and sighing have fled away. This is the prayer of active rather than of passive obedience, an obedience like that of God's angels who excel in strength and do His commandments. Before we think of Jesus in the garden of shadows, we should think of Him as He sat by the well of Sychar and said to His disciples, 'My meat is to do the will of him that sent me, and to accomplish his work' (Jn 4³⁴). When we pray this prayer we are asking that we and all men, being delivered from the spirit of wilfulness, may attain to a joyful alacrity like that of angels in doing the will of God.

(e) Fourth Petition.—'Give us this day our daily (ἐπιούσιον) bread.' We pass now from the Godward to the manward aspects of the prayer. The first petition of this second group shows that it is right and proper to pray for material as well as for spiritual blessings. The prayer is not to be spiritualized, with most of the Fathers, into a request for the Bread of Life; it is literal bread, bread for bodily sustenance, that Jesus means us to ask for.

The one expository difficulty of this petition lies in the word ἐπιούσιος, which has been called 'the most untranslatable word in the NT.' It appears here (in both Mt. and Lk.) for the first time in Gr. literature, and within the NT occurs nowhere else. Of the three principal renderings—'daily' (EV text), 'for the coming day' (RVm), and 'needful' (Amer. RVm, alternat.)—there is least to be said for the first, familiar as it is. It reproduces the Old Lat. quotidianum, but finds no support in etymology, and may be regarded perhaps as nothing more than a guess suggested by what the sense of the passage appeared to require. 'For the coming day' is more likely from the etymological point of view (ἐπιούσιος fr. ἡ ἐπιούσα [sc. ἡμέρα]='the coming day', fr. ἐπιών, pres. part. of ἐπιμι [ἐμι, 'to go or come']), but seems out of keeping with Christ's teaching elsewhere in the Sermon on the Mount (Mt 6³⁴). If this rendering is accepted, Chase's view ('Lord's Prayer in Early Church,' Texts and Studies, Cambridge [1891], in loc.) is plausible, that the word was a liturgical insertion intended to adapt the prayer for use at evening service. In the morning the petition would run, according to its original form, 'Give us this day our bread,' while in the evening there would be substituted, 'Give us our bread for the coming day.' Cf. Lk.'s 'day by day,' which obviates any inappropriateness in asking at night for the bread of the day.

Perhaps, however, there is most to be said for the view that ἐπιούσιος is a word specially coined, after the analogy of the LXX πρωτόσιος (Ex 19⁵, Dt 7⁶ 14² 26¹⁸, for Heb. 7:7; EV 'peculiar.' It is evidently derived from πρωτόσιος=wealth, abundance [πρῶτο and όσιος]). Επιούσιος in contrast to πρωτόσιος would thus denote what is needful or sufficient as distinguished from what is abundant or superfluous. If this is the proper rendering of the word, the petition would correspond almost exactly with the prayer of Agur, 'Feed me with the food that is needful for me' (Pr 30⁸ RV).

(f) Fifth Petition.—'Forgive us our debts (ὀφειλήματα), as we forgive our debtors.' Lk. has 'sins' (ἁμαρτίας), while in the explanatory addition given by Mt. (vv. 14, 15) 'trespasses' (παραπτώματα) is used—the word which in the Bk. of Com. Prayer is substituted for 'debts' in the Lord's Prayer itself. 'Debts' is particularly suggestive. In the first place, it reminds us of the personal accountability to God into which we are brought by every act of sin. We may look at sin in many aspects—as the transgression of an ideal law, as a wrong done to our neighbour, as a harm inflicted upon ourselves. But most solemn of all is the thought that sin makes us debtors before God, debtors who have wasted our Lord's money and are called to render account. But further, 'debts' reminds us of a class of sins we are most apt to forget—our sins of omission. It is when we ask ourselves, 'How much owest thou unto thy Lord?' that the full extent of our shortcoming begins to appear. Perhaps we have striven hard against wrongdoing, but what of the things we have left undone? In Christ's great vision of the Judgment, 'Inasmuch as ye did it not' is the preface to the sentence of condemnation (Mt 25⁴⁵).

By teaching us to offer this petition our Lord teaches that God is ready to forgive all our debts. But a condition is laid down. Those who pray for forgiveness must be ready to forgive. On this Jesus placed great emphasis, so great that He does for the fifth petition what He does for no other, adding at the end of the prayer (vv. 14, 15) a sentence of explanation and enforcement, in which He makes it perfectly clear that if we will not forgive those who have trespassed against us, neither will our Father in heaven forgive our trespasses.†

(g) Sixth Petition.—'Bring us not into temptation, but deliver us from the evil one.' This petition follows naturally after the fifth, for the recollection of past falls makes us conscious of weakness and fearful of future possibilities. But is it not an impracticable petition? How can we hope to escape from being tempted? The world and the flesh and the devil are ever with us, and still 'in the midst of the garden'; just where all life's daily cross-paths meet, the tree of temptation grows and the Tempter himself lies waiting. And is it not also a mistaken petition? Is not temptation a means of grace, an opportunity of 'winning our souls'? Does not St. James write, 'My brethren, count it all joy when ye fall into divers temptations' (Ja 1²). Yes, but there is another side to the question. Temptation is a means of grace, but it may prove to be an occasion of stumbling and even of utter destruction. Blessed is the man that endureth it (Ja 1¹²); but what of him who is drawn away by his own lusts and enticed, and so falls into the snare of the devil? By putting this petition into our lips Jesus reminds us that the hour of temptation is always a dangerous hour. He hangs out a red lamp of warning on the dark and crooked road along which we have to pass, and summons us to 'watch and pray' (cf. Mt 26⁴¹ = Mk 14³⁸).

* In support of this interpretation see A. N. Jannaris in Contemp. Rev., Oct. 1894; Expt vi. [1894] p. 51. Cf. also the preceding article.

† If the view is taken that vv. 14, 15 have been imported here by the Evangelist from another connexion such as 18³⁵ (so Meyer-Weiss and Bruce; cf. Holtzmann in Hand-Com.), the words testify at all events to the fact that Jesus was accustomed to lay stress on the relation between human and Divine forgiveness; see Mk 11^{25, 26}, Lk 6³⁷, and esp. the parable of the Unmerciful Servant, Mt 18²³⁻³⁵.

And yet temptations must come, we cannot hope to escape meeting them, and this petition, like every other in the Lord's Prayer, is subject to the rule of the guiding petition of all, 'Thy will be done.' But 'Deliver us from the evil one' is a prayer that Satan may not gain the victory over our souls. That 'the evil one' is the right rendering of τοῦ πονηροῦ is now commonly accepted by scholars on grounds of exegesis. It is in keeping, too, with our Lord's teaching about the presence and influence in the world of a hostile and malevolent will, an 'enemy' of God's Kingdom and its King (cf. Mt 13^{25, 39}). From him we may well pray to be delivered. Jesus Himself prayed for Simon that in the hour of Satan's sifting his faith might not fail (Lk 22^{31f.}). And we know that faith need never fail. God will not suffer us to be tempted above that we are able (1 Co 10¹³), and this petition is an appeal to Him for strength to endure and to overcome in the evil day.

4. Uses.—(1) This is a brevery of Christian prayer, in which all Christian petitions are summarily comprehended. As the commandments of the moral law are all gathered up in the two tables of duty to God and to man, so the petitions of the gospel are all represented in the two divisions of this little prayer. Apart from requests of a personal and particular kind, everything that the universal Christian heart need ask for is explicitly stated or implicitly enfolded here, whether things on earth or things in heaven, things human or Divine, things of the body or the spirit, things of the life that now is or of that which is to come.

(2) It is a model or directory of prayer. According to Mt.'s account, Jesus, when He gave it, had just been warning His disciples against the formalisms of hypocrites and the vain repetitions which the Gentiles use (vv. 5-8), and it was in contrast with these that He said, 'After this manner pray ye.' Looking at the manner of the prayer we are struck by its direct sincerity, its brevity, its simplicity, its calmness and quietness of spirit, its entire submission to the will of God. It teaches us that we are not heard for our much speaking, that long and elaborate prayers are unnecessary, that a simple request like that of a child to a father is enough. It teaches also the right relation and proportion in prayer between what belongs to God and what concerns ourselves. The earthly has its claims, but the heavenly comes before it; and all requests must be made in subordination to the Divine will.

(3) It is a form of prayer. The prayers which John the Baptist taught his disciples (Lk 11¹) must have been forms; and when a disciple of Jesus, reminding Him of John's custom, said, 'Lord teach us to pray,' it was doubtless a prayer-form for which he asked. And Jesus justified the request by replying, 'When ye pray, say, Our Father,' etc. Not that He wished His disciples to restrict themselves to this form or to repeat it incessantly. It is significant that, apart from these two passages in Mt. and Lk., we do not hear of the Lord's Prayer in the NT again. The recorded prayers of the Apostolic Church bear no resemblance to it. When God sent forth the Spirit of His Son into men's hearts, they prayed with freedom as the Spirit gave them utterance. And yet from the first this must have been, and must ever continue to be, a specially consecrated form of prayer, which no one can sincerely use without being conscious that, in presenting his petitions in the very words that Christ has given, he is asking according to the will of God (cf. 1 Jn 5¹⁴).

(4) It is a prayer especially for social use. There are prayers which can be offered only in secret, and Jesus had already spoken of these. 'Thou, when thou prayest, enter into thy closet,' He said (v. 6). But this was a prayer for the whole Christian society: 'After this manner pray ye,' 'When ye pray, say.' The invocation is addressed to 'our Father,' the requests are on behalf of others as well as ourselves: 'give us,' 'forgive us,' 'bring us not,' 'deliver us.' And so this prayer, which is an appeal to the Fatherhood of God, is also a constant reminder of our human and especially of our Christian brotherhood. It teaches us to join our desires with those of the universal Church as we pray for the coming of the Kingdom. It teaches us when we ask for bread, or forgiveness, or guidance and deliverance, to bear the needs of others along with our own on our hearts before God, and to remember that the unspeakable privilege of intercession is of the very essence of Christian prayer.

Literature.

Introductory.—The Lord's Supper has been for centuries, and is to-day, a theological storm-centre; though the blasts have shifted, recent critical scholarship having occasioned a new incidence of forces. Former controversies raged round the meaning of the institution. At present the discussion is even more vital, for it is a matter not of interpretation only, but of the trustworthiness of the sources. The Gospels as they now stand are said to owe so much to the thought and practice of the growing Church, that it is necessary to read between the lines in order to detect the simple form of the Eucharist on the day of its first celebration, when 'it signified rather the abrogation of the old worship and the near approach of the Kingdom than the institution of a new worship.' It is denied that Jesus, with His views as to the speedy consummation of His Kingdom, could have instituted the Supper as a perpetual memorial of His death; and the connexion in the Gospels between the Last Supper and the Passover is regarded as a later overlying deposit, which can be easily detached from the primitive stratum. To take an example, Jesus is supposed to have uttered the words of the Supper recorded in the Gospels on the impulse of the moment. Feeling Himself already victor over death and the world, He wishes to inspire His disciples with His own conviction, and by an act of vivid imagination conceives Himself as already dispensing the blessings of the completed Kingdom, their simple farewell meal having been transformed into the great Messianic banquet of the future, which commonly served as a figure for the joys of Messiah's sovereignty. Professor Gardner is even more drastic in his treatment of the Gospel tradition, eliminating all evidence except that of St. Paul, who, he thinks, was the real originator of the rite, having 'turned a pagan ceremony to Christian use' in a moment of ecstasy under the influence of what he had seen of the Greek mysteries in Corinth. But the great majority of impartial scholars who have discussed the question do not adopt such a highly critical attitude towards the narratives of the institution of the Supper, or reverse so completely the ordinarily accepted views as to its origin and purpose. No sufficient treatment of the Lord's Supper can pass in silence these problems which have been raised with great learning and acuteness, but they must be discussed in relation to the method of Jesus the Messiah, who brings Israel to its fulfilment.

1. The Sacramental in Hebrew worship.—The term 'sacrament' denotes an outward and visible sign of an invisible spiritual reality. By means of symbol, which is metaphor transformed into action or concreteness, truth is conveyed to the participants in a sacrament much more readily than by the bare word. Language conveys truth, but symbol does what language cannot compass. The worship of the OT was full of the symbolic, for it is almost certain that the cultus was in its essence no arbitrary prescription of meaningless forms. The sacrificial system was held to be a means of grace, of Divine appointment, whereby the worshipper could approach Jehovah. It must have been educative, so that the obedient and leal-hearted Israelite became in the actual observance more receptive of moral and spiritual truth. In that sense the sacrificial system of Israel was truly sacramental. But whether the average Hebrew recognized the sacramental character is doubtful, for the great prophets constantly warn the people that the mere ritual performance of sacrifice is inefficacious. Some, especially the earlier prophets, often seem to disparage offerings entirely, as though the only worship with which Jehovah is well pleased is the spiritual service of moral character and a contrite heart. And yet the prophets employ symbolic action again and again in the service of an ideal spirituality, so that in itself symbol has been a widespread and perfectly legitimate means of grace. The transcendental element in worship, however brightly or faintly the contemporary life of Israel may have been illumined by the spiritual truth of the prophets, had all but vanished from the official Judaism of our Lord's day. There was no open vision. No prophet or seer was abroad in the dull day of rationalism. Heroic faith had been displaced by a shrewd but commonplace conduct. The Law had come in alongside Temple service, and ritual was observed as an ordinance. The average Jew, having become a deist, could not feel sky, earth, and sea palpitate with the Divine Spirit, and so was impervious to sacramental conceptions (W. P. Paterson, art. 'Sacrifice' in Hastings' DB iv. 341; Bousset, Rel. des Judenthums, pp. 182-184). It was to the 'poor of the land' who cherished the prophetic ideal that the parabolic, the sacramental, the symbolical in the teaching of Jesus would appeal.

2. The Method and Teaching of Jesus.—The Gospel narratives represent the Supper as a solemn final act in the life of the Messiah. But the Messiah of their delineation is a Person of startling originality. He penetrates through the crust of unimaginative moralism to the living prophetic stream which in His day found its way to the surface only in tiny rivulets. On His own authority He claims, while purifying and enlarging the hopes of prophecy, to fulfil all that was truest in the religion of Israel, having accepted in His Temptation the Divine ideal of a Kingdom unalloyed by any earthly aspirations. He discovers and applies to Himself the title 'Son of Man,' and in virtue of His position inaugurates changes in religion which constitute a breach with the past, for His doctrine concerning worship, foreshadowed by the prophets, antiquates bloody sacrifices and opaque ritual. To say that Jesus could not have instituted the sacraments of Baptism and the Lord's Supper, because He looked for a speedy realization of the Kingdom, is to deny that He had the complete vision of the destiny of the Servant of the Lord whose function is assumed by the Son of Man, whereas it seems certain that He foretold a spiritual inheritance among the Gentiles in return for His faithful service even unto death (Is 42^{ff.} 52^{13ff.} 62^{ff.}, Mk 1¹¹, Lk 4¹⁰⁻²¹, Mt 12¹⁸, Mk 10⁴⁵). Another unique prophetic ideal was the consummation of the Kingdom in the Day of the Lord. With respect to this also we must assume that Jesus was a creator of spiritual truth, for the consistency of the Synoptic portraiture of Jesus, and the purity of His own views as to His mission, demand that our interpretation of His outlook into the future of the Kingdom should not be limited by the current ideas of Jewish apocalypses, or by the literal symbolism of OT prophecy.

We infer from the Gospels, (1) that before the close of His ministry in Galilee Jesus had looked forward to His death as the goal of His service (Mk 8³¹); (2) that this death was to result in the redemption of the new Israel to which the prerogatives of the old would be transferred (Mk 10⁴⁵ 12¹⁻¹²); (3) that He expected an earthly future for His Kingdom outlasting the earthly Jerusalem, and involving its establishment among the Gentiles (Mk 4³⁰⁻³² 12¹⁻¹² 13^{10, 14ff.}, Lk 13³²⁻³⁵ 21²⁰⁻²⁴). No less evident, however, was the inability of the disciples to understand that the road of service even unto death was the road to the crowning glory of the Kingdom. For Him thus steadily to set His face towards Jerusalem, was, they thought, a sheer and fatal fascination (Mk 10³²⁻³⁴, Lk 18^{31ff.}).

Nor is the institution of the sacrament of the Supper inconsistent with the method of Jesus. The day for symbolism was not past, provided the symbolism was adequate; and this Supreme Teacher surpasses all others in the use of parable and symbol. Every meal with His disciples becomes sacramental through its prayer of thanksgiving, a symbol of the spiritual truth that in Him God was giving to the world the food that was real indeed (Jn 6⁵¹⁻⁵⁸). Nor would such a procedure be altogether strange to men who would remember that in the OT the common meal was the symbol of a completed covenant (Gen 26³⁰ 31⁵⁴, Ex 24¹¹, 2 S 3²⁰; see König, 'Symbols, Symbolical Actions' in Hastings' DB, Ext. Vol., 171^b). In order to understand the significance of this institution, it must be borne in mind that the disciples had committed all their fortunes to Jesus. Their faith had been for them a heroic venture, and the death of the Messiah meant little less than His desertion of them. That night, death like a dark shadow hovering over them was foreing their loved one within its portal. They could not see that a glorious light was shining on His back, that He was in reality an angel of blessing. They needed a pledge of love significant of the future and yet full of tender memories. This the Lord's Supper becomes to them. That it was a mark of supreme wisdom thus to perpetuate the significance of His death for the completion of His Kingdom in concrete symbolism, is evident from their misinterpretation of their Lord's promise as to the future of His Kingdom on earth and His own return; but we are led to expect only such words and symbolic action as would illuminate the spiritual idea of the Kingdom; not precepts and ritual ordinance for its external organization.

3. Passover Eve.—Jesus came into Jerusalem on the morning of the first day of the week, and for several days escaped the plots of His enemies. But Judas entered into a conspiracy with the chief priests apparently two days before 'the Passover and the feast of unleavened bread' (Mk 14^{1-10, 11}). Ignorant of this accomplished treachery, the other disciples, observing that Jesus has as yet made no arrangement for the celebration of the feast, say unto Him 'on the first day of unleavened bread, when they sacrificed the Passover, Where wilt thou that we go and make ready that thou mayest eat the Passover?' (14¹²). Now we are embarked upon a sea of difficulties. The Gospels separate very distinctly—the Synoptics on the one side, the Fourth on the other. Did Jesus eat the regular Passover with His disciples, or did He not? At first sight the Synoptic Gospels seem to say that He did. But, according to John, Jesus died on the afternoon when the Passover lamb was slain (Jn 13¹⁻²⁹ 18²⁸).

(a) The Synoptic Gospels.—(a) Evidence that the last meal was eaten at the conclusion of the regular Passover meal is offered by Mk 14¹²⁻¹⁴, Mt 26¹⁷⁻¹⁹, Lk 22^{7, 8, 11, 15, 16}, the last verses laying especial stress upon the desire of Jesus to eat this Passover with His disciples. Many features of the meal also suggest the Passover,—the family group with Jesus presiding, the prayers of thanksgiving, the cups (Lk 22^{17, 20}), the breaking of the bread, the solemn demeanour, the exposition, the conclusion with a hymn.

(β) But the Synoptics contain hints that the Supper was not a regular Passover meal. It is stated in Mk 14¹⁻², that two days before the feast the priests resolved to capture Jesus, and to execute Him before any sympathizers among the populace could interfere; and, since nothing is said to the contrary, it is reasonable to conclude that the purpose was carried out. It would appear that, according to contemporary Jewish practice, Passover, the 14th Nisan, was spoken of as the beginning of the feast Mazoth, though originally Unleavened Bread began on 15th Nisan (Wellhausen, Evangelium Marci, 115; Schürer, ThLZ, 1st April 1893, col. 182; as against Chwolson in Das letzte Passamahl). But only work necessary for preparing food was permitted from sunset on the 14th to sunset on the 21st, and it would have been illegal or contrary to custom to arrest Jesus that night with swords and staves, to hold a meeting of the Sanhedrin, to release a prisoner, to purchase grave-clothes, and to take the dead body down from the cross, if He ate the regular Passover meal on Thursday evening Nisan 14. Further, there is no mention in the Synoptic narrative of their eating the lamb (Jewish Encyc. x. art. 'Passover'). Jesus died on a Friday, so that we may probably assume from Mk 14¹⁻² that Passover (Nisan 14) fell on the Sabbath, which began on Friday at sunset. Nevertheless the preponderating impression of the Synoptic Gospels is certainly in favour of this meal having been related in some way to the Passover feast. It is distinctly so stated, and it is difficult to suppose that there were not good grounds in the primary sources for such united testimony.

(b) The Fourth Gospel.—From Jn 18²⁸ we must infer that Jesus died on the afternoon before Passover—'between the two evenings' (Dt 16⁶). This inference is so strongly reinforced by Jn 13¹⁻²⁹, that

Dr. Hort, with whom Dr. Sanday and Mr. C. H. Turner agree, believes that the Fourth Evangelist is silently correcting a false impression left by the Synoptists (Expos. iv. v. [1892] p. 182; Hastings' DB i. 411^a). On the other side see Edersheim, Life and Times of Jesus the Messiah, Bk. v. ch. x.). St. John neither here nor elsewhere refers directly to the institution of the Supper, but in 6⁵³⁻⁵⁹ his conception of the truth that underlies the Sacrament is set forth in the conversation of Jesus. He states that the miracle of the feeding of the 5000 took place at Passover time (6⁴, so true reading), probably seeing in it a figure of the Christian Passover. Notwithstanding, therefore, his fixing of the day of our Lord's death before the regular Passover, there is good ground for holding that he implicitly relates the Last Supper to the Passover (Westcott, St. John, pp. 96, 113; Holtzmann, NT Theol. ii. 503; Wendt, St. John's Gospel, 137-139). See, further, artt. DATES, vol. i. p. 413 ff., LAST SUPPER, PASSOVER (II.).

(c) The Apostle Paul.—Though 1 Co 5⁷⁻⁸ is often interpreted so as to make St. Paul agree with the Fourth Evangelist, that Jesus died when the lambs for the feast were slain, it is very doubtful whether this idea was in his mind. He is comparing the Christian life with the old Passover upon which the Feast of Unleavened Bread followed (Ex 12¹⁹ 13⁷). So now, since the Christian Passover has begun through the sacrifice of Christ, all impurity must be removed from their lives. Perhaps 1 Co 10^{1-2, 6, 15, 16} have the imagery of the Passover; 'the cup of blessing' (v. 16) was one of the most sacred elements of the Paschal meal (Edersheim, op. cit. ii. 510 f.; but for opposite view, see Holtzmann, op. cit. ii. 184 f.).

The figure of 1 Co 5⁷⁻⁸ may refer to an actual celebration of the Christian Passover in the Corinthian Church, for we know that in the middle of the 2nd cent. Easter was the most important annual festival of the Catholic Church, and there is no evidence of its having been introduced after the Apostolic age. The great Quartodeciman controversy (c. 165 A.D.) was not concerned with doctrinal differences, but with the date on which the universal Christian feast was to be held—whether the Jewish date, Nisan 14, or the Sunday of Easter week. No inference can be drawn from it as to the connexion between the Eucharist and the Passover, inasmuch as the Christian Passover was not a memorial of the Passover only, but of redemption in which Christ's death and resurrection both were the essential factors. The Supper would be at most one element in the celebration, and possibly had little direct Paschal significance. The Church of the last half of the 2nd cent. assumed that there was agreement among the four Evangelists with regard to the time of Christ's death, and apparently accepted the Synoptic chronology, Origen and Eusebius making definite attempts to bring Jn. into conformity with the other Gospels. Zahn, however, holds that the Quartodecimans interpreted the latter in accordance with the former (Gesch. NT Kan. i. 1. 191). For a fuller discussion, with older literature, see Zahn, op. cit. i. 1. 180-192; J. Drummond, Character and Authorship of Fourth Gospel, 444-513; Stanton, The Gospels as Historical Documents, 173-197; Preuschen in *PRE*³ xiv. 725-734 takes a different view.

The easiest explanation of this conflicting evidence is that Jesus did not eat the regular Passover feast with His disciples, but that He did eat a meal by anticipation on Nisan 13, the night before the regular Jewish celebration, which was in some sort a keeping of the Passover by this little group (but see Robinson, art. 'Eucharist' in Encyc. Bibl. i. § 3). The words of Jesus in Lk 22^{15, 16} become intelligible when we remember what the Passover meant, and also His method in promulgating His Kingdom. Passover was the greatest national feast, gathering into itself whatever was most sacred in the religious life of Israel. It was the memorial of national redemption. Through its families—each a part of the larger whole—Israel entered annually into renewed covenant relationship with Jehovah, who had graciously preserved and ransomed the people. It was a sacrificial feast allied with the shelamim or peace-offerings. The sprinkled blood denoted atoning efficacy (v. Orelli, 'Passah,' in *PRE*³ xiv. ; art. 'Passover' in Hastings' DB iii. and in Jewish Encyc.) Now Israel is on the point of being transformed. A new redemption is to be completed. Jerusalem and the Temple, with its bloody sacrifices and ritual worship, are soon to disappear. But while the Messiah is abrogating the letter of the old, He fulfils its spirit. He is supplying new wine-skins for the new wine. Just as He has provided the new Israel with a new conception of worship (Mt 6¹⁻¹⁸, Jn 4²¹⁻²⁴), a new standard of righteousness (Mt 5¹⁷⁻¹⁸), and a reinter-pretation of the Sabbath (Mk 2²³⁻²⁶ 3¹⁻⁵), so now He transfigures, while yet He preserves the identity of, the central institution of Israel's national life. By 'a masterpiece of practical skill as a teacher' Jesus enshrines, in this symbolic action, for the spiritual representatives of the new Israel, the memory of its ransom through the death of Messiah, whereby a new covenant relationship with Jehovah is possible.

4. The Institution.—Mk 14²²⁻²⁶, Mt 26²⁶⁻³⁰, Lk 22¹⁵⁻²⁰, 1 Co 11²³⁻²⁶ :

1 Co	adds: For as often as ye eat this bread and drink this cup ye proclaim the Lord's death till He come.

We read in Matthew and Mark that, during a meal, Jesus took bread and brake it. Possibly it was one of the unleavened cakes used at the Feast, though the foregoing discussion renders unnecessary any attempt to fix this action into the order of the regular Passover. The procedure was peculiarly solemn, with an added gravity, because for the first time, a few moments before, Jesus had announced that one of the little group was a traitor (Lk 22²¹⁻²³, which puts this after the narrative of the Supper, is probably a displacement). Ruin without, treachery within, the disintegration of the brotherhood may well have seemed to have already begun, and collapse was staring them in the face. Nothing but the serene assurance of Jesus could brace them against such disaster. Like a father presiding at a family meal, He rallies them, in full view of His own death, by such a thanksgiving as they had often heard from Him before (Mt 14¹⁹ 15³⁶, Jn 6¹¹). There is no suggestion here of exaltation or ecstasy. His demeanour is that of confidence, subdued by sorrow for His betrayal and the hatred of His enemies. The presumption from the order of Mk 14¹⁸⁻²¹ and Jn 13²¹⁻³⁰ is against the traitor having remained throughout the Supper.

(a) The common underlying Tradition.—The action of Jesus in solemnly breaking bread and handing it to His disciples must mean that His body is likewise to be broken, destroyed by men; but, when assimilated by His disciples, He in His complete Person will become their spiritual food. It is parabolic, or rather, it may be illustrated by the allegories of the Fourth Gospel, as e.g. Jn 15¹, where Jesus claims to be 'most really and yet not materially the true vine' (Westcott). Quite apart from the question of its historical value, the discourse of Jesus in Jn 6⁴⁷⁻⁵⁹ may be used to illuminate this procedure, because the same truth is expressed in Jn. in words as in the Lord's Supper by words and symbol.

The second part of the Supper is another solemnly acted allegory. Old is passing over into new. At Sinai sprinkled blood had ratified a covenant (Ex 24⁴⁻⁸). Jeremiah, all but submerged in the flood which was carrying on its surface the fragments of the old system, sees like a rainbow of hope the new covenant which, with its promise of forgiveness of sins, was to be established on a perfect knowledge of God; and later came the profound truth that this new covenant between God and man could be inaugurated only by the death of the Servant of the Lord, whose sufferings would bring salvation to the whole world (Is 42⁶ 49⁸ 52^{13, 14} 53^{11, 12}; see Kautzsch, 'Religion of Israel,' in Hastings' DB, Extra Vol. 708).

The new covenant is about to be ratified by Messiah's blood. The many are to be ransomed (Mk 10⁴⁵), these representatives of the true Israel being but the first to appropriate the benefits of the new covenant. Parabolic or symbolic this meal was, but both parts do not convey the same truth. The first action is a vehicle for the truth that Jesus Himself will continue to be for His disciples their heavenly food unto eternal life; the second that, in virtue of Messiah's death, salvation from sin is possible through the covenant grace of God. To attribute the conception of the second half of the institution, as it is recorded in Mk., to the influence of Pauline thought, is to do injustice to the fact that its roots are deeply imbedded in OT prophecy, although, like many other ideas, its flower first appears in the teaching of Jesus.

His closing words have a future outlook. Death will end in victory, and when the Day of the Lord shall usher in the Kingdom, He will again hold fellowship with His disciples at the eternal Messianic banquet. That Day began to come with power as the Spirit-filled Church received the Gentiles for her inheritance, and the eagles gathered upon the carcase of official Judaism.

(b) Differences in detail.—The records, as preserved in the TR, divide into two types—Mark-Matthew and Luke-Paul. In the shorter recension of Luke, to be referred to later, there is an independent narrative. We begin with the Markan tradition, reproduced mainly in Matthew, as the earliest source.

(i.) Mark-Matthew.—The words 'take (eat)' may perhaps be intended to emphasize the representative action of the disciples. As those who are to sit on twelve thrones, they are not eating a common meal but accepting this blessing for Israel. Some justification of this view may be found in the fact that in Luke and Paul the addition 'which is (given or shed) on your behalf' is qualified by the words 'do this in remembrance of me,' whereas in Mk.-Mt., which omit this injunction altogether, the words run 'which is shed for many,' as though the meal had a wider reach than an ordinary supper. The omission from Mk.-Mt. of the command to repeat the meal as a memorial is the most remarkable difference between the two sources for the Supper. Mt. differs from Mk. in minor points, the most important being the addition of the words 'unto remission of sins,' which may have been a current or ritual interpretation, but in any case merely render explicit the idea of the new covenant (Jer 31³⁴).

(ii.) Luke 22¹⁵⁻²⁰.—The difficulties of the text are such that so far no final decision has been reached with regard to them, some scholars indeed thinking that the textual problem is involved in the Synoptic problem. The evidence is as follows: (1) The TR is supported by \aleph ABCL. (2) Old Latin b e (k defective) have the order 16. 19^a. (καὶ λαβὼν ἄρτον . . . τὸ σῶμά μου) 17. 18, and omit 19^b. 20. Old Syriac (Syr^{sin} and Syr^{cur}) agree in the main with old Latt., though with interpolations. Their order is 16. 19. 17. 18. 21. 'And he took bread and gave thanks for it and brake it and gave and said: This is my body which is for you (Syr^{sin} + 'is given'): do this in remembrance of me. And (Syr^{sin} 'after they had supped') he took a cup and gave thanks over it and said: Take this and share it among yourselves (Syr^{sin} + 'this is my blood of the new covenant'). I say to you that from this time on I shall not drink of this growth of the vine (Syr^{sin} 'fruit') until the kingdom of God comes.' The Pesh. omits 17. 18; Egyp. omits 16-18; Marcion omits 16. 18. 19^b, and after 19^a comes the cup, but there is only one. (3) D a ff² i l omit 19^b and 20. Hort, with whom Nestle agrees, is strongly of opinion that vv.^{19b, 20} were not part of the original text of Luke. Weiss, Schürer, Zahn, and others also believe in a shorter text, but Zahn looks to the oldest versions rather than to D a, etc., for the proper order. Their testimony is uniform for the order of Mk.-Mt.-Paul (for 1 Co 10¹⁶ even with the Didache can hardly, in the face of 1 Co 11²⁴, be cited for primitive practice) and for only one cup. However, Mark and Paul seem to have influenced the oldest Syriac directly, in its additions 'this is my blood,' etc., and the command for repetition. If the longer text be accepted, as it is by many scholars, the mention of the two cups may be due to the recapitulatory propensity of Luke (Thayer), or the first cup may signify the close of the Old Covenant in the last Passover (16-18), while the second cup belongs to the New Covenant (19^a. 20). In favour of the latter view it may be observed that 'a cup' occurs in v.¹⁷, but in v.²⁰ 'the cup,' as though well known in the Church (Holtzmann). There is, however, other evidence in this chapter of unsuitable order if not disarrangement, as e.g. vv.^{18, 21-23}, where a change of position would fit the narrative better: and if Jn 13¹⁻³⁰ may be taken as a guide, it would seem that Lk 22²⁴⁻²⁷ should come before the institution of the Supper. Hence Hort's excision of vv.^{19b, 20} is as yet the simplest solution of the difficulty. In that case Luke did not intend to give the detailed account of the institution of the Supper, but rather its meaning. Whatever the original order may have been, there can be no doubt that he desires to lay stress on the Paschal character of the meal. The old dispensation is closing. For the last time Jesus hands His disciples the Passover cup: in the coming Kingdom He will provide for them a heavenly vintage (cf. Jn 15⁴). (See Hort, 'Notes on Select Readings,' p. 63 f.; Nestle, Textual Crit. of Gr. Test. p. 276 f.; Zahn, Eint. in d. NT, ii. 357 ff.; Sanday, Hastings' DB ii. 636; Plummer, St. Luke, 496).

(iii.) Paul.—1 Co 11²³⁻²⁶ is evidently drawn upon by the author of the longer account of the Supper in Luke. The Apostle gives unimpeachable authority for his view of the Supper, claiming that he had a revelation from the Lord, though it is highly probable that he derived it indirectly through the Apostles (ἀπό seems to involve a remote source; see Schmiedel, Hand-Com. ii. 162). Of the variations from Mk.-Mt. the most important are the repetition of 'Do this in remembrance of me,' and the change of 'This is my blood of the covenant' into 'This cup is the new covenant in my blood': while the common Synoptic prophecy of Jesus that He will drink the new fruit of the vine in the Kingdom with His disciples, gives way to a Pauline interpretation of the forward aspect of the Supper—'ye proclaim the Lord's death till he come.'

In 1 Cor. the subject is introduced incidentally. There is no formal description of the first Supper, with full historical detail. The narrative is intended to correct abuses among light-hearted Greeks, who seem to have degraded the Supper to the level of their former heathen club-banquets (συσσίτια, ἑσπαι). They had few such sacred associations as the Jews, whose annual Passover was a valuable discipline in reverence for Jehovah their Redeemer. These Corinthians had poor ideas of the awful cost of their redemption, when they failed to recognize the meaning of this memorial of Christ's redeeming death, and by their selfish party-spirit profaned the Lord's Supper, instituted as it was at such a time as the night on which preparations for His betrayal were being matured (παρεδίδετο). The rite as described here is essentially the same as in the Gospels; but in the Gospels we have the historical account of its creation; while 1 Cor. describes an ideal celebration for the Christian brotherhood.

According to 1 Co 11²³⁻²⁶, the ruling idea of the Supper is the symbolical display of redemption through the death of our Lord, and the same conception, under the figure of the Christian Passover, is involved in 1 Co 5⁷. Another truth also underlying 11²³⁻²⁶, but especially taught in 10¹⁶⁻²², is that all those who partake of the spiritual food and drink in this Sacrament are brought into fellowship with Christ Himself, and are thus united into one body (vv.^{5, 4, 16, 17}).

(iv.) The Fourth Gospel.—Though the institution of the Supper is not found in Jn., the final discourses of Jesus (13-17) are coloured with the thought of it and of the love-feast, like brilliant clouds irradiated by the sun which they hide. It is in a measure true to say that, while the Synoptists are concerned with the Supper, St. John lingers upon the memory of the love-feast, for the conversations have the one great theme fittingly introduced by the deed of humility on the part of Him who having loved His own, loved them unto the end. He had exhibited the new law of love of which His death would be the crowning expression, and He becomes at once their example and their Sanctifier (see esp. ch. 17). The Evangelist, as we have seen, seems to correct the Synoptists as to the day of Christ's death, but he relates the discourse of ch. 6 to the Passover, and in the theme he agrees substantially with them, for the words 'this is my body . . . this is my blood,' with their symbolic accompaniments, find an excellent interpretation in Jn 6⁴¹⁻⁵⁸, which can hardly be dissociated from the later institution of the Supper (see Westcott, St. John, 113; Holtzmann, NT Theol. ii. 501-503; Loisy, Quatrième Évangile, 702-722, 760, 811).

RESULTS.—(a) The Lord's Supper was instituted by Jesus as a perpetual memorial of His death. It is true that the words 'Do this in remembrance of me' do not occur in the oldest tradition, and may, perhaps, in their present form be traceable to St. Paul; but it is incredible that he should have originated this sacrament, and that it should have been adopted from him by the Jewish Christians. The ordinance was in existence among the Jerusalem Churches before his conversion, and the symbolism and narrative which he received must have been invested with a peculiar sacredness, for, as preserved in the written Petrine source (Mark) at least twenty years later, while different and distinctly more original, they are essentially the same. It is difficult to see how the early Christians would have turned every meal into a commemoration of their Lord's death without His command, for even after the death they failed for a while to understand its full significance. After Pentecost they might have found their meals to be symbols of His perpetual presence to nourish them, but that they should have combined with this the necessity of His death, which remained a solemn mystery, would be inexplicable except under the example and instruction of their Lord.

(b) The Evangelical records relate the Supper to the Passover either directly or indirectly, but no such transformation of the original feast as we find in the Supper would have been made by the primitive Church, which remained thoroughly Jewish, except under the guidance of Jesus.

(c) Like all other teaching of Jesus, this does not prescribe new ritual dependent for its validity upon a set of fixed terms. Possibly freedom was allowed even with regard to the order of the action (see shorter text of Luke, 1 Co 10¹⁶ and Didache): certainly the spirit was not to be enslaved by an inerrant repetition of sacred words. Complete verbal accord is not to be found in the records, nor even in St. Paul is there a fixed liturgical formula such as might be repeated by a presiding officer; but the import of the Supper was preserved and conveyed mainly by a generally uniform Christian practice.

(d) The Lord's Supper was a 'visible word' conveying the truth of the awful mystery of Redemption. Until He came, however long or short might be the interval, His followers, Jew and Gentile, would in this acted parable read their Master's mind in regard to His death, the culmination of His service of love on their behalf. 'The Passion of Christ was itself a sacrament or mystery of an eternal truth: it was the supreme sacrament of human history: the outward and visible sign of a great supra-temporal fact' (W. R. Inge, Contentio Veritatis, p. 298; see also art. FELLOWSHIP, § ii.).

5. The Apostolic Church.—(a) The Jewish-Christian Community.—'To break (or 'the breaking of') bread' (κλάω—ἡ κλάσις τοῦ ἄρτου) is almost a formula in the NT (Mk 8⁹ ||, Mt 26²⁶, Lk 24³⁵, Ac 2⁴², 4⁶ 20⁷, 11, 1 Co 10¹⁶, 11²⁴). The term does not seem to have been employed for the ordinary meals of the Jews or their sects in any formal way (see Jer 16⁷⁻⁸, La 4³). Undoubtedly sacrificial feasts shared in by fellow-worshippers were common not only in heathen circles but among the Jews; they were consecrated by thanksgivings and other religious ritual (Schürer, ThLZ, 1891, 32), and it would have been quite natural for the Christians thus to associate themselves together; but a widespread religious custom is not sufficient to account for the usage, and its nomenclature among the early disciples. Why was it distinguished from the 'fellowship' (κοινωνία) and singled out by a different terminology? Partly because of the memory of their Lord's constant table-fellowship, to which His thanksgivings, with their intense reality, had given religious significance, but much more because of the Last Supper carrying His command. That Supper made every common meal more sacred. Enshrining the love of their Master in the symbolism of its closing scene, it gave new meaning to the communion of brethren at their common board. It became the source of a renewed joy, and the daily inspiration of a richer hope. So the term 'breaking of bread' covers more than the observance of the Eucharist. It designates the meals of which this ordinance formed an integral part, the action of breaking bread, which was the largest factor of their meal, being used to denote the whole feast. We may assume that the disciples followed their Lord's example, celebrating a love-feast, which would be enriched with memories of their Master and teaching from His nearest disciples, and closing with the more solemn thanksgiving for the broken body and the cup of blessing which Jesus had consecrated.

(b) The Pauline Churches.—There are signs in the letters of St. Paul that there was a widespread doctrine and practice to which his own churches would conform (Ro 6¹⁷), so that his influence over any churches but those of his foundation must not be exaggerated, especially in matters so vital as the sacred observances on which the personal disciples of Jesus would be regarded as primary authorities (cf. 1 Co 11²). Nevertheless the Church underwent a profound change when it passed from Jerusalem and the village churches of Judæa to the large cities of Syria, Asia Minor, and Greece. All ranks now contributed their share to the brotherhood. Thus of necessity the disciples could no longer meet daily, and their regular gatherings were held on the first day of the week (Ac 20⁷, 1 Co 16², Rev 1¹⁰). Probably the conduct of the service at Troas (Ac 20⁷⁻¹¹) was that of the average Gentile congregation, but little can be gathered from it except that there was a weekly meeting of the church on Sunday night, followed by a common meal, at which, in this case, St. Paul presided, and protracted the discourse till day-break. The Lord's Supper may have been observed at some time during the common meal.

Thanksgiving was such an outstanding feature of the meal that already in 1 Co 10¹⁶ there is mention of 'the cup of blessing which we bless' (some think it is so called in distinction from the cups at heathen banquets), and afterwards the meal is called 'the Eucharist' (Ignat. Philad. 4, Smyr. 6; Justin Martyr, Apol. i. 64-66, Trypho. 116, 117). This Supper, originated and presided over by the Lord (τὸ κυριακὸν δεῖπνον), did not owe its validity to any official president or to any Apostolic blessing. It was a celebration of the brotherhood as a whole; indeed, the sacrilege of the Corinthians consisted partly in destroying the bond of love which united into one body the brethren who ate one bread (1 Co 10¹⁶, 11²⁰ff.). Only brethren seem to have been admitted to the Supper, though unbelievers and strangers attended other gatherings of a hortatory or didactic nature (14²³). It is noteworthy that the direct references to the Lord's Supper in the epistolary writings of the NT are confined to 1 Cor., so that we may possibly attach a larger importance to the function of the Lord's Supper in the Christian life than the Apostle Paul (see 1 Co 14-17), though he did undoubtedly regard it as a powerful means of grace (1 Co 10¹⁶⁻²¹).

(c) The Agape and the Lord's Supper.—While the word 'Agape' occurs only once in the NT (Jude 12, for the reading of 2 P 2³ is almost certainly ἀγάπης), there can be no doubt that the common meals of the primitive Christians, and the table-fellowship which the Corinthians abused, answer to the later Agape. A new name was given to what was really a new thing, for there is nothing elsewhere like the spirit of love which called into existence and pervaded the common intercourse of the brotherhood. The occasion for the origin of the name may be found in Jn 13-16, though the technical term probably did not come into use till long after the brethren had been enjoying the reality.

What did 'the Lord's Supper' (τὸ κυριακὸν δείπνον, 1 Co 11²⁰) precisely mean? Was it the concluding part of the Agape, later called the Eucharist, or did it include both the Agape and the Eucharist? Or was the Lord's Supper a distinct Eucharistic meal separate from the Agape? The decision turns partly on the interpretation of 1 Co 11²⁰. Jülicher is of the opinion that 'the Lord's Supper' was quite unlike all other congregational gatherings, and holds that St. Paul found fault with the Corinthians because by their greed they turned a meal, which was meant to serve the brotherly unity of the Church, into a means of satisfying their appetites (see Stewart, Expos. July 1898, and also Drews, PRE³ v. 562 f.). But there are two decisive objections to this view. (α) The Apostle says that the ordinance was instituted 'after supper' (μετὰ τὸ δεῖπνῆσαι, 11²⁵). (β) Bread and wine would not occasion the gluttony which he rebukes. It is much more difficult to decide between the other views. Those who hold that the Agape culminated in the Eucharist, and that the whole was called 'the Lord's Supper,' explain that the selfish conduct of the Corinthian cliques rendered impossible any table-fellowship like that of the first Lord's Supper, when the feast of love culminated in the Eucharist. (Keating, Agape and Eucharist, Appendix B; Robertson in Hastings' DB i. 490^b). Perhaps this agrees with the term 'breaking of bread,' and the practice as outlined in Acts, but the words of St. Paul seem to separate this part of the feast from the rest. It is a 'Lord's meal' because of the institution by the Lord which he proceeds to relate. 'It is impossible for you to eat a real Lord's Supper when you have acted so disgracefully in the Agape.' Further, the institution 'after supper,' and the subsequent history of the ordinance, seem to be most easily explained on this view. (Weizsäcker, Apost. Age, Eng. tr. vol. ii. 283 ff.; Zahn, 'Agapen,' in PRE³ i. 236 f.). The abuses which led eventually to a separation of the Agape from the Eucharist were abundant in Corinth, though the process of dissociation proved to be slow, and varied in different localities.

6. The sub-Apostolic Church.—(a) Clement of Rome.—To counteract the disturbances resulting from the Corinthian rivalries, Clement urges the necessity of order and reverence in the service, which will be effected by every one abiding in his own part (41). The bishops must offer 'the gifts blamelessly and holily' (44), i.e. 'the prayers and thanksgivings, the alms, the Eucharistic elements, the contributions to the Agape, and so forth' (Lightfoot). His stately prayers and insistence upon orderliness may point to a developing liturgical service, but the epistle sheds no real light upon the place or meaning of the Eucharist in the worship of the Church.

(b) Pliny's Letter to Trajan (A.D. 112).—This letter is of importance, but raises vexed questions. How far the practice described extended beyond the Church of Bithynia, and the trustworthiness and interpretation of evidence which he drew from apostate Christians, are doubtful. He says: 'Essent soliti stato die ante lucem convenire carmenque Christo quasi deo dicere seque invicem, seque sacramento non in scelus aliquod obstringere, sed ne furta, ne latrocinia, ne adulteria committerent, ne fidem fallerent, ne depositum appellati abnegarent: quibus peractis morem sibi discedendi fuisse, rursusque coeundi ad capiendum cibum, promiscuum tamen et innoxium' (Ep. 96. 7).

Just what is involved in the word sacramentum has divided scholars. Lightfoot (Ign. i. 50 ff.) and Ramsay (Ch. in Rom. Empire³, 219 f.) believe that the Eucharist and the Agape were separated at this time, and that the social meal, which was held in the evening, had been repressed in accordance with the Roman Imperial policy against associations (Keating, 54 ff.). Weizsäcker is not very clear (op. cit. ii. 249, 285), but Zahn (PRE³ i. 236, art. 'Agapen') and J. A. Robinson (Encyc. Bibl., 'Eucharist,' § 17) are unwilling to draw such a conclusion. Possibly the abolition of the Agape was local and temporary (Mayor, Clem. of Alexandria, Strom. vii. 376 ff.). In any case, undue emphasis should not be placed upon the Imperial policy as a uniform influence, for there were other contributory local forces at work, introducing changes into worship; and when Ignatius wrote, the Eucharist and the Agape were still united 'in some parts of Asia Minor, and probably at Antioch' (Lightfoot).

(c) The Teaching of the Twelve Apostles.—The uncertainty of the date and local origin of the Didache renders its witness doubtful. Quite different in tone from Paul, and not influenced directly, it would appear, by John, it may be taken as a type of widespread Jewish Christian life within the limits of Palestine, and possibly Egypt, about the end of the 1st century. The Supper, called 'the Eucharist,' and associated with 'the breaking of bread,' is mentioned in chapters 9, 10, and 14. The Eucharist is not yet separated from the Agape, if, indeed, they are not identical, for the latter is not mentioned, though some take ch. 9 to contain the closing prayers of the Agape, and ch. 10 those of the Eucharist (Zahn, Weizsäcker, Weiss, Loofs). It is held on the Lord's Day, and is preceded by confession, for only pure hearts make praise and thanksgiving possible. The order, as in the shorter form of Luke, is cup and bread; but nothing is said as to the method of celebration, except that, while a set form of prayers is given for ordinary use, prophets are allowed freedom. There is no sign of a priest, and the celebration is the common act of the whole Church. Only the baptized are to partake of the Eucharist, which is that holy thing that cannot be given to the dogs, though not because the Eucharistic elements are regarded as conveying some mysterious power, or are, in any sense, sacrificial; for there is not much advance on Ro 12¹.*

The Didache is mystical, like the Fourth Gospel. Life and knowledge come through the appropriation of Jesus Christ as Messiah, but no reference is made to redemption through His blood. A unique figure—that of the grains of wheat being brought together to form one loaf—is applied to the sanctification of the Church in a unity. Thanks are given for knowledge of God, for faith and immortality brought through Jesus the Servant, and for daily food, but especially for the spiritual food through Jesus. After the stress of the present evil age, which may soon close with the advent of the Lord, will come the peace of perfect mystical union in the Church of the completed Kingdom (Bartlet, 'Didache,' Hastings' DB, Extra Vol. 439 ff.; Drews in Neutest. Apokryphen, 182-188).

(d) Ignatius.—The Lord's Supper assumes large

* εὐχαριστία in Christian usage has two concrete senses besides the abstract sense: (1) a thanksgiving in words, and (2) a thanksgiving in offerings; and in early times it appears to denote always the offering or thing offered itself, not the ceremony or service, or the institution' (Hort, JThSt, vol. iii. 595).

importance. By a transference of the name for the prayer of thanksgiving to the whole meal it is called 'the Eucharist' (Eph. 13, Phil. 4, Smyr. 6, 8). It is still associated with the Agape (Smyr. 8, 1, 2), and the term 'breaking of bread' seems to include both (Eph. 20). His utterances often stand out untoned in the atmosphere of controversy with the Docetists, against whom he is never wearied of insisting upon the reality of the human nature of Jesus Christ which is essential to salvation. Only in the one Church is this full truth preserved, and the Eucharist is the symbol of unity, for there the gifts of salvation which are the full fellowship of life with Christ find fleshly expression. So, to be valid, it must be celebrated by the bishop, who, as opposed to all heretics, performs the sacrament as an act of the Church as a whole. For Ignatius the spiritual supersensible world is intensely real, but it becomes illusory without an earthly or material form, and only through the appropriation of the flesh and blood of Christ do believers enter into mystical union with God. This is most fully realized in the breaking of bread, an action efficacious as an antidote to spiritual death—'a medicine for immortality' (φάρμακον ἀθανάσιον, Eph. 20). Some hold that Ignatius regards the elements of the Supper as purely symbolic, for in Phil. 5, 1, the gospel is called 'the flesh of Jesus'; in Trall. 8, 1, faith is 'the flesh of the Lord', and love is 'the blood of Jesus Christ'; and in Rom. 7, Eph. 5, 'the bread of God' is an image of the blessings of salvation without any reference to the Lord's Supper (v. d. Goltz, Ignatius von Antiochien, pp. 72, 73; Lightfoot, Ign. ad Rom. 7; Loofs, PRE³ i. 40). Harnack's most recent view is that in Ignatius, sixty years after St. Paul, the whilom clear theology has become fouled by the Mysteries and their lore (Expansion of Christianity, i. 289). Apparently Ignatius does not think of magical powers as being inherent in material elements, but, influenced by Johannine mysticism, holds that the material forms must be interpreted by a spirit of faith, love, and thanksgiving in order to convey spiritual gifts. Yet he is ambiguous, and his realistic language, partly due to a mind more imaginative than penetrating, opens the door for the cruder conceptions which follow. Perhaps we may go further, and see in his use of the term 'medicine for immortality' the first evidence of the later view of Greek theology, which laid the chief stress of redemption rather on the annihilation of physical corruption by the infusion of the Divine Nature of the Son of God, than on spiritual regeneration through the eternal Divine Person. (Lightfoot, Ign. ii. 45, 171, 258; Inge, Christian Mysticism, 257, and Appendix C; Swete in JThSt. iii. 168; Sanday, The Fourth Gospel, 241-245).

(e) Justin Martyr.—The ecclesiastical term for the Supper is henceforth 'the Eucharist.' Justin makes no mention of the Agape. The Eucharist ceases to be a meal of the congregation and becomes a regular part of the Sunday service, and seems to require the presence of a bishop or some other official for its valid celebration (Apol. i. 65-67). Under the growing tendency towards ritual it began to gather to itself some of the Jewish, or perhaps heathen, sacrificial ideas centring in a special priesthood. Indeed Justin sees in the mysteries of Mithras a demonic imitation of Christian symbolism (Apol. i. 54, 62, 65-67; Dial. c. Trypho., 70, 78). The ideas of Ignatius are in Justin losing their purity. He continues to speak of the Supper as a spiritual life-giving food, but holds that a material change passes upon the elements of the sacrament, so that they nourish our bodies and make them incorruptible, the Logos becoming united by the Eucharistic prayer with the bread, as He took flesh and blood when He became incarnate in Jesus (Apol. i. 66; Loofs, PRE³ i. 40, 41, 45, 46; Swete, JThSt. iii. 169 f.). Harnack put forward a theory that bread and water were the usual elements in the Eucharist at the time of Justin, but it has received little approval, for the most that can be said is that the practice existed among some small sects in Africa (TU vii. 2, 117-144, outlined by Stewart, Expos. July 1898, 43 ff.).

A variety of causes led to the discontinuance of the celebration of the Agape along with the Lord's Supper. (a) The increase of abuses as they are found already in 1 Cor. and Jude. (b) The growth of the Church in large cities, where it became impossible for the Christians to meet together in house-celebrations. (c) The increasing power of the bishop and clergy, who found in house-gatherings a menace to the unity of the Church, together with the development of the dogma that the presence of a bishop was necessary to make a Supper valid. (d) Charges of child-murder and cannibalism (θυσία δειπνα, οιδιποδέλου μίξαις). (e) The enforcement of the Imperial law against associations (see Drews, PRE³ v. 'Eucharistie'). The change, already widespread in the time of Justin Martyr, whereby the Supper is definitely called 'the Eucharist' and becomes the central part of public service, was of vast consequence, and gradually spread over the whole Church, transforming the conception of worship. In Tertullian's circle the Eucharist is celebrated in the early morning and the Agape is held in the evening (Apol. 39, de Corona. 3). But authorities differ as to the completeness of the separation at Alexandria in Clement's day, Bigg, e.g., saying that 'the Eucharist was not distinguished in time, ritual, or motive from the primitive Supper of the Lord' (Christian Platonists, 102, 103), while Mayor is doubtful (Clem. Alex. Strom. vii. 382), and Zahn is strongly of the contrary opinion (PRE³ 'Agapen,' 234).

7. The Lord's Supper and the pagan Mysteries.—Dr. Percy Gardner may be taken as a representative of a few scholars who trace the influence of the pagan Mysteries on St. Paul.

'The great difference between the teaching of the Synoptic Jesus on the one hand, and the teaching of Paul, of the Fourth Evangelist, and of the author of Hebrews on the other, is just that the latter is permeated, as the former is not, by the ideas of spiritual communion, of salvation, of justification, and mediation—ideas which had found an utterance, however imperfect, in the teaching of the thiasoi. . . . Christians are, like the Pagan Mystae, called upon to be θεοί and ἄγγελοι. The language of the Pauline and Johannine writings shows the translation of Christianity on to a new level by the reception and baptism into Christ of a set of ideas which at the time, coming from a Divine source, were making their way into the various religions of the human race' (Explor. Evangel. p. 340 ff.). H. J. Holtzmann also holds that in separating the sacrament as a specifically religious act unrelated to the kernel of his gospel, Paul opened the gates to 'mystery' conceptions (NT Theol. ii. 186, 187).

But the sacrament of the Supper was in existence before St. Paul, and its import well established in the Jewish section of the Church before the gospel went to the Gentiles, who for many decades were not sufficiently influential to stamp the sacrament with 'mystery' conceptions even if they had so desired. All this type of thought was alien to the Jewish mind, the only section of the nation that was in sympathy with these ideas being the Essenes, who derived their sacramental meals—in some sort 'mystery' associations—from foreign sources, and they cannot be regarded as a factor in the shaping of the Christian rite (Bousset, Rel. des Judenthums, 431-443). It is quite gratuitous to say that the ideas of spiritual communion, salvation, justification, and mediation are especially Pauline or Johannine. They had, in fact, a long history in Hebrew thought, and while they are frequent in 'mystery' ritual, their import is different. The pagan Mysteries, even in their purest expression, were tainted with the religious conceptions of old nature-worships. Fellowship through sacraments with the Divine was thought to bring an infusion of the subtle material essence of the god, who thus held present communion with the initiated, and vouchsafed immortality to him. This was the result not so much of a moral act of faith as of an impression produced upon the character by the vision of the Divine drama. Contemplation and ecstasy crown the course of the initiated. A rigorous ethical discipline was also required by way of preparation for the vision of the Divine, but inasmuch as the purpose was to free the soul from its prison-house in the flesh, the purification was chiefly of a ceremonial character. The soul cleansed of earthly impurities would ascend after death into final union with the Supreme (see Dill, Roman Society from Nero to Marcus Aurelius, Bk. iv. chs. v. vi.). Of sin in the Christian sense there is little trace in pagan thought. Such sin as the worshipper was freed from in the heathen Mysteries was inherent in him by reason of human frailty, or was an outward taint of the body (Anrich, Das antike Mysterienwesen, 38). When in the 2nd cent. these subtle shades began to colour Christian thought, it was a sign that the full summer was passing.

St. Paul is ruled by the Hebrew idea of sin as it became heightened by the life and death of Jesus. God is for him the supremely moral Person, and sin is treason against His Sovereignty. On His Son, the Redeemer from sin, he lavishes all his loyalty and worship. Indeed, Christ becomes his intimate personal friend and Lord. For him it is Christ to live, which is only another way of saying that Christ is his spiritual food as it is symbolized in the Supper (1 Co 10⁴⁻¹⁷). He does not, it is true, lay inordinate emphasis on the celebration of Baptism or the Supper (1 Co 11⁴⁻¹⁷), but he finds in the common meal of love the most perfect earthly expression of the fellowship of the saints with the Head of the body. The living Christ draws the believers, who have abandoned their former pagan fellowship, into a new communion with Himself. He is the most real of all persons, dwelling in the hearts of a loving company as their thought is focussed upon Him by the symbols of His redemption, and pledged by this memorial of His death to return (see Dobschütz, Probleme d. apost. Zeitalters, 72, 73; Ramsay, Expos., Dec. 1900, Jan. 1901). Even the use by St. Paul of such words as 'mystery' and 'to initiate' (τελειοῦν), 1 Co 2⁷, 2 Co 1²², Ph 3¹², hardly justifies the assumption of conscious influence (Heinrici, Com. [1887] zu 2 Kor. 121; Anrich, 112). Nor is there any more reason for discerning 'mystery-doctrine' in John, for the conception of God and of true worship which rules this Gospel is unsurpassed (4²⁰⁻²⁴), while in 6⁵³ words which might be thought to have a materialistic sense are expressly said to be spirit and life. In the final discourses of Jesus the conditions for receiving the Spirit of Christ are ethical. Those abide in Christ who show their love to Him by obeying His command to love one another. In the First Epistle the final vision of God is promised for the world to come, but only those can know God now who love, and who have had their sins taken away through the Lamb of God who is the propitiation for the sins of the whole world (1 Jn 2², cf. 1 Jn 1²⁹). 'Faith' in Paul, 'love' and 'knowledge,' almost convertible terms in John, are the subjective conditions for communion with God, who dwells in the individual heart attuned to the loving fellowship of the brotherhood.

It may be partially true to say that without the sacraments Christianity would not have conquered Europe, and yet such a judgment should be qualified by the fact that non-sacramental Judaism was the most effective proselytizer of all the religions of the old world. Widespread as the 'mystery' cults were, the Jews became a church within the Roman Empire, exceeding other foreign worships in numbers, the attention it attracted, and the privileges it extorted from a hostile power. Philo, the only 'mystery' philosopher of the Jews, was an isolated phenomenon (Bousset, op. cit. 78, 79).

Unquestionably, the heathen Mysteries satisfied many deep religious longings. The contemplation of impressive ceremonial and a Divine drama concealed from all but the initiated, the litany, the rhythmic music, appealed to the feeling of the worshipper, and swept him into an attitude of mind in which he enjoyed Divine communion and received a pledge of his immortality. By means of a common meal he entered into mystical union with the god, and began the process of deification through the infusion of the imperishable Divine nature. Degraded though these Mysteries often were by magic and superstition, they were felt by their purest votaries to be the guarantee of salvation here in fellowship with God and of a blessed future life (Anrich, pp. 39, 46, 47; Dill, 609-614). And yet Judaism was the most powerful factor in that religious world, because it satisfied more perfectly than any 'mystery' cult the more insistent ethical and spiritual needs of human nature. But Christianity brought to the world a richer boon than either Judaism or the heathen Mysteries. It offered all that was best both in the Mysteries and in Judaism. By its sacraments it disclosed its 'open secret' to Jew and Gentile; and in these sacraments the believer, as one of a brotherhood of saints, was brought into perfect communion with the eternal God who had redeemed him.

The most sacred symbol of this redemption, 'the core of religious worship,' was the Lord's Supper, and it remained truly symbolic until, after the first decade of the 2nd cent., the stream of Christian life, making its way through pagan soil that was saturated with ideas drained off from mystery practice and thought, began to grow discoloured. How far in the succeeding years there was direct imitation between Christianity and the mystery religions, or how far resemblances were due to ideas that had by a long process of religious development become almost essential to the thought of the early centuries, is a problem that still awaits solution. But it was the Gnostic sects that were first invaded and overcome by distinctly heathen influences. The Christian Church, with its immense reserve of spiritual power, performed a mastery and slow retreat from the more exalted positions of the Apostolic age (Harnack, Expansion of Christianity, i. 235-299; Hatch, Hibbert Lectures, 283-309; Mayor, Clement of Alexandria, ch. iii.; Inge, Christian Mysticism, Lect. ii. and Appendix B; and esp. Dill and Anrich, ut supra).

R. A. FALCONER.

LORD'S SUPPER (II.).—The NT passages bearing on this subject may conveniently be divided into the following groups:—

1. Preparation for Institution.—(1) Feeding of Five thousand (Mk 6^{41, 42}=Mt 14^{19, 20}, Lk 9^{16, 17}, Jn 6^{11, 12}). In connexion with this miracle it is important to observe that (a) it is recorded in all four Gospels; (b) the record contains the following significant phrases, which it is well to compare with the phraseology in the accounts of the institution: λαβών (Mk., Mt., Lk.; ἔλαβεν, Jn.), εὐλόγησεν (Mk., Mt., Lk.; εὐχαριστήσας, Jn.; cf. Jn 6²³ εὐχαριστήσας τοῦ Κυρίου), κατέκλασεν (Mk., Lk.; κλάσας, Mt.; Jn. omits), ἐδίδον (Mk., Lk.; ἔδωκεν, Mt.; διέδωκεν, Jn.); (c) the event carried on and emphasized the idea of a sacred meal, which, as a means of communion with God, had been profoundly impressed on the minds of the Jews by the sacrificial system.

(2) Feeding of Four thousand (Mk 8⁶⁻⁸=Mt 15^{36, 37}). In connexion with this must be observed: (a) the same type of phrases as in the Feeding of the Five thousand: λαβών (Mk.; ἔλαβεν, Mt.), εὐχαριστήσας (Mk., Mt.), ἐκλάσεν (Mk., Mt.), ἐδίδον (Mk., Mt.), εὐλογήσας (Mk. only); (b) the same idea of a sacred meal as in the Feeding of the Five thousand. With the Feeding of the Five thousand and the Four thousand should be compared the meals after the Resurrection in Lk 24^{30, 31, 35} and Jn 21¹³, where, though neither appears to have been the Eucharist, the idea of a sacred meal is maintained, and the phraseology should be noticed (λαβών τὸν ἄρτον εὐλόγησεν καὶ κλάσας ἐπέδιον αὐτοῖς καὶ ἐν τῇ κλάσει τοῦ ἄρτου ἐδίδον αὐτοῖς, and λαμβάνει τὸν ἄρτον καὶ δίδωσιν αὐτοῖς, καὶ τὸ ὄψάριον ὁμοίως in Jn 21¹³).

(3) Discourse in the Fourth Gospel in connexion with Feeding of Five thousand. This miracle, like others, is called σημεῖον in the Fourth Gospel (Jn 6^{14, 26}), i.e. it has a place in the group of 'signs' which are so called because 'they make men feel the mysteries which underlie the visible order' (Westcott). The peculiar significance of this 'sign' in particular was drawn out by our Lord in the discourse at Capernaum which followed it. That it was an acted parable of Divine truth He asserted to the multitude which sought Him at Capernaum, in the words: 'Ye seek me, not because ye saw signs, but because ye ate of the loaves, and were filled. Work not for the meat which perisheth, but for the meat which abideth unto eternal life, which the Son of Man shall give unto you: for him the Father, even God, hath sealed' (Jn 6^{26, 27}). Thus it supplied the starting-point for the conversation with the multitude, in which our Lord identified 'the bread out of heaven that is genuine,' which 'the Father giveth,' with Himself as 'the bread of God which cometh down out of heaven, and giveth life unto the world,' 'the bread of life,' 'the bread which cometh down out of heaven, that a man may eat thereof, and not die,' 'the living bread which came down out of heaven' and further declared, 'the bread which I will give is my flesh, for the life of the world' (vv. 32-57). As the conversation proceeded, our Lord spoke, in still clearer terms, of the reception of His flesh and blood as the means whereby there was to be participation in Himself, and as requisite to the possession of life: 'Except ye eat the flesh of the Son of Man, and drink his blood, ye have not life in yourselves. He that eateth my flesh, and drinketh my blood, hath eternal life'; 'My flesh is true food, and my blood is true drink. He that eateth my flesh, and drinketh my blood, abideth in me, and I in him'; 'He that eateth me, he also shall live because of me. This is the bread which came down out of heaven'; 'He that eateth this bread shall live for ever' (vv. 52-58). Recognizing the difficulty caused to His hearers by this teaching, our Lord laid stress on the deep spiritual significance of what He had said: 'The Spirit is the life-giver; the flesh profiteth nothing:

the words that I have spoken unto you are spirit, and are life' (vv. 61-63). By this conversation, the idea of a sacred meal is carried further than it had been in the miracle itself. An act of eating the flesh and drinking the blood of Christ is anticipated as the way in which His disciples will participate in the life which is in Him.

To dissociate this teaching from the Eucharist is to take away the key to its meaning which is supplied by the comparison of the phraseology used in it with that employed by our Lord at the Institution. This fact may be illustrated by the view of Arthur Wright (*Synopsis of the Gospels in Greek*², p. 240, NT Problems, pp. 134-146) that the Eucharist had been observed by our Lord from the first as 'a covenant of service' or 'union,' since the language of Jn 6 would not have been intelligible unless the Eucharist had been already in common use. Wright's view must be rejected as (a) lacking positive support; (b) not really affording a parallel to the existence of a rite of baptism (3²² 4^{1, 2}) before the institution of Christian Baptism (Mt 28¹⁹); (c) being contrary to the tenor of Jn 6, which implies that, to the disciples as well as to the multitude, the teaching had the element of difficulty which shows that the Eucharist was not yet instituted; and (d) as contrary to the parallels by which the discourse about Baptism in Jn 3 is prior to the institution in Mt 28¹⁹, and the teaching about forgiveness in Mk 9²⁵⁻¹¹ (=Mt 9²⁻⁸, Lk 5²⁰⁻²⁴) is prior to Jn 20²¹⁻²³; but its plausibility at first sight is a significant indication of the truth that the discourse in Jn 6 was destined to find its explanation in the Institution of the Eucharist. Thus the teaching may be taken as anticipatory of the Eucharist. As such it suggests (a) a real spiritual participation on the part of the communicant in the human nature of Christ by the power of the Holy Ghost, and a consequent union with His Divine Person; (β) connexion with His death, indicated in the words 'the bread which I will give is my flesh, for the life of the world,' and with His resurrection, indicated by the references to 'the bread of life' and 'the living bread.' Consequently the communicant feeds on the living risen body and blood of the Lord which have passed through death.

The interpretations of the discourse which need be mentioned are the following: (1) that there is no connexion with the Holy Communion, but the feeding on Christ referred to is simply acceptance of His teaching or faith in His work, a view which obviously fails to allow for the distinctive character of the phraseology; (2) that the primary and special reference is to the Holy Communion, the interpretation which best satisfies all the conditions; (3) that the teaching, while not excluding the Holy Communion, is rather to the general verity of spiritual communion with our Lord than specifically to the Holy Communion, a view which, though it may be expressed so as to come very near the interpretation here accepted, does not account for the peculiar phrases used in the discourse and their remarkable likeness to, and explanation by, the words used in the Institution of the Eucharist. The objection that, if the primary reference were to the Eucharist, Jn 6²⁴⁻⁵⁸ would require that mere reception of Communion, even by one who should receive unworthily, would confer the gift of life, is not weighty, since any reasonable treatment of the passage regards it as referring to those who communicate with such dispositions as may preserve them from receiving unworthily.

2. Accounts of the Institution.—(1) 1 Co 11²³⁻²⁵. The earliest history of the Institution which we possess is that here given by St. Paul. It records our Lord's words with reference to the bread: 'This is my body, which is for you: this do as my memorial'; and with reference to the cup: 'This cup is the new covenant in my blood: this do, as oft as ye drink it, as my memorial.' The interpretation of these words is concerned with two subjects:—

(a) The meaning of 'This is my body.' The word 'this' is the subject of the sentence. Viewed in connexion with the introductory words 'took bread,' 'He brake it and said,' it cannot reasonably be understood to denote bread in general or anything else except the actual pieces of bread which our Lord gave as He spoke. The word 'is' is the logical copula between the subject 'this' and the predicate 'my body.' In the Aramaic sentence which our Lord spoke, the predication was probably expressed simply by the juxtaposition of the subject and the predicate without any copula. Either the Greek copula, as used in the record which we possess, or the juxtaposition in the Aramaic sentence which it probably represents, denotes that the subject ('this,' i.e. the bread which our Lord gave to His disciples) and the predicate ('my body') are viewed as identical. The interpretation of the sentence then depends on the sense in which the word 'body' is to be understood. It must be remembered that (a) the idea of communion with God by means of a sacred meal was familiar, as in many religious rites outside Judaism, so also in the literature and the religion which were well known to the disciples, as shown in the Levitical peace-offerings with the threefold division into the portion for God, the portion for the priest, and the portion for the worshipper (Lv 3 7²⁹⁻³⁴); the bread and wine brought forth by Melchizedek, the 'priest of God Most High' (Gn 14¹⁸); the eating of the lamb in the Passover (Ex 12); the meal of Moses and Aaron, Nadab and Abihu, and seventy of the elders in the presence of God (Ex 24¹¹); the prophecy by Isaiah of the feast to be made by the Lord of hosts (Is 25⁶); and the invitations to a meal evidently of profound spiritual significance given by the personified 'Wisdom' of the Sapiential books (Pr 9¹⁻⁵, Sir 24⁹⁻²¹). (β) This idea had been emphasized in our Lord's ministry in the Feeding of the Five thousand and the subsequent discourse, and the disciples had been taught that in eating His flesh and drinking His blood they would have participation in Divine life (Jn 6⁵³⁻⁵⁷). (γ) There is nothing to indicate that the word 'body' is used in any unreal or metaphorical sense, and the added words, 'which is for you,' alluding to the sacrificial efficacy of our Lord's body, appear to identify that which is spoken of with His actual body. (δ) The close connexion of the words 'The Spirit is the life-giver: the flesh profiteth nothing' (6⁶³) with the teaching about eating the flesh of the Son of Man and drinking His blood, suggests that in the rite which our Lord was instituting there would be the operation of the Holy Ghost and a work of spiritual efficacy. (e) However accomplished at the Institution, as in the parallel instances of anticipation in the walking of our Lord on the water and His Transfiguration during the days of His humiliation, the gift contemplated in the rite instituted must be viewed in the light of the spiritual nature and powers of the risen body of Christ. (ζ) The assertion of this spiritual aspect of the body denoted is confirmed when the language in which St. Paul describes Christians as 'the body of Christ' (1 Co 12²⁷) is compared; but this comparison would be pushed beyond its proper force if it were held to imply that the meaning in the two passages is the same, since in St. Paul's teaching the gift in Baptism, which makes men 'the body of Christ' (12²³), is not identified with the gift in the Holy Communion. The exegesis of this part of our Lord's words at the Institution, then, as recorded by St. Paul, indicates that the gift in the Eucharist is the spiritual food of the risen and ascended body of our Lord. The same method of exegesis involves a similar interpretation of the words 'in my blood,' though, in view of the spiritual nature of the risen body, it is impossible to make a sharp severance between the body and the blood.

That this line of exegesis, which is that which is naturally deduced from the study of the Holy Scripture by itself, is right is strongly confirmed by the traditional interpretation in the Church from St. Ignatius onwards.

Other interpretations are (1) that the words 'this is my body' mean, 'This conveys the efficacy of my body but is not my body'; (2) that they mean, 'This represents my body but is not my body.' Both of these interpretations are vitally distinguished from that which has here been adopted, namely, 'This not only represents my body and conveys its efficacy, but also is my body.' To adopt either of them involves putting aside the cumulative argument which has already been briefly detailed; the main argument by which they have been supported is the supposed merely metaphorical character of certain phrases, alleged to be parallel, in which our Lord described Himself as 'the bread of life' (Jn 6^{35, 41, 48}), 'the living bread' (6⁵¹), 'the light of the world' (8^{12, 9⁵}), 'the door of the sheep' (10^{7, 8}), 'the good shepherd' (10^{11, 14}), 'the way' (14⁶), 'the true vine' (15^{1, 5}). In regard to these phrases it must be observed that (1) neither the phrases themselves nor the circumstances in which they were used were really parallel to the words and circumstances at the Institution; and (2) the phrases in question are as a matter of fact very far from being simply metaphorical. In each of them an actual fact about Christ is set forth. Christ in spiritual reality feeds Christians, and gives them light, and admits them into the Church, and tends them, and affords them access to the Father, and unites them in Himself. Similarly, in spiritual reality the bread which He gives in the Holy Communion is His body.

(b) The meaning of 'This cup is the new covenant'; 'this do, as oft as ye drink it, as my memorial.' The interpretation of these sentences turns on three words: (i.) 'covenant,' (ii.) 'do,' (iii.) 'memorial.'

(i.) The sentence 'This cup is the new covenant in my blood,' while recalling the phraseology and promise of Jer 31³¹⁻³⁴, inevitably suggests a comparison with Ex 24¹¹. The making of a covenant between the Lord and Israel is there described. A sacrifice was offered by the slaughter of oxen and the sprinkling of part of the blood of the victims on the altar. After the reading of the book of the covenant in the audience of the people by Moses, and their promise to be obedient to all that the Lord had thus spoken, the rest of the blood was sprinkled by Moses on the people with the words, 'Behold the blood of the covenant, which the Lord hath made with you concerning all these words.' The sacrifice was consummated, and the covenant completed, by the sacred meal wherein 'the nobles of the children of Israel' 'beheld God, and did eat and drink.' The analogy between this series of actions and the Eucharist which the words 'This is the new covenant in my blood' suggest, is worked out with some detail in He 9¹⁷⁻²⁸. The death of Christ and His entrance into heaven with His own blood are there represented as the high-priestly actions of which the slaughter of the beasts and the sprinkling of their blood in the Mosaic sacrifices, alike in the covenant of Ex 24¹¹ and in the ceremonies of the Day of Atonement in Ex 30¹⁰, Lv 16, were an anticipation. The words 'This is the new covenant in my blood' thus bring the Eucharist into close connexion with the high-priestly work wherein Christ offered Himself a sacrifice in His death on the cross, and His entrance into heaven at the Ascension. They denote that the gift by Christ of His body and blood, and the reception of these by Christians, are the means of a covenant relation in the sacrificial action; and that Christians by participating in this rite are in contact with the death of Christ and His high-priestly acts in heaven.

(ii.) The command 'this do' conveys the injunction for the perpetuation of the rite instituted by our Lord in the Church. It has been much discussed whether the word 'do' (ποιεῖτε) suggests sacrificial associations. The truth appears to be that in itself ποιέω is simply negative as to this point. Apart from other indications of sacrifice, it would not suggest any such thing, since in the very large number of instances in which it is used in LXX and NT it is in a merely general sense. In a sacrificial context, however, like the Heb. שָׁחַ, it acquires the idea of 'sacrifice' or 'offer,' as, e.g. in Ex 29³⁹, Lv 9⁷, Ps 66¹⁵, where שָׁחַ (LXX ποιέω) is rightly translated 'offer' in AV and RV. In NT cf. Lk 2²⁷. In this possibility of a special use, side by side with the ordinary use, ποιέω is not greatly dissimilar from the Shakspearian use of 'do,' by which 'do' constantly has its ordinary general sense, but in a sacrificial context in Jud. Ctes. II. ii. 5 acquires the sense 'offer' ('Bid the priests do present sacrifice,' i.e. 'offer sacrifice immediately'). Consequently, the word 'do,' as used by our Lord at the Institution, is in itself wholly negative, and does not suggest or deny the idea of sacrifice. In relation to the context, however, it will be held to be appropriate or inappropriate to the idea of sacrifice according as the suggestion of sacrifice is recognized or ignored in the general surroundings of the Last Supper and in the words 'covenant' and 'memorial.'

(iii.) The primary thought suggested in the word 'memorial' (ἀνάμνησις) is that of a memorial before God, though without excluding the idea of a memento to man. It occurs five times in the LXX, namely in Lv 24⁷, Nu 10¹⁰, Ps 37¹ (= Heb. 38¹ 89¹ (= Heb. 70¹), Wis 16⁶). In Wis 16⁶ it denotes a reminder to man; in the other four passages it denotes a memorial before God. The only place in NT where it occurs besides 1 Co 11²⁴⁻²⁵, and the same phrase in Lk 22¹⁹, is He 10³, where it refers to the remembrance of sins in the Jewish sacrifices. When all the circumstances are taken into account, the thought most naturally suggested is that of a memorial of Christ presented by Christians before the Father, which is at the same time a memento to themselves. If so, the idea differs little from that way of regarding the Eucharist in much Greek theology, whereby it is viewed as the act in which the Church remembers Christ and in remembering Him makes the memorial of Him before the Father. In the sentences 'This cup is the new covenant in my blood: this do, as oft as ye drink it, as my memorial,' then, our Lord associated with the command for the observance of the rite which He instituted, indications that by means of it Christians would have access to His high-priestly work on the cross and in heaven, and would possess a memorial before God and a memento to themselves.

(2) Mk 14²²⁻²⁵. As here recorded, our Lord's words at the Institution were: 'Take ye: this is my body'; 'this is my blood of the covenant, which is poured out for many. Verily I say unto you, I will no more drink of the fruit of the vine, until that day when I drink it new in the kingdom of God.' The words in connexion with the species of bread are the same as those in 1 Co 11²⁴, already discussed, and do not need further comment, except to notice that Mark does not add 'which is for you: this do as my memorial.' In connexion with the cup Mark differs from 1 Cor. in that (1) he has 'this is my blood of the covenant' instead of 'this is the new covenant in my blood'; (2) he omits 'this do, as oft as ye drink it, as my memorial'; (3) he adds 'which is poured out for many'; (4) he adds 'Verily I say unto you, I will no more drink of the fruit of the vine, until that day when I drink it new in the kingdom of God.' As to these differences, it may be noticed: (a) The blood in Mark's phrase is described as being Christ's and as being 'of the covenant,' i.e. it is Christ's because it is the blood which He personally took in the Incarnation, and it is 'of the covenant' because by means of it the covenant between God and man which Christ makes is ratified and sealed. Consequently the meaning of the expression is not substantially different from that used by St. Paul in 1 Co 11²⁵; (β) the consideration of the omission of 'which is for you: this do as my memorial,' 'this do, as oft as ye drink it, as my memorial,' does not belong to this section of the article; (γ) the words 'for many,' i.e. 'on behalf of many' (ὑπὲρ πολλῶν), indicate the sacrificial and expiatory power of Christ's blood. Similarly the words 'which is poured out' (τὸ ἐκχυννόμενον) are connected with the sacrifice of His blood. In the LXX ἐκχέω is often used both of the shedding of blood in slaughter and of the pouring out of the blood of slain victims at the altar. Instances of the latter use are Ex 29¹², Lv 47^{18, 25, 30, 34} 8¹⁵ 9⁹; cf. 1 K (=1 S) 7⁶. The close connexion with the word 'covenant' in Mk 14²⁴, and the general sacrificial surroundings, give strong probability that the meaning here is 'poured out' rather than 'shed,' and that the sense is 'this is my blood,' 'which is sacrificially poured out,' as in the Jewish sacrifices the blood of the slain victim was poured out as the culmination of the sacrifice; (δ) like much else in the Gospels, the words 'when I drink it new in the kingdom of God' appear to have a twofold reference. They refer in part to Christian Eucharists; the 'kingdom of God' is the Christian Church; the drinking 'new' is in the 'new covenant' of 1 Co 11²⁵; thus is denoted the fellowship between Christ and His people in the Eucharistic feast. In a further sense they refer to the 'marriage supper of the Lamb' (Rev 19⁹); the 'kingdom of God' is the consummated Kingdom of glory: the drinking 'new' is in that state in which 'all things' are made 'new' (Rev 2⁵), newness being a characteristic feature of the future as well as of the present Christian life. See art. COVENANT.

(3) Mt 26²⁶⁻²⁹. As here recorded, our Lord's words were: 'Take, eat, this is my body'; 'Drink ye all of it; for this is my blood of the covenant, which is poured out for many unto remission of sins. But I say unto you, I will not drink henceforth of this fruit of the vine, until that day when I drink it new with you in my Father's kingdom.' There is little here different from Mark's account which calls for comment: (a) 'unto remission of sins' is added to 'poured out,' specifying distinctly the object of the sacrificial offering of our Lord's blood; (β) the words 'with you' are added in the description of the future 'new' drinking of 'this fruit of the vine'; (γ) the phrase 'my Father's kingdom' is used instead of 'the kingdom of God,' both phrases alike being descriptive of both the Christian Church and the future perfected Kingdom.

(4) Lk 22¹⁴⁻²⁰. The account here given is as follows: 'When the hour was come, he sat down, and the apostles with him. And he said unto them, With desire I have desired to eat this passover with you before I suffer: for I say unto you, I will not eat it, until it be fulfilled in the kingdom of God. And he received a cup, and when he had given thanks, he said, Take this, and divide it among yourselves; for I say unto you, I will not drink from henceforth of the fruit of the vine, until the kingdom of God shall come. And he took bread, and when he had given thanks, he brake it, and gave to them, saying, This is my body which is given for you ; this do for my memorial. And the cup in like manner after supper, saying, This cup is the new covenant in my blood, even that which is poured out for you.' From the point of view of exegesis, this account of the Institution does not need further comment than what has already been said in connexion with the accounts in 1 Cor., Mk., Mt. From other points of view it would be necessary to discuss (1) the cup which our Lord 'received' (δέξαμενος) before He 'took bread' (λαβὼν ἄρτον); and (2) the shorter reading of the text according to which some authorities omit from 'which is given for you' to 'which is poured out for you.'

3. Pauline teaching.—(1) 1 Co 10¹⁶⁻²¹. 'The cup of blessing which we bless, is it not a communion of the blood of Christ? The bread which we break, is it not a communion of the body of Christ? seeing that we, who are many, are one bread, one body: for we all partake of the one bread. Behold Israel after the flesh: have not they which eat the sacrifices communion with the altar? What say I then? that a thing sacrificed to idols is anything, or that an idol is anything? But I say, that the things which the Gentiles sacrifice, they sacrifice to demons, and not to God; and I would not that ye should have communion with demons. Ye cannot drink the cup of the Lord, and the cup of demons; ye cannot partake of the table of the Lord, and of the table of demons.' The following points here call for comment: (α) St. Paul describes the 'bread' and the 'cup' as being the means by which Christians participate in the 'body of Christ' and the 'blood of Christ'; (β) there is nothing to suggest that the phrases 'body of Christ' and 'blood of Christ' are used in any other sense than that in which they would ordinarily be understood; (γ) the phrases 'which we break,' 'of blessing which we bless,' seem to connect the efficacy of the elements as means of conveying the body and blood of Christ with the consecration of them, not simply with their reception; (δ) this participation by Christians in 'the one bread' is a means of their unity, so that they are 'one bread, one body'; (ε) this description of the 'bread' and the 'cup' as the 'body of Christ' and the 'blood of Christ' must be compared with St. Paul's description elsewhere of Christians being made by means of baptism the body of Christ (see 1 Co 12^{22, 27}, Eph 5³⁰); (ζ) the communion of Christians is analogous to the Jewish sacrifices and to the sacrifices of the Gentiles. As the object of the Jewish sacrifices was to hold communion with God, and as the object of the Gentile sacrifices was to hold communion with the false gods who are more properly regarded as demons, so also the Christian feast aims at communion with Christ.

(2) 1 Co 11²⁶⁻²⁹. 'As often as ye eat this bread, and drink this cup, ye proclaim the Lord's death till he come. Wherefore whosoever shall eat the bread or drink the cup of the Lord unworthily, shall be guilty of the body and the blood of the Lord. But let a man prove himself, and so let him eat of the bread, and drink of the cup. For he that eateth and drinketh, eateth and drinketh judgment unto himself, if he discern not the body.' (α) Christian communion is here declared to be a proclamation of the death of the Lord, a setting forth of it so that it may not be forgotten between the time of His visible departure from the earth and the time of His return. So far as the indications of a sacrificial aspect which have already been noticed are held to be of weight, this proclamation may be regarded in a double manner as a memory among Christians and as a memorial before God. (β) The reception of communion unworthily is said to be an offence of so great gravity as to make the offender 'guilty of the body and the blood of the Lord,' so that his communion is an act of judgment upon himself in his failure to discern or appreciate or estimate the significance of the Lord's body.

(3) 1 Co 12¹³. 'We were all made to drink of one Spirit.' This probably refers to the gift of the Holy Ghost in Baptism, though the use of the word 'drink' has led some to refer it to such a gift in Communion.

4. He 13⁸⁻¹⁶.—The starting-point in this passage is the assertion in v.⁸ of the unchangeableness of Christ: 'Jesus Christ is the same yesterday, and to-day, yea and for ever.' From this is derived the thought of v.⁹, that since Christ, the centre of Christian life, is unchangeable, Christian belief must have stability and consistency. Hence 'divers and strange teachings,' such as those in Judaistic forms of Christianity, and the externalities to which Judaizing teachers would have led Christians, are to be avoided; and the power that stabilishes the heart is to be sought in Divine grace. This contrast leads on to v.¹⁰, the point of which is to emphasize the sharp line which divides Christianity from Judaism; since Christians 'have an altar, whereof they have no right to eat which serve the tabernacle.' Vv.^{11, 12} pass on to the likeness between the Jewish sacrifices and the sacrifice of Christ, in that in the former bodies were 'burned without the camp,' and in the latter Christ 'suffered without the gate.' V.¹³ notes the conclusion from the sacrifice of Christ that it is right for Christians to abandon what is distinctively Jewish. V.¹⁴ takes up the frequently-implied thought of this Epistle, that the old covenant is earthly, and that the new covenant, both now on earth and in its future perfection, is heavenly. The Christian gets beyond the old earthly covenant. He reaches the new heavenly covenant in the city of the living God, which on earth he does not realize as an abiding possession, though even now he has the life of Christ which makes his citizenship, and through which he is eventually to reach perfect holiness and fruition of God. Vv.^{15, 16} point out that through Christ Christians can offer up to God a 'sacrifice of praise,' and that with this are to be associated the 'sacrifices' of doing good and communicating, with which 'God is well pleased.' These two verses, then, describe the worship and life of Christians as being a sacrificial offering to God. The Epistle as a whole regards the heavenly centre of this earthly worship and life as being the high-priestly work of our Lord in heaven. If the 'altar' mentioned in v.¹⁰ is the altar of the Eucharist, this implies that the earthly centre of the sacrificial worship and life of Christians is in the Eucharist. This would be in harmony with the traditional Christian view of the Eucharist as the means whereby Christians enter into and partake of the heavenly offering of Christ. The interpretations of the word 'altar' which need be mentioned are that it denotes (1) Christ Himself, (2) the cross of Christ, (3) the altar of the Christian Church. Any one of these three interpretations would give a good meaning to the verse. It might be truly said that the Jews have no participation in Christ, or in His cross, or in the Christian altar. But the use of the word 'eat' makes it difficult to suppose that a reference to the Eucharist was not at any rate included by the writer. Thus there is the idea of the priesthood of Christ as an abiding priesthood, and the sacrifice of Christ as an abiding and continually pleaded sacrifice in heaven, and of the Eucharist as the means of entering into and pleading that heavenly sacrifice on earth, and as the earthly centre of the sacrificial worship and life of Christians.

5. Rev 5⁶.—'A lamb standing as slain.' The offering of our Lord's living ('standing') created human nature ('lamb'), which had passed through death ('as slain'), is here represented as the centre of the heavenly worship. This passage, therefore, has an indirect relation to the Eucharist as the corresponding earthly centre (see above on He 13⁸⁻¹⁶).

6. Summary.—The results of the exegesis of the NT passages relating to the Eucharist may be summed up as follows: (1) In the reception of Holy Communion there is a gift of Christ's body and blood to sustain and increase His life in those who receive it. (2) The consecrated elements are the spiritual body and blood of the risen and ascended Christ. (3) Those who receive the communion grow thereby in that living union with Christ which their baptism conferred. (4) The feast of communion is also a sacrificial presentation of Christ. (5) It is important to observe that the tradition found in the teaching of the writers of the Church corroborates what is thus seen to be taught in the NT.

DARWELL STONE.

LOST.—The word 'lost' has come to be invested with a sinister theological significance. A moral sense hopelessly degraded, a sullen abandonment to evil, a persistent closing of the heart, and a future determined beyond the possibility of alteration—are some of the ideas which it compels in the mind. As it fell from Christ's lips, however, the word did not, as a rule, convey any such harsh suggestions. It was rather a word of infinite pathos and of Divine pity. Used in its Middle voice, the verb ἀπόλλυμι denotes irretrievable ruin, as in the great text, Jn 3¹⁶ (cf. also 17¹² 'None of them is lost, but the son of perdition'; see JUDAS ISCARIOT); but as a participle used passively, the form in which we find it in Lk 19¹⁰, and in the group of parables in Lk 15, which bear especially on this subject, it signifies simply a condition of peril, grave, yet with the glad prospect of recovery.

What moral condition of humanity is meant by the word 'lost' appears from the character of those to whom Jesus directed His message. Broadly speaking, the society of His day was split up into two classes. There were those who, with the advantage of wealth, or, if wealth were denied them, with praiseworthy self-denial, contrived to satisfy the demands of the Law; and, on a platform infinitely lower, stood those who had neither the will nor the means to bear so heavy and so doleful a burden. These latter comprised the sinners, the lapsed, and those recreant Jews who so far forgot themselves as to take service under the conquering Power. They had no share in Israel's hopes; they had ceased to cherish the ideals of the race. It was precisely to this class, called by the Pharisees in a bitter hour 'an accursed multitude which knoweth not the law' (Jn 7⁴⁹), that Christ mainly appealed. He ate and drank with them: He made the conditions of entrance to His Kingdom such as were possible for them all. With a profound sense of what they had missed in life, He summed up their imperfections under this term, 'the lost.' Reviving a beautiful OT figure, He compared them with sheep that had gone astray. If the reality of the case demanding sterner language, His supreme pity covered that fact from His eyes. They were simply 'lost'; and the word, sorrowful as it was, yet with a ring of hope in it, expressed, while at the same time it concealed, the heinousness of their sin. It was a moral condition full of danger, because they acquiesced in it, and were in some measure content to abide under the shadow of the contempt of their fellow-men. It was a condition full of hope, because it was due partly to circumstances that were invincibly against them, and partly to a merely thoughtless divergence from the true way of human life.

But the delicate shades of meaning which Christ imparted to the word may best be appreciated from its use in the trilogy of parables in Lk 15. From them we learn that, however sinister may be the suggestions which the word carries to our minds, it did not, as employed by Christ, indicate any supreme or singular degree of vice. To be lost was to wander, aimlessly and thoughtlessly, or in wantonness and self-will. It was to live in vain, as a coin that lies hidden among the dust; to turn aside from life's true way, and therefore miss life's true end. There is a suggestion in the term of the lost ideals that one used to hold, and of the forlornness of the mind from which those ideals have fled. There is a hint of the entanglement of the wandering soul in influences that hold it back from safety. There is the generous implication that sin is always in a greater, or less degree the result of ignorance, of a thoughtless and wild pursuit after unknown pleasures into unknown paths, until the true path is lost to view, and the unhappy wanderer does not know where it lies. The term leaves also upon the mind the impression that to be lost one does not need to wander far. A man need step but a little way aside to find himself among circumstances that stand up about him and shut out the light, and then, equally with him whose 'feet stumble on the dark mountains,' he is lost. But the singular and appropriate beauty of the idea lies in the prospect of recovery which it implies. Whatever is lost may be found, if in its ignorance it cannot find itself. It may be found by him who has lost it, and whose heart, tortured by anxiety and thrilled with exquisite devotion, will carry him in his search over difficult and perilous roads.

LOT.—The suddenness of the Divine Parousia and the unpreparedness and want of expectation on the part of the world, find illustration from 'the days of Lot' (Lk 17²⁸), when the people of Sodom continued their social and commercial activity until 'the day that Lot went out' (v. 29).

Lot's wife—to whom in Jewish tradition the name עֵיִת Edith is given—is recorded in Gn 19 to have been turned into a pillar of salt as a result of her looking back upon Sodom while escaping to the mountain. Her fate, as one failing to escape imminent and foretold destruction, is referred to in Lk 17³², though without specific mention of the form in which destruction overtook her.

Our Lord's word 'Remember' neither confirms nor rejects the tradition. It is with the spiritual fact and its lesson, not with the memorial, that He is concerned. The folly of unreadiness, of the longing for things left behind, of the desire to retain a transient little in the face of impending judgment and at the cost of a greater and eternal loss, is the lesson He would teach in connexion with His Parousia, from the remembrance of Lot's wife.

LOTS (Casting of) (λαγχάνω, κλήρον βάλλειν).—Among the Jews the lot was in frequent use (see Hastings' DB, art. 'Lots'). It was the recognized method by which the order of service and most of the individual duties of the priesthood were determined. The order of the 24 'courses' or priestly families was arranged by lot. The 'course' to which Zacharias (Lk 1⁹⁻⁹) belonged was that of Abijah, which stood eighth on the list (1 Ch 24¹⁻¹⁹). Each family or 'course' was on duty for a week, from one Sabbath to another, twice a year (2 K. 11⁹). The priests from whom the officiating ministers for the service of the day (ἐφημερία) were to be chosen, had to present themselves 'washed' (Ex 40¹²⁻¹⁵) before the officer who had special charge of the lots. The lots were cast in the 'Hall of Hewn Polished Stones' in the Temple. The distribution of duties for a day among the priests required that the lot should be cast four times. The priest who had to offer incense was chosen by the third lot. This duty was regarded as one of special honour, and the lot by which it was assigned was cast after prayer and confession. The decision was accepted as indicating the man whom God had chosen to offer the prayers of the people. The third of April or the first week of October is by some reckoned as the time when Zacharias was appointed to offer incense (Lk 1⁹). It may have been at the morning or the evening service.

At the Crucifixion the soldiers cast lots for the clothes of Jesus. As they were divided into 'four parts, to every soldier a part' (Jn 19²³), it was evidently a quaternion of soldiers that was on duty. The Synoptists simply record the parting of the garments by lot (Mt 27³⁵, Mk 15³⁴, Lk 23³⁴). In Jn, special reference is made to His 'coat.' It is impossible to say whether the 'coat' was added to one of the four parts, or if a separate lot was cast for it. The precision and detail of the narrative in Jn, have been regarded as proofs that the Fourth Evangelist was an eye-witness of the things which he records. In the casting of the lot for the 'coat' he saw the fulfilment of one of the predicted woes of the Messiah (Ps 22¹⁸). The quotation is in the exact words of the LXX. Critical editions of the NT omit the quotation in Matthew.

There is no indication as to the particular method by which the lot was cast in the two incidents in which it is employed in the Gospels.

It may be noted under this heading that the idea of the lot as giving expression to the Divine will runs through all the words which relate to inheritance (κληρονομίαι, -ομία, -ονόμος). With this fundamental significance all such words become part of the language of grace. The right of inheritance in the Kingdom of God, or to eternal life, does not spring from legal enactment or personal merit, but from the will of God.

JOHN REID.

LOVE.—In the word 'love' is concentrated, we may say, the essence of the Christian religion. It is love that is the outstanding feature in the revelation Christ has given us of the nature of God, love that is the controlling power in the life of the Son who claimed that he that had seen Him had seen the Father (Jn 14⁹). On the two commandments to love God and to love our neighbour, Christ declares that all the Law and the Prophets hang (Mt 22⁴⁰). In the commandment to love one another as He has loved them, He sums up the new law which He lays upon His disciples, declaring that by their fulfilment of it the faithfulness of their discipleship shall be known (Jn 13^{34c}). We propose to exhibit from different points of view the place which love holds in the doctrine of Christ.

1. The love of God for man.—It is certainly true, as has been pointed out, that Christ does not, in the Synoptic Gospels, speak directly of the love (ἀγάπη) of God. But if He does not thus expressly predicate love of God, it is because He has already endowed Him, as subject, with this love in the highest degree. The doctrine of the Fatherhood of God, which is the foundation of the whole gospel of Christ, contains within it the fullest recognition of the love of God. If the Apostolic writers of the NT expand with greater fulness the doctrine of the Divine love, they are only making explicit the truth involved in the assurance of the Fatherhood of God set forth on every page of the Synoptic Gospels. The God whose love is the constant theme of St. Paul's preaching is the Father-God of Jesus Christ (so H. Holtzmann interprets the Pauline formula ὁ θεὸς καὶ πατὴρ τοῦ κυρίου ἡμῶν Ἰησοῦ Χριστοῦ, Neutest. Theol. i. 171). In the one word 'Abba,' which Christian lips have learned to repeat after the Master, there lies to St. Paul the assurance of the Divine love which can banish the old feeling of bondage and inspire the spirit of adoption (Ro 8¹⁵). The Johannine doctrine that God is love (1 Jn 4⁸) is but the statement in abstract terms of the truth to which Christ has given concrete expression in the doctrine of the Fatherhood of God. For it is the love of God that Christ will express by this name which is so constantly on His lips. He speaks of God not only as His own Father ('My Father'), or as the Father of those who are members of the Kingdom of God ('your Father'), but as 'the Father' absolutely (Mt 11²⁷, Mk 13³², Lk 11¹³). The title suggests more than the relation in which God stands to mankind as their Creator. In Mt 5⁴⁴⁻⁴⁵ Christ urges His hearers to become God's sons by showing a love like to that of their Father in heaven, 'for he maketh his sun to rise on the evil and on the good, and sendeth rain on the just and on the unjust.' Did Fatherhood mean merely Creatorship, there could be no question of becoming the sons of God. All men are God's creatures. The fact that Christ speaks of our becoming God's sons, proves that He is using the terms 'Father' and 'sons' in an ethical sense. By Fatherhood He indicates the love which God cherishes for men, by sonship the love by which they may prove themselves like in character to this Father whose nature is love. This love suggested by the name 'Father' is the very essence of the Divine nature. It is not merely one among the various attributes of God. It is the supreme and dominating element in the Divine character. It is in it that the Divine perfection lies; and when Christ urges us to be perfect as our Father in heaven is perfect (Mt 5⁴⁸), it is evident from the context that it is of the love of God that He is thinking, a fact recognized by Lk., who substitutes 'merciful' for the 'perfect' of Mt.'s version (Lk 6³⁶).

This love of the Father in heaven is the foundation upon which the gospel of Christ rests. It is all-embracing. God is the Father not only of those who are members of the Kingdom of God, i.e. of those who by the love which animates them prove themselves to be His sons (Mt 5⁴⁵), but of all men. The evil as well as the good, the unjust as well as the just, are the objects of His love (ib.); and if the facts to which Christ refers, in this connexion, in proof of the universality of the Father's love, do not go beyond such natural blessings as the sunshine and the rain, that is explained on the ground that these blessings require for their appreciation no special receptivity on the part of those who enjoy them (Beyschlag, Neutest. Theol. i. 81). The Father cares for all. Each individual is precious in His sight. 'It is not the will of your Father which is in heaven, that one of these little ones should perish' (Mt 18¹⁴). The very hairs of our head are all numbered (10³⁰). There is joy in heaven over one sinner that repenteth (Lk 15⁷⁻¹⁰). In the fact of God's Fatherhood there lies the assurance that He will certainly give good things to them that ask (Mt 7¹¹ 18¹⁹), and that He will welcome the penitent sinner who turns to Him (Lk 15¹¹⁻³²). It is the Father's good pleasure, Christ assures us, to give us the Kingdom (12³²), that greatest of all blessings, to obtain which a man might well be willing to sacrifice everything else (Mt 13⁴⁴⁻⁴⁶); and with it He gives us all such material blessings as He sees to be necessary for us (Lk 12³¹, Mt 6³³). When we thus gather together the various utterances of Christ with regard to the God whom He reveals to us as Father, when we think of the assurance that name breathes of bountiful providence, of watchful care, of forgiving love, when we remember, above all, how Christ points to the Father's unflinching goodness towards the undeserving as an instance of the Divine perfection, we must confess that though the Synoptic Gospels contain no direct mention of the love of God, the Being whose character the Saviour seeks to reveal to us by that name 'Father' is one whose very nature is love.

In the Fourth Gospel it is the same representation of the nature of God that meets us. Here, too, 'Father' is the favourite designation. It has been questioned, indeed, whether the title 'Father' has the same significance in the Fourth Gospel as in the Synoptics. H. Holtzmann (Neutest. Theol. ii. 433 f.) maintains that in the constantly recurring designation of God as 'the Father' there is always either an express or a tacit reference to the Son. [For a full discussion of the use of the word 'Father' in St. John, see Westcott, The Epistles of St. John, pp. 29-34]. But there are occasions on which we feel that the title is used in a manner which suggests a reflexion on the love of God quite in the manner of the Synoptics, as when Christ says to the disciples that whatever they shall ask the Father in His name He will give (15¹⁶ 16²³), or when He tells them that He does not say that He will pray the Father for them, for the Father Himself loveth them (16^{26f.}). And in any case the question of the significance attaching to the title 'Father' in the Fourth Gospel is of minor interest in our present inquiry, since that Gospel contains many express declarations of the love of God, the absence of which makes the question of the significance of that title in the Synoptics matter of importance. These express references to the love of God in the Fourth Gospel occur specially in connexion with that aspect of the Divine love which we proceed to consider under the following head.

2. The love of God for man as manifested in Christ.—The highest proof of the Father's love is given in the mission and Person of the Son. This aspect of the Divine love, which is emphasized in the Fourth Gospel, is not unknown in the Synoptics, though it is rather implied than expressed. If the love of the Father is manifested in the bestowal of the Messianic Kingdom (Lk 12³²), that Kingdom which has been prepared for His children from the foundation of the world (Mt 25³⁴), and which is now about to come with power (Mk 9¹), then the sending of the Son (Mt 10⁴⁰ 21³⁷) to inaugurate the Kingdom must in itself be an evidence of the love of God. All things are delivered unto the Son of the Father, and He alone can reveal the Father to man (Mt 11²⁷, Lk 10²²). And this revelation is not confined to His preaching. It embraces the whole of His Messianic work. That work was from beginning to end animated by the spirit of love. He pointed to His works of healing as proof that the Messianic era had arrived (Mt 11⁵ 12²⁸). He described His daily work on one occasion as 'casting out devils and doing cures' (Lk 13³²). He called to all who laboured and were heavy laden to come to Him and He would give them rest (Mt 11²⁸). As He had assured men of the forgiving love of God, so He declared that He came not to call the righteous but sinners (Mk 2¹⁷), and on occasion announced the forgiveness of their sins to those who approached Him (Mk 2⁵, Lk 7^{47f.}). His whole ministry was one continual mission of love, culminating in the willing sacrifice of His own life as a ransom for many (Mk 10⁴⁵). If we look for the revelation which the Son gives of the Father, not only to His preaching but to His Person and work, then we must admit that that revelation is one which confirms at every point the assurance of God's boundless love for man conveyed by the gracious title by which Christ designates Him.

But this aspect of the matter is not emphasized in the Synoptics as it is in the Fourth Gospel. Here the mission of the only-begotten Son for the salvation of man is expressly cited as a proof of the vastness of the love of God (3^{16f.}); and whatever question there may be as to the metaphysical relation suggested by that word 'only-begotten,' there can be none as to the depth of the love involved in the sacrifice of the Son so designated. We may note not only the depth but the wideness of the love here proclaimed. God gives His Son for the salvation of the world. This wider outlook in connexion with the work of Christ is characteristic of the Fourth Gospel (O. Holtzmann, Johannes-evangelium, 49 f., 80 ff.). Christ is the Saviour of the world (4⁴²), the Lamb of God which taketh away the sin of the world (1²⁹). He speaks to the world (8²⁶), gives His flesh for the life of the world (6⁵¹), is the light of the world (9⁵ 12⁴⁶). Into this world burdened with sin (1²⁹) and animated by a spirit of hostility to Himself (12³¹ 17¹⁴), God in His infinite love has sent His Son for its deliverance (3¹⁷). Throughout the whole Gospel there is far more prominence given than in the Synoptics to the fact that Christ has been sent by the Father (5³⁷ 7¹⁶ 8^{16, 28} etc.). He repeatedly refers to Himself as Him whom the Father hath sent (5³⁸ 6²⁹ 10³⁶ 17³). He is not come of Himself (7²⁸), but is come in the name of His Father (5⁴³) from whom He has come forth (8⁴² 16²⁷ 17⁸). Not only does the Son, as in the Synoptics, claim to reveal the Father as none other, He asserts that He is in the Father and the Father in Him (10³⁸ 14^{10, 20} 17^{21, 22}). He and the Father are one (10³⁰ 17²²). The words that He speaks have been given Him by His Father (7^{16f.} 12^{49f.} 14^{10, 24} 17⁸). The works that He does are the works of His Father who dwelleth in Him (14¹⁰). He that hath seen Him hath seen the Father (14⁹). As it is love that has inspired the Father in the mission of His Son, so it is love that is the animating principle in the life of the Son who is one with the Father—love to the Father on the one hand (14²¹), and love to His own in the world on the other (13¹ 15¹³). As the Father has loved Him, so He has loved His disciples (15⁹). He sets His love before them as an example, and bids them love one another as He has loved them (13³⁴ 15¹²). The highest proof of His love is given in His death (10¹⁵ 15¹³). The Son lays down His life willingly in obedience to the commandment of the Father (10^{17f.}). For this the Father has given the Son (3¹⁶ ἔδωκε, if not to be restricted to the giving to the death, may be taken, in view of 3¹⁴, cf. 12³², to include this reference); and the result will be the consummation of the gracious purpose which animated the Father in the giving of the Son. The cross will become the centre of attraction. Through it Christ will draw all men unto Him (12³² 8²⁸ 11⁵², cf. 10³⁴), and gain the victory over the prince of this world (12³¹). Thus will the love which impelled the Father to the sacrifice of the Son gain the end it seeks to attain, man's deliverance from the destruction which threatens him, and participation in the blessing of everlasting life (3¹⁵ 6⁴⁰).

Such is the aspect under which the love of God is presented in the Fourth Gospel. It is in the Person of Christ that we have the full and complete revelation of that love. He is God's love incarnate. The Prologue gives the keynote to the whole Gospel. Christ is the Word become flesh, the perfect revelation in human personality of the Divine nature. He is the only-begotten Son (or only-begotten God, if we adopt the reading θεός instead of υἱός), who has declared the Father to us (1¹⁸). With God in the beginning (v. 2), He was made flesh, and dwelt among us (v. 14). The glory that we behold in Him is a full revelation of the Divine glory, for His relation to the Father is that of an only son who receives the whole of his father's inheritance (ib.). And that glory is the glory of one who reflected in His own person the Divine love, who was full of grace and truth (ib.), and of whose fulness we have received, in ever increasing measure, participating in the grace which flowed from Him.

3. The mutual love of God and Christ.—The words 'Father' and 'Son' as applied by Christ to God and man in their relations to one another have, as we have seen, an ethical significance. It is by His love that God proves Himself the Father. It is by exhibiting a love like to that which God displays that man becomes the son of God (Mt 5⁴⁵). The terms do not lose their ethical content when used to describe the relation in which God and Christ stand to one another. The God whom Christ revealed to men as 'the Father' He had known first of all as His own Father. Such He had felt Him to be from His childhood (Lk 2⁴⁹). So He addressed Him in prayer (Mt 11²⁵, Mk 14³⁶, Lk 23⁴⁶); so He spoke of Him to others (Mt 10³², 11²⁷ 18^{19, 35}, Lk 22²⁹). He knew Himself to be in a special sense the object of the Divine love. He had been anointed of the Spirit for the performance of the work for which He was sent (Mk 1¹⁰, Lk 4¹⁸⁻²¹), and endowed with a power whereby He might triumph over every hostile influence (Lk 10¹⁹ 11²⁰). In a remarkable utterance (Lk 10²², Mt 11²⁷) Christ describes the intimate relationship in which the Father and He stand to one another, 'All things are delivered to me of my Father; and no man knoweth who the Son is but the Father; and who the Father is but the Son, and he to whom the Son will reveal him.' The mutual knowledge which Father and Son have of one another is based upon that mutual love indicated by the terms Father and Son. Christ claims to be able to reveal God in His character of Father (τὸς ἑστὶν ὁ πατήρ) as no one else, for none can have such knowledge of the Father's love as the Son, who knows Himself to be in the supreme degree the object of that love (Mk 1⁹), and can say of Himself that all things are delivered unto Him of His Father, i.e. all things necessary for the fulfilment of the Father's gracious purpose. And the Father can reveal Himself thus to the Son because of the love with which that Son responds to His love, and the meekness and submission with which He surrenders Himself to the Father's will (Mt 11²⁹, Mk 14³⁶). It is evident that in this striking word of Christ's regarding the mutual knowledge of the Father and the Son, the words 'Father' and 'Son' are not mere names to denote the persons concerned, but are used to suggest that mutual love upon which the knowledge is based. And indeed all through the Synoptic Gospels there is always a suggestion of this relationship of mutual love in the manner in which God and Christ are spoken of as Father and Son. Whether, when Christ is spoken of in the Synoptics as the Son of God, there is more than this ethical relationship implied, is a question upon which there is difference of opinion. But it is admitted, even by those who attach a deeper significance to the designation, that, in the first instance at any rate, it has an ethical content, and that, when Christ is called the Son of God, whatever more may be implied, so much in any case is suggested, that on the one hand He is the supreme object of the Father's love, and that on the other He exhibits in His Person in its perfection that loving obedience whereby man may become the son of God.

In the Fourth Gospel the references to the love of the Father and the Son to one another are more frequent and more express. Christ is the only-begotten Son (3¹⁶), loved by the Father before the foundation of the world (17²⁴), and now returned to the bosom of the Father (1¹⁸). He and the Father know one another intimately (10²⁵). The Father loves Him, and has given all things into His hand (3³⁵). As in the Synoptic account of the announcement at the Baptism, Christ is called the beloved Son in whom God is well pleased (Mk 1¹¹), so in Jn. the love of the Father is occasionally represented as being based upon the Son's obedience to the Father's commandment (15¹⁰) and willing sacrifice of Himself (10¹⁷). The Father never leaves Him alone (16³²), for He does always those things that please Him (8²⁹). Because He keeps His Father's commandments He abides in His love (15¹⁰). No higher estimate can be given of the Saviour's love for His disciples than to say that He has loved them as His Father has loved Him (15⁹), nor of the love of God for believers than to compare it to that of the Father for the Son (17²³). Sometimes the love of God for believers is represented as based upon that of the Father for the Son (14^{21, 23} 16²⁷).

And as the Father loves the Son, so the Son loves the Father. He alone has seen and known the Father (3^{11, 32} 6⁴⁶ 7²⁹ 8⁵⁵ 10¹⁵). He does nothing of Himself, but only what He seeth the Father do (5¹⁹). He speaks only as His Father hath taught Him (8²⁸ 12⁵⁰). His meat is to do the will of Him that sent Him (4³⁴). It is love to the Father (14³¹) no less than love to His brethren (13¹ 15¹³) that is the motive that animates Him in the fulfilment of His vocation. In virtue of the love which unites them one to the other, each may be said to be in the other, the Son in the Father and the Father in the Son (10³⁸ 14^{10, 20} 17^{21, 23}). They have no separate interests. Whatever belongs to the one belongs to the other (17¹⁰). The Father and the Son are one (10³⁰ 17²²).

4. The love of man for God.—There is comparatively little under this heading to be found in the Gospels. It is true that Christ has Himself given as the first commandment of all, that which enjoins the love of God with the whole heart and soul and mind and strength (Mk 12^{28ff.}), and in the same spirit in the Fourth Gospel He finds the final explanation of the unbelief of the Jews in their lack of this love of God (5⁴²). But so far as the former of these passages is concerned, it is evident that Christ's answer to the scribe is purposely couched in language borrowed from the Old Testament; and it is a noteworthy fact that at other times, when He has no occasion to conform to OT modes of expression, Christ does not give prominence to the duty of love towards God.

Ritschl has drawn attention to the fact of how small a part the love of man towards God plays throughout the NT as a whole. 'Love is reserved as the characteristic of God and God's Son in the foundation and guidance of the congregation, while of its members faith or trust in God and His Son is demanded' (Recht, u. Vers. ii. 100 f.). B. Weiss thinks that Christ keeps the commandment of love to God in the background, because where the love of God does not awaken such love in return it would be of no avail to demand it (Bib. Theol. of NT, § 25b). Wendt, while recognizing that the idea of love corresponds well, on the whole, to the filial relationship, believes that it is too general, and does not give sufficient prominence to the relation of subordination and complete dependence in which man stands to God. To express the feeling of whole-hearted devotion to God suggested by the idea of love, while at the same time giving full recognition to His infinite love and power, Christ selected the term 'trust' (πιστις) as the one most suitable to describe the disposition man should display (Lehre Jesu, ii. 227).

Whatever the reason, we must recognize the fact that neither in the Synoptics nor in the Fourth Gospel, with the exception of the passages referred to, do we find Christ dwelling on the love which man should cherish towards God. But though He speaks of man's trust in God rather than of his love towards Him, we must not overlook the fact that this trust which Christ seeks to inspire is but love under a slightly different form. It is the response of the human heart to the infinite love of God,—love on the part of man awakened by the love of God, yet humbling itself in the presence of One who, though the Father, is yet Lord of heaven and earth. Without love there can be no such trust as Christ seeks to inspire. The prayer in which this trust finds expression must be the outpouring of a heart full of love to God and of zeal for the establishment of His Kingdom. The righteousness which becomes the members of the Kingdom must be righteousness not of outward conduct alone, but of a heart which takes delight in the performance of the Divine will. The believer is to seek first the Kingdom and the righteousness of God (Mt 6³³), to have his heart fixed on the heavenly treasure (6²¹), to be filled with whole-hearted devotion to the service of God (6²⁴), and to renounce, no matter at what cost, whatever may hinder him in the attainment of the great end set before him (Mk 9⁴³⁻⁴⁵, cf. Mt 13^{44ff.}). Though there may be little explicit reference in the teaching of Christ to the love for God which man is required to cherish, we feel that in the case of the believer no less than in that of Christ Himself, it is the source from which springs all the strength for the performance of duty and the endurance of suffering, and that, just as Christ accounted for the unbelief of the Jews by the utter lack in them of this love of God (Jn 5⁴²), so, if we trace back to its beginnings the faith which the gospel inspires, it will be found to issue from the love to the Father who has revealed Himself in Christ.

5. The love of man for Christ.—Of love for Christ there is almost no mention in the Synoptics. In one utterance, indeed, Christ requires His followers to love Him more than their closest earthly relatives (Mt 10³⁷). But the purpose of that saying, as is proved by the parallel passage, Lk 14²⁶, is not so much to insist on a personal affection for Himself as the condition of discipleship, as to emphasize the supreme worth of the good represented by His own Person, compared with which the joys of family life are to be esteemed as nothing. The nearest approach to any reference to love of Himself as a motive for conduct is to be found in those passages in which He puts His own Person in the foreground, requiring of His disciples a readiness to sacrifice themselves for His sake (Mk 8³⁵ 10²⁹), and attaching high importance to the most trivial acts done in His name (Mk 9³⁷, 41). On these occasions He identifies Himself with His cause. When He requires devotion to Himself, it is only another way of requiring devotion to the truth revealed in His Person. Thus He speaks of sufferings borne for His sake and the gospel's (8³⁵ 10²⁹, cf. Lk 18²⁹), and of being ashamed of Him and of His words (Mk 8³⁸, Lk 9²⁶). In this spirit He welcomed the love displayed by the woman who anointed His feet in the Pharisee's house, as a proof of the sincerity of the repentance which filled her heart, and of the vastness of the blessings she was conscious of having received (Lk 7⁴⁷).

In the Fourth Gospel, where the personal relation to Christ is so strongly emphasized, there is more direct reference to love as the disposition the believer may be expected to display towards Christ. Jesus tells the Jews that if God were their Father they would love Him, for He proceeded forth and is come from God (8⁴²). Of the disciples He says, on the other hand, that the Father loveth them because they have loved Him, and have believed that He came from God (16²⁷). Something is, indeed, still lacking in their love. He tells them in His farewell address that if they loved Him they would rejoice because He said that He went unto the Father (14²⁸). But though their love be not perfect, He can confidently reckon upon it. He would only remind them, as He does more than once in the course of that address, that a true love for Him will manifest itself in the keeping of His commandments (14²¹, 23¹⁷). So it had been with His own love for the Father (14³¹). So let it be with the disciples. Let them prove the sincerity of their love to Him by the loyalty of their obedience. Such a relationship to Himself, love manifesting itself in faithful fulfilment of His commandments, is the condition upon which the giving of the Paraclete is promised (14^{26ff.}). Where it exists, Christ promises the enjoyment of the closest communion with the Father and Himself (14²¹, 23). It is quite in keeping with the emphasis that has been laid upon love throughout the Gospel as the relation which must exist between the disciple and Christ, that in the final scene with Peter in the Epilogue He should thrice address to him the question, 'Lovest thou me?' (21¹⁵⁻¹⁷), as if to suggest that such love is the indispensable qualification on the part of one who would be a true shepherd of Christ's flock.

In view of these quotations, it is difficult to understand Ritschl's statement (Recht, u. Vers. iii. 560), that, apart from Jn 21^{15, 16}, there is no reference in the NT to love towards Christ. Certainly it is the case that, for the most part, faith is the usual formula to indicate the relation of the believer to Him. But it is quite in accordance with the general character of this Gospel, with its conception of a mystical union between the believer and Christ (15^{1ff.}), to use warmer colours to paint the devotion of the believer, and to describe that complete self-surrender to Christ, which is the true relation to Him, as the work of love.

6. The love of man to man.—Alongside of the first great commandment to love the Lord our God, Christ places a second, 'Thou shalt love thy neighbour as thyself' (Mk 12³¹). The high importance He assigned to this duty is evident from the place He gives it alongside of the commandment to love God. 'There is none other commandment greater than these' (ib.). Both are ethical in their nature. The ceremonial observances in which Christ's contemporaries thought to find the fulfilment of this first commandment are never to be allowed to stand in the way of the performance of the offices of love towards our fellow-men. These latter, because they are ethical, are the weightier matters of the Law which are on no account to be omitted (Mt 23²³). To refuse to support one's parents, on the plea that one desires to make an offering of the money that might be used for this purpose, is to make a travesty of religion (Mk 7⁹⁻¹³). The ethical stands above the ceremonial. God desires mercy, not sacrifice (Mt 127). The first commandment may be to love the Lord our God, but when it is a question of showing love towards our brother man or performing some act of worship towards God, there can be no doubt which is to come first, 'Leave there thy gift before the altar, and first go thy way; be reconciled to thy brother, and then come and offer thy gift' (5^{23f.}).

In the enunciation of this second great commandment, Christ specifies the love which men are required to show for one another as the love of one's neighbour. Doubtless the word was suggested by the precept from Leviticus which He quoted, just as the form of the first commandment is based, as we have seen, upon the language of Deuteronomy. When we inquire as to the wideness of the circle denoted by the term 'neighbour,' we seem to find an answer in the parable of the Good Samaritan, which was told, according to Lk., in response to the question that had been put, 'Who is my neighbour?' (Lk 10²⁹⁻³⁷). But in its present form that parable gives no satisfactory answer to the question. After telling the story of what befell the traveller, how he was maltreated by the thieves and passed by in his miserable plight by the priest and the Levite, and how at last the Samaritan took compassion on him, Christ asks, 'Which now of those three, thinkest thou, was neighbour unto him that fell among the thieves?' The answer is, the Samaritan; and the conclusion of the parable seems to be that it was the traveller's duty to love the Samaritan, i.e. that the term 'neighbour' is wider than the lawyer who had put the question seemed to imagine, and must be held to embrace any who by their conduct prove themselves worthy of the name, whether they be Jews or not (so Wendt, Lehre Jesu, ii. 268). This is certainly the logical conclusion from the parable as it at present stands, but it is questionable whether this can have been the lesson Christ desired to enforce by it. It starts with the object of proving who is one's neighbour in the sense of diligendus (v.²⁹), and ends by proving who is the traveller's neighbour in the sense of diligens, v.³⁶ (Jülicher, Die Gleichnisse des Jesu, ii. 596). The nearest approach that it reaches to a definition of the term 'neighbour' in the sense required is contained in the 'Go and do thou likewise' with which it concludes. The usual method of interpreting the parable is to find the answer to the question in the practical lesson enforced by that exhortation, and to conclude that our neighbour is anyone who requires our help. But in view of the immediately preceding statement that the neighbour of the traveller was the Samaritan who had compassion on him, it seems utterly incongruous to conclude that the design of the parable is to teach that one's neighbour is not one's benefactor, but anyone that one can benefit, i.e. in this case that the traveller was the neighbour of the Samaritan. So we can only conclude that Lk. is responsible for the introduction of the parable in connexion with this question of the lawyer's, and that whatever the original purpose for which it was related, it was certainly not designed to give an answer to the question, 'Who is my neighbour?' in the sense of 'Who is the person I am required to love?'

But the precise scope of the term 'neighbour' in the mouth of Christ is of the less importance, as it is only on the occasion of His interview with the scribe (Mk 12²⁸⁻³⁴, Mt 22³⁵⁻⁴⁰) that He thus defines the limits within which one is to show love towards one's fellow-men, and there, as we have seen, He is evidently formulating His answer in the language of the OT commandment. In opposition to the narrow sense in which the term

'neighbour' was interpreted by His contemporaries, who could add to the injunction to love their neighbour a corollary to the effect that they were to hate their enemy (Mt 5⁴³), Christ enjoined a love which was to embrace both friend and enemy (v.^{44f.}). The Golden Rule which Christ has given men to guide them in their offices of love takes us far beyond the circle of neighbours in the narrow Jewish sense. The command runs, 'All things whatsoever ye would that men (not your neighbours) should do unto you, do ye even so to them' (7¹²). We are to show love to all. 'Whosoever shall smite thee,' 'if any man will sue thee,' 'whosoever shall compel thee,' 'he that asketh thee,' 'he that would borrow of thee,'—these are the phrases with which Christ introduces those to whom He commands His disciples to show love (5³⁹⁻⁴²). Sometimes He describes them as 'brothers' (5^{22, 24} 7³⁻⁵ 18^{15, 21f., 35}), not in the sense of those who are bound to us by natural ties, in which sense brotherly love is practised by the Gentiles as well (5⁴⁷), nor in the sense of fellow-citizens of the Kingdom of God (so B. Weiss; Westcott, The Epistles of St. John, note on 1 Jn 2⁹), in which sense the word would reproduce in a new form the limitation that attached to the Jewish interpretation of the term 'neighbour,' but in the same wide sense as He applies the term 'Father' to God. He is the Father not only of the members of the Kingdom, but of all mankind (5⁴⁵), and by using the term 'brother' to denote the objects of our love, Christ will suggest that it is to be a love as wide and all-embracing as that of the Father in heaven, who bestows His bounties on good and evil,—a love not only of those who are members of the Kingdom of God, but of all who have the right to look up and claim God as their Father in heaven (Wendt, Lehre Jesu, ii. 270 f.). The command to forgive our brother his trespasses (18³⁵) is interpreted in the widest sense in 6^{4c}, when, in place of forgiving our brother, Christ speaks of forgiving men their trespasses.

From various occasional utterances of Christ we can form a general idea of the nature of the love which He expects men to display in their relations to one another. Its unselfishness on the one side, and its interest in the welfare of others on the other, are features which continually appear in the exhortations in which He seeks to inculcate it. In illustration of the unselfish spirit which He commends, He urges His hearers to invite to their banquets not their friends and kinsmen who may invite them in return, but the poor, the maimed, the lame and the blind, who cannot recompense them (Lk 14^{12ff.}). In the same spirit He bids men lend, hoping for nothing (6³⁵, according to the translation of μηδὲν ἀπελπίζοντες best suited to the context). Another aspect of the unselfishness which is characteristic of the spirit of love Christ would instil, is the suppression of those vindictive feelings which are prone to rise when we experience ill-treatment from others. We are required to forgive those who have wronged us, not seven times, but seventy times seven (Mt 18^{21f.}); to be so far from resenting injury we receive from another that we turn the other cheek to the smiter, allow him who would take away our coat to have our cloak also, and go two miles with him who would compel us to go one (5³⁸⁻⁴²); to love our enemies, and to pray for them that persecute us (5⁴⁴). Again, this unselfishness will exhibit itself in the absence of all self-assertion or desire to attain pre-eminence among our fellows. Such self-exaltation is characteristic of the scribes and Pharisees (Mk 12^{38f.}, Mt 23^{5ff.}), and of the Gentiles (Mk 10⁴², Lk 22²⁵). But the follower of Christ, who came not to be ministered unto but to minister, and who was among His disciples as he that serveth, will be ready to stoop to the lowliest service (Mk 10⁴³⁻⁴⁵, Lk 22^{26f.}), and will seek for self-exaltation only through self-abasement (Lk 14¹¹).

But while love is thus regardless of self, it will ever seek to advance the good of others. It will give readily to supply their demands (Mt 5⁴², Lk 6³⁰). Nay, it will be quick to anticipate them. It will teach us to put ourselves in their place and realize what they stand in need of. 'All things whatsoever ye would that men should do to you, do ye even so to them' (Mt 7¹², Lk 6³¹). We shall not hesitate to share with them our earthly goods. 'It is more blessed to give than to receive' is a saying of Christ's preserved by St. Paul (Ac 20³⁵) which is not recorded in the Gospels. In the picture which Christ has painted of the Judgment, He claims as offices of love performed towards Himself acts of kindness done to our unfortunate fellow-creatures (Mt 25³⁴⁻⁴⁰). That is the wise use of our riches whereby we make to ourselves friends of those whom we benefit (Lk 16⁹). But we shall care not only for our brother's worldly interests, but also for his spiritual welfare. We are solemnly warned to give heed lest we cause him to stumble (Mk 9⁴², Lk 17^{1f.}). It is not the will of our Father which is in heaven that one of these little ones, i.e. the humblest member of the Kingdom of God, should perish (Mt 18¹⁴). And while we are careful to avoid the censorious spirit which takes delight in uncharitable judgment of the faults of others (7^{1f.}), we shall still feel it our duty to rebuke our brother when he trespasses, and to endeavour to reclaim him from his sin (18^{15f.}).

One other point worthy of notice in connexion with the duty of brotherly love which Christ inculcates, is the light in which this duty is presented in view of the love which we experience at the hands of God. At the root of all that Christ says regarding the love which we should display to one another lies the great truth of the Fatherhood of God. That word of St. John's, 'We love because he first loved us' (1 Jn 4¹⁹), expresses the position which Christ takes up. To forgive another his trespasses and to recompense an injury with kindness, to love one's enemies and to pray for them that persecute one, appears the height of magnanimity from the standpoint of the natural man. But Christ puts the matter in a new light. He reminds us of the love with which God treats man, undeserving as he is, and of the readiness with which He forgives us our offences. In the parable of the Unforgiving Servant (Mt 18²³⁻³⁵) He exhibits in its true light the conduct of the man who, freely forgiven at the hands of God, yet refuses to forgive his brother who has offended him. And as our indignation burns at the behaviour of the unforgiving servant in the parable, we realize that so far from the forgiveness of those who have offended us being the magnanimous conduct we had imagined, it is a simple duty, the non-fulfilment of which calls for severest condemnation.

In the Fourth Gospel the duty of love to our brother is laid down with the utmost distinctness, though the references are comparatively few. As in the Synoptics Christ had summed up the Law and the Prophets in the Golden Rule to do unto others whatsoever we would that they should do to us, so here He concentrates His ethical teaching to His disciples in the new commandment to love one another as He has loved them (13³⁴ 15¹²). It was a new commandment in the new emphasis with which it was enjoined, in the new place assigned to it as the one principle in which the Law and the Prophets find fulfilment (Mt 7¹² 5^{17f.}, cf. Ro 13⁹, Gal 5¹⁴), in the new sanction it received through the appeal to Christ's own example. He declares that the keeping of this commandment is the sure test whereby His disciples may be recognized by others (13³⁵). It is by their fulfilment of it alone that they may enjoy such close communion with Him as He enjoys with His Father (15^{10, 12}). He has given them an example in His own Person of the love they are to practise. At the last meal with His disciples, at which this new commandment was given, He had Himself washed their feet, to enforce the injunction to lowly service which He laid upon them (13^{14f.}). But this act of condescension on the part of the Master was typical of the self-denying love which He had displayed throughout His whole intercourse with them, that love which reached its culminating point in the willing sacrifice of His life. It is to this that He points when He urges them to love one another as He has loved them. 'Greater love hath no man than this, that a man lay down his life for his friends' (15¹³).

It has been urged that the brotherly love which is thus commended in the Fourth Gospel falls short of that enjoined in the Synoptics, in respect that it is limited to the circle of the Christian brotherhood. While Christ in the Synoptics commands us to love our neighbour, and insists that the love which He enjoins must embrace not only our friends but our enemies, we read in the Fourth Gospel of a love for one another (13^{34, 35} 15^{12, 17}). The reciprocal pronoun points to a limitation of the love to the Christian brotherhood. The Christians are known not by their love for others, but by their mutual love amongst themselves (H. Holtzmann, Handcom. on Jn 13³³, Neutest. Theol. ii. 388 f.; O. Holtzmann, Johannesevang. 76, 266). And as the love which the believer is exhorted to practise is limited to the Christian brotherhood, so also, it is maintained, is that of Christ Himself, which is held up as an example. The Fourth Gospel and St. Paul both cite the death of Christ as the highest proof that can be given of His love; but St. Paul finds in it a proof of His love for His enemies (Ro 5^{6f.}), whereas the Evangelist adduces it as a proof of His love for His friends (15¹³). Such love of friends, it is maintained, is the highest love the Gospel recognizes. Of love for one's enemies it knows nothing (O. Holtzmann, ib. 87, 276; H. Holtzmann, Handcom. on Jn 15¹³, Neutest. Theol. ii. 477).

We must admit that there is so much truth in the contention that, as a matter of fact, the love referred to in 13^{34, 35} 15^{12, 17} is a love of Christian brethren for one another. It would be quite unwarrantable to find the novelty of the commandment 13³⁴ in the wideness of its scope, to which there is no reference at all in the context. But it is equally unwarrantable to explain that novelty as consisting in the narrowness of the circle within which Christ, in the context, insisted on its fulfilment, as if this commandment to practise brotherly love were an advance upon the old injunction to love one's neighbour. (So Grotius: 'Novum autem dicit, quia non agit de dilectione communi omnium, sed de speciali Christianorum inter se, quae tales sunt'; cf. Kölbinger, SK, 1845, pp. 685-694). It is a mistake to take the commandment in any exclusive sense, as if there were any contrast implied to the wider commandment of the Synoptics. Christ speaks of the love of Christian brethren for one another, either because He had had occasion immediately before to give His disciples a lesson on the manner in which they should be ready to render loving service to one another (13³⁴⁻³⁷), or because it was natural to look for the display of this spirit of love He would inculcate first of all within the smaller circle of those who stood in close relation to Him and to one another. It is not a question of confining their love to their Christian brethren, but of displaying it towards those with whom they come into closest contact.

In the same way as Christ urges them to show their love to those who stand nearest to them, He represents His own love as issuing in the sacrifice He made for them, His friends. He does not mean that it was because of the love they had shown Him as friends that He responded with this culminating proof of love in return. On the contrary, He calls them friends because they are the objects of His love (15^{15c}). His sacrifice has not been evoked by the friendship they have displayed. It is rather their friendship that is the response to the love He has cherished for them, of which that sacrifice was the culminating proof.

While we recognize, then, that in this farewell conversation with His disciples, the love which Christ urges them to display is in the first instance a love of one toward another, we cannot admit that there is any intention on the part either of the Evangelist or of Christ Himself to limit the practice of it to the Christian brotherhood. The circumstances in which the address was spoken sufficiently explain the form in which the commandment is given, and the manner in which Christ's example is appealed to. The Teacher who had inculcated a love which was to embrace friend and enemy alike might well feel constrained to give His own disciples the commandment to love one another. And He who had given His life as a ransom for many might well remind those who stood nearest to Him that they were among the many for whom the sacrifice was made, and appeal to them to love one another as He had loved them.

LOWLINESS.—The modest attitude of mind and demeanour which characterized our Lord as a man. It is in contrast with, though not in contradiction to, the greatness both of His station and of His claims. He describes Himself (Mt 11²⁹) as 'lowly in heart,' and the word employed (ταπεινός) is accurately translated by the Eng. 'lowly' and the Lat. humilis as denoting that which is near the earth, low as opposed to lofty, bowed down as opposed to erect. Though sometimes used in a bad sense, as indicating meanness of spirit, this is not at all its necessary or common signification. In the moral sense it is opposed to proud, haughty, self-assertive. The adjective occurs elsewhere in the NT (Lk 1⁵², 2 Co 10¹, Ja 1⁹ 4⁶, 1 P 5⁹); and the noun ταπεινοφροσύνη and the verb ταπεινῶ are even of more frequent occurrence. Both noun and verb are used by St. Paul (Ph 2³⁻⁸) in describing the κένωσις of Christ, where a twofold lowliness is declared of Him: (1) in becoming man, (2) as a man. In the prophecy of Zechariah (9⁹) the Messianic King is foretold as being 'lowly and riding upon an ass'; but in the passages where the prophecy is quoted (Mt 21⁵, Jn 12¹⁵), the action is given in both cases. The adjective is altogether omitted by St. John, and is rendered 'meek' (πραῦς) by St. Matthew. See also artt. MEEKNESS and HUMILITY.

LUKE.—The only reliable sources for the life of Luke are his Acts of the Apostles, and, in a very slight degree, his Gospel, and the Epistles of St. Paul. The biography found in many MSS of the Gospel in Latin, and printed, for example, in Wordsworth and White's Novum Testamentum Domini Nostri Iesu Christi Latine, Pars i. (Oxonii, 1889-1898), pp. 269-272, can hardly be considered reliable, by whomsoever composed. Some of its statements will be quoted below.

1. Name.—The name Λουκᾶς appears to be unexampled elsewhere. The modern accentuation is no doubt correct, and this at once proclaims it as a contraction or shorter form of some other name. It belongs in fact to the class of pet names (Lallnamen, Kosennamen in German), as a glance at the long list of such in Jannaris' Historical Gr. Gram. (London, 1897), § 287, will show. The NT itself is not without examples of such names; Σίλας (Σιλῆας) for Σιλονανός, Ἀμπλιᾶς (Ro 16⁸) for Ἀμπλιανός, Ὀλυμπᾶς (Ro 16¹⁹) for Ὀλυμπιόδωρος, Δημᾶς (Col 4¹⁴) for Δημήτριος, Ἐπαφρᾶς (Col 4¹²) for Ἐπαφρόδιτος, Ἀπολλῶς for Ἀπολλώνιος, Ζηρᾶς (Tit 3¹³) for Ζηροδῶρος, Ἀντιπᾶς (Rev 2¹³) for Ἀντιπατρος, Στεφανᾶς (1 Co 16¹⁵) for Στεφανηφόρος. The shorter names are less technical and more friendly than the others. There can be little doubt that Λουκᾶς is short for Λουκανός, and indeed this latter form is very frequent in the oldest forms of the Latin Bible, in the title of the Gospel. There appears to be no example of the nominative in MSS, but the accusative CATA LUCANUM is regular (see C. H. Turner in JThSt, vi. (1904-1905), pp. 256-258). Monsignor Mercati, of the Vatican Library, has found an instance even of the nominative, on the sarcophagus of Concordius at Arles, MATTEUS MARCUS LUCANVS IOANNES (ib. p. 435).* The name Lucanus suggests 'Lucanian,' a native of the district of Southern Italy; it also suggests the Latin poet, a member of the gens Annæa, nephew of Seneca the philosopher. But neither of these suggestions seems to lead us further in the attempt to trace the ancestry or family of the Third Evangelist.

2. Origin.—The Latin biography above referred to calls Luke a Syrian of Antioch. This is almost certainly due to a mistaken interpretation of Ac 13¹, where a different person, with a different name, Lucius, is mentioned. If that be not the explanation, the selection of Antioch may be due to a guess, which sought to connect him with an important city. Some have thought that 'Antiochensis' is right, but that 'Syrus' is wrong, and would claim him for Pisidian Antioch, a place of much less importance. In the absence of other evidence, this second theory would be possible, as Pisidian Antioch is much nearer the historical scene on which he first appears and figures prominently in the missionary journeys of St. Paul. The Book of Acts itself, however, seems to yield up the secret. If we concentrate our attention on that part of the narrative which tells of St. Paul's visit to Philippi, we observe certain peculiarities about it which distinguish it from the other parts. In the first place, we observe that in 16⁹ 'a certain man of Macedonia' (τις) implies that the author could name him if he chose) is mentioned as appearing to St. Paul in a dream at Troas, and inviting him to cross over into Macedonia. In the following verse, the first 'We' passage begins:—'we sought immediately.' The Macedonians did not differ from other Greeks in their appearance or dress, and why should the author conceal the name of the Macedonian, if not from modesty? The present writer can feel no doubt that Luke and Paul met in Troas, and conversed together, expectant of a sign of the Spirit's will; that, as the result of their impressive talk, St. Paul saw a vision of his companion of the previous day, who appeared to be addressing him in the words of v. 9; and, in accordance with the belief of the time, considered—who shall say wrongly?—that the Spirit had spoken through this dream. V. 12 of ch. 16 is even more important in this connexion for the information it supplies:—'Philippi, which is a city of Macedonia, the first of its district, a Roman colony.' The characterization of Philippi might almost be styled gratuitous. Since the battle of B.C. 42 this place was well known to all persons of any education. Further, one might judge from this passage that it was the only Roman colony mentioned in Acts. This is far from being the case. Corinth, Lystra, Ptolemais, and Pisidian Antioch, to mention no others, were also Roman colonies; yet the author affixes the title to Philippi only. Again, we know that Philippi was not regarded by all as the chief town of its district. The author is clearly taking a side as against those who regarded Thessalonica or Amphipolis as the chief town of that district. The rivalry between cities was a characteristically Greek quality, which finds a parallel in the more modern rivalry between Dôle and Besançon. An instance in Asia Minor was that between Smyrna, Ephesus, and Pergamum. We shall not be wrong in regarding the author as a native of Philippi. His fondness for the sea and all matters nautical, as well as his choice of a profession almost entirely confined to Greeks, already proclaim him a Greek. There are other indications that point to Philippi as his native place. V.¹³ of ch. 16, 'where we thought there was a place of prayer,' is quite natural, if the author, being a Gentile, had only a rough idea where the Jewish place of prayer in his native town was. Again, when Paul and Silas go to Thessalonica (Ac 17), Luke is left behind in Philippi, and reappears in that neighbourhood afterwards (20⁴⁻⁵).

3. Notes on his Life.—Of Luke's early life little can be said, and that little is inference derived from his two books. If he were the son of a Greek freedman of a Roman master, this would account both for his name and his history. From the character of the language of his writings it is evident that he had a good education, both rhetorical and medical. It is impossible to say where he was educated, as higher education was widespread in the Greek world. About his disposition something can be said. From the frequent references to the poor in his Gospel and his loving attachment to Paul, as well as his self-effacement, it seems not too fanciful to picture him as a man of modest, tender, sympathetic, and constant nature. His circumstances appear to have been good; otherwise he could hardly have followed Paul as he did, ministering to his ailing body. The present writer has little doubt that the reason why Titus, though a valued coadjutor of St. Paul, is not mentioned in Acts, is that he was Luke's brother, especially as the only natural way to take the words τὸν ἀδελφόν in 2 Co 12¹⁸ is as 'his brother,' i.e. the brother of the man previously mentioned, that is, of Titus. Luke as a teacher was not so prominent as Titus, and hence is not named there. The true meaning of the passage would have been understood long ago, had it not been for the obscuration produced by the ecclesiastical sense of the term 'brother.'

The only part of Luke's life of which we know much is the part he spent travelling in St. Paul's company. They met first at Troas, and journeyed together from there by Samothrace and Neapolis to Philippi (Ac 16¹⁰⁻¹²). In Philippi Luke remained after Paul had gone, and they appear to have been separated for a little over five years (according to Ramsay's chronology). After meeting again, almost certainly at Philippi (Ac 20³⁻⁵), they appear to have remained together till the death of St. Paul. Certainly they were together on St. Paul's last journey along the coast of Asia Minor and Syria, up to Jerusalem (Ac 21¹⁶), and on the eventful voyage to Puteoli and Rome (ch. 27). In Rome he appears with St. Paul (Col 4¹⁴, Philem 24).

It is probable that he devoted himself mainly to medical and literary work, and not so much to evangelization. The Latin biography states that he never married, and that he died at the age of 74 in Bœotia (some MSS, Bithynia). Another tradition has it that he died at Constantinople, and his sarcophagus, said to have been brought from there, is now pointed out in the Church of Santa Giustina, at Padua.

i. THE SYNOPTIC PROBLEM.—To a student of the Synoptic Problem St. Luke's Gospel is the most interesting of the three. Indeed, we may confidently affirm that, but for St. Luke, the Synoptic Problem would never have existed. For the connexions between St. Matthew and St. Mark are comparatively simple and are easily explained. It is only when we read St. Luke that the perplexing questions which constitute the Problem arise. We have first to explain the fact of his omissions (a) of Markan matter, (b) of Matthean; next, his additions (a) of narrative, (b) of discourse; thirdly, his variations from the other Gospels in arrangement (a) of Markan matter, (b) of Matthean; then we must examine his editorial work, which consists (a) of prefaces to introduce a section, (b) of conclusions to wind it up, (c) of explanatory notes, (d) of corrections, alike in fact, in style, and in grammar; lastly, we must consider cases where he agrees with St. Matthew against St. Mark, and cases where he alone of the Synoptists has some contact with St. John. Anyone who attempts to solve the Problem by neglecting one or more of these factors, may fascinate the reader by the simplicity of his proposals, but he does so at the expense of success. He has not really grappled with the Problem, and therefore has not solved it. If, on the other hand, the reader thinks the proposals which are here offered too intricate; if he accuses the writer of vacillation, because two or more solutions are frequently offered of the same difficulty, let him reflect that in mathematics—the most exact of sciences—a similar fact may be observed. For every quadratic equation has two solutions, and when the Radcliffe Observer published his calculation of the distance of the sun from the earth, the answer came out as a double quadratic with four variations. Similar complications should be expected in an intricate literary problem like this. Let the beginner cultivate patience and suspense of judgment. He will have made good progress, if he learns to suspect the man who is too simple or too confident.

1. Solutions offered in the past.—Augustine, bishop of Hippo, at the close of the 4th cent., was the first writer who made a serious attempt to solve the Synoptic Problem. He was guided partly by tradition, but chiefly by a careful examination of the internal evidence which the Gospels offer. In that age it was perhaps inevitable that he should assume, what modern critics are almost united in denying, that the Apostle Matthew was the author of the First Gospel in its present form. From this fundamental error it inevitably followed that he assumed the priority of St. Matthew, and spoke of St. Mark as the 'abbreviator and humble follower of St. Matthew.' St. Luke he held to have copied from the other two. Augustine's influence in the Western Church was so transcendent, that his opinion on these intricate questions was accepted without examination until quite modern times. Strange to say, the founders of the famous Tübingen school in theology, though they reversed most of the traditional beliefs, adhered to this. They upheld the priority of St. Matthew, not for any literary reason, but for a dogmatic one. The miraculous element is somewhat less prominent in St. Matthew than it is in St. Mark; therefore, they argued, he must be the earlier writer.

2. Priority of St. Mark.—The notion of the priority of St. Matthew has, however, been so completely beaten off the field, that we need not spend time in refuting it. Suffice it to say that even so conservative a writer as Dr. Salmon, the late Provost of Trinity College, Dublin, admitted that St. Mark's is the archaic Gospel. And no wonder, for it is simple where the others are complex; it is meagre where they are rich; it is a chronicle while they are histories; it contains Latin and Aramaic words which they have translated or removed. For example, in Mk 15³⁹ we find the Latin word κεντυριων, but in the parallel passages St. Matthew writes ἐκατόνταρχος and St. Luke ἐκατοντάρχης. Both Evangelists felt that they must not disfigure their pages with St. Mark's 'barbarism,' and the different forms which they used indicate independent action. Who, on the other hand, could suppose that St. Mark found ἐκατόνταρχος in St. Matthew, and deliberately altered it into κεντυριων, or that St. Luke found ἐκατόνταρχος, and deliberately altered it into ἐκατοντάρχης? For these and other reasons it is maintained in all orthodox schools of criticism that St. Matthew and St. Luke made use of St. Mark. Indeed, St. Mark's Gospel furnishes the historical framework for the others. Equally certain is it that St. Matthew and St. Luke were unacquainted with each other's writings. Whatever agreement exists between them in non-Markan sections comes from their use of a common source. Augustine therefore is wrong in every particular.

3. The doctrine of a proto-Mark, of a deutero-Mark, and of a trito-Mark.—It has, however, long been debated whether St. Mark's Gospel in its complete form lay before St. Matthew and St. Luke. Many critics have held that St. Luke, at any rate, had only an Urmarkus—a term which has been used in Germany to signify a document shorter than our St. Mark, earlier in date, and free from those 'picturesque' additions which strike the reader of St. Mark's Gospel. Of late years there has been a growing tendency, both in Germany and in England, to repudiate the doctrine of an Urmarkus. Dr. Swete, without arguing the question at length, expresses the opinion that we can dispense with it. The Dean of Westminster is more positive in setting it aside. Nor is this surprising. Those who reject the oral hypothesis are beginning to feel that they cannot multiply documents at pleasure. Litera scripta manet. If St. Mark's Gospel circulated in the Apostolic age in three widely different editions, it is impossible to believe that the first and second editions perished without being noticed by such scholars as Origen and Jerome. Nor is it conceivable, as some maintain, that St. Mark entrusted his first edition to St. Luke, who incorporated it into his Gospel, but allowed no one else to make use of it. No wonder that with men who have an historical sense such hypotheses are unpalatable. But the oral hypothesis readily admits of, nay requires, these gradual growths in St. Mark. Under it there is no difficulty whatever in believing that St. Luke's (oral) St. Mark was much shorter than St. Matthew's, and that St. Matthew's had not received the final touches. In fact, the oral hypothesis solves the Synoptic Problem. The documentary hypothesis fails to do so. Both are equally hypothetical. And those who declare the oral hypothesis to be incredible have never, as yet, fairly tackled the arguments on which it rests, or sufficiently taken into account the habits of the East and of that age. This, however, is not the place to plead for the oral hypothesis, nor has the present writer any wish to do more than demand for it a dispassionate consideration. In the examination which follows he will not assume its truth.

ii. ANALYSIS OF ST. LUKE'S GOSPEL ACCORDING TO THE SOURCES USED.—1. First Source.—St. Mark.—St. Mark's Gospel (oral or written) was not merely used by St. Luke, it forms the backbone of his Gospel. It is hardly too much to say that without St. Mark there would have been neither a St. Luke nor a St. Matthew. But, as we have already intimated, there is strong reason for concluding that St. Luke used a much shorter work, not merely than our St. Mark, but than the St. Mark which lay before the redactor of St. Matthew. In short, he used an Urmarkus or an (oral) proto-Mark. By adopting this view we account at once (a) for his omissions, (b) for his variations from St. Mark's order. He omitted nothing which his St. Mark contained: he adhered to St. Mark's order in every section which he took directly from St. Mark. The marvellous simplification of the Synoptic Problem which this view offers can be appreciated only by those who have seriously endeavoured to explain to themselves and justify to others St. Luke's omissions and his order.

But St. Luke's omissions are so important that we must consider them at some length. In the Synopsis St. Mark's Gospel is divided into 223 sections, of which St. Luke omits 54. A group of sections is omitted between Mk 3²² and 4¹. A much larger group—amounting to more than two out of St. Mark's 16 chapters—is omitted between Mk 6¹⁷ and 8⁵⁶. The remaining omissions consist of single sections scattered over the rest of St. Mark's Gospel. Only from Mk 2 and 5 are no sections omitted. It is manifestly the duty of the critic to account for these omissions, and attempts have been made by harmonists to do so. Thus they have suggested (1) that St. Luke omitted what his readers would not value: being a Gentile himself, and writing for Gentiles, he naturally omitted sections which dealt with questions of Jewish interest; (2) that he objected to repetition, and left out what he regarded as dittographies; e.g. having given the feeding of 5000, he thought it unnecessary to narrate the feeding of 4000; having described the anointing of our Lord's feet, he deemed it superfluous to record the anointing of His head. These reasons, however, are quite inadequate. St. Luke is particularly fond of alluding to Jewish customs, and Gentile Christians have always taken a deep interest in them. Furthermore, the great majority of his omissions cannot be accounted for under either of the above heads. Thus he omits 25 out of St. Mark's 86 proper names. He does so in defiance of his instincts as an historian (Wright, NT Problems, 56-90). Again, he omits the healing of the Syrophenician's daughter (Mk 7²⁴⁻³⁰)—the only case in which our Lord is recorded to have healed a Gentile. He omits the only journey which our Lord is said to have taken through Gentile lands (7^{31-8¹⁰}). He omits our Lord's teaching about the inferiority of the moral precepts of the Old Testament to those of the New (Mt 5^{27, 31, 33, 38, 43}). All these topics were of overwhelming interest to Gentile readers, and we find it impossible to believe that St. Luke deliberately rejected them. The only satisfactory hypothesis is that he was not acquainted with them, as he would not be if he used a shorter recension of St. Mark and of the Logia.

(a) Now, if St. Luke used an earlier recension of St. Mark, whether oral or written, it is reasonable to suspect that in several places he has preserved for us the primitive Petrine wording. He will occasionally be nearer to St. Peter's teaching than is either St. Matthew or St. Mark. For, if the trito-Mark has made many additions to the primitive records, so also has he sometimes altered the tradition. In the index to the Synopsis nine passages are pointed out in which St. Luke's account is held to be the oldest, but there are probably many more. At any rate it is of the greatest advantage to the critic to feel that he is not always bound to vindicate the priority of St. Mark in details, however highly he may value it on the whole. And although subjective reasoning must always be received with caution, it ought not to be altogether discarded.

(b) Although St. Luke omits, as we have seen, 54 out of St. Mark's 223 sections, he does not always omit them entirely, but has preserved short fragments or 'scraps' of 24 out of the 54. These 'scraps' are always misplaced in his Gospel. In fact, the departure from St. Mark's order is our chief means of detecting them. (They may be seen in the Synopsis, Table I. a.) No one is likely now to maintain that these 'scraps' were copied directly from a written St. Mark. It is surely incredible that they should have been torn from their context and misplaced. But if these 'scraps' came to St. Luke orally, is it conceivable that he was so careless as never to have discovered that he had a full account of them in writing before him? To the present writer's mind the very existence in St. Luke's Gospel of these 'scraps' is conclusive proof that he used an abbreviated St. Mark. When, therefore, these 'scraps' reached him, he was not aware that they were Markan. For, if we mistake not, there were in the Apostolic age two kinds of oral tradition, both of which contributed much to the composition of St. Luke's Gospel. First there was a vast body of uncodified fact, rudis indigestaque moles. Striking sayings were remembered apart from their surroundings, striking deeds were recorded without mention of place or person. These passed from mouth to mouth informally. Secondly, there was the regular course of catechetical teaching preserved by those catechists to whose ill-requited toil St. Paul bears testimony in Gal 6⁶. From these men St. Luke derived the sections of the proto-Mark in their invariable order: from the former source he derived the 'scraps' of the deuterio-Mark together with much other matter.

(c) St. Matthew's redactor frequently introduces non-Markan material into a Markan section, mixing the two together to the reader's confusion. St. Luke avoids doing this, as a rule, rightly feeling that his sources ought to be treated with respect. But, of course, all the 'scraps' are amalgamated with and lost in other matter.

(d) There are cases in which St. Luke corrects the proto-Mark or forsakes it in favour of other sources. Not only does he polish St. Mark's style in a multitude of instances, but in his third chapter he gives (with some additions) the account of the Baptist which he found in the second Source, preferring it to the much shorter account which is found in St. Mark. The same thing is done in Mk 3²²⁻²⁶. He differs from the proto-Mark in holding that only one of the malefactors who were hanged reviled our Lord, the other turned to Him for help (Lk 23³⁹). In the account of the Eucharist (according to the true text) he puts the administration of the Cup before that of the Bread (Lk 22¹⁷⁻¹⁹), following in all probability a local liturgical usage of which several traces remain. These changes must have been made deliberately. And in all cases in which St. Luke or St. John corrects St. Mark, it is reasonable to believe that they had good warrant for doing so.

(e) It used to be argued that the testimony of four men is true, and those passages which are found in more than one Gospel were held to be doubly or trebly attested. Criticism has considerably altered our view of this matter. No doubt the 'Triple tradition' deserves special respect. When three Gospels agree verbatim (as they seldom do for more than a few words at a time), they are reproducing a source which must be as old as, and may be considerably older than, any of them. Tradition assigns St. Mark's Gospel to St. Peter's teaching, and we are entitled to claim that at least the proto-Mark may in large measure be regarded as his work. In this there is scope for apologetics. But it is evident that, if three Evangelists are reproducing the same Source, they may be reproducing its defects as well as its excellences. Their agreement proves the antiquity, but not the infallibility, of the original. Now Papias expressly asserts that St. Mark's Gospel is defective in order. And when we examine it critically we find that it is arranged topographically. It takes us first to the Jordan valley for our Lord's Baptism, then to Galilee for His ministry; after that comes a journey to Jerusalem, followed by the Passion. Finally, the lost verses must have contained a journey into Galilee, for such a journey is expressly enjoined on the disciples. All three Synoptists adopt this arrangement, except that the final journey into Galilee is omitted by St. Luke, belonging, as it does, to the deuterio-Mark. Can we accept St. Mark's arrangement, supported, as it is, by St. Matthew and St. Luke? Is the testimony of three men true? No one until quite modern times has ever thought so. The traditional account is that it is partly true. The Galilæan ministry was broken by visits to Jerusalem, which St. John alone records. In ignoring them the Synoptists were wrong. But the ministry in Jerusalem which the Synoptists give is assumed to have been unbroken by visits to Galilee, and must therefore merely be adjusted with Jn 12-20. This is improbable. St. Mark assigns 360 verses to the ministry in Galilee, which is commonly supposed to have lasted three years, 251 to the ministry in Jerusalem, which lasted about a week. Events in real history seldom move so rapidly. Our contention is that St. Mark is, as Papias says, and as his contemporaries probably well knew, defective in arrangement. Not only ought the ministry in the North to be broken by several visits to Jerusalem, but St. Mark's account of the ministry in Jerusalem ought to be broken by several visits to Galilee. Both ministries must be split up and dovetailed together, if we would attain to the true sequence of events. St. John corrects St. Mark by putting the Cleansing of the Temple into the first year's ministry (Jn 2¹³⁻²²) instead of the last. The traditional view that there were two cleansings is discredited in every other case, and is particularly incredible here. But if St. Mark has misplaced it, he has misplaced also some other sections which adhere to it. And although we cannot with any confidence decide at which particular visit to Jerusalem each of the recorded events happened, it is an enormous gain to the historian to be at liberty to distribute them.

2. Second Source—St. Matthew's Logia.—When Papias wrote that 'St. Matthew compiled the Logia (or Utterances of our Lord) in the Hebrew dialect, and each man interpreted them as he was able,' he cannot, as the traditionalists suppose, be alluding to our First Gospel, which was written (at Alexandria?) in Greek. Critical opinion is fast coming round to the view that St. Matthew compiled, not a formal Gospel, but a collection of our Lord's Utterances, which was incorporated into our First Gospel, and formed so distinctive a feature of it, that the whole book was with some justice called 'the Gospel according to St. Matthew.' And if this collection was originally oral, as many who deny an oral Mark are ready to admit, there is nothing strange in our contention that St. Luke used it, when it was much shorter: in fact, he used a proto-Matthew. In that way we explain his omissions, which are more glaring even than his omissions from St. Mark.

The question of order, which was complex in the case of the first Source, is simple here. For St. Luke's order is entirely different from St. Matthew's. Except on the rare occasions when St. Mark furnishes a clue, as he does in the account of the Baptist and of the Temptation, St. Luke arranges the Logia in one way, St. Matthew in another. Which, then, of these arrangements is to be preferred? Which Evangelist reproduced St. Matthew's order? Not the redactor of the Gospel according to St. Matthew, for he has massed most of the Logia into five huge Discourses, which are impressive for Church reading, but can hardly correspond to any actual Sermons. Many critics, however, incline to believe that St. Luke has preserved the original order, because he has so scrupulously followed the order of the proto-Mark. Even if he has done so, we must not assume that he is any nearer the truth, for we have no right to suppose that St. Matthew, any more than St. Mark, had regard to anything else in arrangement than convenience in Church teaching. It seems to us, however, that there is considerable evidence to show that originally the Logia were piled one upon another in confused disorder, as they are in the Oxyrhynchus fragment, with no other prefaces than 'Jesus said' or 'John said.' Their arrangement into speeches was the work of later hands (Synopsis, xxv). If so, this was done by the art of conflation, which consists in picking out all the Utterances which dealt with one subject and arranging them into an artificial speech on that subject. Such speeches, of which the Sermon on the Mount is a typical example, do not correspond to any Sermon that was ever preached, but are compiled for the simplification of teaching, and for the preservation of important Utterances which were in danger of being lost. St. Matthew prefers long conflations. One of these covers three chapters (Mt 5-7), another two (24, 25), and three more one each (10, 13, 23). St. Luke's conflations are shorter, never filling one chapter. They are therefore more numerous (we reckon nineteen of them) and more compact; for, whereas it is difficult to say what is the subject of the Sermon on the Mount or of the Charge to the Twelve, there is no such difficulty with St. Luke. In St. Matthew's Eschatological Discourses (24, 25) the prophecies respecting the destruction of Jerusalem and those respecting the Second Coming of the Son of Man are inextricably blended together, as though the redactor regarded the two events as synchronous, whereas St. Luke separates them (Lk 17²⁰⁻³⁷ 21⁵⁻³⁸), and it may well be that our Lord habitually did so.

The hypothesis of conflations may come as a shock to those who have been brought up in the belief that the Sermon on the Mount is a single discourse. We credit the Evangelists with some audacity. Their literary morality must not be judged by the standard of this century. They were composing Gospels and not formal histories. They were providing for the need of an age which lived in daily expectation of the return of their Lord. The work was done wisely and well, for it has stood the test of time; but we must understand its limitations if we really care to attain to the truth.

That the art of conflation was a real thing, actually practised by the Evangelists, can be fully proved only by a detailed examination into all the conflations; and for that we have no space now; but it may help to remove prejudice if we compare St. Matthew's Sermon on the Mount (Mt 5-7) with St. Luke's Sermon on the Plain (Lk 6³⁰⁻⁴⁹). Both begin with Beatitudes, and both end with the same Warning. We conclude, therefore, that the source contained the nucleus of a sermon. But the proto-Matthæus had only three short and one long Beatitude, for St. Luke gives no more. In St. Matthew five others have been added by the deuterio-Matthæus. St. Luke's Beatitudes, short and long, are all expressed in the second person, owing to an editorial change made by him for the purpose of securing literary uniformity. In St. Luke, Woes follow the Blessings. St. Matthew contains Woes, but not here. Either, therefore, St. Luke borrowed these Woes from another source unknown to us, or they are mere editorial work to enhance the Blessings. Their close uniformity to the Blessings favours the latter view. The wording of the Warning, with which the Sermons end, has been slightly altered in St. Luke to suit the comprehension of readers who did not live in Palestine, and would not know the action of winter torrents on a wady. Between the Beatitudes and the Warning the Source must have contained some Utterances setting forth the Law of Love. Besides these, St. Matthew has collected much material, St. Luke comparatively little; for St. Matthew's Sermon contains 107 verses, St. Luke's only 30. Yet we cannot regard St. Luke's Sermon as an abbreviation of St. Matthew's. True, he reproduces 26 out of St. Matthew's 107 verses; but he reproduces 32 more of them in other parts of his Gospel, spreading them over no fewer than seven chapters. Again, he gives in his Sermon four passages (Lk 6²⁴⁻²⁶, 27, 34, 35, 37, 38) which are not found in St. Matthew at all, and therefore do not come from the Logia. He adds two (6^{39, 40}) which are given by St. Matthew in a different context. We are justified, therefore, in regarding the Sermons as in large part independent conflations. St. Luke's subject, as usual, is precise, being simply the statement of the Law of Love; but the most that we can say for St. Matthew is that he seems here to be setting forth the duty of Christian laymen, while in the charge to the Twelve he gives our Lord's teaching about the duty of the clergy.

It is a further proof of the fact of conflation that in some cases, where the subject-matter is so clearly marked that two Evangelists have collected the utterances respecting it, which may have been widely separated in the Source, into one conflation, they have nevertheless arranged the sections in different order. Thus in the Temptation, St. Matthew gives the second and third Temptations in one order, St. Luke in another. In the passage about the Ninevites, and Solomon and the Queen of the South (Mt 12²⁸⁻⁴⁵, Lk 11²⁴⁻³²), two such differences of arrangement occur. In the Woes on the Pharisees, St. Luke's order (Lk 11³⁷⁻⁵⁴) differs repeatedly from St. Matthew's (Mt 23^{13ff.}), and the deuterio-Matthæus supplies fresh Woes. It is, of course, possible that St. Luke was dissatisfied with St. Matthew's order, and thought to improve upon it; it is more probable that he was not acquainted with it.

In cases where the subject is less clearly marked, the Evangelists collect the utterances into independent conflatons. But there is one very instructive example. Both Evangelists have gathered together our Lord's teaching on the subject of prayer. St. Matthew has put it into the Sermon on the Mount (Mt 6⁵⁻¹³), St. Luke into an independent conflation (Lk 11¹⁻¹³). St. Luke, however, has very properly included in his conflation the utterance, 'Ask, and it shall be given you,' etc. St. Matthew has put this also into the Sermon on the Mount, but in a different department (Mt 7⁷⁻¹¹). Why is this? The words 'pray' or 'prayer' do not occur in it, and the redactor of St. Matthew, acting, as we are all liable to do, mechanically, did not perceive that this Logion dealt with prayer. St. Luke was more observant.

That the original Logia had no prefaces beyond 'Jesus said,' etc., is shown by four remarkable cases in which St. Matthew (3⁷ 12^{24, 38} 16¹) applies to the scribes and Pharisees, i.e. to the ruling class, denunciations which in St. Luke (3⁷ 11^{15-29, 16}) are addressed to the lower orders. Plainly the Evangelists were left to gather from the contents of the Logion the persons to whom it was addressed. St. Luke's pronounced dislike of the rabble made him incline to them, while St. Matthew's indictment of the upper class led him into the opposite direction. It may well be that both Evangelists were mistaken. At any rate the limitations under which they worked must be acknowledged by all seekers after truth.

The contents of the second Source may be seen in the Synopsis, 187-239. St. Luke's parable of the Pounds is identified with St. Matthew's parable of the Talents, and St. Luke's parable of the Great Dinner with St. Matthew's of the Marriage Feast.

3. Third Source—a Pauline Collection.—If the first Source contained a good deal of triple tradition, and the second Source a good deal of double tradition, the remaining sources consist almost entirely of single tradition. Again, St. Mark contains a small quantity of single tradition, added (we believe) by the trito-Mark. St. Matthew gives a considerable amount; but St. Luke surpasses them both in respect of quantity and interest. And first we must recognize in his Gospel a collection of nineteen discourses, parables, and stories which stand by themselves, and may be called Pauline from their character (Synopsis, 241-250). We do not mean that St. Paul had much, if anything, to do with their wording; but some one in sympathy with Pauline teaching must have edited them. Our Lord spoke the words, but credit must be given to the collector who preserved them from oblivion. And if in St. John's Gospel it is more and more recognized that the mind of the Evangelist cast the utterances of our Lord into the peculiar form which they there hold, the same process of redaction may be observed in St. Luke, who comes nearest of the Synoptists to the methods of St. John. The story of the Prodigal Son is the crown of this division, but the stories of the Good Samaritan, of the Pharisee and the Publican, of the woman who washed our Lord's feet with her tears, are scarcely of inferior interest, while the parable of the Unjust Steward, when properly interpreted, is full of interest, and that of the Rich Man and Lazarus of difficulty. The more we consider this collection, the more entranced we are with it. It is the very cream of the Gospel, and yet (strange to say) it is peculiar to St. Luke.

In all cases, but especially in those of the single tradition, the question arises, How near do our records come to the actual words of Christ? The traditionalists, although they are forced to admit that in the triple and the double tradition some doubt may exist through the divergences in three, or two, Gospels, quietly assume that in the single tradition we have a verbatim report. To this assumption the critic is unable to assent. If the triple tradition was first taught by St. Peter, and confirmed by the general consent of the Churches; if the double tradition was taught by St. Matthew and diffused extensively, the single tradition was later in formation, lays no claim to Apostolic origination, and must have been known to few, or else by its intrinsic interest it would often have found its way into more Gospels than one. It is possible that St. Philip the Evangelist was the worker to whom we are indebted for the third Source; but it is mere guesswork to say so; there are no solid grounds for argument. We do not therefore claim for the single tradition the same authority that we claim for the others. The work of an editor is often conspicuous in it, and always to be suspected. And yet it would be mere scepticism to throw much doubt on these utterances, many of which vindicate their claim to have been given by Him who spake as never man spake. When a witness recollected only one or two sayings of our Lord, his memory would be specially trustworthy. The apologist has no cause to fear, but he must recognize the human element which plays its part in all Scripture. In this division the human element, if we are not mistaken, may be most clearly seen in the narrative of the washing of our Lord's feet by the woman who had been a sinner (Lk 7³⁶⁻⁵⁰). Our view of this most perplexing section is that its groundwork belongs to the deuterio-Mark, being identical with the Markan account of the anointing of our Lord's head. It has been misplaced by St. Luke, but he misplaces all the deuterio-Markan sections which he gives. St. Luke agrees with St. John in saying that the feet, not the head, were anointed. In this, according to our contention, St. Luke and St. John are simply following St. Mark's original narrative. In the Gospels according to St. Matthew and St. Mark the feet have been changed into the head, because the Psalmist wrote, 'Thou anointest my head with oil' (Ps 23⁵). The early Christians were always searching for fulfillments of Scripture, and in some cases the primitive records have been changed to secure a more complete fulfillment. Such changes appeared legitimate to the literary morality of that age, and we have no right to object (Synopsis, 269).

4. Fourth Source—Anonymous Fragments.—To this Source we assign 80 fragments of St. Luke, of which nine are found also in St. Matthew, but, of course, in a different context. If the sections in the third Division lack Apostolic authority, still more probable is it that these do so. Nay, to some of us it may appear their chief glory, as it is of the Epistle to the Hebrews, that their authors are unknown. Hundreds of Christians in Palestine had seen our Lord in the days of His flesh, and every one of them would treasure up some personal reminiscence. The great majority of these have inevitably been lost, but a few were so widely known and so much valued that they forced their way into local Church tradition and so passed into one—seldom into two—Gospels. All this is quite certain to the historian. But, of course, difficulties about chronology arise. Probably most of these fragments are widely misplaced. Thus St. Luke (5¹⁻¹²) by a conflation blends the Draught of fishes with the deuterio-Markan account of St. Peter's Call. St. John places it (in what we believe to be its true position) after the Resurrection (Jn 21¹⁻¹⁴). Now, as St. Luke leaves no room either in his Gospel or in the Acts for a visit to Galilee after the Resurrection, it is at last being confessed that he was not aware of such a visit, and therefore it was quite natural for him to infer that the Draught of fishes belonged to St. Peter's Call, and indeed explains his readiness to rise and follow Christ without question. But, if this had been the true connexion of events, it is incredible that St. Mark, if he gives St. Peter's account of the call, did not mention it (Synopsis, 13).

If in the deuterio-Mark and in the Logia St. Luke was content to find a literary connexion for many of our Lord's Utterances, it is no wonder if he did so in the fourth Source. He certainly endeavoured to write, as he says, 'in (chronological) order,' but in many cases he had not the detailed information which was necessary for doing so. St. Luke's Gospel is probably the least chronological of the three (as we shall show hereafter more fully), but in all the Gospels criticism teaches us to value the picture more than the frame; to treasure the Utterance, but esteem at a much lower value the setting which the Evangelist has given it.

5. Fifth Source—a Private Collection (from the Holy Family?).—St. Luke's first two chapters, together with the Genealogy, the Sermon at Nazareth, and the Raising of the widow's son at Nain, form our fifth and last Division. Marcion rejected the first two chapters and many other sections from his canon. Wellhausen omits them from his edition of St. Luke. The Bishop of Ely infers from Ac 1¹⁻²² that they were no part of the first edition of the Gospel. The present writer has long taught that they are among the latest additions to the Gospel, and that they never were part of the oral teaching; beyond that we can hardly go. The idea that St. Luke issued two editions of his Gospel has gained few converts, and Dr. Blass, its chief advocate, assigns these chapters to both supposed editions. That they proceed from St. Luke is shown by the literary connexions which Sir John Hawkins has traced.

This Division bears testimony to the fact, which Irenæus records, that there was difference of opinion in the early Church on the question of the Virgin Birth. St. Paul is silent on that subject, showing, perhaps, that it had not been raised in his day. St. John alludes to it in his own peculiar way (1⁴⁵). Both Genealogies seem to have issued from Ebionite circles, in which our Lord's descent from Joseph was affirmed. They have been altered with some rather clumsy editorial changes, to make them square with orthodox belief. But the trito-Mark has altered the wording of a passage (6³) with a view to support the Virgin Birth (Synopsis, xli), while St. Matthew's first chapter and St. Luke's second strenuously assert it. There can be no doubt that, when once the question was raised, it was answered in widely different Churches in no hesitating way. East and West, at Rome and in the provinces, belief in the Virgin Birth became a test of orthodoxy.

In St. Matthew, Joseph is the hero, and all action is taken by him. Mary is kept in the background, in accordance with Eastern feeling. But in St. Luke, Elisabeth and Mary are brought forward. Honour is claimed for women, as it is throughout the Third Gospel.

It is obvious that the story told in these chapters, unless it be regarded as a free invention, must have been derived, directly or indirectly, from the Virgin Mary herself. The style is strangely Semitic, in striking contrast to the four verses of preface. Not only was the original narrative told in Aramaic, but the translator has closely imitated the language and manner of the LXX, feeling that he could thus best convey the meaning. Few parts of the Gospel have been more popular than this. The Sermon at Nazareth (4¹⁶⁻²⁹) is conflated, much of a (misplaced) deuterio-Markan section having been worked into it. But it shows additional information; and long ago the observation was made, that St. Luke's knowledge of events at Nazareth is unique. If he had intercourse with some member of the Holy Family, the mystery is explained.

6. Editorial Notes.—The editorial element in all the Gospels is very great, for ancient authors took immense pains to reduce the crude chronicles which they used into literary form. In Herodotus, Thucydides, Livy, and Tacitus the charm of style is all their own, and it must have been gained by unsparing labour. Nor did inspired authors deem it unnecessary to take pains. Nay, the Divine treasure which they held in earthen vessels demanded and received all the skill which they possessed. Both St. Luke and the redactor of St. Matthew are artists of a high order.

Editorial changes, however, though they often improve upon the original, do so at some sacrifice. The substitution of a more elegant word alters the precise meaning of the original. The critic's endeavour must always be to recover the primitive wording. And in the triple tradition he can generally feel sure of his ground; in the double tradition there is more room for subjective preferences; while in the single tradition he has little else to guide him. Just where the records are most likely to be obscured, the means of verifying them disappear. We cannot attain to greater certainty than God has given.

St. Luke's editorial contributions are manifold and important. He had sources of information which are closed to us. Even his own opinion is of high value. But, nevertheless, he worked under limitations, and an exact scrutiny throws some doubt upon many of his assertions.

Let us first consider the general arrangement of his Gospel, which, as we have said, depends almost entirely on St. Mark. The first thing which strikes us is the extraordinary fact, that whereas St. Mark describes our Lord's last journey to Jerusalem in 52 verses, which St. Matthew expands to 64, St. Luke devotes to it no fewer than 408: more than one-third part of his whole Gospel. How are we to understand this amazing disproportion? First, let us look at the 'Travel Narrative' in itself. It contains a very few and slight Markan 'scraps': so few, that we are entitled to call the whole of it non-Markan. There is a good deal of matter which has been taken from the second Source; this, of course, is arranged by St. Matthew in an entirely different way. But much of the material is peculiar to St. Luke. For example, sixteen out of the nineteen sections of the third Source are embedded here.

Harmonists say that St. Luke is giving us a Peræan ministry, in which our Lord repeated much of what He had taught in Galilee. But who were these Peræans, that the wealth of the third Source should have been reserved for them? St. Luke gives us no help in answering that necessary question. Not a single town or village is named until we reach the Markan Jericho. If there was a door open to our Lord at all in Peræa, it would seem to have been among those Galilaean pilgrims who passed through Peræa on their way to keep the Feast. But there are other difficulties. We are distinctly taught that our Lord gradually withdrew from public teaching, first speaking only in parables, and finally confining Himself to the training of the Twelve. But here within a fortnight of His death (though harmonists try to lengthen the journey, and, indeed, change it into several journeys, with visits to Jerusalem and retirements into Galilee of which St. Luke says nothing) some of the simplest and plainest of His teaching is set forth. Again, why does St. Matthew put so many of these sayings into the Sermon on the Mount or the Charge to the Twelve? The theory of repetition is entirely unsatisfactory (NT Problems, 30-39).

We have little doubt that a different explanation must be found. If St. Luke's sole guide to chronology was St. Mark, what was he to do with non-Markan matter? The difficulty confronted him continually. New materials reached him, while he taught at Philippi, by every ship which arrived. Seldom did the new fragments contain any clue to their date or occasion. If they were not worked into his oral teaching they would soon be forgotten. Some niche must be found for them. And he began, it would seem, by placing them into this last journey. Slowly they accumulated until they reached their present proportions. The famous 'Travel Narrative' is therefore really a collection of undated material. The extraordinary vagueness which characterizes this Division favours that view. It is discourse matter, but quite indeterminate. Some of the most striking parables have no further preface than 'He said,' and there are no indications of locality except that He was still on the journey. St. Luke's idea was that our Lord brought forth the best of His treasures as the time of His departure drew nigh: it is a noble conception, but not in agreement with what we learn from the other Gospels. The matter (we believe) is scarcely arranged at all, and always wrongly.

If this be so, it is no wonder that we attach low historical value to those editorial prefaces with which St. Luke introduces so many sections in this 'Travel Narrative,' and, indeed, outside it also. Such prefaces appear usually to be inferences from the contents of the passage or transferences from other occasions. Thus the parable of the Marriage Feast according to St. Matthew (22¹⁻¹⁴) was spoken in the courts of the Temple. But the parable of the Great Dinner, which we identify with it, was, according to St. Luke (14¹⁵⁻²⁴), part of a long discourse at a Pharisee's dinner table: the machinery of the dinner table is made much of by St. Luke in binding the conflation together. St. Luke stands alone in telling us that our Lord on three occasions (7³⁶ 11³⁷ 14¹) accepted hospitality from Pharisees. There is reason to think that the last two of these occasions are due to transference or assimilation.

St. Luke, like the other Synoptists, seems to have thought that our Lord's ministry lasted one year only—'the acceptable year of the Lord' (NT Problems, 182-194). He appears to have placed our Lord's Birth after Herod's death, though St. Matthew distinctly places it before that event. For a discussion of this difficult question the present writer may be allowed to refer the reader to his edition of St. Luke's Gospel. Suffice it here to record the conviction that, though St. Luke has done much for us in connecting our Lord's life upon earth with secular history, his Gospel is very far from being arranged with the chronological accuracy at which he aimed. He was working in a place and amid surroundings which precluded historical research, and, when he visited Palestine, it was too late to recast the whole work of his life.

Philosophy was sedulously cultivated among the Gentiles for whom St. Luke wrote. All the more earnest thinkers, who were attracted by Christianity, had been brought up as neo-Platonists or Stoics. They would, of course, bring their philosophy with them into their new religion. Christianity became to a considerable extent leavened by Hellenistic thought. This is what our Lord foretold in the parable of the Leaven, rightly interpreted. Now Plato taught the indestructibility of the soul. But in Mt 10²⁸ God is declared to be 'able to destroy both soul and body in hell,' which is the usual Biblical doctrine. St. Luke (12⁹) has altered this into 'him who has power to cast into hell.' It would seem that he, or his informant, did this to avoid giving offence to the Platonists. In the Markan account of the Agony in Gethsemane (Mk 14³²⁻⁴²) there is much to perplex a Stoic, who believed that a good man is never perturbed. All trace of agony is absent from St. Luke's account (cf. RvM at 22^{33f.}); perhaps because the proto-Mark did not contain it; more probably because St. Luke has deliberately struck it out.

St. Luke has long been accused of Ebionism, because the rich are severely handled in his pages, and because he expressly commands us to part with all our property (12³²⁻³⁴); whereas St. Matthew (according to the Greek) bids us only think more highly of the heavenly than of the earthly treasure (6¹⁹⁻²¹). St. Luke was certainly not an Ebionite, or he would not have defended the Virgin Birth or praised Joseph of Arimathea. In speaking words of severity against the rich he is probably faithfully reproducing our Lord's words, which were wont to be incisive. The strongest of all these sayings against the wealthy is preserved in the proto-Mark (Mk 10²⁵), and it is followed by a declaration in which our Lord Himself cautions us against interpreting His utterances with prosaic literality. Nor have Christians generally supposed that He intended us to pluck out our right eye or cut off our right hand and foot.

The most striking example of editorial addition in St. Luke is that in which he attributes the three hours' darkness to a solar eclipse (23⁴⁵). In saying so he cannot be right for many reasons (Comp. of the Gospels, 119).

iii. POINTS OF CONTACT WITH ST. JOHN.—If St. John's teaching was esoteric, intended for advanced disciples only, we shall better understand the rarity of the occasions on which allusions to it are found in the sub-Apostolic age. But that it existed orally for many years before it was committed to writing, is indicated not only by its own characteristics, but by several cases in which it is simpler to assume that one of the Synoptists learned a fact from St. John than that St. John learned it from him. Many passages are pointed out in the index to the Synopsis in which the trito-Mark is held to have drawn from St. John's oral teaching. There is one case where St. Matthew does so. And we have now to consider cases where St. Luke appears to have followed their example. We have already seen that St. Luke agrees with St. John that our Lord's feet were anointed and not His head. But in that matter we held that St. Luke is reproducing the original deutero-Markan statement which has been corrupted in St. Matthew and in the trito-Mark. The trito-Mark tells us that the day of the Crucifixion was Friday (Mk 15⁴²). This statement St. Luke repeats (23⁵⁴), but in a different context and in different language. The simplest explanation of these peculiarities and of the absence of the words from St. Matthew is that both Evangelists, directly or indirectly, derived their information from St. John. Finally, St. Luke and St. John tell us that the sepulchre in which our Lord's body lay was a new one, 'where no one had yet lain' (Lk 23⁵³).

iv. ST. LUKE'S CHARACTERISTICS.—St. Luke the Gentile was cosmopolitan in his sentiments. St. Luke the beloved physician had sympathy for the sorrows of mankind. The words of pity which he records were drawn from the all-compassionate heart of the Saviour, but to St. Luke is due the credit of preserving them from oblivion. To his literary skill we are probably right in attributing some of the beauty of their form. St. Luke the disciple of St. Paul tells of the publican, who durst not so much as lift up his eyes to heaven, but kept smiting his breast and saying, 'God be merciful to me the sinner' (18¹³). He tells of the traveller by the wayside, stripped, wounded, and half-dead, and how the good Samaritan had pity upon him (10³⁰⁻³⁷). He tells of the Prodigal, wandering in thoughtless levity from home, spending his substance in riot and revelry, and then eating the husks which were thrown to the swine; and how the father had compassion upon him and welcomed him home (15¹¹⁻³²). He tells of the poor woman who had been a sinner in the city, coming behind and washing the Saviour's feet with her tears (7³⁶⁻⁵⁰); of the robber's appeal on the cross, 'Lord, remember me when thou comest in thy kingdom' (23³⁹⁻⁴³). These and other passages which set forth the freeness and fulness of pardoning love have been preserved to us only in the writings of St. Luke, who had more pity for the weak and for the suffering, for widows and for the poor, than any other NT writer.

St. Luke was no idealist. He had a literal, matter-of-fact mind, which blurted out facts without glossing them. We have seen how he records without reservation the command to part with our possessions, as St. Barnabas and others in their first love did (Ac 4^{36, 37}). Being a physician, he nevertheless had the strongest belief in the truth of demoniacal possession, understanding literally what was originally given as a burst of insanity (Mk 5⁹ with parallels). He stands alone in affirming that our Lord, after His resurrection, ate a piece of broiled fish before His disciples (24⁴¹⁻⁴³). To this he refers, probably in Ac 1⁴, certainly in Ac 10⁴¹. Many persons in modern times have felt some difficulty in reconciling this with the general Scripture account of the nature of our Lord's resurrection body. It may be one side of the truth which is apt in these days to be ignored; in a coarser age it was the only side that was accepted. Ignatius supports it in the saying which he preserves: 'I am not an incorporeal demon' (Smyr. iii. 1).

v. DATE OF WRITING.—St. Luke's Gospel is not, like St. Mark's, a bare record of our Lord's deeds and words, but, to a considerable extent, a theological exposition of their meaning. St. Luke, like his master St. Paul, has reflected on them, and is anxious to impress on the reader his own ideas about them. Such action demands time. In spite of 1 Ti 5¹⁸, we cannot admit that St. Luke wrote before St. Paul's death.

Again, if we observe the treatment in his pages of the destruction of Jerusalem, contrasting his precise language (21²⁰) with the vague predictions in St. Mark (13⁴), we can hardly doubt that he wrote after the event, and edited the wording accordingly. The end of the world was not with him, as it was with the redactor of St. Matthew, synchronous with the burning of the Temple. He carefully puts our Lord's teaching about the last days into a separate conflation, which he prefaces with a remarkable saying which warns us against a literal interpretation: 'The kingdom of God is within you' (17²¹).

But there are no 2nd cent. ideas in the Gospel, nor anything to throw doubt upon the unanimous and early tradition of St. Luke's authorship. Nor would so obscure a member of the Church have been selected as author if there had not been good ground for the belief. Probably his name stood on the original title-page.

We are, therefore, probably right in assigning the date to about 80 A.D.

LITERATURE.—Plummer's Commentary (T. & T. Clark) is good on the linguistic side. The Commentaries of Meyer (German) and of Godet (French) have been published in English by T. & T. Clark, but the later German editions of Meyer, edited by B. and J. Weiss, are preferable. In the Expositor's Greek Testament the Synoptic Gospels are treated from the side of the higher criticism by A. B. Bruce, but unfortunately the TR is used. Wellhausen has translated the Gospel into German with a few critical notes. For comparative study Wright's St. Luke and his Synopsis may be used. In Horæ Synopticae Sir J. C. Hawkins has collected statistics of great value. Hobart's Medical Language of St. Luke needs some weeding out, but has never been refuted. A. Resch, in Das Kindheits-Evangelium, as in his other writings, collects an immense quantity of illustrative matter, but the critical standpoint which he adopts is not generally acceptable. Ramsay (Was Christ born at Bethlehem?) successfully defends St. Luke as an historian of high rank, but insists too much on his accuracy in editorial details. Blass, in his edition of St. Luke's Gospel and of the Acts, follows Lightfoot in suggesting that St. Luke published two editions of his works—one for Theophilus and another for use by the Church. In this way he accounts for the Western readings, which, however, are found in other books of the NT.

Literature.

The word 'lunatic' in the AV of NT is the tr. of σεληνιαζέσθαι (from σελήνη, 'the moon') which occurs in Mt 4²⁴ 17¹⁵, and nowhere else in the NT or in classical or Biblical Greek. Literally its meaning is 'to be moonstruck.' The Vulgate translates it lunaticus, and in Mt 17¹⁵ lunaticus est, where Tindale gives 'is frantiek,' and other versions practically follow the Vulgate. Sir John Cheke (1550) has the expression 'is moon'd' as the equivalent of 'lunatic,' putting into plain English the ancient thought expressed by the word. The influence of the moon on persons was believed to be injurious, and to be able to cause them to become moonstruck (Ps 121⁶), an idea which has been widely prevalent and still persists. The fact that certain forms of insanity are periodical, no doubt gave rise in part to the idea. Dr. Menzies Alexander says: 'The popular idea that there is some connexion between the moon and epilepsy is partly due to the confusion of epilepsy with epileptic insanity. The bright moonlight of the Orient has a curious stimulating effect on such creatures as crows and dogs, making them restless and noisy. It has an exciting effect also on those afflicted with epileptic insanity. In both cases darkness acts as a sedative.'

The RV of the two passages in Mt. above cited prefers 'epileptic' and 'is epileptic' as tr. for σεληνιαζέσθαι, but without substantial warrant. The ground for the preference according to Encyc. Bibl. is that a Greek medical writer of the 7th cent. gives επιληπτικός as the correct scientific term for the disorder referred to, and that δαίμονιζόμενος and σεληνιαζόμενος were the popular terms for the same disease.

But the word 'lunatic' covers more than the cases in which Mt. uses σεληνιαζέσθαι. The mentally deranged also are described by the Evangelists as δαίμονιζόμενοι, and no kind of doubt is possible that the latter term included many sufferers who are now called lunatic, as well as simple epileptics and epileptic idiots. The uncontrollable explosions of nervous energy which characterize these cases were not unnaturally attributed solely to demonic agency. The explanation is so simple and direct and apparently so adequate, that none other was sought for. But the term 'lunatic' must be restricted in its use to those who were mentally deranged, and ought not to be applied to those who were simply epileptic, or suffering from mental feebleness or imbecility.

The attempt to trace a differentiation between mental diseases on the part of the Evangelists cannot be pronounced successful, being based upon far too slender ground in a simple NT passage, Mt 4²⁴, where δαίμονιζόμενοι and σεληνιαζόμενοι are placed side by side. (1) We have no grounds for expecting such precision in writers like the Evangelists. (2) The same writer uses (Mt 17¹⁵) the word σεληνιαζόμενοι of a case which is not simple epilepsy (see below). (3) He does not use the word for the Gerasene demoniacs of Mt 8²⁸, where we have undoubted cases of lunacy. (4) Luke the physician knows nothing of the distinction so far as his own usage is concerned. (5) It is not to be thought that Mt. alone of the Evangelists traced a distinction between the epileptic and the possessed, or that he would not attribute an attack of simple epilepsy to the domination by evil spirits.

The Evangelists class all the cases together, and use both words to cover the same trouble of mental derangement, while the latter word δαίμονιζόμενοι is also employed with a wider signification. The fact that the description given in the Gospels enables us to classify the instances under the broad types of mental disease is evidence of the faithful unsophisticated narration of what the Evangelists had seen or heard, not of their having any scientific understanding of the phenomena in question.

i. DIFFICULTY OF CLASSIFYING NT CASES.—The Gospels record and describe three clear cases which may be included under the general head of lunacy. Others are probably indicated with no kind of description; or only the very vaguest is given. But the task of determining to which particular class of lunacy the cases described are to be assigned is not without difficulty, and perhaps cannot at present be accomplished without some degree of uncertainty. The difficulty is twofold.

1. The current classifications, in vogue amongst alienists, of the various insanities are very numerous, and by common consent far from being final. Certain of these systems, some adopted by International Congresses and others determined by representative associations, and generally in use among the leading mental physicians of Great Britain, are valuable chiefly as giving facilities, the one for international conference, the other for national comparison and correspondence. Clouston in his Clinical Lectures provides a good working classification. Following the example of many illustrious predecessors, he divides mental diseases: (1) according to the mental symptoms manifested, and (2) according to the causes of the disorder and to the relationships of the disease to the great physical periods of life and to the activities other than mental. But the researches of the present day, and especially in respect of the causes of mental derangement, with their suggestions of toxic and bacteriological origin, are profoundly modifying the generalizations which only a few years ago were accepted as satisfactory. Brilliant and enthusiastic investigators in Italy, France, Germany, America, and in our own country are 'settling much and unsettling more' (Clouston), and while this condition of science is full of promise for the ultimate goal of all such research in the alleviation and recovery of the malady and the removal of its causes, the prevalent uncertainty does not lessen the difficulty of classifying the NT cases. The difficulty arises largely from the facts that (a) the symptoms from one class are combined in ever-varying proportions with symptoms of other classes, rendering the task of deciding which is the predominant symptom according to which the malady must be classified well-nigh impossible; and (b) a similar combination is discovered among the causes producing the disorder. Accordingly some have scoffed at the attempt to classify mental diseases with all the divisions and technology of a botanical or zoological system. And perhaps it is more important to mark carefully all the symptoms in each case and study the predisposing and actual causes so far as they can be ascertained.

2. The difficulty from the Biblical side lies in the following facts. (a) The descriptions of the cases mentioned in the Gospels are non-scientific. They do not profess to give a complete methodized account of the ailments with which the power of Jesus dealt. The Evangelists give no sign that they themselves understood what they describe. (b) They deal only with symptoms. Causes of the disorder were not sought for, the prevalent theory of demonic possession being to them adequate to account for the trouble, and this possession the only possible cause. Our Lord Himself speaks and acts as though upon the whole He shared the conceptions of the time. Possibly because in this realm, as in others, He in His incarnate condition shared the limitations of the race, or because He could not take upon Himself the task of correcting and remoulding the deep-lying misconceptions of that generation with respect to these matters, without withdrawing His strength from far more vital concerns on which in the short time at His disposal He must concentrate all His attention. (c) The Evangelists' descriptions probably do not give all the symptoms which a modern alienist would have noted, but only those which for one reason or another were pressed particularly upon their observation.

ii. LEADING CASES OF LUNACY REPORTED IN NT.—1. The case in the synagogue at Capernaum (Mk 1²¹⁻²⁸, Lk 4³¹⁻³⁷). The symptoms indicated by the Evangelists are—

(1) The predominance of unclean habits and instincts. Mk. speaks of the man as being under the influence of an unclean spirit; Lk. of the spirit of an unclean demon. This might possibly mean no more than that the victims of this malady habitually haunted unclean places, as tombs, and desert regions believed to be the habitation of demons. But the greater probability is that it points to 'moral alienation,' which Esquirol (Maladies Mentales) declared was the proper characteristic of mental derangement. 'The subtle influence of epilepsy, or rather of that condition of the nervous system which gives rise alike to epileptic seizures and certain mental symptoms, is most strikingly manifested in the change which takes place in the moral character' (Bucknill and Tuke).

(2) Convulsive seizures. This feature is not made prominent in the case before us, but is indicated by the words of Mk 1²⁶, 'And the unclean spirit tearing (RVm 'convulsing,' σπαράξαν) him and crying with a loud voice.'

(3) Uncontrolled impulse, leading the victim in defiance of all that was fitting and customary to burst into the assembly at the hour of worship.

(4) The patient's belief in and identification of himself with an alleged evil spirit. He speaks of himself and the evil power as one—'What have we to do with thee?' This may be explained as an example of a well-known delusion classed as demonomania, but the question must not be foreclosed (see below). At least, however, an element of delusion may be traced in the feeling of entire and inevitable subjection to the monstrous control.

(5) The acknowledgment of Messiah. This has been claimed as the classical criterion of demonic possession, all cases where it is not found being regarded as not due to this cause even although the Scripture so attributes them (Menzies Alexander). But argument from silence is always perilous, and especially so in dealing with the Gospel narratives. And other cases might yet be genuinely demonic where the confession is apparently or really absent. And, on the other hand, the acknowledgment might reasonably be regarded as the last vestige of rationality in the otherwise deranged nature.

Attempting to classify the above, it may be ranged symptomatically under Clouston's head—'States of Defective Inhibition, or Impulsive Insanity,' the chief characteristic of which is uncontrollable impulse, and which includes general impulsiveness, epileptiform impulse (indicated by the convulsions), animal, sexual and organic impulse (pointed to by the term 'unclean' applied to this and other instances). Clinically considered (according to the causes) it most nearly approaches epileptic insanity. This 'means insanity with epilepsy, whether the convulsive affection has preceded the insanity and has seemed to be the cause, or whether it has appeared during the course of the mental disease only as a symptom or complication' (Bucknill and Tuke). The presence of epileptic insanity is not always indicated by epileptic fits but by the character of the mental disturbance, the paroxysmal gust of passion, the blind fury. And therefore Defective Inhibition is difficult to distinguish from Mania. Out of 385 epileptic women observed by Esquirol (Maladies Mentales, vol. i.), only 60 were free from mental derangement, and nearly all were unstable, peculiar, easily enraged.

2. The case at the foot of the Mt. of Transfiguration (Mt 17¹⁴⁻²⁰, Mk 9¹⁷⁻²⁹, Lk 9³⁷⁻⁴³).—Two sides are plainly marked in this disorder: (1) The physical. Uncontrollable paroxysms accompanied by foaming at the mouth and gnashing of teeth, succeeded by utter prostration. The affliction had been from infancy, pointing to some congenital disease involving the other physical features—deafness and dumbness. (2) The mental. At least idiocy, but more probably lunacy, a feature of which was the suicidal mania manifested. The indication is that during the time while he was free from convulsions and their effects the patient was not mentally disturbed. The suicidal impulse was apparently spasmodic and periodical, but no very solid ground is given to theorize upon.

The epilepsy is more pronounced than in the previous case, and the suicidal tendency is added. But possibly, if the previous instance had been fully described, it might more nearly approximate to the one under consideration. The classification must be under the same general head—Defective Inhibition or Epileptic Insanity (rather than Epileptic Idiocy—as Alexander).

3. The Gerasene victim (Mt 8²⁸⁻³⁴, Mk 5¹⁻²⁰, Lk 8²⁶⁻³⁹).—The physical symptoms, the convulsions, that characterize 1 and 2, are here absent, and the features of mental derangement become all-prominent. The victim is possessed by an un-governed violence, having the command of a morbid muscular energy. This uncontrollable power was one that increased, for the description implies that in the earlier stages they had been able to control him in some measure by binding, but that the binding had increased the violence of the power so that he could no longer be bound (Mk 5³⁻⁴). 'The tenses used (δεδῆσθαι, διεσπᾶσθαι, συντεριφῆσθαι) denote the relation of these past acts to the present inability' (Gould, Internat. Crit. Com. on 'St. Mark'). The malignant power controlling the life drove him into the tombs and mountains, causing him to utter frenzied cries and leading to impulses of self-mutilation, apparently also to homicidal tendencies (Mt 8²⁸). Loss of personality is the dominant feature of the case, evidenced by the absence of the sense of all fitness, causing him to destroy his clothing and rush about in nakedness, and by his positive feeling of being possessed by a legion of devils which tore his life asunder. At times he thoroughly identifies himself with the power that controlled his life ('we are many'), and is terrified by the fear lest he and they should be driven from their hiding-place. A conspicuous feature also was the homage paid by the evil power, or by the man in spite of the evil power, to the authority of Jesus (Mk 5⁷, Lk 8²⁸).

The case belongs to those described by Clouston as 'states of mental exaltation or mania,' which includes the varieties simple, acute, delusional, chronic, ephemeral, homicidal; and the indications all point to acute mania with delusions. The fixed idea of plural possession would lead to the medical classification 'Demonomania,' a variety of 'religious mania.'

4. Other cases.—(1) The daughter of the Syro-phœnician woman, Mt 15²¹⁻²⁸, Mk 7²⁴⁻³⁰. (2) The dumb demoniac, Mt 9³²⁻³⁴, Lk 11^{14, 15}. (3) The blind and dumb demoniac, Mt 12²²⁻²⁴. These cases are not described except in most obscure terms. In (2) and (3) the interest of the narrator was fixed upon other elements of the occasion. And they would all be doubtfully classified as cases of lunacy. (4) Mary of Magdala (Mk 16⁹, Lk 8²), with whom are classed other women healed of evil spirits and infirmities. Mary Magdalene is said to have been delivered from seven demons. The expression may be due (a) to the Evangelist's sense of the violence of the derangement to which she had been subject, or (b) to the current idea of manifold possession among the disciples, to which Jesus gave no sanction, or (c) to mania and delusion of manifold possession. But nothing can be determined beyond the fact that Jesus had delivered her from grievous bodily or mental distress, or a combination of these.

The Evangelists give full prominence to the physical side of these distressing afflictions, not because they understand the symptoms they describe, but because they testify simply and artlessly to what they had themselves witnessed, or what had become part of the common tradition from the testimony of eye-witnesses. But the physical is not the only side. Even in bodily disorders it is being more fully recognized that there is the mental or psychical factor in the problem as it faces the physician (see art. CURES). And the NT plainly sets forth this psychical element in the cases now before us. They ascribe the trouble directly to an intangible spiritual influence which possesses the being of the sufferer, takes the use of the bodily organs, and controls the will. And thus emerges—

iii. THE QUESTION AS TO POSSESSION BY EVIL SPIRITS.—How far does the NT in attributing these disorders to demonic possession give a true account of the phenomenon? The question is not to be determined by invoking authority, either that of the NT or of our Lord Jesus Christ. The authority of the Gospels is of a totally different order, and moves in a higher sphere than that of writers who were 'supernaturally' lifted above the current conceptions of their generation. We have no warrant for believing the Evangelists to have been granted knowledge of mental disease in advance of the scientific attainments of their own day. Nor can inquiry be silenced by the appeal to the fact that our Lord Himself habitually spoke and acted as if He recognized the presence of evil spirits in mental disease. The Christian apologist takes unnecessarily perilous ground when he declares that for our Lord to have been limited in knowledge invalidates His authority as Prophet and Saviour. In His condition as incarnate our Lord did share the limitations that belong to our human lot, and advanced in knowledge of human affairs and scientific problems by normal human processes.

But it is equally important that the matter should not be dogmatized off the roll of discussion by those who claim to speak in the name of science and declare that the NT explanation is 'impossible' on the ground that spiritual agencies do not exist. The question, if left open, must be open on both sides; and there are certain considerations which must be borne in mind while we examine the possibility of spiritual agencies being concerned, as concomitants of the physical disease or nervous instability, in cases of mental derangement, whether in NT times or in the present day.

(1) We must guard ourselves from the conception of these evil spiritual agencies as semi-sensuous beings, possessed of bodily form, appetites and passions. The conception has vitiated human thought from early Semitic times, in the NT age, through the Middle Ages down to the present, when it is even yet strangely persistent. The popular thought of Satan is grotesquely dominated by that idea, and much of the prevalent disbelief in the existence of a spiritual adversary can be traced to that gross misconception.

(2) Kindred to this is the thought of a multiplicity of demons being concerned in the possession of a human life. This idea has been responsible for much false conception in the case of the Gerasene sufferer. And it cannot be too strongly emphasized that nowhere does our Lord give the least sanction to any such notion. He never speaks of more than one evil or unclean spirit (see Alexander, Demonic Possession, ch. vii.).

(3) In place of misconceptions, a right conception needs to be grasped of the malignant powers that can make a prey of an otherwise disordered human life. So far from the idea of semi-sensuous beings representing the truth, it would be far truer to think of possession as akin to the condition seen in intense anger, or extreme fear. 'Anything is a possession that dispossesses the man of himself, from whatever world it comes' (Bushnell). We are yet far from being able to define the nature of mind or spirit. We believe in mind on the ground of its manifest action in the directing of our human activities, because of the things it creates and destroys. But what mind is, passes our power to conceive and define. And the same is true of spirit. But we can make no progress in understanding the Universe and our human life within it, except on the assumption of a Supreme and Holy Intelligence and Will behind all physical and mental phenomena. We believe in a living Personal God, and the faith illumines all life and being. Moreover, we are ourselves personalities constantly acting upon, and being acted upon by, other personalities. A moral world is inconceivable on any other terms. And is it unreasonable if we decline to admit the impossibility of other superhuman personalities, some of them centres of benignant and others of malignant moral energy, being present and active in and upon our life here? Who can reasonably deny that such evil agencies may conceivably take advantage of an unstable nervous system or a disordered physical constitution, and possess and control the whole being?

(4) It must also be made clear that the physical disease may be the effect of a potent psychical disorder. The whole mischief may come from the side of the mental or psychical. A long-continued yielding of the mind or spirit to evil agencies may result in physical deterioration, just as truly as physical deterioration may give the opportunity for an evil spiritual possession. 'Prolonged mental enfeeblement is followed by brain atrophy, and prolonged mental disturbances by structural brain changes' (Clouston). A consideration of our Lord's method in dealing with this disaster in humanity will increase our unwillingness to bar out the 'demonic' element in lunacy. See also artt. ACCOMMODATION, vol. i. 20 f., and DEMON, ib. 441 ff.

IV. OUR LORD'S RESTORATION OF THE 'LUNATIC.'
—The Synoptic Gospels all ascribe to Jesus a unique command over these afflicted persons and over the alien power that possessed them. He was able to restore the lost self-control and also to deal with the disease which was commonly the physical basis of the mental derangement. The latter portion of the process is akin to our Lord's healing of bodily diseases (see CURES); but the action of Jesus is upon the body through the mind, and upon the mental or psychical directly. Mental physicians who treat lunacy from the physical side yet fully recognize the existence of the psychical, and the possibility and actuality of alleviation being brought by action upon that side of the ailment. 'The action of "mind on mind" in healthy brains is direct, intense, and most subtle. The same is the case when the brain is disordered, and hence in psychiatry mental therapeutics are a most important means of treatment' (Clouston). Such facts are truly illuminative of the action of Jesus, and we may not unreasonably attribute His restoring power to a master-influence which, while it transcends all that is known of the human, yet is not on a totally different plane. In Jesus the power of mind was at its fullest and finest by reason of: (1) His intense and penetrating sympathy with mankind; (2) His vigorous will to bring help and deliverance to all human sufferers; (3) His continual and perfect alliance and moral union with the Divine Power in which He lived and moved and had His being. The Divine Will can and does manifest itself in every human unselfishness and sympathy and generous helpful impulse, and through a human personality healing forces of God Himself are at work amidst all human distress and oppression. And in our Lord that Divine healing might find full scope and unhindered freedom of activity, so that the Name of Jesus was a healing, restoring, life-giving Name, even empowering feeble disciples to cast out devils (see art. MIRACLES, c.).

The method of Jesus clearly suggests the exercise of a Holy Divinely-informed Will and Personality upon other wills and personalities. The features which most impressed those who witnessed His action were the rebuke, the command, the authority which claimed and obtained unhesitating homage and obedience (Mk 12²⁷⁻²⁷, Lk 9³⁷⁻⁴³), inevitably reminding them of 'the majesty of God.' Especially does His dealing with the Gerasene lunatic indicate His secret. He goes direct to the lost self-control, seeks to recover the submerged personality, and to remove that self-identification with the evil power. He endeavours to awaken the man to the true sense of his own individuality and to set it free from an alien domination. 'What is thy name?' He asks. By the efficient co-operation of the man He would break up that terrible sympathy and alliance which caused the victim to say, 'We are many.' (The suggestion of Schmiedel that in asking this question Jesus was, like a modern alienist, seeking to discover the delusions of the patient, amounts to an anachronism). And the unique Personality of Jesus had the power to evoke, and give once again its commanding controlling place to, this essential energy of the man.

Modern treatment of the insane bears a most suggestive likeness to the method of Jesus. By cheerful surroundings, by healthful labour, by the encouragement of all existing faculty in the patient, by amusement and music and religious exercises, and not least by human sympathy, the endeavour is made to conserve every vestige of self-possession, to keep alive and to develop all available capacity. The constant effort is to penetrate through all physical and psychical disabilities to the real and effective personality. It may fairly be said that medical skill and investigation into causes and remedies of this distressing malady are yet in their preliminary stages, and the progress of the years may be followed with the utmost hopefulness because in all such investigation the Divine Spirit energizes.

LUST.—The noun 'lust' (ἐπιθυμία) occurs only twice in EV of Gospels (Mk 4¹⁹, Jn 8⁴⁴), and the verb 'to lust' (ἐπιθυμῶ) only once (Mt 5²⁸). Both noun and verb, however, are of common occurrence in the rest of the NT. In modern usage, 'lust' is confined to sexual desire; but, when the AV was made, the word had a much greater elasticity of meaning, corresponding in this respect to ἐπιθυμία and ἐπιθυμῶ. In NT, as in classical Gr., these words properly denote strong desire whether good or bad, then evil desire in particular, and finally sexual desire specifically. Even in the Gospels we find illustrations of these varying connotations of both the Gr. and the Eng. terms. When our Lord says of His desire to eat of His last Passover ἐπιθυμία ἐπεθύμησα (Lk 22¹⁵), He simply expresses a deep longing. When He speaks of the seed of the word being choked by the lusts (ἐπιθυμίας) of other things (Mk 4¹⁹), these lusts are desires not necessarily evil, though the taint of evil is beginning to enter, because, while in themselves they may be harmless, these desires are allowed to hinder the operation of the word. When He says to the Jewish leaders, 'Ye are of your father the devil, and the lusts (ἐπιθυμίας) of your father it is your will to do,' both 'lust' and ἐπιθυμία have passed into a distinctly bad meaning. And in Mt 5²⁸ the Gr. and the Eng. word are alike equivalent to lascivious desire. See also art. DESIRE, vol. i. p. 453.

Very little is said explicitly about lust in the Gospels, because little is needed. Lust is not to be dallied with or compromised with; it is to be totally and continually shunned and avoided. Inward lust is as heinous as outward adultery to the eye of God, which views alike the inside and the outside of man (Mt 5²⁸).^{*} The lustful eye will make the whole body full of darkness (Mt 6²²). The single eye and mind are free from lustful fancies and thoughts (Lk 11³⁴). The honest and good heart brings forth only good fruit (Lk 8¹⁵). Either the heart must be pure, and its fruit pure; or else impure, and its fruit impure (Mt 12³³). Adulteries, covetings, lasciviousness,—these defile a man (Mk 7²²). And lust, in its very nature, is unholy. Hence Christ's Holy Spirit is opposite to, and inconsistent with, the lustful demon which makes its foul abode in the neglected heart of the careless or heedless or wanton. There is no limit to the iniquity and abandonment to which such evil possession or corruption may drag the blinded, besotted soul intent upon brutish delights never realized. Herod's course was impeded only a little by the rebuke of a John Baptist (Mk 6¹⁸). No man can serve two masters (Lk 16¹³); and he that committeth sin is the bondservant of sin (Jn 8³⁴).

W. B. FRANKLAND and J. C. LAMBERT.

LYSANIAS.—This name is given by St. Luke (3¹) among those who ruled in the various parts of Syria and Palestine at the time when John the Baptist entered upon his public work. The name does not again occur in the NT. A Lysanias is mentioned by Dio Cassius (xlix. 32) as having been made king of Iturea by Mark Antony and afterwards put to death by him. This same Lysanias is also spoken of by Josephus (Ant. xv. iv. 1), who adds that Antony was moved to the step of putting Lysanias to death by Cleopatra, on the ground that he had conspired against her with the Parthians. The same Lysanias and his connexion with the Parthians are alluded to also elsewhere by Josephus (BJ i. xiii. 1; Ant. xiv. xiii. 3). The data agree in making him the son of Ptolemy, and locating his reign between B.C. 40 and 36. A Lysanias is mentioned again by Josephus in Ant. xviii. vi. 10 and xx. vii. 1. In both of these passages the territory over which he ruled is designated a tetrarchy (cf. BJ ii. xi. 5, xii. 8; Ant. xix. v. 1).

The question raised by these data is, Does Josephus know two men of the name or one? If he knows two, the Lysanias of St. Luke is evidently the second, and no further difficulty exists. If, however, he has the same man in mind throughout, the question next emerging is as to whether St. Luke knew and alluded to another and younger Lysanias, or erroneously identified the only ruler of that name with the times of the public appearance of John the Baptist and Jesus. In favour of the latter view, it is alleged that Josephus never gives any intimation of a difference between the two men of the name, and in fact does not at first reading seem to know two. His readers were bound, it is argued, to suppose that the Lysanias who was executed in B.C. 36 is meant wherever the name is used. St. Luke was acquainted with the writings of Josephus, but did not use them with accuracy, and an error is quite probable. He makes an error in defining the limits of the realm of Philip, Iturea. It is not held that an error can be demonstrated in his statement regarding Lysanias, but the probability is said to be for such an error, and the grounds for believing in a second Lysanias are regarded as unsatisfying. This view was propounded by Strassus, and has been supported by Keim, Krenkel, and Schmiedel.

Per contra, that there were two men of the name is argued from various considerations. (1) Though Josephus does not explicitly say that he is speaking of two distinct persons, his descriptions imply such a distinction. Lysanias the son of Ptolemy was not a tetrarch, but bore the title of king (so he is also called by Dio Cassius). (2) The limits of the territories over which the Lysanias of Josephus ruled are different. The elder Lysanias inherited from his father a kingdom including Chalkis on the Lebanon. This was not, however, included in the realm of the tetrarch Lysanias. (3) Abila was associated with the name of the tetrarch, but not with that of the son of Ptolemy. (4) During the reign of Tiberius, or at least 50 years after the death of the first Lysanias, a certain Nymphæus built a road and erected a temple, and left an account of these acts in an extant inscription (CIG 4521). In this inscription he calls himself 'a freedman of Lysanias.' It is impossible that he should have been the freedman of the son of Ptolemy. He must be regarded as living under the tetrarch. (5) Another inscription at Heliopolis, whose lacunæ have been filled out by Renan, renders it exceedingly probable that there were more than one ruler bearing the name in question. (6) A coin discovered by Pococke at Nebhi-Abel (Abila) bears the superscription Αυσαβλου τετραρχ. και αρχιεπεισ. But as Dio calls the first Lysanias a king, it is at least doubtful that the lower title of tetrarch should appear on his own coin. In that case the coin must have been struck by the second Lysanias. (7) Finally, an inscription (CIG 4523) informs us that Lysanias the son of Ptolemy left children behind him. It is probable that the names Lysanias and Zenodorus were dynastic names, and that the second Lysanias was given the name of him who was put to death in 36. This is the view supported by S. Davidson, Wieseler, Renan, Schürer, Plummer, and others.

An earlier effort to establish the historical accuracy of St. Luke's statement regarding Lysanias was made by Paulus (Com. i. 1) through the suggestion that the word τετραρχοῦντος should be erased from St. Luke's text, or that it should be connected with Φίλιππον, making Philip the 'tetrarch of Ituræa, Trachonitis, and the Abilene of Lysanias,' i.e. of that province of which Lysanias had been tetrarch in his day. But this has always been considered an arbitrary way of dealing with the text, resorted to solely for the purpose of saving the historical precision of the Evangelist, and has not found much favour in any quarter.

MACHÆRUS.—A fortress on the east of the Dead Sea, in which, according to Josephus (Ant. XVIII. v. 2), John the Baptist was imprisoned and put to death by Herod Antipas (Mt 14³⁻¹², Mk 6¹⁷⁻²⁹, Lk 3¹⁹). It had been originally fortified by Alexander Jannæus (Jos. BJ VII. vi. 2), and afterwards destroyed by Gabinius (ib. i. viii. 5; Ant. XIV. v. 4). It was restored by Herod the Great, who used it as a residence (BJ VII. vi. 1, 2). On his death it passed into the hands of Antipas, as it lay in the Peraean portion of his tetrarchy. At the time of the Jewish revolt it was occupied by a Roman garrison, which was constrained to abandon it in A.D. 66 (ib. II. xviii. 6). After the fall of Jerusalem it was recaptured, and finally destroyed by the Roman general Lucilius Bassus (ib. VII. vi. 4). The ruins, called Mkauer, on a projecting height near the Dead Sea on its eastern side, are supposed to mark the site of the fortress.

MADNESS.—It is somewhat remarkable that the OT ideas about madness should differ so much from those of the Gospels. In the OT madness is due to the influence of a spirit from God (1 S 16¹⁴ 18¹⁰), in the Gospels to a demon; in the OT it is conceived of as being closely connected with the 'spirit of prophecy' (which likewise came from God); this is clear from such passages as 1 S 10⁶⁻¹² 19^{23, 24}, Hos 9⁷, 2 K 9¹¹, Jer 29²⁶; there is no sign of this in the Gospels.* It was, no doubt, owing to the belief that madness was a sign of the indwelling of a spirit from God that a madman was looked upon (in the OT) as, in some sense, sacred;† in the Gospels the reverse of this seems to be the case, if one regards the demoniac described in Lk 8²⁶⁻³⁹ as a madman [see DEMON].

There are very few references to madness in the Gospels; in Lk 6¹¹ the word δωκία is used (the RVM renders it 'foolishness'), its meaning is certainly nearer to 'foolishness' than to the modern notion of madness; perhaps its meaning is best expressed by the German ausser sich, lit. 'outside of oneself,' resulting in a temporary loss of mental balance; in 2 Ti 3⁹ the same word is translated 'folly,' which, taken with the words 'corrupted in mind' in the preceding verse, brings out the sense more fully. Another expression, used in Mt 4²⁴ 17¹⁵, is σελη- νιάζεσθαι 'to be lunatic,' or 'moonstruck,'* but from the context in the second passage there can be no doubt that this was epilepsy. Neither of these expressions answers to modern ideas of madness. There is, however, one other word (μαίνεσθαι, Jn 10²⁰) which seems to correspond with what would be understood by madness nowadays, viz. to be bereft of reason; in the passage in question it is certainly used in this sense; at the same time it must be remembered that μαίνεσθαι is connected with μαντεύεσθαι, which implies possession by some supernatural being.† The same word, as well as μανία, is used in Ac 26²⁴⁻²⁵, where ἀλήθεια and σωφροσύνη are placed in opposition to it, which confirms the meaning implied in Jn 10²⁰.‡ [See, further, DEMON, LUNATIC].

On two occasions in the Gospels we find madness or insanity definitely attributed to our Lord Himself. Once by His own friends, among whom, apparently, His mother and brethren were included (Mk 3³¹, cf. v. 31). We read that 'they went out to lay hold on him: for they said, He is beside himself' (ἐξέστη). Commentators are for the most part agreed that in this passage ἐξέστη denotes insanity, or at least a mental excitement bordering upon it (cf. a similar use of the word by St. Paul, 2 Co 5¹³). The other occasion is that already referred to, when, according to St. John, certain of 'the Jews' said of Jesus, 'He hath a devil, and is mad' (δαίμονιον ἔχει καὶ μαίνεται, Jn 10²⁰). In this case the madness is evidently ascribed to Satanic possession, and is not regarded merely as a derangement due to overwork and excitement. It is worth noting, however, that μαίνομαι is applied to St. Paul in a less offensive way (μαίνω, Ac 26²⁴) by Festus. AV renders, 'Thou art beside thyself,' which RV consistently changes into, 'Thou art mad,' to correspond with 'I am not mad (οὐ μαίνομαι), most excellent Festus,' in the next verse. The charge of madness brought against Jesus is characteristic and significant, and has many parallels in the history of Christ's followers in the early (cf. Ac 2¹³ as well as 26²⁴⁻²⁵, 2 Co 5¹³) and in the later Church. It is an illustration of the inability of the natural man to receive the

* Macalister (in Hastings' DB iii. 328*) quotes Vicary, who says of the brain that 'it moutheth and followeth the mouing of the Moone: for in the waxing of the Moone, the Brayne followeth upwards; and in the wane of the Moone the Brayne descendeth downwards, and vanishes in substance of vertue . . .'; according to the Jewish conception, which connects epilepsy with demoniacal possession (Mt 17¹⁵), the light of the moon drove demons away. MAGDALA.—The word 'Magdala' occurs once only in the TR of the NT (Mt 15³⁹). In B and N the reading is 'Magadan.' This reading is followed by Tisch., Alford, WH, and is adopted in the RV. In the parallel narrative in St. Mark's Gospel (8¹⁰) the place to which Christ came is designated as 'the parts of Dalmanutha' (wh. see). These names evidently refer to the same district, but not necessarily to the same place. They seem to have been in such proximity, however, that the adjacent district might be named from either. With respect to their location, various sites on the south and south-east border of the Lake of Galilee have been suggested, but none of them can be regarded as satisfactory. There is no site in this locality whose name bears any resemblance to Magadan; and the only place which suggests a resemblance to Dalmanutha is a village known as ed-Delhemiyeh, near the mouth of the Jarmuk river. Apart from the name there is nothing else in or about the place to justify its identification with the town to which St. Mark refers in the passage above cited. Caspari and Edersheim would place Magadan within the limits of the Decapolis, but do not assign it to any definite location. The suggestion of Ewald that its site is identical with Megiddo, on the southern border of the Esdraelon plain, does not harmonize with the facts of the narrative, and apparently rests upon a very slender foundation.

In the light of all the information attainable at the present time, the probabilities strongly favour the view, which has long been held by eminent writers and explorers, that the district in which these places were located was on the western shore of the Lake of Galilee, and that Magadan represents the village now known as el-Mejdel, the traditional site of the town of Mary Magdalene. While the words in their present form are not identical, they may be regarded as variations of the same name. Stanley's suggestion is worthy of note in this connexion: 'It may be observed that, as Herodotus (ii. 159) turns Megiddo into Magdalum, so some MSS in Mt 15³⁹ turn Magdala into Magadan' (SP 451, note 1). It has been suggested also by another writer, as a possible explanation of the substitution of one name for the other, 'that owing to the familiar recurrence of the word Magdalene, the less known name was absorbed in the better, and Magdala usurped the name and possibly also the position of Magadan' (art. 'Magdala' in Smith's DB ii. p. 1734). On the supposition that Magadan was on or adjacent to the site of el-Mejdel, the probable location of Dalmanutha is at or near Ain el-Barideh, where the ruins of an ancient village have been traced and described by Porter, Tristram, and other explorers. This site is about a mile south of el-Mejdel. An incidental testimony in support of this identification is given by Rabbi Schwarz, who asserts that the cave of Teliman or Talmanutha was in the cliffs which overlooked the sea behind the site of el-Mejdel. In the same connexion he identifies Migdal (Mejdel) with Magdala (p. 189). To this may be added the testimony of the Rabbins, that Magdala was adjacent to the city of Tiberias (Otho, Lex Rabb. 353). In the travels of Willibald (A.D. 722), 'Magdalum' is located between Tiberias and Capernaum; and in the time of Quaresmius (17th cent.), Mejdél is mentioned as identical with the Magdala of Scripture (ii. 866).

The generally accepted view that the descriptive surname of Mary—'Magdalene'—used several times in the NT, and by all the Evangelists, was derived from her home or birthplace, is confirmed by the testimony of Edersheim, who asserts that several Rabbis are spoken of in the Talmud as 'Magdalene' or residents of Magdala. From the same source he gathers the statements that Magdala, which was a Sabbath-day's journey from Tiberias, was celebrated for its dye-works and its manufactories of fine woollen textures, of which eighty are mentioned. It was also noted for its wealth, its moral corruption, and for its traffic in turtle-doves and pigeons for purifications. The suggestion made by Lightfoot, that the name meant 'curler of hair,' is rejected by Edersheim, who regards it as founded upon a misapprehension (Life and Times of Jesus the Messiah, vol. i. p. 571).

Magdala is favourably situated at the S.E. corner of the plain of Gennesaret. It is three miles north of Tiberias, and almost the same distance south of Khan Minyeh. Before it lies the northward expanse of the Plain and the Lake; behind it rises a dark background of beetling cliffs, broken in one section by the deeply-cleft gorge of the Wady Hamam (Valley of Doves). Its precipitous sides are honeycombed with caves, which for centuries have been the refuge of robbers and outlaws. Mt. Hattin, the traditional mountain of the Beatitudes, is a conspicuous landmark on the plateau at the upper end of the wady. Through this natural passage-way the caravan route from the Mediterranean coast follows the line of the old Roman road to Khan Minyeh, and thence northward over the hills of Naphtali. A perennial stream, which waters the southern portion of the Plain, finds its way to the Lake a short distance north of the outskirts of the town.

Mejdel, which has little in itself to commend or distinguish it, is the only place of permanent habitation in the once densely populated 'land of Gennesaret.' It consists of twenty or more low, flat-roofed, grass-covered hovels, built of a conglomeration of dried mud, shells, and pebbles. Its degenerate inhabitants are the only resident farmers of the Plain, and go out from the town to cultivate a few patches of cleared ground in favourable locations. Near the centre of the village a palm-tree rises conspicuously above the objects around it, and a few thickly set thorn-trees on the outskirts afford a grateful shade to the loungers of the place in the heat of the day. A watch-tower on the north border of the town is a present suggestion of the derivation of the name Mejdel or its Greek form Migdol. It is possible also that Migdal-el (Jos 19²⁸) stands for the same place. The tower gives evidence of a date of construction comparatively modern, but it is doubtless the successor of an older outlook or watch-tower, which commanded the gateway to the southern section of the Gennesaret plain. The remains of substructions of a substantial character, hidden beneath the earth and its dense covering of undergrowth, afford satisfactory evidence of the antiquity of the site.

MAGDALENE.—See preceding art., and MARY, No. 2.

MAGI (μάγοι, AV and RV 'wise men').—The only reference to Magi in the Gospels occurs in Mt 2, where we have the well-known story of the visit of the Oriental Magi to the infant Jesus. The following article will deal with (1) certain difficulties in the narrative, (2) the historical value of the narrative, (3) the legendary additions to the narrative.

1. The difficulties are occasioned chiefly by the vague and indefinite character of the record. The first question that suggests itself is, What class of people had the Evangelist in his mind when he used the term μάγοι? Now, according to Herodotus (i. 101), the Magi were a Median tribe which in the time of Gaumata, the pseudo-Smerdis, made a determined attempt to substitute Median for Persian rule (ib. iii. 61 ff.; Ctesias, Pers. 41 (10) ff.; Justin, i. 9, 10; Agathias, ii. 26). Through the failure of this revolt the Magi lost all political importance, but they were influential as the priestly caste (Herod. i. 132; Amm. Marc. xxiii. 6; cf. the Levites among the Hebrews, SBE iv. pp. lxii, lxiii), and as religious instructors of the Persian kings (Cic. de Divin. i. 41; Philo, de Special. Lcg. 18; Pliny, HN xxx. 1). The introduction of this Magian priesthood is ascribed to Cyrus (Xen. Cyr. viii. 1. 23); and classical writers conversant with Persian affairs use the word magus as synonymous with 'priest' (Apul. Apol. i. 25, 26; cf. Strabo, pp. 732, 733; Philo, Quod omn. prob. lib. 11; Dio Chrysost. Or. 36, p. 449, 49, p. 538; Diog. Laert. proem. 6; Porphyry, de Abstinent. iv. 16; and the lexicons of Hesych. and Suidas). Darius Hystaspis made Mazdaism the religion of the Empire (Behistun inser., and Sayce, Ancient Empires of the East), and from his time, at any rate,—for how long before, if at all, is disputed,—the Magi are identified with the Zoroastrian worship, and are represented as the disciples of Zoroaster (Plato, Alcib. i. 122; Plutarch, de Is. et Os. 46, 47; Pliny, HN xxx. 1; Apul. Apol. 26; Diog. Laert. proem. 2; Amm. Marc. xxiii. 6; Agathias, ii. 24; Aug. de Civ. Dei. xxi. 14). In the Avesta, however, the priests are called, not magi, but athravans; though even in the sacred texts the word 'magi' is found in a few instances. Finally, it may be noted that these Median magi are credited with skill in philosophy (Strabo, pp. 23, 24; Nicol. Damasc. fr. 66; Diog. Laert. proem. 1), natural science (Philo, Quod omn. prob. lib. 11; Dio Chrysost. Or. 49, p. 538), and medicine (Pliny, HN xxx. 1, cf. xxiv. 17). They are also described as interpreters of dreams (Herod. i. 107, 120, vii. 19), astrologers (ib. vii. 37; Pliny, HN xxxvii. 9; Amm. Marc. xxiii. 6), soothsayers and diviners (Cic. de Divin. i. 41; Strabo, p. 762; Pliny, HN xxx. 2; Diog. Laert. proem. 7; Aelian, Var. Hist. ii. 17; Amm. Marc. xxiii. 6).

In a technical sense, then, magi denoted the members of the sacerdotal class in the Persian Empire. But in the LXX Daniel the word is used to render the Heb. 'ashshāphim, AV 'astrologers,' of Babylonia (Dn 2²⁰ 22¹⁰, 27⁴ 57¹¹, 15). Some would explain the title Rab-mag in Jer 39³, 13 as = 'chief magian,' but without probability). Moreover, classical writers sometimes confuse the words magi and Chaldæi (Ctes. Pers. 46 (15); Justin, xii. 13). The latter term, however, is properly used in Daniel (1⁴ 2⁴ 4⁵, 10⁴ 47⁵, 11) and by classical authorities (Herod. i. 181, 183; Diod. Sic. ii. 29-31) to represent a class, or the class, of Babylonian priests or learned men (Driver, Daniel, pp. 12-16), renowned for their skill in astronomy, astrology, and sorcery (Cic. de Divin. i. 41, de Fato, 8, 9; Diod. Sic. ii. 29-31; Strabo, p. 762; Curtius, v. 1; Apul. Flor. 15; Porph. Vit. Pyth. 6; Diog. Laert. proem. 6; cf. Lenormant, La magie chez les Chaldæens; R. C. Thompson, Reports of the Magicians and Astrologers of Nineveh and Babylon; W. L. King, Babylonian Magic and Sorcery; Chantepie de la Saussaye, Lehrbuch der Religionsgeschichte; Jastrow, Religion of Babylonia and Assyria).

Lastly, the words magi and Chaldæi came to be applied not only to the members of a sacerdotal caste, but in a secondary sense to all those who cultivated magic arts (Soph. Ed. Tyr. 387; Tac. Ann. ii. 27, xii. 22, 59; Juv. Sat. x. 94, with Mayor's note; Dio Chrysost. Or. 36, p. 449). In Rabbinical writers this bad sense is predominant (Edersheim, Life and Times, i. p. 210), and the same may be said of the passages in the NT (other than Mt 2) in which magi are referred to (Ac 8⁹, 11 Simon Magus, 13⁸ Elymas). In the LXX the Egyptian conjuring is described as μαγική τέχνη (Wis 17⁷). And Jerome says: 'Consuetudo et sermo communis magos pro maleficis accepit' (Hieron. Com. in Dan. 2, cf. Isid. Ety. viii. 9).

In what sense, then, did the author of Mt 2 understand the term? The majority of the Fathers affix the worst interpretation, and lay stress on the idea that magic was overthrown by the advent of Christ (Ign. Éphes. 19; Justin M. Dial. 78; Tertull. de Idol. 9; Origen, c. Cels. i. 60; Max. Taur. Hom. 21; Hilar. de Trin. iv. 38, Com. in Matt. 1; Aug. Serm. 200, § 3; Theophylact, in loc.); and this was the common opinion even in the Middle Ages (Abelard, in Epiph. serm. 4; Aquinas, Summa, III. xxxvi. 3). But the consensus of later commentators rejects this view. There is no hint or suggestion of reprobation in the Gospel narrative. On the other hand, there is no indication that the Evangelist is alluding to any particular class of magi. He appears, on the contrary, to use the term in the general sense of sages from the East, who busied themselves with astronomy (vv. 2⁷, 8, 10) and perhaps with the interpretation of dreams (v. 12). There is certainly no attempt in the narrative to contrast Christianity with Zoroastrian or Babylonian worship.

Closely connected with the above is the further question of the region whence the Magi are supposed to have come. Mt. calls them simply μάγοι ἀπὸ ἀνατολῶν, i.e. 'Oriental magi.' The expression is quite indefinite (cf. Mt 8¹¹ 24²⁷, Lk 13²⁹, Rev 21¹³). Various attempts have been made, however, to identify the particular part of the East whence the Magi may have come (Patritius, de Evang. iii. p. 315 ff.; Spanheim, Dub. Evang. ii. p. 291 ff.). The oldest opinion inclines to Arabia (Justin M. Dial. 77, 78; Tertull. Jud. 9; Epiph. Exp. Fid. 8, and most Roman commentators, c.g. Corn. a Lapide, in loc.), partly on account of references such as Ps 72¹⁰, Is 60⁵, partly on account of the character of the gifts, partly by reason of the close intercourse that subsisted between Arabia and Palestine (Edersheim, i. p. 203). On the other hand, Arabia is to the south rather than the east of Judæa (cf. Mt 12⁴² βασίλισσα νότου), and in the NT it is usually specified by its geographical name. Other places suggested are Persia (Clem. Alex. Strom. i. 15; Chrysost. in Mt. Hom. 6, § 1, 2, 3, 4; 7, § 5; Op. Imp. in Mt. 2 ap. Chrysost. vi.; Diodorus Tars. ap. Phot. cod. 223; Theophylact, in loc.; Juvenius, Evang. Hist. i. 276), Chaldæa (Max. Taur. Hom. 21; Origen, c. Cels. i. 58), Parthia (Wetstein, in loc.; Hyde, Rel. Vet. Pers. c. 31), and Egypt (Möller, Neue Ansichten). But the language of the Evangelist is 'too indefinite, and perhaps intentionally too indefinite, to justify any decision' (Trench, Star of the Wise Men, p. 4), and it is unsafe to draw any inference from the nature of the presents (Weiss, Life of Christ, i. p. 266). One thing alone seems clear—the Magi were heathen and not Jews (see references in Meyer, Com. in loc.). The form of their question (Mt 2²) would be sufficient to establish this, apart from the ecclesiastical tradition which represents their homage as the first-fruits of the Gentile world (Aquinas, Summa, III. xxxvi. 8).

The cause of the coming of the Magi is roughly indicated in the words, 'we have seen his star in the rising' (ἐν τῇ ἀνατολῇ). It seems clear that they were induced to make the journey by some sidereal appearance; but what exactly this appearance was is not conclusively determined (see art. STAR). From this phenomenon, however, whatever it may have been, the Magi inferred the birth of a Messiah-king of the Jews. We cannot say precisely by what means they arrived at this inference. It is unlikely, for chronological and other reasons, that their expectations had been excited by the Zoroastrian prediction of the coming of Soshyos (SBE iv. p. xxxvii); nor is it probable that an independent tradition of Balaam's prophecy (Nu 24¹⁷) had been preserved by their ancestors and handed down to them (Origen, c. Cels. i. 60, Hom. in Num. 13. 7; Op. Imp. in Mt. 2 ap. Chrysost. vi.); nor is there any historical evidence that there was at this time among the nations any widespread expectation of the advent of a Messiah in Palestine (Tac. Hist. v. 13 and Suet. Vesp. 4 are derived from Jos. BJ vi. v. 4, and refer to the Flavian dynasty). On the other hand, the Jews themselves were undoubtedly expecting the Messiah (Charles, Eschatology, p. 304; Toy, Judaism and Christianity, p. 330), and a Rabbinical tradition, which may be previous to Christ's birth, declared that a star in the East was to appear two years before the Messiah's advent (Edersheim, i. pp. 211. 212; Strauss, Life of Jesus, Eng. tr. p. 174 and references; cf. the name Bar-Cochba). Hence the source whence the Magi derived their inference that a king of the Jews was born may well have been the Jews of the Diaspora, whose tenets would doubtless be known to the wise men of the lands in which they sojourned.

The time of the visit of the Magi is quite uncertain. By ancient writers it was usually supposed that they arrived at Bethlehem on the 13th day inclusive after the birth of Christ, i.e. Jan. 6 (Ang. Serm. 203. 1). Most commentators, however, place their coming after Christ's presentation in the Temple; and some, as an inference from Mt 2⁶, delay it till Jesus had reached or nearly reached His second year (see Patritius, iii. 326 ff.; Spanheim, ii. p. 299 ff.; Trench, p. 109 ff.; Ramsay, Was Christ born at Bethlehem? pp. 215-220). Here also the evidence is insufficient to warrant a definite conclusion.

2. The historical value of the narrative has been frequently impugned, the principal objections being as follows. The account of the Magi is found in the First Gospel only, and is not corroborated by either Lk. or Josephus or any pagan historian. (The references in Macrobius, Sat. ii. 4. 11, and Chalcoidius, Tim. 7. 126, cannot be regarded as independent evidence). Moreover, it is not easy to see how Mt.'s narrative can be harmonized with that of Luke. Many of the details, again, are suspicious; the conduct of Herod, as here represented, seems inexplicable (Meyer, in loc.). Finally, the story in general is vague, and on a priori grounds may even be held to be improbable. These objections are not without force. Doubtless too much stress has been laid on the absence of confirmatory evidence, and the argument from the silence of Josephus can scarcely be sustained (Edersheim, i. pp. 214, 215; Trench, p. 102 ff.). The difficulties in connexion with Herod's attitude have also been overestimated (Weiss, i. p. 269). Yet the divergence between Mt. and Lk., though certainly not incapable of explanation (Ellicott, Huls. Lect. p. 70), is sufficiently serious; and the positive evidence for the truth of the narrative is slender. It may be urged, however, that there is no reason for denying the existence in the narrative of at least a substratum of historical fact, though possibly the facts have been treated with a certain amount of freedom. Such a view, at any rate, appears to account for the story better than any rationalistic explanation hitherto put forward.

Of these attempted explanations the most important may briefly be summarized. (a) The older school of critics sought for the basis of the history mainly in the prophecies of the OT. Thus Strauss laid great stress on Nu 24¹⁷, while Keim emphasized Is 60. From these and other prophetic passages (e.g. Is 9² 4²⁶ 496. 7, Ps 68²⁹. 31 72¹⁰), supplemented possibly by Jewish or pagan tradition, the Evangelist is supposed to have built up his story. But it is incredible that the history could have been constructed from such material, or that such a fulfilment could have been deliberately devised for prophecies which at the time were understood to have so different a significance (Edersheim, i. p. 209). Moreover, it should be noted that 'the Evangelist who at other times searches zealously for the fulfilment of OT predictions, nowhere refers in this narrative to one of these prophetic passages, from which it is said to have arisen' (Weiss, i. p. 267). (b) A different, and very fanciful explanation has been offered by W. Soltau, Usener, and others (Soltau, Birth of Jesus Christ; Usener in Encyc. Bibl. art. 'Nativity,' cf. his Religionsgeschichtliche Untersuchungen, i. 'Das Weihnachtsfest'). According to this, Mt.'s account is the outcome partly of the operation of heathen superstitious ideas, partly of the transformation of a story recorded by Dio and Pliny. Thus, for the incident of the star, Soltau appeals to the widespread belief that such portents were manifested in connexion with the birth and death of kings and heroes (for instances see Wetstein, in loc.; Winer, Biblisches Realwörterbuch, vol. ii. p. 613); and, for the Massacre of the Innocents, Usener refers to the story of Marathus concerning the birth of Augustus (Suet. Aug. 94). The visit of the Magi is represented as a Christian transformation of the story related by Dio and Pliny about the visit of Tiridates and his Magians to Nero (see the passages quoted by Soltau, op. cit. pp. 73, 74). In the year A.D. 66 the Parthian king Tiridates, the Magus, bringing other Magi with him, journeyed to Rome, worshipped Nero as the sun-god Mithra, and afterwards travelled home by another way through the cities of Asia. Now to the Christians of the East Nero was Antichrist; hence it is argued that just as, in the early legends, the miraculous events of Christ's life were transferred to Antichrist, so the story of being worshipped by Magi may have been transferred from the Antichrist Nero to the Christ. The whole narration of the Magi, then, Soltau dismisses as an insertion 'of Hellenistic origin' (op. cit. p. 49). But he does not explain how this insertion received so characteristic a Jewish form, or why such alien elements should have 'crystallized themselves in just the most markedly Jewish part of the New Testament, while they are passed over in silence elsewhere' (Interpreter, Jan. 1906, pp. 195-207). On the whole it is easier to suppose that the events recorded actually took place, than to believe the far-fetched explanations of them offered by Soltau and Usener. (c) Other critics, again, resort to a mythological solution, and regard the adoration of the Magi and the attendant events as 'not history, but pious transformations of current mythic stories.' Réville believes that it was suggested by the Mithraic legend, though he admits that the supposition is incapable of proof (Études publiées en hommage à la faculté de théologie de Montauban, 1901, p. 339 ff.). Pfeleiderer and Cheyne maintain that the star, the worship of the wise men, and the persecution of the Holy Child have many prototypes in tales concerning heroes of old, and belong to a pre-Christian international myth of the Redeemer (Pfeleiderer, Early Christian Conception of Christ; Cheyne, Bible Problems); on which it may be remarked that although striking parallels can undoubtedly be produced, yet resemblances do not necessarily presuppose an imitation. (d) Another suggestion is that the narrative exhibits the characteristic features of Jewish Midrash or Hag-gādā, and is governed by an apologetic purpose. The writer's object is to show that the prophecy of Dt 18¹⁵ was fulfilled in Jesus, and he endeavours to do this by drawing a parallel between the early career of Moses and that of the Christian Messiah (see the Midrash Rabba to Exodus in the section which deals with the birth of Moses, and cf. Jos. Ant. ii. ix. 2). Jesus is throughout represented as the antitype of Moses. This is the underlying motive of the narrative, to which may be added another influential idea, viz. the desire to suggest the homage of the Gentile world (G. H. Box in Interpreter, loc. cit.). The simplicity of the Gospel story, however, seems to be at variance with this hypothesis.

Allusion may here be made to the theory that the history of the Magi was added to the Gospel as late as the year A.D. 119. The evidence for this is a Syriac document, ascribed to Eusebius of Caesarea, which was published with an Eng. translation by W. Wright in the Journal of Sacred Literature, vols. ix., x., 1866, from a 6th cent. British Museum codex, Add. 17, 142. The title is, 'Concerning the star; showing how and through what the Magi recognized the star, and that Joseph did not take Mary as his wife.' This tractate relates that the prophecy of Balaam about the star was recorded in a letter written by Balak to the king of Assyria, and preserved in the Assyrian archives. At last, in the reign of king Pir Shabour, the star appeared, and the Magi were sent with great pomp to do homage to the Messiah. The colophon at the end states: 'And in the year 430 (= A.D. 119), in the reign of Hadrianus Cæsar . . . this concern arose in (the minds of) men acquainted with the Holy Books; and through the pains of the great men in various places this history was sought for and found and written in the tongue of those who took this care.' As to the meaning of this statement, however, critics are not agreed (see F. C. Conybeare, Guardian, April 29, 1903; and, on the other side, Church Quarterly Review, July 1904, p. 389). The more probable explanation seems to be that 'the Holy Books' refers, not to the OT but to the narrative in Mt 2, already, therefore, incorporated in the Gospel in A.D. 119; and that the 'history' is not Mt 2, but the legend about the preservation of Balak's letter and the coming of the Magi in the reign of Pir Shabour.

To conclude this part of the subject, it may be pointed out that the story of the Magi must stand or fall with the other Matthean narratives of the Infancy. All were probably drawn from some written source, Jewish-Christian in character, and perhaps originally Aramaic in language. The value of this source cannot here be determined (see art. BIRTH OF CHRIST, MATTHEW). It is sufficient to point out that if a Palestinian or semi-Palestinian origin of the narratives can be sustained, the hypothesis of direct pagan influence in their formation must be rejected.

3. Of the legendary accretions to the story of the Magi, the following deserve notice. From the 6th cent., if not before (Tert. Marc. iii. 13, Jud. 9 are not decisive), the opinion prevailed that the Magi were kings. This belief is first unambiguously stated in a sermon ascribed to Cæsarius of Arles (Aug. Opp. v. Append. Serm. 139. 3); and it prevailed universally during the Middle Ages (cf. Paschasius, Exp. in Mt. ii. 2). Hence the festival of Epiphany received the name Festum Trium Regum. The idea would, of course, find support in such passages as Ps 68^{29, 31} 72¹⁰, Is 49^{7, 23} 60^{3, 10, 16}; but there is no suggestion of it in the Evangelic narrative. (For discussions see Patritius, iii. p. 320 ff.; Spanheim, ii. p. 273 ff.; Barradius, Com. ix. c. 8).

The number of the Magi is not specified in the Gospel. Eastern tradition fixed it at twelve (Op. Imp. in Mt. 2 ap. Chrysost. vi.; cf. the curious MS fragment quoted in Classical studies in honour of Henry Drisler, p. 31—'Twelve kings set out from Persia to go to Jerusalem,' etc.), or thirteen (Bar Bahlul in Hyde, Rel. Vet. Pers. c. 31). But in the West the number of the Magi was reckoned at three (Max. Taur. Hom. 17, 20; Leo M. Serm. 31. § 1, 2; 34. § 2), probably on account of their three-fold gift (Abelard, Serm. 4: 'Quot vero isti magi fuerint, ex numero trinae oblationis tres eos fuisse multi suspicantur'), though allegorical reasons were also found (Patritius, iii. 318 ff.).

The familiar names of the Magi—Melchior, Gaspar, and Balthasar—first occur in Bede, where also is given a remarkable description of their persons, derived most probably from some early work of art. 'Primus fuisse dicitur Melchior, senex et canus, barba prolixa et capillis . . . aurum obtulit regi Domino. Secundus nomine Gaspar, iuuenis imberbis, rubicundus . . . thure, quasi Deo oblatione digna, Deum honorabat. Tertius fuscus, integre barbatus, Balthasar nomine . . . per myrrham filium hominis moriturum professus est' (Collect. v. 541. For the association of the gifts with the several Magi, contrast the familiar verse, 'Gaspar fert myrrham, thus Melchior, Balthasar aurum'). Other names are found, e.g. Appellius, Amerius, Damascus: Magalath, Pangalath, Saracen: Ator, Sator, Peratoras, etc. (Patritius, iii. p. 326; Spanheim, ii. pp. 288, 289; Hebenstreit, de Magorum nomine, patria et statu dissert., Jenæ, 1709). Hyde quotes thirteen names, among which the three familiar to Western tradition do not occur (Rel. Vet. Pers. c. 31).

Symbolical meanings were early attached to the gifts. Thus Irenæus says: 'Matthæus autem Magos ab Oriente venientes ait . . . per ea quæ obtulerunt munera ostendisse quis erat qui adorabatur: myrrham quidem quod ipse erat qui pro mortali humano genere moreretur et sepeliretur: aurum vero quoniam rex, cuius regni finis non est: thus vero, quoniam Deus, qui et notus in Judæa factus est, et manifestus eis qui non quærebant eum' (Hæc. iii. 9, 2, cf. Max. Taur. Hom. 21; Leo, Serm. 34. 3; Origen, c. Cels. i. 60; Ambros. in Lk. ii. 44; [Aug.] Serm. 139. 2; Hilar. Com. in Mt. 1; and Christian poets, Juvenius, Ev. Hist. i. 285; Prudent. Cath. xii. 69 ff.; Sedulius, Carm. Pasch. ii. 96; [Claudian] Carm. Append. 21). Mediæval tradition invented histories for these gifts. The gold consisted of thirty pennies, which had once been paid by Abraham for the cave of Machpelah, and which were afterwards given to Judas. Some of the myrrh is said to have been administered to Jesus on the cross (Quarterly Review, vol. lxxviii. p. 433 ff.).

Miraculous elements were increasingly introduced into the narrative, and the whole history was gradually amplified. Thus the star is alleged to have shone with surpassing brilliance (Ignat. Ephes. 19; Leo, Serm. 31. 1; Protevang. Jacob. 21; and pass. quoted in Barradius, Com. ix. 9), having the sun, moon, and other stars as 'chorus' to it (Ignat. loc. cit.). According to Eastern tradition, there was in the star an appearance of the Virgin and Child (Lightfoot, Ap. Fath. ii. 81), or of a young child bearing a cross (Op. Imp. in Matt. 2 ap. Chrysost. vi.). The star was alleged to be an angel (Suicer, Thes. s.v. ἀγγέλ); and according to Greg. of Tours it was still, in his time, to be seen in a well at Bethlehem (Mirac. i. 1). Similarly a mass of details were invented about the Magi themselves, their journey, and their later life and death. Here it need only be noticed that they are reported to have been baptized by St. Thomas. (A full account of the Magi-legends will be found in Crombach's monumental monograph, Primitiæ gentium sive historia et encomium SS. Trium Magorum. See also the epitome in the Quarterly Review, vol. lxxviii. p. 433 ff., of the mediæval stories collected by John of Hildesheim; and the Boll. AA. SS. Jan. d. i. vi, and xi.)

The bodies of the Magi are said to have been discovered in the East in the 4th cent. (according to one tradition, by St. Helena herself), and to have been brought to Constantinople and deposited in the Church of St. Sofia. When Eustorgius became bishop of Milan, they were transferred to that city, whence, in the year 1162, they were again removed by Frederic Barbarossa to Cologne (Boll. AA. SS. Jan. d. vi.). The festival of Epiphany (the celebration of which in the West is mentioned first by Anm. Marc. xxi. 2) commemorated originally Christ's manifestation to the Magi, together with His baptism, His miracle at Cana (Max. Taur. Hom. 29; Isid. de Off. Eccl. i. 27; Abelard, Serm. 4), and the miracle of feeding the 5000 ([Aug.] Append. Serm. 36. 1). But soon the manifestation to the Magi became in the West, if not exclusively, yet principally, dwelt upon (see, e.g., Leo's Epiphany Sermons); and the common Western synonym for Epiphany was Festum Trium Regum (Bingham, Ant. xx. 4; DCA i. p. 617 ff.; Boll. AA. SS. Jan. d. vi.). In the Middle Ages the Magi were considered the patron saints of travellers, and inns were called after them. Their names were also used as charms to cure epilepsy and snake-bite (Spanheim, ii. pp. 289, 290). See also art. STAR.

F. HOMES DUDDEN.

MAGISTRATE.—This English word occurs only twice in the Gospels (AV), viz. in Lk 12¹¹ and ⁵⁵, where the RV gives the same translation. By our use of the word we usually mean one entrusted with the duty and power of putting laws into force, but the Greek ἀρχων (of which 'magistrate' is the translation in the passages before us) has a wider meaning, and may denote ruler, captain, chief, king. In the Gospels, ἀρχων (as well as the similar word ἡγεμών) occurs frequently, and will be referred to in the articles RULE and RULER.

In the first of the instances to be noticed here our Lord prepares His disciples for the persecutions that await them. One form of persecution will be arrest and accusation before magistrates. In such an event, however, Christ's followers are not to concern themselves unduly about their defence, for the Holy Ghost shall teach them in the same hour what they ought to say. Their presence before the magistrates and their utterance in such a situation will constitute a twofold testimony—a testimony against the unbelief and injustice of their accusers, and perhaps also of the magistrates (Mk 13¹¹)—and a testimony to the truth of the gospel and to their own fidelity (Lk 21¹³). The Lord's prediction and promise were alike fulfilled. Persecutions did ensue, and nothing is more remarkable than the dignity and wisdom of the words spoken by disciples thus accused before magistrates, the Holy Ghost being a mouth and wisdom unto them (Lk 21¹⁵; cf. Ac 4¹³ et al.).

This policy of submissively trusting to the Holy Ghost for defence is not to be taken as justifying Tolstoi's theory of non-resistance. But our Lord's counsel indicates that He looked upon existent magistracies as a part of the providential order, not to be overturned in any revolutionary way by His first disciples. Similarly, Christ taught that, the political circumstances being what they were, tribute should be paid to Cæsar, the supreme magistrate (Mt 22²¹). The capital instance of submission to the magistrate is Christ's own demeanour before Pilate (styled ἡγεμών in Mt 27², Lk 3¹). The subject of the relation between Christ and the magistrate runs into questions of Church and State, the spiritual and the civil power, individual conscience and public law.

In the second instance (Lk 12⁵⁶) Christ seems to warn against a litigious spirit, and to commend that 'sweet reasonableness' which is one of the gifts of His own Spirit, and which may obviate the necessity of going before a magistrate. This does not condemn as un-Christian all reference to a magistrate, but Christ hints that to agree with an adversary quickly may prove to be the highest prudence as well as the most Christian-like conduct. The advice is sometimes spiritualized to mean that the sinner ought to settle accounts with God quickly.

MAGNIFICAT.—Our primary interest in the hymn Magnificat (Lk 1⁴⁶⁻⁵⁵) is centred in the question of (1) its authorship, upon which must largely depend the scope of (2) its interpretation. Then (3) the history of its liturgical use may be briefly summarized.

1. Authorship.—Opinions are divided as to the source from which St. Luke derived the materials of his first chapter. Völter suggests that it is based on an Apocalypse of Zacharias, a Jewish document which has been edited by a Christian, who found the Magnificat attributed to Elisabeth, and transferred it to Mary. Weizsäcker thinks that St. Luke simply inserted an early Christian hymn. A more satisfactory view is that of Sanday (Hastings' DB ii. 639, 644), who suggests that St. Luke was supplied with a special (written) source, through one of the women mentioned in Lk 8³ 24¹⁰, possibly Joanna, who, being the wife of Herod's steward, may also have supplied information about the court of Herod. We know from Jn 19²⁵ (cf. Ac 1¹⁴) that the Virgin Mary was brought into contact with this group. Ramsay (Was Christ born at Bethlehem? p. 88) calls attention to 'a womanly spirit in the whole narrative, which seems inconsistent with the transmission from man to man, and which, moreover, is an indication of Luke's character; he had a marked sympathy with women.' On the supposition that St. Luke used an Aramaic tradition or document, it is possible to account for all the characteristics of style by which Harnack (see below) seeks to prove that he was the author both of the Magnificat and of the Benedictus.

Having described the visit of the Virgin Mary to Elisabeth, and Elisabeth's salutation, the TR has καὶ εἶπεν [Μαριάμ] with the variant reading Ἐλισάβετ. Then follows the hymn, the text of which has been excellently preserved, the only other doubtful reading being μεγάλα, for which we should probably read μεγαλεία.

Μαριάμ is the reading of all Greek MSS, of the great majority of Latin MSS, and of innumerable Patristic testimonies, back to the 2nd cent., when Tertullian wrote (de Anima, 26): 'Exsultat Elisabeth, Johannes intus impulerat, glorificat dominum Maria, Christus intus instinxerat.'

Ἐλισάβετ is the reading of three Old Latin MSS. a (Verzellensis, sec. iv.), b (Veronensis, sec. v.), rhe (Rhedigeranus-Vratislaviensis, sec. ferè vii.), in Burkitt's phrase 'a typical European group,' to which may be added the testimony of Niceta of Remesiana, de Psalmodiæ Bono, c. 9: 'Nec Elisabeth, diu sterilis, edito de reprimissione filio, Deum de ipsa anima magnificare cessat'; c. 11: 'Cum Elisabeth Dominum anima nostra magnificat.'

So also Origen, or his translator Jerome, in the 5th Homily on Lk. 5 (Lommatzsch, t. v. p. 108 f.): 'Inuenitur beata Maria, sicut in aliquantibus exemplaribus reperimus, prophetare; non enim ignoramus, quod secundum alios codices et hæc verba Elisabeth uaticinetur Spiritu itaque sancto tunc repleta est Maria,' etc. Harnack thinks that Jerome, if he had been responsible for this reference, would have mentioned whether the reading was in Latin or Greek MSS. But as Jerome was writing in Latin, and the evidence of Niceta shows that the reading Elisabeth was more persistent and widespread in the very district from which Jerome came,—having been born in Pannonia, not a great distance from Remesiana,—it must be considered still possible that he interpolated the reference.

Lastly we come to Ireneus, iv. 7. 1 (Cod. Clarom. et Voss.): 'sed et Elisabeth ait: Magnificat anima mea dominum,' etc. Cod. Arund. 'Maria.' In iii. 10. 1: 'Propter quod exultans Maria clamabat pro ecclesia prophetans: Magnificat anima mea dominum,' etc. Here the context proves that Ireneus intended to write 'Maria.'* Thus it seems probable that it was the translator of Irenæus, or a copyist, who introduced the reading Elisabet from his Old Latin Bible, and we may safely carry it back to the 3rd century.*

How then are we to account for the reading? Bardenhewer thinks that, Μαριάμ having dropped out, Ἐλισάβετ was supplied by a copyist. But most critics (Burkitt, Harnack, Wordsworth) agree that the original text must have been καὶ εἶπεν without either name. Burkitt puts it concisely: "Mary" was read by Tertullian as well as by all Greek and Syriac texts. This is fatal to "Elisabeth"; yet, if "Mary" were genuine, the actual occurrence of "Elisabeth" in the European branch of the Old Latin would be inexplicable. But if the original text of the Gospel had καὶ εἶπεν Μεγαλύνει, κ.τ.λ., without either name, all the evidence falls into line.'

On the question, which is the right gloss, critics are divided. Harnack and Burkitt argue for 'Elisabeth,' Wordsworth and Spitta for 'Mary.' (1) Harnack does not think that the exclamation of vv. 42-45 covers all that is implied in v. 41 καὶ ἐπλήσθη πνεύματος ἁγίου ἢ Ἐλισάβετ. In v. 67 similar words are used about Zacharias, and are followed by the Benedictus. Nothing is said about Mary being filled with the prophetic spirit. It does not seem necessary, on the other hand, to resort to the extreme remedy of Spitta, who refuses to consider that the Benedictus supplies a parallel case, because he thinks that it has been interpolated at this point. The 'glowing words' of Elisabeth's address need some reply. 'Could St. Mary, who answered so freely and so bravely, yet so humbly, to the angel, have been silent at such a moment when addressed by one whom she knew so well?' (Wordsworth). Though undoubtedly she is kept, or more probably keeps herself, in the background of this history, and is not spoken of as 'filled with the Holy Ghost,' there is no question of deepest communing with God (Gottinnigkeit, Spitta), and this suffices to explain the outpouring in devotion and faith of a mind stored with OT phrases.

In the OT 'when any question is addressed to a person or persons whom the reader knows to be present, the formula of reply is frequently and perhaps generally without proper name and without pronoun'; cf. Lk 2⁴⁹. Later in his Gospel Lk. generally uses ὁ δὲ εἶπεν; but the first chapters have 'a special OT colouring' (Wordsworth), in view of which Harnack's argument, that 'if in v. 46 the subject was to be changed, Lk. would have written εἶπεν δὲ Μαριάμ,' falls to the ground. Further, the words μακαριοῦδι με πᾶσαι αἱ γενεαὶ of v. 48 seem to be a reply to Elisabeth's μακαρία ἡ πιστεύουσα. On the other hand, it is only fair to point out that Prof. Burkitt seeks to prove that St. Luke was 'remarkably fond of inserting καὶ εἶπεν or εἶπεν δὲ between the speeches of his characters without a change of speaker.'† (2) Another argument has been based on the words ἔμεινεν δὲ Μαριάμ σὺν αὐτῇ, which are said to make it probable that Elisabeth has been the speaker, otherwise Lk. would have written ἔμεινεν δὲ Μ. σὺν τῇ Ε. or ἔμεινε δὲ σὺν τῇ Ε. 'The Peshitta as well as the Sinai Palimpsest renders, "Now Mary remained with Elisabeth."' But the Greek has retained "the tell-tale αὐτῇ" (Burkitt).

In the OT the personality of the singer is, as a rule, sunk in the song, and the name is mentioned at the end as if to pick up the thread (cf. Balaam, Nu 24²⁵; Moses, Dt 32⁴⁴ 34¹ etc.). It is true that Hannah's name is not mentioned in 1 S 2¹, but it has been mentioned at the beginning. The name marks 'the whole section vv. 39-56 as what we may call a "Mary section,"' the Syriac reading being an attempt to clear up ambiguity (Wordsworth).

On the whole, then, so far as external evidence goes, the balance of probability is in favour of the reading or gloss 'Mary.' But the more difficult question of internal evidence remains for discussion. Does the Magnificat seem more suitable on the lips of Elisabeth?

Harnack thinks that it was modelled on the lines of Hannah's song, that it expresses the feeling of a mother from whom has been removed what Jewish women felt as 'the reproach of childlessness.' Burkitt suggests that 'the λόγος ἀπὸ Συγῆς προελθὼν more corresponds to the fitness of things than a burst of premature song.'

Apart from the question raised by Wellhausen whether Hannah's song has been interpolated in 1 S 2, Spitta thinks that it is the song of a warrior rather than a woman, and looks elsewhere for parallels to the Magnificat. Any way, either Mary or Elisabeth would regard it as the song of Hannah, which is the main point before us. We cannot do better than quote the text at this point, with Harnack's parallels, to introduce his argument that St. Luke is thereby proved to be the actual author of the hymn which he puts into the mouth of Elisabeth.

In regard to these parallels Spitta argues with some force that there are nearer parallels in the Psalms; e.g. Ps 33^{3, 4} ἐν τῷ κυρίῳ ἐπαινεθήσεται ἡ ψυχὴ μου . . . μεγαλύνετε τὸν κύριον σὺν ἐμοί; 34⁹ ἡ δὲ ψυχὴ μου ἀγαλλιάσεται ἐπὶ τῷ κυρίῳ, ἐφθθήσεται ἐπὶ τῷ σωτηρίῳ αὐτοῦ; 34⁷=39¹⁷=69⁹ ἀγαλλιάσαιντο καὶ εὐφρανθήσων ἐπὶ σοὶ πάντες οἱ ζητούντες εἰς κύριε, καὶ ἐπάτρωσαν διὰ παντός, Μεγαλυνθήτω ὁ κύριος, οἱ ἀγαπῶντες τὸ σωτήριόν σου.* This is true; but at the same time we cannot doubt that a Jewish woman would turn to Hannah's song as, so to speak, a model, even though the phrases of the psalms which she used often in devotion would come more readily to her lips while working out her idea.

Harnack picks out certain words as having no place in his parallels, and suggests that they are not found in the LXX, and being characteristic of Lk.'s style, prove that he was really the author of the hymn. Spitta, however, proves that the phrases in question are not only found in the LXX,

* Prof. Burkitt still adheres to his view, that 'Irenæus regarded Elisabeth as a type of the ancient Jewish Ecclesia prophesying by a Divine Spirit about the Christ.' † JThSt vii. p. 223.

* He quotes Ps 91⁴, 124⁶ 30⁸ as parallels to v. 53.

but are not so characteristic of Lk.'s style; e.g. (1) ἰδοὺ γὰρ is found not only in Lk 1⁴⁴ 2¹⁰ 6²⁸ 17²¹, Ac 9¹, but also in 2 Co 7¹¹;* (2) ἀπὸ τοῦ νῦν, said to be found in Lk 5¹⁰ 12⁵² 22¹⁸, 69, Ac 18⁶ only, is also found 2 Co 5¹⁶.† These instances alone will suffice to prove how unsafe the foundations are upon which Harnack's argument is based.

There is one other possible source for some of the phrases which has not been mentioned, i.e. the 18 Benedictions of the Synagogue (quoted by Warren, Liturgy of Ante-Nicene Church, p. 243).

v. 49 Ben. 2: 'Thou art mighty, O Lord, world without end.'

v. 51 Ben. 12: 'Let the proud speedily be uprooted, broken, crushed, and humbled speedily in our days. Blessed art Thou, O Lord, who breakest down the enemy and humblest the proud.'

vv. 54-55 Ben. 1: 'Blessed art Thou who rememberest the pious deeds of our fathers, and sendest the Redeemer to their children's children. Blessed art Thou, O Lord, the shield of Abraham.'

On the whole, then, in spite of Harnack's arguments, there is still room to believe that St. Luke translated, or perhaps to some extent worked up into a Greek hymn, the materials supplied to him in an Aramaic tradition or document. There was no unnatural seeking after effect. In reply to Elisabeth's address no conventional answer would seem in place. On the other hand, Prof. Burkitt regards the whole of Elisabeth's words as the acknowledgment of Mary's salutation, and finds 'a striking parallel in Lk 2²⁵⁻³⁵, i.e. the conversation of Mary and Simeon. In both cases Mary's interlocutor is said to have a holy Spirit, in both cases the whole of the words recorded is assigned to the interlocutor, and the words themselves consist partly of pious meditation, partly of words addressed exclusively to Mary' (JThSt vii. p. 225). This is a question perhaps of sentiment. But few devout believers in the Incarnation would hesitate to express their profound gratitude for the words of simple faith and hope, grounded, as Spitta has certainly shown, as much on the Psalms as on Hannah's song, a spontaneous offering of praise from a lowly spirit continually in communion with the Divine, and therefore never lacking words of praise. We may regard these words as spoken in substance by the Virgin Mary, and yet maintain the truth of the phrase of Ignatius about 'the Word proceeding from silence.' The silence remains unbroken. No personal dread of the possible reproach not of childlessness but of shame, no personal exultation in this transcendent blessedness among women, find expression.

2. Interpretation.—The scope of interpretation varies in accordance with the view held concerning the authorship. Harnack's description is correct so far as it goes: 'The artistic arrangement of the pronouns, which governs the hymn, expresses exactly the progress of thought, advancing from the subjective to the objective in order to return again to the subjective, though in a higher form.' But he fails to express the situation so clearly described by Liddon (p. 13) from the internal evidence.

'Like the songs of Zacharias and Simeon, it is something more than a psalm, and something less than a complete Christian hymn. A Christian poet, living after the Resurrection of Christ, would surely have said more; a Hebrew psalmist would have said less than Mary. In this Hymn of hers we observe a consciousness of nearness to the fulfilment of the great promises, to which there is no parallel even in the latest of the psalms; and yet even Mary does not speak of the Promised One, as an Evangelist or an Apostle would have spoken of Him, by His Human Name, and with distinct reference to the mysteries of His Life and Death and Resurrection. Her Hymn was a native product of one particular moment of transition in sacred religious history, and of no other; when the twilight of the ancient dispensation was melting, but had not yet melted, into the full daylight of the new.'

In Strophe I. (vv. 46, 47) she offers praise to God as His due, with all powers of the soul, that is, of imagination and impulse; and of the spirit, with the faculties of reason and memory and will.

In Strophe II. (vv. 48, 49) she dwells on the distinction vouchsafed to her in becoming the Mother of the Incarnate Son. She is to live in the memory of mankind not because she deserves it, but because He whose Name is holy so wills.

In Strophe III. (vv. 51, 53), turning away from self, she rises, as in moments of spiritual enlightenment any one may rise, to larger views of God's purposes in the shaping of human history. His presence and power are vindicated in the humbling of the proudest dynasties and the triumph of the meek. This thought is characteristic of a group of psalms (9. 10. 22. 25. 35. 40. 69. 109; cf. 4 Ezr (2 Es) 11⁴², Ps-Sol 5¹³⁴.) which must often have been in the minds of the little group—Joseph, Mary, Zacharias, Elisabeth, Simeon, Anna—who were looking for the redemption of Israel.

In Strophe IV. (vv. 54, 55) she comes back to the thought of the Messianic time now beginning: the assurances given to the fathers should be fulfilled. The source of the Incarnation is found in God's attributes of loving-kindness and truth.

3. Liturgical use.—In the Eastern Church the Magnificat is sung as a morning canticle. This also was its use in the West at one time. In the directions at the end of the Rule of Aurelian, bp. of Arles, c. 540, it is mentioned as used in the Office of Lauds 'with antiphon or with alleluia, following OT psalms and canticles, and followed by Gloria in excelsis.'

In the treatise of Niceta, de Psalmodia Bono, to which we have already alluded, the primary reference is to Vigils, to the use, therefore, of the Magnificat in the evening. The list of canticles mentioned corresponds to that in use in the Church of Constantinople at that time. When the later-hour offices were developed in the West, it was, in accordance with such usage, attached to Vespers, with varying antiphon. Thus it passed into the first Prayer-Book of Edward VI., and has since been used in Evensong after the first Lesson.

In Julian's Dict. of Hymnology there are references to several metrical versions which found favour from the 16th century. But these are of no importance.

MAID.—The English words 'maid,' 'maiden' represent three Greek words: κορσίων (Mt 9²⁴), AV 'maid,' RV 'damsel'; ἡ παῖς (Lk 8⁵¹ AV and RV 'maiden'; v. 54 AV 'maid,' RV 'maiden'); and παῖδικη (Mt 26⁶⁸, Jn 18¹⁷ AV 'damsel,' RV 'maid'; Mk 14⁶⁶, 69, Lk 22⁵⁶ AV and RV 'maid'; Lk 12⁴⁵ AV 'maidens,' RV 'maid-servants'). The first two clearly signify 'young girl,' answering to the Aramaic talitha (cf. Mk 5⁴¹ and Lk 8⁵⁴: for a discussion of the Aramaic form see art. TALITHA CUMI). Talitha seems to have been frequently employed in the sense of 'young woman.' In the Targums it is used of Dinah, Miriam, and Esther. It and its Greek equivalents have almost that meaning as applied to the daughter of Jairus. κορσίων seems to have lost its diminutive force in later Greek and to have been no longer employed as a familiar term, but to have been virtually equivalent to κῆρη, παιδίσκη, the feminine of παιδίσκος, originally a diminutive of παῖς, meant in the first instance 'girl' and then 'domestic female servant' or 'slave.' It has the latter meaning in the Gospels. In some passages in the LXX (Ex 20¹⁰, Lv 25⁴⁴ etc.) it represents 'āmāh (cf. art. HANDMAID). It seems to have been used especially of a doorkeeper (Gospels, Ac 12¹³, Lysias cited by Wetstein). That it often referred to a slave, not a hired servant, is evident from the passages quoted by Wetstein from the grammarians, and seems to be implied in the contrast between παιδίσκης and ἐλευθέρας in Gal 4²².

MAIMED.—This term signifies disabled by wounding or mutilation; deprived of the use of a necessary constitutive part of the body; mutilated; rendered unable to defend oneself or to discharge necessary functions. In Mt 15³⁰ and Mk 9⁴³ κυλλός is the word employed and is tr. 'maimed' in both AV and RV. It is kindred with κολλος, 'hollow,' and signifies originally 'crooked,' 'bent,' and so crippled and halt. κυλλή χεῖρ is the hand with its fingers bent so as to make a hollow palm. ἐμβαλε κυλλῇ (sc. χεῖρ) = 'put it into the hollow of the hand.' In Lk 14^{13, 21} the word used is ἀνάπηρος, i. e. πηρός = 'deprived of some member of the body' (Lat. mancus), preceded by ἀνά intensive. The composite word indicates an extreme form of bodily mutilation, and Jesus is never said to have restored one so suffering. The word is not employed in connexion with our Lord's miracles, but only in His invitation to the blessings of the Kingdom, to which all outcast sufferers were with Divine compassion called. T. H. WRIGHT.

MAJESTY.—1. The term.—In the NT the word 'majesty' is associated with Christ in three different connexions. (1) In RV of Lk 9^{43a} we read that the people 'were all astonished at the majesty (μεγαλειότης, AV 'mighty power') of God.' The immediate occasion of their astonishment was the healing of the lunatic boy, but v. 43b, and esp. the ἐποίησεν which critical editors substitute for ἐποίησεν of TR, seems to show that the miracles of Christ generally are to be thought of as producing this impression that the Divine μεγαλειότης was manifesting itself through Him.

(2) In 2 P 1¹⁶ the writer, who claims to have been present with Jesus on the Mount of Transfiguration, says of that experience, 'We were eye-witnesses of his majesty' (AV and RV; Gr. μεγαλειότης). The word μεγαλειότης is found in only one other passage of the NT, viz. Ac 19²⁷, where it is used to describe the 'magnificence' (AV and RV) of the great goddess Diana. It is thus an interesting coincidence that the two instances of its use in connexion with Christ belong to the episode of the Transfiguration and the incident of the healing of the lunatic boy which followed immediately after. On the 'holy mount' the favoured three received a revelation of Christ's inherent μεγαλειότης (the word ἐπόπται, 'eye-witnesses,' is a technical term denoting those who had been admitted to the highest grade of initiation into the Eleusinian mysteries). And when He came down from the mountain, the μεγαλειότης of God shone forth through His works in the eyes of all the multitude.

A comparison of the uses of μεγαλειότης in Lk 9⁴³, Ac 19²⁷, and 2 P 1¹⁶ raises a doubt whether 'majesty' is the most adequate rendering of the word in the first and third passages, and whether 'magnificence' (as in Ac 19²⁷ EV) or 'splendour' would not more correctly reproduce the original idea. This is suggested by the ordinary use of the adj. μεγαλῖος in class.

Greek, and even by the two instances of its employment in the NT (Lk 14⁹, Ac 21¹). The evidence of the LXX also points in the same direction; for while μεγαλειότης is used in Jer 33⁹ to tr. תְּהָרָה (AV 'honour,' RV 'glory')—a word which is usually rendered by δόξα—the terms ordinarily taken to express the idea of greatness or majesty are μεγαλωσύνη and μεγαλοσθένεια (e. g. 2 S 7²³, Ps 145 [LXX 144] 3. 5. 6. 12).

With this idea of Christ's miracles, or of His miraculous being, as an effluence of the Divine splendour or magnificence, compare the statement of Jn 2¹¹ that by the miracle of Cana Jesus 'manifested his glory' (ἐφανέρωσεν τὴν δόξαν αὐτοῦ). Cf. also the ἰσότητι τῆς ἰκύνου μεγαλειότητος of 2 P 1¹⁶ with what is said in v. 17 of the 'glory' (δόξα) which Jesus received upon the mount from God the Father.

(3) In He 1³ 8¹ we see Jesus seated 'on the right hand of the Majesty on high.' The word for 'Majesty' in these two cases is μεγαλωσύνη, a term that does not occur again in the NT except in the doxology at the end of Jude (v. 25). The idea of Christ as seated at God's right hand, which is so frequent in the NT (Mt 26⁶⁴ ||, Ac 2³³ 7^{55f}, Ro 8³⁴, Eph 1²⁰, Col 3¹ etc.), was no doubt taken in the first case from Ps 110¹ (cf. He 1³ with v. 13). It seems always to be used with reference not to His pre-existent dignity, but to the exaltation that followed His incarnation and suffering. Moreover, in the two passages in Hebrews there is no direct ascription of the Divine majesty to Jesus. The idea is that of His exercise of a supremely exalted office as the Great High Priest who is the Mediator between God and men.

2. The quality of majesty in Christ.—Apart from its infrequent use of the word, the NT affords abundant material for a consideration of the majesty of Christ, whether in His estate of humiliation or of exaltation.

(1) With regard to His life on earth, (a) it is evident that there was nothing of the majestic in His outward circumstances. From His birth in a stable to His death on a cross, it was a life of 'no reputation,' His form being that of a servant and not of a king (cf. Ph 2⁸). And on the one occasion when He assumed a kind of royal state, and suffered the multitudes in the streets and the children in the Temple to hail Him with Hosannas (Mt 21^{9, 15f.}), His majesty, after all, as the Evangelists subsequently perceived, was but the majesty of meekness, for Zion's King came to her gates, as the prophet had said, 'lowly, and riding upon an ass, and upon a colt the foal of an ass' (Mt 21^{1f.}, Jn 12^{14f.}; cf. Zec 9⁹).

(b) Was there no majesty, then, in His personal appearance? The Gospels are completely silent on this point, and in the lack of any trustworthy tradition the Fathers seem to have fallen back chiefly on the prophetic pictures of the Messiah, with the result that a wide diversity of view came to exist, according as one passage or another was taken as the norm. The earlier tendency, inspired without doubt by prevailing ascetic ideals, was to fasten upon the words of Deutero-Isaiah with reference to the Suffering Servant (53²⁻³), and to represent Jesus as utterly devoid of all beauty and dignity of face or form. 'Base of aspect' (αἰσχροὺς τὴν ὄψιν) is the verdict of Clement of Alexandria (Pæd. iii. 1), who was preceded in his estimate by Justin Martyr, and followed by Tertullian. There came a reaction by and by, represented in the East by Origen and in the West by Jerome, when men bethought themselves of such a prophetic Psalm as the 45th, with its vision of One 'fairer than the children of men' (v. 2) and girded with glory and majesty (v. 3). Jerome in particular maintained this high view of the majesty of Christ's outward aspect. There was 'something starry' (siderewum quiddam), he affirmed, in the Saviour's face and eyes (Ep. ad Principiam); 'the brightness and majesty of His Divinity . . . shed their rays over His human countenance' (in Matt. i. 8). This was the view that ultimately prevailed in the Church, and finds expression in the so-called 'Letter of Lentulus' (see vol. i. p. 315). It gave rise to a type of presentation that has dominated Christian art ever since; but it is right to remember that this conventional conception of a Christ who was tall in stature, beautiful in countenance, dignified and even majestic in figure and bearing, rests upon no real basis of authentic tradition, as it is supported by no single word of the NT; and that Augustine has stated the simple truth when he says, 'Qua fuerit ille facie penitus ignoramus' (de Trin. viii. 5).

(c) But there is a moral majesty, a majesty of purity and truth and goodness, that is independent of all outward seeming; and the Gospels give abundant illustration of Christ's endowment with this majesty of soul. Milton tells us how, face to face with the cherub:

'abash'd the devil stood,
And felt how awful goodness is' (Par. Lost, iv. 846).

And no one can read the Gospel narratives without perceiving how good men and bad alike were smitten at times with a sense of subduing awe as they stood in the presence of Jesus Christ. This was the experience of the Baptist when he exclaimed, 'I have need to be baptized of thee, and comest thou to me?' (Mt 3¹⁴). It was the feeling of Simon Peter when he cried, 'Depart from me; for I am a sinful man, O Lord' (Lk 5⁸). This majesty of Christ's character forces itself upon us at every point, rising higher and higher until it reaches a culmination in the awful scenes of the judgment-hall and the cross. Was it not this majesty of a pure soul that arrested and troubled Pilate himself in the midst of his keen concern for his own selfish interests and his lofty Roman contempt for a mere Jew? And was it not this same majesty of holiness that smote upon the heart of the very centurion who carried out the sentence of crucifixion, so that he exclaimed, 'Certainly this was a righteous man' (Lk 23⁴⁷)? Sometimes we see Christ's moral majesty flashing out so overwhelmingly that it works with a kind of physical effect, as when the profane traffickers in the Temple cringe and flee before Him; or when, in the Garden, as He steps out of the shadows, saying, 'I am he,' His enemies go backward, and fall to the ground (Jn 18⁵⁶).

(d) But besides the unconscious majesty of goodness, we see in Jesus Christ throughout His public ministry a conscious majesty of the most positive kind. This man, so meek and lowly in heart, does not hesitate to make the most astounding claims. He claims a personal authority that sweeps aside in a moment all the traditional learning of the nation's religious teachers (Mt 7^{28, 29}). Never, surely, in the world's history has there been another series of utterances so clothed in the majesty of spiritual power as the Sermon on the Mount. And this poor Carpenter of Nazareth further assumes without the least hesitation the name and dignity of the promised Messiah of Israel; He affirms, in a sense altogether unique, that He is the Son of God, unto whom all things have been delivered of the Father (Mt 11²⁷, Lk 10²²; cf. Jn 14-17); He invites every burdened and weary soul to come unto Him for rest (Mt 11²⁸). And what could be more majestic than the language in which Christ assumes the office of the universal Judge of men, and describes the events and issues of that solemn day when the Son of Man shall come in His glory, and all the nations shall be gathered before Him? (Mt 25^{31ff.}).

(2) It is unnecessary to dwell in any detail upon the majesty of the exalted Christ. From St. Peter's first sermon on the Day of Pentecost (Ac 2^{38ff.}) down to the last utterance of the Apostolic Church, the Christ of the NT is the Christ enthroned in glory, dignity, and power. His followers do not think of Him 'according to the flesh' (2 Co 5¹⁶)—as the Prophet of Galilee or the Man of Sorrows. The Christ of whom they do habitually think is risen, ascended, glorified, and set down on the right hand of the Majesty on high (cf. Ro 8³⁴, 1 Co 15^{14ff.}, Gal 2²⁰, Ph 2^{6ff.}, 1 Th 4^{13ff.}, He 1^{3ff.} and passim). Apart from the evidence of their own writings, no better proof of this can be found than the fact that for more than a century after the death of Jesus the Church appears never to have concerned itself in any way as to His earthly appearance, or to have had any desire for pictorial representations of His human face and form. And is it not highly significant that, on the one solitary occasion on which a NT writer has set himself to describe the Lord's personal appearance, the attempt is based upon no recollections or traditions regarding Jesus of Nazareth, but upon a splendid conception of the majesty of the exalted Christ—His eyes as a flame of fire, His voice as the sound of many waters, in His right hand seven stars, and His countenance as the sun shineth in his strength (Rev 1^{13ff.})?

MALCHUS (Μάλχος).—The name of the man whom Peter wounded in the right ear at the arrest of Jesus (Jn 18¹⁰).

Malchus was a common Semitic name, though not certainly met with among the Jews proper. By both Delitzsch and Salkinson it is vocalized מלכוס, which is no more than a transliteration. Josephus (see Niese's index) mentions five persons who bore it under the form of Μαλχος or Μάλχος, whence an original מלך has been inferred (Dalman, Gram. Avam. 104). But the true Greek form seems to have been Μαλίχας (Periplus maris Erythraei, cf. Müll. Geogr. Gr. Min. i. 272); and מלכו, pronounced מלכוס, appears in three inscriptions (CIS ii. 158, 174, 218) that may be dated with some confidence between B.C. 40 and A.D. 40. In these inscriptions the name is Nabataean; but the root מלך is common to all the Semitic languages, and appears to belong to the unhistorical period prior to the separation of the various peoples. In Assyrian it is a designation of a subordinate ruler (Schrader, COT i. 23), a prince rather than a king. While there are instances of its use in relation to a god (cf. Boehmer in Evros. Times, xvi. [1905] 473 ff.), there is no need to see in it anything more than an allusion, serious or playful, to superiority in rank or in pretence.

The bearer of the name in the Gospel narrative held a position of trust in the household of the high priest, probably Caiaphas (Jn 18¹³). It has been assumed that the other Evangelists suppressed the name (Mt 26⁵¹, Mk 14⁴⁷, Lk 22⁵⁰) with a view to protect Peter from revenge or an action at law on the part of the Jews. It is at least as likely that they were ignorant of the name, or of opinion that no purpose was to be served by its mention. There is no evidence that Malchus was exceptionally active in the arrest, or anything more than an onlooker. Peter's forward rush, when his indignation could be restrained no longer, towards the group of which Jesus was becoming the centre (Jn 18⁴), suggests rather that Malchus was on the skirt of the group, and not immediately engaged in binding Jesus. He happened to be in Peter's way in his attempt to rescue his Master, and may well have been personally unknown to the majority of the disciples. If John was the unnamed disciple who was 'known unto the high priest' (v. 15), possibly because he supplied the family of Annas with fish (according to an old tradition; cf. David Smith, Days of His Flesh, 465), he would be acquainted with both Malchus and his kinsman (v. 25); and the mention of the name in the Fourth Gospel may be taken as one of the undesigned indications of Johannine authorship. The healing of the ear of Malchus is recorded by Lk. alone, but is an essential part of the story (cf. Expos. Times, x. [1898-99] 139, 188), and exactly such an incident as would be likely to attract the notice of a physician, and so to calm the soldiers as to make the subsequent remonstrance preserved by each of the Synoptics possible. The natural order of events was first the healing of the wound, followed, while Malchus' friends were crowding around him, by the rebuke of Peter, and then, as soon as the people were ready to listen, by the taunting protest in regard to the manner of the arrest. Thereupon Jesus consented to be seized, and in perfect self-possession passed on to His trial and death.

MALEFACTOR.—Two Gr. words, whose shades of meaning are indistinguishable, are thus translated in NT: (1) κακοποιός or κακὸν ποιῶν (lit. 'evil-doer'), Jn 18³⁰, 1 P 2^{12, 14, 415}; (2) κακοῦργος (lit. 'evil-worker'), Lk 23^{32, 33, 39}, 2 Ti 2⁹. AV renders κακοποιός 'malefactor' in Jn 18³⁰, 'evil-doer' elsewhere; but RV gives 'evil-doer' throughout. Again AV renders κακοῦργος 'malefactor' in Lk 23^{32, 33, 39}, 'evil-doer' in 2 Ti 2⁹, while RV makes it always 'malefactor.' This illustrates the NT Revisers' uniformity in the translation of words.

In Lk 23³² the best attested text is ἕτεροι κακοῦργοι δύο, not ἕτεροι δύο κακοῦργοι (TR). Hence it is maintained by Alford and others that we ought to read 'two other malefactors' (without a comma after 'other') instead of 'two others, malefactors' (AV and RV). There is really no difficulty about adopting this rendering, which does not imply that St. Luke assents to the judgment that Jesus was a malefactor, but merely states the fact that He was led to execution as such.

MAMMON, or more accurately 'Mamon,' is the transliteration of the Gr. equivalent for a late Aram. or Syro-Chald. term denoting 'wealth' or 'riches' or 'treasure,' whose etymology is still a matter of dispute (cf. the articles s.v. in Hastings' DB and Encyc. Bib.). In the Gospels it means worldliness in the form of wealth, and occurs twice—(a) in Mt 6²⁴=Lk 16¹³ ('ye cannot serve God and mammon'); and (b) in Lk 16^{9, 11}, where it is defined, or rather described, as unrighteous, the latter epithet being applied to it not only in the Targums, but as early as En 63¹⁰ ('our souls are satisfied with the mammon of unrighteousness, yet for all that we descend into the flame of Sheol's pain').

The genuineness of the logion (a) there is no need to question, although its present position is probably due to editorial arrangement. Of the two settings, Matthew's seems preferable. Mammon here represents a sort of personified worldliness, a Plutus of the age, and Christ exposes the impossibility of combining devotion to this end with devotion to the true God. The spiritual life, He explains in 6¹⁹⁻²⁴, must have the two notes of inwardness and unity. Compromise here is out of the question. The object of a man's confidence determines ultimately his character; and single-mindedness is the supreme condition of health and effectiveness in religion. Jesus 'warns them that it is impossible to be at once high-minded and just and wise, and to comply with the accustomed forms of human society, seek power, wealth, or empire, either from the idolatry of habit, or as the direct instruments of sensual gratification' (Shelley). Objection is sometimes taken to this counsel as inapplicable to a group of good disciples. But Jesus had rich people among His adherents, and besides it is not the rich alone who are tempted to make a god of their money. Poor people are just as prone in some ways to attach an exaggerated importance to wealth, to overestimate its power, and thus to let it exercise a control over their desires. No written comment on the verse, however, can equal the impression made by Mr. G. F. Watts' picture of 'Mammon,' with its coarse, gross limbs crushing human life; to which one pendant is the same painter's picture entitled, 'For he had great possessions.'

The Lukan setting is as apt in its own way, placing the same logion amid a cluster of characteristic (see THEOPHILUS) sayings and parables on the dangers and abuse of money (cf. v. 14). Lk 16¹³ forms one of several rather heterogeneous fringes to the parable of the Unjust Steward (16¹⁻⁸ or 16¹⁻⁷), arranged with almost as little connexion as the logia in 16^{16f}. So far as it stands, however, it has the same meaning as in Mt 6²⁴. The main difficulty is to correlate it with what immediately precedes, and this opens up the unpersonified use of mammon in the second class of passages (b). The point of 16¹⁻⁸, which is certainly a genuine parable of Jesus, is to inculcate the wisdom of making provision in the present life for the life which is to come. The temper commended by Jesus is that of a man who has wit enough to see that his future prospects depend on his present exertions, and who inferentially has no illusions whatever about himself. He is open-eyed to the present situation. He does not flatter himself into a rosy view of his case, or look to some happy chance to bear him through. A prudent regard to self-interest is the saving feature of his character and conduct. So much is clear. The trouble is to adjust vv. 9-13 to this standpoint. If, with critics like J. Weiss, Wernle, and Jülicher, all five verses are regarded as editorial glosses, the solution becomes fairly simple, the original parable having nothing to do with the use of money at all, as Christ meant it. But v. 9 may well be the original sequel to v. 8 (so Wellhausen recently), in which case 'the mammon of unrighteousness' there and in v. 11 is explained by 'what belongs to another' in v. 12. Wealth, Jesus teaches, does not really belong to a Christian. It is something alien to him. Yet, as the steward used wealth that was not his own for his own ends, so the Christian can and must employ his wealth in order to promote his eternal interests. Money given in alms makes friends for him in heaven, just as it lays up a treasure for him there (11⁴¹ 12²³ etc.). Instead of serving God and mammon alike, he is to use mammon wisely in the interests of his relation to God and the heavenly Kingdom, the wisdom consisting in the practice of charity (cf. v. 19^{1f}). If not, the prospect held out is ominous. 'God,' as Kingsley once said, 'will yet take 'account of the selfishness of wealth; and His quarrel has yet to be fought out.' This is true to the spirit of the Lukan sayings, except that they threaten an eschatological ruin rather than one wrought out on this side of the grave.

In any case vv. 10-13 (v. 10 coming from 19¹⁷) form a conglomerate appendix, added to prevent misconceptions, 'another instance of editorial solicitude on the part of an Evangelist ever careful to guard the character and teaching of Jesus against misunderstanding' (Bruce). V. 11, especially, indicates the right use of money (as in the parable of the Talents): Use it faithfully, i.e. for the good of the needy, instead of hoarding it up selfishly. Honesty in money matters (v. 10) is vital to the Christian. And honesty, in this particular application, is viewed under the light of liberality (v. 11), in accordance with the tenor of Luke's social sympathies throughout his Gospel. Thus the use of mammon brings out two elements in the teaching of Jesus upon money—(a) the need of administering it wisely, and (b) the essentially inferior and even irrelevant position of money in the religious life. The latter is brought out by the epithet unrighteous (almost equal to 'secular' here); money is less by far than a Christian's other interests (v.¹⁰), alien (v.¹²), and unreal (v.¹¹), even when it is not allowed to be a positive rival to God (v.¹³). By its nature it belongs to the present (i.e. this evil generation, not to the real order of things which forms the sphere of the children of light, i.e. Christians. Yet even so it is a test; it furnishes opportunities for the exercise of certain virtues (cf. Morley's Voltaire, p. 107). Christians are trusted with money, as the steward was. But what in his case was fraud, in their case is both honest and shrewd. Forethought is the quality commended by our Lord, as opposed to a selfish and shortsighted policy. Faithfulness in dealing with money means giving it away. And the two, faithfulness and forethought, are different sides of the same habit—pretty much as in the proverb, 'What I gave, I have' (cf. Pr 11²⁴). The steward dispensed his goods; no doubt, for selfish ends. Still he dispensed them, and so proved his wisdom at least.

On this interpretation 'the mammon of unrighteousness' does not mean money or worldly advantages wrongfully gained, as though the point of the parable were that wealth, dishonestly come by, should be disbursed in charity (so Strauss, and O. Holtzmann in Stade's Geschichte Israels, ii. 584-585). The steward is not commended because he atoned by beneficence for ill-gotten gains, as if he represented a sinner who insured forgiveness and welcome in heaven by means of charity to his fellows on earth, finding it impossible to restore, as Zacchaeus did, his fraudulent profits (so even Bruce, Parabolic Teaching of Jesus, pp. 373-374). 'The mammon of unrighteousness' means money as essentially secular and unchristian (cf. Weinl's Wirkungen des Geistes, 1899, p. 15), pertaining to the order of the Evil One. Jesus does not deal here with any question of reparation. The object of the parable is to point out how one may best use this tainted possession in view of the future, and the teaching is on the lines of the later Jewish Rabbis, who attached high religious significance to alms (cf. Lk 12¹⁵⁻²¹ 18²² etc.), though it must be borne in mind that some allowance has to be made for St. Luke's 'ascetic' bias in estimating some of Christ's sayings on wealth in the Third Gospel, where logia, perhaps originally genuine, have been sharpened (e.g. in 6^{34c}) into exaggerated emphasis. In calling mammon 'unrighteous,' Jesus means that great wealth is seldom gained or employed without injustice. The stain of abuse is upon it. The mark of the evil world is stamped on it. At best, then, it is a means, not an end, for the Christian, and a means which demands care and conscience for its wise employment, lest life degenerate into the mercenary and narrowing spirit which devotes itself to what Bacon called 'a Sabbathless pursuit of fortune,' a culpable love of acquisition and material goods, and an insidious appetite for self-gratification which deadens the higher faculties of the soul and stunts the instinct of self-sacrifice.

Bezold criticises unfavourably Mr. Pinches' derivation of the term from an Assyr. mimnu or memnu = 'anything,' 'everything,' 'property,' etc.

MAN.*—1. Christ's relation to men.—(1) The first aspect of Jesus in His relation to men, is the relation of a Master to His disciples, and of a Brother, who is also Leader and Teacher, to His brethren. This relationship is unmistakable. 'Ye did not choose me, but I chose you' (Jn 15¹⁶). The disciple is not above his master, nor the servant above his lord' (Mt 10²⁴). They were not to accept the title 'Rabbi'; they were brethren; they had but one teacher, even Christ (Mt 23⁸⁻¹⁰). The relationship was no external one. The disciples were not simply the servants of Jesus; they were His friends (Jn 15^{14, 15}), and knew His thoughts and purposes. To them He was about to show the very height and greatness of His love by laying down His life. The best way for them to show that they were His friends was by keeping His commandments (Jn 15¹⁴). They were also under His Father's care; they were the Father's flock, and no one should snatch them out of His hand (Lk 12^{28, 32}, Jn 10²⁹). They were called to a vocation in some respects similar to His own: they were to be 'fishers of men' (Mt 4¹⁹); they, too, would know persecution and trial and death; but these, in their essence, were but temporal things, and could not really injure or destroy (Mt 10^{17, 18, 28}, Lk 10¹⁹). As contrasted with others who were 'wise and prudent,' the disciples were but 'babes'; but it was to them that God had made the revelation of Himself in Jesus Christ (Mt 11^{25, 26}). The disciples responded to this attachment. When they found the teaching of Jesus difficult and obscure, and were almost-tempted, like many others, to go no more with Him, He asks them plainly, 'Will ye also go away?' and the answer rises within them with all the strength of passionate loyalty and conviction: 'Lord, to whom shall we go? Thou hast the words of eternal life' (Jn 6⁶⁶⁻⁶⁸). It is significant also that one of the strongest utterances of devotion is recorded of Thomas. Other references to this disciple show him as a practical man, who lives on the earth and not in the clouds, and who withholds his faith and support until plain proof be shown (Jn 20^{24, 25}). But when Jesus expressed His determination to go up to Bethany and wake His friend Lazarus out of his sleep, it was Thomas who first saw his Master's danger, and that death was near at hand, and who exclaimed with vehemence, 'Let us go up also with him, that we may die with him' (Jn 11¹⁶). Peter is called blessed when, at Caesarea Philippi, he answers Christ's question and confesses, 'Thou art the Christ of God' (Lk 9²⁰); and John is the disciple whom Jesus loved (Jn 19²⁶), the man who at the Last Supper sat next to His Master and leaned upon His breast (Jn 21²⁰), and the one to whom Mary the mother of Jesus was entrusted by Jesus as He hung on the cross (Jn 19^{26, 27}). When His disciples are weary, Jesus bids them go with Him to a desert place and rest a while (Mk 6³¹); and after their last meal together, He kneels down and washes their feet, thus teaching

* ἄνθρωπος and άνήρ are used by Jesus with the ordinary classic distinctions. Generally ἄνθρωπος = a human being, male or female (e.g. Mt 4⁴ 5¹⁶); άνήρ, a man as distinguished from a woman (Mt 7^{24, 26}, Lk 14²⁴). In keeping with this distinction, and by a Hebrew idiom (cf. the use of שָׂרָף), He employs ἄνθρωπος in the sense of the Gr. τις, Lat. quidam, to denote 'someone,' 'a certain one' (Mt 21²⁸ 22¹¹ etc.). As the converse of this, it may be noted that not infrequently (esp. in Jn.) where τις occurs in the teaching of Jesus, EV renders it 'a man.'

them the duty of service (Jn 13³⁻⁵). The discourses recorded in Jn 14-16 are doubtless in some measure ideal; but they are true to the main lines of Christian tradition. The relationship between Jesus and His disciples was very intimate and sacred, and the disciples were filled with sorrow at the prospect of that relationship being snapped.

(2) But Jesus was also a Jew and a citizen. His mission was, first and foremost, to the lost sheep of the house of Israel (Mt 15²⁴); and it was only when they repeatedly rejected Him and His doctrine that He turned and went elsewhere. Jesus found that His own people were spiritually dead. They had now no prophets, and scarcely any teacher who might quicken their interest in things beyond the present hour and day. They had made the Temple (which was to Jesus His Father's house) a den of robbers (Mt 21¹³), and they had forgotten that mercy was better than sacrifice (Mt 9¹³); and Jesus, in the strength of His moral indignation, upset the tables of the money-changers, and drove those who sat there out of the Temple. His people honoured the prophets, but in their lifetime they stoned them; and now the greatest of the prophets had come, and they knew it not (Mt 23²⁹⁻³⁰, Lk 11^{29, 32}). He had come to His own, and they that were His own received Him not (Jn 1¹¹). There was woe to come upon Chorazin and Bethsaida. Had Tyre and Sidon seen the things which they had seen, they would have repented long ago in sackcloth and ashes (Mt 11²¹). Jesus looked upon Jerusalem and its people with a citizen's and a patriot's love, and was moved even to tears (Mt 23³⁷, Lk 19⁴¹). Let them weep for their city, themselves and their fate, and not for Him! (Lk 23²⁸⁻³¹). How often would He have gathered her children together as a hen gathereth her brood under her wings!

(3) It seems certain that the Jews, as a body, could never have accepted Jesus as their Messiah. It was the Pharisee who, with all his faults, had remained true in some measure to his national tradition; and it was in him that the teaching of Jesus found its strongest opponent. It was, above all, the universalism of Jesus that the Pharisee could not bear. He despised the Greek and Roman, and especially his kin and neighbour the Samaritan, as 'Gentile' folk—outsiders. If the God of the Jews should show Himself favourable unto such, it would have to be by some special act of grace. But Jesus followed out the prophetic ideal. He submitted to be baptized by John, and He expressed in no stinted way His feeling about the Baptist and his work. In His first public utterance Jesus reminded His hearers of the nature of Israel's God. He was the God of men, no matter what their race and no matter what their moral character. It was this God who despatched Elijah to Zarephath on an errand of mercy, when there were many widows in Israel. Elisha also was sent to heal Naaman the Syrian, although there were many lepers nearer home (Lk 4²⁶⁻²⁷). It was by utterances such as these that Jesus gained at the outset the opposition of the national party. Men felt—and felt rightly—that if Jesus triumphed Judaism was undone. The Pharisees were also deeply troubled by Jesus' manner of life. He received 'sinners,' and ate with them; He dined with tax-gatherers, and spoke kindly and compassionately to a woman of ill fame (Lk 5²⁷⁻³⁰ 19¹⁻¹⁰, Jn 8¹⁻¹¹). The official class—the Sadducees and priests—also felt that new wine like this would burst the old skins, and that a new society might arise, in which they themselves might be anywhere save at the top. And from the moment Jesus set foot in Jerusalem, the priests and Sadducees, as the ruling official party, set themselves to work, not to confute Him, but to compass His death (Mt 21²³ 26^{3, 4}, Lk 19^{47, 48} 20. 22).

It follows from this that Jesus was a lover of man, irrespective of his race or condition. He began His ministry with teaching and healing. He was often moved to compassion by the multitudes which followed Him; they were as sheep without a shepherd; they heard Him gladly, and even tarried with Him a whole day, and that in a desert place (Mk 1³⁶⁻³⁸). On one occasion they would have made Him their king (Jn 6¹⁻¹⁵). And to Jesus, though He refuses their proffered sovereignty, they were as 'fields white unto the harvest' (Jn 4³⁵). Many of the most striking sayings of Jesus, however, occur in utterances addressed to individuals. It was while sitting and talking with a Samaritan—a Samaritan woman—that He said: 'God is Spirit' (Jn 4²⁴); it was in the house of Zacchæus that men first heard that 'the Son of man came to seek and to save that which was lost' (Lk 19¹⁰); while it was in answer to 'a certain lawyer' that Jesus related the parable of the Good Samaritan (Lk 10²⁵⁻³⁷). Men were amazed at and charmed by Jesus' power of speech; they 'wondered at the words of grace which proceeded out of his mouth' (Lk 4²²). Police officers on one occasion were disarmed by it. 'He taught,' says the Evangelist, 'as one having authority, and not as the scribes' (Jn 7⁴⁵⁻⁴⁷, Mt 7^{28, 29}).

What was it that led Jesus to teach and to associate Himself, not simply with Jews, but with men as men? What was it that carried Him willingly and of set purpose into all classes of society, and especially among the outcast and unfavoured folk? What led Him to seek, not the righteous, but sinners, and not the whole, but the sick? To answer this question we must pass to—

2. Christ's teaching on man.—With Jesus the doctrines of God and man are closely akin. They pass into each other, and are deeply interfused; so much so, that at times we seem but to have been looking at different sides of the same fundamental truth. Central, basal, a pole around which everything else centres and revolves, is His conception of God. To know Him is to share His life, and to seek His Kingdom and His righteousness is alike the highest duty and the highest joy of man (Jn 17³, Mt 6³³). He is Spirit (Jn 4²⁴). Without Him nature would cease to be; its beauty, its order, and the creatures which have within it their home, derive all their life and sustenance and joy from Him. The hairs of a man's head are all numbered; not even a sparrow falls to the ground without His notice. The common flowers and grass owe their life to Him (Mt 6²⁵⁻³⁴ 10^{29, 30}).

What, then, does Jesus, with this high doctrine of God, say about man? He tells us that man is distinct from the natural world and natural creatures; he is God's child; God is his Father; he is God's son (Mt 5⁴⁸⁻⁴⁹ 6²⁵⁻³⁴). Such words may not define man's present condition; they look at him in the light of the ideal; they describe his duty, his highest destiny and ambition. The loftiest hope and purpose that any man may cherish is to become a son of his Father who is in heaven, and to become perfect as his heavenly Father is perfect (Mt 5⁴⁵⁻⁴⁸). It is noteworthy that Jesus never mentions the fall of man, nor is there any very conclusive passage in which He speaks of man as a sinner. But He implies that man is such in that He makes 'Repent' the keynote of His opening ministry (Mt 4¹⁷). There is but one who is good, even God (Lk 18^{18, 19}); yet men, who are evil, can render good gifts to their children (Mt 7¹¹). It is possible for a man's eye to be evil, and for his whole body to be filled with darkness rather than with light (Mt 6²³). Men cannot serve two masters, mammon and God (Mt 6²⁴). A rich man can with difficulty enter into the Kingdom of God (Mt 19²⁴). Ultimately, too, men are sifted out and their destiny is determined by their attitude to Himself and His brethren; some will sit down with Abraham and Isaac and Jacob in the Kingdom of God; others will be cast into the outer darkness, where there shall be weeping and gnashing of teeth (Mt 25³¹⁻⁴⁶).

But, generally, it is the ideal which is present with Jesus; He prefers to look at the possibilities; He does not see capacity for evil; He tries rather to discover the latent powers and potencies of good. An incident such as that recorded in Jn 8¹⁻¹¹ is striking proof of this. Jesus there sees not simply the sinner, but the possibility of good in the sinner. His final word to her, therefore, is not one of condemnation: 'Neither do I condemn thee; go thy way; from henceforth sin no more.' Man, therefore, is crowned with high dignity and solemn grandeur because he is akin to the Divine. If Jesus had not believed in the capacity for good even in the most unlikely and unexpected people, what we read recorded of Him and His work would never have happened. Of set purpose He turned from folk who were reputable, respectable, and, in the conventional sense, righteous and holy. He came not to the whole, but to the sick; not to call the righteous, but sinners to repentance (Lk 5³¹⁻³²). He turned to those without repute, to the so-called 'sinners,' in the faith that goodness lived within their hearts; and history tells us that He was not disappointed. He sought for the common man, unsophisticated, unconventional; and we read that He was often surprised and astonished at what the common man revealed to Him (Mt 8⁵⁻¹³); Jesus may thus be said to have been the first to discover the true significance of common men and common things. They were significant because they led up to and implied more than themselves; at the base and heart of each there was God.

But to Jesus man was not one object or thing among other objects or things in the natural world. He was not simply a part of Nature. 'How much then is a man of more value than a sheep?' (Mt 12²). If the recovery of one sheep brought joy to the shepherd in charge of the flock, a man, by his choice and pursuit of the good, could bring joy to the heart of God (Lk 15³⁻⁷). He was of value, as a lost coin is of value, for which a woman sweeps the house and searches diligently until she finds it (Lk 15⁸⁻¹⁰); or as a son is of value, who, even if he has left home for a far country and there wasted his substance in riotous living, is still dear to his father's heart (Lk 15¹¹⁻³²).

To Jesus, man, as a spiritual being, made in the image of God, who is Spirit, took precedence of all material things. The death of the body was merely a temporal event; but to think and believe and act as if the material world was all, was the death of the soul (Lk 12¹³⁻²¹). It was to deny God by forgetting Him, and at bottom meant the surrender of one's life as a person and the endeavour to become a thing. Such was the act of a fool. To Jesus the spiritual side was all; or, in relation to other things it was the central, controlling principle, the fons et origo of all besides. The life is 'more than the meat, and the body than the raiment' (Mt 6²⁵). 'A man's life consisteth not in the abundance of the things which he possesseth' (Lk 12¹⁵). 'What shall it profit a man if he gain the whole world, and forfeit his life?' (Mt 16²⁶).

From a strictly moral standpoint the same truth held good of man; he alone of all natural creatures was capable of good and ill; things could not defile; they were unmoral, and knew neither good nor bad; defilement could come only from spirit, from man, and it proceeded from the thoughts and purposes of his heart (Mt 15^{10, 11, 18-20}). If the inner life was watched, and its waters and streams kept pure, all was well; from without there was no danger, because things had no power. It was similar in regard to the nature of the true good. It was an inward possession; moth and rust consumed material things, but they could not touch spiritual treasure, which made up the wealth of the soul; this was treasure in heaven, and as such would abide (Mt 6²⁰). It was the good incorporated, as it were, into the very life and spirit of man. Such also was the Kingdom of heaven. Men could not see it; it did not come by observation; it was within (Lk 17^{20, 21}).

There is a revelation of God in Nature; there is a revelation of God in man; above all, in the moral consciousness of man. People often asked Jesus for a sign or miracle to show them that His teaching was true. But Jesus gave no sign. The teaching itself was its own sign and witness (Lk 11²⁹⁻³²); its presence was also an argument; it 'doth both shine and give us sight to see.' The rich man in the torments of hell-fire might ask that a messenger be sent to his brethren—that some one should rise from the dead to warn them from his fate;—surely at a miracle they would repent? But the appeal of Jesus ever addressed itself to the moral consciousness of man. 'They have Moses and the prophets; let them hear them. . . . If they hear not Moses and the prophets, neither will they be persuaded though one rise from the dead' (Lk 16¹⁹⁻³¹). In this aspect John also, in the Prologue to his Gospel, defines for us the nature of man. There was a light which lighted every man as he came into the world. The source of this light was God. Its supreme manifestation was in Jesus; in Him was life, and the life was the light of men (Jn 1¹⁻⁹).

Man, then, as spiritual, takes precedence of everything else that is. He is not a means or a thing; he is an end in himself. In the time of Jesus, however, as has also happened in other periods of history, the customs and institutions, which man had made had become his master, were obscuring his vision and keeping him from his true good. One of these institutions was that of the Sabbath. A man might not heal another man on the Sabbath; yet if a sheep had fallen into a well he might get it out, or if his ox or his ass were thirsty he might lead them to the pool. Jesus enforces the true order; the Sabbath was made for man; it was a means for his good; it was a custom, an institution, a thing, and, as compared with spirit, occupied a strictly subordinate place. It was similar with every custom and institution man had made (Mt 12¹⁻²¹, Mk 2²³⁻²⁸).

In saying this, Jesus stood emphatically for progress; He practically said also that there was something in the life of man which neither institutions nor the social order nor civic legislation could ever fully express; man bore the infinite within him; deep and ineradicable, within his life, there was the life of God. Man was therefore immortal. If we admit the premises, no other conclusion is possible. The fact, said Jesus, in effect, that we can stand in relation to God, that we can speak with Him and commune with Him, is itself the promise and pledge of immortality. Because He lives, we live also (Jn 14¹⁹). God 'is not the God of the dead, but of the living, for all live unto him' (Lk 20³⁸). And thus the chief end of man was to know God and Jesus Christ whom He had sent (Jn 17³); his true vocation was to seek the kingdom of God and His righteousness (Mt 6³³). Because he was made in God's image, and was able, in some measure, to represent Him and reveal Him, man was endowed with a peculiar dignity. But here again Jesus spoke in the language of the ideal. Immortality was a possibility for man; it was in some sense an achievement; it was also something that could be lost. But it was something of which every man was capable.

In conclusion, the strongest argument for the dignity and worth of man is to be found in Jesus Himself. He called Himself the Son of Man; whatever touched man and his well-being was His concern. His teaching and His life were such that men find it impossible to regard Him from the ordinary human standpoint. They have conceived of Him as Divine; they say that His entry into human life to share the common pain and toil and death was a purely voluntary act. Such is not only a view held by theologians, but one which is entertained to-day by men of science. Sir Oliver Lodge speaks of Jesus as being willing to share the life of a peasant, and as being the best race-asset that men possess (Hibbert Journal, Oct. 1904). From whatever standpoint, however, He is viewed, the presence of Jesus in humanity can only add incalculably to its worth and dignity. In set doctrine Jesus taught very little as to the nature of man. To really see what He thought about man and the value He set on him, we must look at Jesus' life. He came to do the will of His Father and to accomplish His work (Jn 6³⁸ 9⁴); He came to give life, and to give it abundantly (Jn 10¹⁰); He came not to be ministered unto, but to minister, and to give His life a ransom for many (Mt 20²⁸). That He loved men is a commonplace. He, beyond all other teachers and leaders whom we know, 'stood stoutly for the human,' and made the cause of man—the true well-being of man—take precedence of every other thing and cause. It was not that men were better in His than in any other age; it was that He ever saw men in the light of the ideal, and ever found at the root of man's life the life of God. To say this is to say also that among all the benefactors of humanity, Jesus of Nazareth is, par excellence, the Friend of Man. He thought that the common weal—man and man's true cause and good—was worth living for with absolute devotion; should things so require, it was also worth dying for. And, as Jesus Himself has said, greater love hath no man than this (Jn 15¹³).

Psychologically, man, in the thought of Jesus, is made up of two parts, soul and body, or spirit and flesh. But He speaks, as a moral teacher, of man in his broad general aspect, and is not concerned with minute psychological distinctions (cf. Mt 10²⁸, 29 16²⁶ 26⁴¹, Mk 8³⁶, Lk 16²²).

MANAEN (Μαναήν, Ac 13¹=Menahem, מנחם, 'comforter,' 2 K 15¹⁴ etc.).—Two facts only are recorded in Scripture concerning Manaen. In his old age he was a Christian minister; in youth he was foster-brother of Herod the tetrarch, i.e. Antipas (Ac 13¹). But this must be read side by side with a statement of Josephus, who tells us (Ant. xv. x. 5) that, some few years before, another Manaen (or Manaem) had come into touch with another Herod,—the Great. The double parallel appears too striking to be mere coincidence. It seems more reasonable to assume a connexion between the two stories, and from them we may inferentially derive much light.

1. The connexion between the Manaen of Josephus and Herod the Great.—When Herod was yet a schoolboy, he was one day greeted in the street by this Manaen, who patted him on the back, and saluted him as future king of the Jews. As Antipater, Herod's father, was only a military governor, the prediction seemed absurd. But Manaen was an Essene, one of the stalwart Puritans of that day, who had a reputation not only for austerity but for predictive powers (Jos. BJ ii. viii. 12); and the words induced the lad to make further inquiry. Manaen persisted, adding that the coming dignity would not be accompanied by righteous living, and that God's punishment would visit his later life. About fifteen years later (B.C. 37), when the first part of the prophecy was fulfilled, Herod sent for the old Essene, and ever after honoured him and his sect. If, as Lightfoot conjectures, he was the same Manaen who, being vice-president of the Sanhedrin under Hillel, led away eighty others to the service of Herod, and inaugurated a system of laxer living, then the connexion did not issue in the moral profit of the older man, and he may have been alluded to (as Plumptre thinks) by our Lord under the figure of the shaken reed (Mt 11⁷), and as a soft-clad dweller in royal households. Perhaps, too, this defection was the origin of the sect of the Herodians (Mk 3⁶, etc.).

2. Connexion between the later Manaen and Herod Antipas.—The facts related above seem to constitute an intelligible foundation for the circumstances of Manaen's life noted in Ac 13¹. Antipas was a son of Herod the Great, and if the old king had an elder Manaen living in his household, nothing would be more natural than that a young Herod and a young Manaen (perhaps a grandson, since Manaen the elder was a man of standing when Herod the Great was a boy) should be brought up together. What this implied it is difficult to determine, since 'foster-brother' (σύντροφος) has both a narrower and a wider meaning. It may only indicate that the children were much together. Manaen may well have shared both the home-life and the subsequent education, under a private tutor at Rome, which Antipas and Archelaus enjoyed (Ant. xvii. i. 3). On the other hand, Archelaus is not mentioned here, so perhaps the narrower sense of σύντροφος may be pressed, that Manaen's mother was also nurse to Antipas. In either case it is suggestive to contemplate the murderer of John the Baptist and paramour of Herodias, side by side with the man of ascetic Essene stock, subsequently a teacher in the Church of Christ.

3. Manaen's religious development and influence.—One wonders how the companion of Herod became the servant of Christ. His name ('consoler') may indicate that his parents were of that spiritually watchful circle who waited for the consolation of Israel (Lk 2²⁵). According to the Talmud (Jerus. Ber. ii. 4), Menahem was to be one of the titles of the Messiah, and indeed it became so (see 1 Jn 2¹ παράκλητος, used in Job 16² [Aq. Theod.] as tr. of מנחם). The name was sometimes given to children at this period, with Messianic thoughts and hopes. Manaen is like a ferry-chain whose ends are visible and whose centre is submerged. We know of his childhood and old age: his mature manhood we can only conjecture. But we know at least that he passed through the Gospel period of John the Baptist's preaching and Jesus Christ's ministry. He may have been amongst the number of those who listened on the Jordan's banks, and brought tidings to Antipas. At any rate, in Herod's household he must have heard the stirring words of the rugged prophet of the old Essene type, and if Herod 'heard gladly,' how much more Manaen! The twin-texts, 'Repent ye' and 'Behold the Lamb,' may well have become the head-lights of his course, and the forerunner's words have led to Christ one more fruitful servant. There is much to indicate that the lonely ministry in the castle of Machærus was not barren of results. Besides Manaen, we know of spiritual interests kindled in Joanna, wife of Herod's major-domo (Lk 8³), in the king's courtiers (βασιλικός, Jn 4⁴⁶), perhaps in Herodion (Ro 16¹¹), whose name indicates court connexions; we know, further, that there were servants to whom Herod talked on religious topics (Mt 14¹⁴). And among these Manaen may well have been one of those unseen influences for good which alone can account for some of the better impulses of Herod's inconsistent life. What passed between the foster-brothers after John's murder? Was Manaen a silent or a protesting spectator when Jesus was mocked? Did the death of Christ complete a work of grace already begun at the death of John? Did the Resurrection of Christ (no rumour this time, Mt 14², but a well attested fact) seal for ever the allegiance of a halting disciple? Did he remain in the train of his foster-brother till the latter left for Rome in A.D. 39? If so, he may have gone to Antioch at that date, and been one of the founders of the Church in that city, which comes into view about A.D. 41 (Ac 11¹⁹). He would then rank amongst that honoured company whose consistent practice of the faith they professed first won them the name 'Christian,' Christ's man,—honoured since with world-wide acceptance wherever the gospel message has spread. At Antioch, in any case, we find him four years later occupying a position of authority (Ac 13¹). If he was a prophet, we have an interesting link with the old Essene foreteller of Herod the Great's reign. But perhaps the copulative particles, strictly pressed, rank him as teacher and not as prophet. He must by this time have become somewhat advanced in years. If St. Luke also came from Antioch (Euseb. HE 3. 4), it may have been from Manaen that he learned certain details concerning Herod and John which are peculiar to his Gospel. We last catch sight of Manaen in that hallowed gathering when he and his fellows in the ministry willingly surrendered their two ablest men, Barnabas and Saul, for the evangelization of the world. He who was called by his parents 'the comforter' cheerfully yielded to the higher voice of the heavenly 'Comforter' (Ac 13²), and tarried by the stuff, while others went forth to the fight.

MANASSEH.—The well-known king of Judah, mentioned as a link in our Lord's genealogy, Mt 1¹⁰.

MANGER.—The AV and RV tr. of φάτνη in Lk 27. 12. 16. In Lk 13¹⁵, the only other place where φάτνη occurs in NT, AV and RV both render it 'stall,' though RVm gives 'manger.' The precise meaning of φάτνη is somewhat uncertain, opinions differing as to whether it denotes a stall or a manger within a stall.

Tristram (Land of Israel, p. 73) supposes that Mary and Joseph, who could not find room in the κατάλυμα, were obliged to go to some poor house hard by, where there was 'an upper platform' for people and 'a lower platform' for cattle, and that 'in the lower portion allotted to the cattle the Infant when born was naturally laid at once in the long earthen trough which serves for a manger, and into which the fodder is pushed from the floor.' If the κατάλυμα was like a modern Eastern khan, and if the φάτνη belonged to it (see below), Mary and Joseph went to one of the stalls for cattle and beasts of burden within the outside wall, and there the babe was born. Meyer (on Lk 27) favours the view that φάτνη means a feeding-trough placed in a stable. In any case, φάτνη, as its derivation implies, designates a feeding-place for animals.

Opinions further differ as to whether the φάτνη in question was a cave or grotto in the limestone rock of the neighbourhood used as a stable, or an enclosure fenced in.

The former view, which has the weight of persistent tradition, is due to Justin Martyr, who tells us that Christ was born 'in a certain cave near the village,' which cave, he says, had been pointed out by Isaiah as 'a sign.' For this latter circumstance he founds upon Is 33¹⁶ LXX, 'He shall dwell in the lofty cave of the strong rock' (Trypho, 70 and 78). A similar statement is made by Origen, who affirms that in his day there was shown at Bethlehem 'the cave where Jesus was born, and the manger in the cave where He was wrapped in swaddling bands' (c. Cels. i. 51).

There is, of course, nothing improbable in this traditional view that the place where Mary sought shelter was a cave, for throughout Palestine such caves or grottoes were and are commonly used as stables. The other view, that the φάτνη was an enclosure, is favoured by many. According to Schleusner, it was the open courtyard attached to the inn and enclosed by a rough fence, into which the cattle would be shut at night, and where poorer travellers might lodge, when from want of room in the inn, or want of means to pay for room, they could find no other place. This view is supported by the Vulg. (præsepium) and the Peshitta. It is, moreover, significant that the earliest Christian artists represent the Nativity as in an open courtyard.

Stanley, who opposes the view that the φάτνη was a cave, does so partly on the ground of Mt 2¹¹ and partly on the ground of the superstitious tendency to associate sacred events with caves. He says (SP p. 440): 'As soon as the religion of Palestine fell into the hands of Europeans, it is hardly too much to say that it became "a religion of caves." He further notes that when the Convent of the Nativity was dismantled during the invasion of Ibrahim Pasha, it was found that the traditional cave had been, in pre-Christian times, a place of sepulture, and was therefore not at all likely ever to have been used by Jews as a manger.

It has been commonly but too readily assumed that the precise meaning of φάτνη in St. Luke's account must be determined by our interpretation of κατάλυμα. This appears to be a groundless assumption. It is not said by St. Luke that the φάτνη was connected with the inn. In 27. 12 the definite article is not used; for, though it appears in the TR and a few MSS of minor importance, in which it was probably inserted to designate the well-known φάτνη, preponderating evidence is altogether against it. It occurs, as the best MSS show, in v. 16, but there it clearly refers to the φάτνη spoken of in vv. 7. 12. It is at least possible that the φάτνη did not belong to the κατάλυμα at all, and it is worth noting as subordinate evidence for this that the Protevangel of James and the Arabic Gospel of the Infancy do not connect 'the cave' of which they both speak with the inn.

Our conclusion, then, seems clear that, whether the φάτνη was a cave or an enclosure, it was certainly a place where cattle were housed or fed. It cannot be maintained that there is anything improbable or unreasonable in the continuous Christian tradition which goes back to the first decade of the second century. Nor is the pious sentiment groundless which has pictured the birth of the world's Redeemer in circumstances so humble, and has lingered in loving and grateful meditation over His manger cradle. MANIFESTATION.—1. The historic manifestation.—We shall not attempt in this article to say anything about such manifestations of Christ as those alluded to in Jn 1⁹, where He is spoken of as the Light which lighteth every man coming into the world. Our first point must obviously be that manifestation in the flesh of which St. Paul speaks in his letter to Timothy (1 Ti 3¹⁶). We are so accustomed to its outward form that to some extent we have lost its significance. Not in the court as a king's son, not in the Temple as the member of a priestly family, not in the wilderness as the son of some aged solitary who had given up the world, but in the familiar commonplace surroundings of a peasant family, as the Son of Mary, the wife of a village carpenter. This was the presentation of God to the world. Any of the other forms would have been more in accord with human expectations. But we are learning more and more every day that God loves the natural, not the out-of-the-way, as a means for manifestation. And this manifestation, first in the manger at Bethlehem, then in the home at Nazareth, was the outward setting of the Divine Life, both simple and natural. There were no miracles, no strange exhibitions of unseen powers, no external signs that led the men of Nazareth to mark out that home as being specially remarkable. Mary and Joseph, who alone knew the secret, read the wonder of it in the spotless life which from infancy to manhood unfolded new beauties every day. Nothing like it had they ever seen or heard.

2. Manifestation by signs.—But this manifestation of God in human character, though the only one seen during thirty out of thirty-three years, was not the only one. His mother evidently expected something further. When He left His home to begin His ministry, she felt sure that this reserve and silence would be broken. It might come at any place, and at any time. And it was in accord with the humility and kindness of her character that she should believe it might come at a small village feast to meet a temporary social need. It is plain from our Lord's reply (Jn 2⁴) that she was looking for some manifestation, for He told her that the hour for such had not come. It is equally plain that she read in His words only a correction of her eagerness and supposition that she best knew the occasion. She had no doubt that He would help, and gave directions accordingly. And in that secret miracle, apparently unperceived at the time, and discovered only when there was an opportunity to ask the servants, He manifested forth His glory.

This is typical of the many manifestations that followed during the three years. They were not wonders wrought to force men's belief, but signs of Divine character. They were bits of teaching by illustration, object-lessons as we should call them. He never would work a miracle for the sake of astonishing men, though He was often asked to do so (Mt 12^{38ff.} 16^{1ff.}). They were all signs of God's sympathy with the needs of men, and the desire He had to relieve them. (See Wace, Some Central Points of Our Lord's Ministry, p. 133).

3. Manifestation of the Transfiguration.—For some eighteen months there had been wonderful manifestations of Divine character and power, but no personal manifestation. Like any one else, Christ was seen tired, hungry, asleep, and in pain through the infirmities and sicknesses of others that He carried. He did not strive nor cry, neither was His voice heard in the streets (Mt 12¹⁹). All was singularly quiet and unassuming, and men might well wonder what there was at the back of this astonishing teaching and these wonderful works. But once the disclosure was made (Mt 17¹ || Mk 9², Lk 9³⁶). See art. TRANSFIGURATION.

4. Manifestations after the Resurrection.—It is very difficult to realize the character of these revelations of the Risen Lord. In one He is like a gardener (Jn 15¹), in another, a traveller walking to a country village (Lk 24¹⁵), in another, a stranger standing on the beach of the Lake (Jn 21⁴). Mk. speaks of the appearance to the two disciples on the road to Emmaus as being in 'another form' (Mk 16¹²). They were manifestations marked by sudden appearances and disappearances. His home was elsewhere, but He came and went according to the disciples' needs. The body was real—could be touched as well as seen. Indeed, He was anxious that they should not suppose Him to be mere spirit, and actually ate a piece of broiled fish before them in order to show them the reality of His bodily existence (Lk 24⁴²). But these manifestations are characterized by two features: (1) they were made only to His friends; (2) they were not apparently surrounded with glory and majesty.

With regard to (1), we may believe that only His friends could have perceived them. They might have seen something, as St. Paul's companions did on the road to Damascus (Ac 9⁷), but not the face of Christ. Faith and love were necessary to interpret the manifestations. (2) They were not apparently surrounded with glory and majesty. They disturbed and frightened, not because they were expressions of His eternal majesty, as that of the Transfiguration was, but because they were unexpected and sudden. This, we think, is singular, and certainly one of the marks of the truthfulness of the narrative. We expect it to be so different, as is shown by the shining figures that represent the Risen Lord in picture and stained-glass window. But just as the graciousness of a king leads him to adopt the dress of his guest so as to make him more completely at home, so our King, when He comes to those poor labouring folk whom He had chosen for His Apostles, comes as one of them.

5. Manifestations to disciples since the Ascension.—There is a striking promise in the words our Lord spoke after the Last Supper, in which He declares that He will manifest Himself to the man that loves Him. That this does not refer to the manifestations of the Resurrection, which were so soon to follow, is clear from His reply to Jude's very natural question as to how He would manifest Himself to the disciples and yet not to the world (Jn 14²²). It is interesting to note that St. John does not use the ordinary Greek word (φανερῶναι) for manifestation, but takes another word (ἐμφανίσω), which is employed in this sense in only one other passage (Mt 27⁵³), where the dead bodies of the saints are said to have appeared to many in the holy city. That passage would seem to indicate a bodily appearance; but our Lord's explanation contradicts such an interpretation. When asked how He could appear to the men who loved Him and yet not to the world, He replies that in the first place the man who loves Him will keep His word, i.e. will give his mind to Him, and observe His teaching, and then in his fixed contemplation and obedience will realize not only His own presence, but the presence of the Father. Such manifestations as these, then, are secret, personal realizations of Christ's presence, according more nearly with the revelations of a friend's character that we have in his letters, or in his pictures if he is an artist, in his music if he is a musician. Not, however, that we are to think of them as entirely subjective. The words 'We will come unto him' teach an actual spiritual movement on our Lord's part towards those who love Him, which they will feel and enjoy.

To St. Paul, who did enjoy some actual appearances of Christ, the spiritual revelations were everything; and in one difficult passage he declares that though he had known Christ after the flesh, i.e. in bodily form, henceforth he knew Him no longer in that way (2 Co 5¹⁸), evidently finding more in the indwelling manifestation of Christ than he had known in the joy of Christ's visible form.

6. Manifestation of the Second Advent.—In 2 Th 2⁸, where AV gives 'with the brightness of his coming,' RV renders 'by the manifestation of his coming,' the Gr. word being επιφάνεια. Similarly RV substitutes 'shall be manifested' for AV 'shall appear' in Col 3⁴, 1 P 5⁴, 1 Jn 2²⁸ 3², the Gr. word in each case being φανερώω. See artt. PAROUSIA, SECOND COMING.

MANLINESS.—To the Christian, Jesus is the perfect man, and therefore in His character is to be found the perfect type of manliness. At the same time, when we speak of the manliness of Jesus, there is an element of challenge in the phrase, and we make an assertion that is felt to require justification. This is due partly to the fact that the conventional idea of manliness seems too poor a standard to apply to Jesus, and partly to the fact that the courage of Jesus is not often emphasized. Gentleness, meekness, and forgiveness are the qualities by which His character was pre-eminently distinguished, and it is too often assumed that these preclude the possession of courage. A somewhat complex problem is thus raised by the discussion of manliness in relation to Jesus, which involves two questions: (1) What is the conventional or worldly conception of manliness? (2) How far do the character and teaching of Jesus agree with this, and how far do they modify it?

1. The conventional or worldly conception of manliness cannot be described in a word, for a number of qualities go to make up what the world accepts as a manly man. (1) There must be a basis of adequate physical strength. Men have always admired the athlete, and they reject the claim to manliness of those who are puny and feeble in body. The vigour and energy of a strong, well-disciplined body form the substratum of the world's idea of manliness. A proof of this is to be found in the many efforts made by Christian people to remove the prejudice that there is an opposition between Christian faith and bodily strength. The combination of Christian faith with athletic vigour has seemed and does seem to many extremely desirable (cf. 'muscular Christianity'). (2) There must be a sufficient degree of intelligence. As, however, the standard of intelligence demanded for manliness is not very high, this element is not greatly emphasized. (3) There must be the moral qualities of courage, temperance or self-control, perseverance, and love of personal honour. Of these courage is fundamental, and it may be defined as the assertion of self against opposing influences. It is recognized by the world in many forms, from the animal quality of bold disregard of physical danger up to steadfast adherence to conscientious conviction. At the same time, however courageous a man may be, the world holds him to come short of true manliness if he is not able to control his impulses, whether of mind or body, to persevere patiently in any course of action he has adopted, and to be scrupulous in guarding his personal honour with life itself if necessary.

There are three points which may be noticed in connexion with this analysis of the conventional idea of manliness. (a) All the virtues involved are compatible with pride, and indeed are conceived as ministering to and supporting pride. This is obvious in regard to courage and love of honour. Self-control, again, is desirable largely because its opposite brings ridicule; and perseverance, because to give in is intolerable to the proud man. (b) This idea of manliness corresponds very closely to the ideal of the perfect man of the Greek and Roman moralists. The starting-point of pagan ethics is the analysis of the term 'happiness' (εὐδαιμονία), regarded not as a subjective state of feeling, but as an objective form of being. Happiness is held to be found in the harmony of character and experience.

VOL. II.—8

Hence the qualities which give a man rule over his circumstances are to be desired as good. By Plato and Aristotle an optimistic view of the world's capacity to satisfy the requirements of a good man is assumed. With the Stoics, and still more with the Cynics, pessimism about the world leads to strong emphasis being laid on the power of the individual to be sufficient to himself. With the Epicureans the optimistic assumption that the world will not fail to give the gratification necessary to happiness, leads to the emphasis being laid on the regulation rather than the suppression of desire. The ethics of Greek and Roman writers may be generically described as the science of the relation of man to his environment. The variations in theory are determined by the view taken of the responsiveness of the environment to man's needs. Thus, from the practical point of view, all the various theories aim at self-development. Self is the beginning, centre, and aim of pagan ethical thought. Harmonies with Christian teaching are largely accidental. The essence and root are different. The virtues of the pagan are 'inflated and arrogant' (Augustine), even where they inculcate the same conduct as the Christian virtues (cf. Luthardt, Hist. of Christian Ethics, i. 25). (c) This idea of manliness corresponds very closely to the ideal of manhood to be found in the Ethics of Evolution. Phrases such as the 'survival of the fittest' and the 'struggle for existence,' which suggest that men are engaged in a constant war from which only the conquerors emerge, indicate at once an ideal of manliness of which self-assertion is the fundamental quality.

2. How far do the character and teaching of Jesus agree with the worldly conception of manliness, and how far do they modify it?—Was Jesus a manly man according to the world's idea? To this the answer must be that His manliness can be vindicated in relation to all the qualities which go to make a manly man, but that allowance must be made for the very different ideal in relation to which these qualities were exercised. About physical strength and intellectual ability it is not necessary to say anything. There is a degree of human excellence which makes even the latter inconsiderable, and we have passed that degree when we discuss the character of Jesus. Courage, however, is on quite a different plane, and the courage of Jesus can be triumphantly vindicated. The cleansing of the Temple (Mt 21¹²⁻¹³, Mk 11¹⁵⁻¹⁸, Jn 2¹³⁻¹⁶), the attitude of Jesus towards the throng who would have made Him king (Jn 6^{15^a}), His denunciations of the Pharisees (Mt 23), His woes against the cities of Galilee (Mt 11²⁰⁻²⁴), His acts of healing upon the Sabbath, His rebuke to the people of Nazareth (Lk 4¹⁶⁻³⁰), His statement about the Temple (Jn 2¹³⁻²²), His refusal of a sign to the scribes (Mt 12³⁸⁻⁴² 16¹⁻⁴, Mk 8¹¹⁻¹², Lk 11^{16^a}), His last journey and entrance into Jerusalem (Lk 9⁵¹), His demeanour before the high priest and before Pilate (Mt 26^{57^a}, Mk 14^{53^a}, Lk 22^{66^a})—all show courage of the very first quality. He is undismayed before an unparalleled combination of adverse forces. And the overwhelming forces opposed to Him give an added lustre to His courage in dealing faithfully with those who took or were ready to take His part. His disciples are fearlessly rebuked when they are in the wrong (Lk 9⁵⁴⁻⁵⁶, Mt 16²³, Mk 8³³, Mt 18^{17^a}, Mk 9³³, Lk 9⁴⁶ 24^{24^a}, Mt 19¹⁴, Mk 10¹³⁻¹⁵, Lk 18¹⁵⁻¹⁹). He never modifies His demands in order thereby to secure influential supporters (Jn 3^{17^a}, Mt 19^{16^a}, Mk 10^{17^a}, Lk 18^{18^a}, Mt 8¹⁹⁻²², Lk 9⁵⁷⁻⁶²). Moreover, the inevitable result of His faithfulness was clear to Him from an early point in His public career. So there was not lacking in His courage that element which arises from the vision of the cruel and shameful death awaiting Him. The self-control of Jesus, again, is very apparent in His life. We see it in the fact that He remained subject to His parents (Lk 2⁵¹), and was 30 years of age before He began His ministry. It is displayed in a different relation in the temptation in the wilderness (Mt 4¹⁻¹¹, Lk 4¹⁻¹³), when neither the pangs of hunger nor the splendid prospect of worldwide dominion could overcome His resolution. And once more, before the high priest, before Pilate, and in the brutal hands of the soldiers, He never spoke one bitter or unworthy word, even though Peter denied Him and the other disciples had forsaken Him. Of His perseverance it is only necessary to say that He was 'obedient even unto death, yea, the death of the cross' (Ph 2⁸).

It is in regard to love of personal honour that the transcendent difference between the world's idea of manliness and the manliness of Jesus becomes apparent, just as also very varying views are to be found even among worldly men as to what honour really is. However, an integral element in honour in the worldly sense is the good opinion of a man held by his fellows. To be an inconsiderable person was regarded by Aristotle as incompatible with happiness. High-mindedness is one of the virtues which go to make the perfect man, and 'by a high-minded man we seem to mean one who claims much and deserves much' (Nic. Eth. iv. 3, § 3; cf. Mt 23¹²). Even the proud indifference of the Cynic to the opinion of his neighbours by its vehemence betrayed its hollowness. It is the last refuge of pride to despise all who do not acknowledge the superiority on which it is based. In the life and teaching of Jesus the centre of morality is changed from self to God. Right conduct consists in obedience to the law of God. The essential nature of the Law is to love God and one's neighbour (Mt 22³⁷⁻⁴⁰, Mk 12^{30, 31}, Lk 10²⁷). The approval of God is thus the supreme practical consideration for the Christian, while his relations to others are to be governed by love and a desire for their good. There is no exception to this rule. It is to guide the conduct of Christians towards those who have injured them. Now the right and duty of avenging an affront or an injury have always seemed to men bound up with the love of honour, and the division of others into friends and enemies has seemed inevitable. But Jesus teaches that His followers are to forgive injuries, and to love their enemies (Mt 5^{39f.}, 18^{21, 22}, Lk 6^{27f.}, 17^{3, 4}). Moreover, they are not to meet violence with violence. And of these precepts He has given a perfect illustration (Lk 4²⁴⁻³⁰, Mt 26⁵²⁻⁵⁶, Mk 14⁶⁵, Mt 27³⁰, Jn 8⁵⁹, 19¹⁷).

It is in regard to this duty of forgiveness that the world has found the greatest difficulty in assimilating the views of Jesus, and has been inclined to treat them as counsels of perfection which cannot be put in practice. Three degrees of opinion on this question may be distinguished: (1) that of those who altogether ignore the teaching of Jesus as impracticable; (2) that of those who find in His teaching the condemnation of all resistance to evil, whether private or public, and so condemn alike war between States and private quarrels, whether settled by physical force or by an appeal to courts of law, the decisions of which ultimately rest on force; (3) that of those who find in the teaching of Jesus primarily the inculcation of a spirit of love the manifestation of which is determined in every case by the circumstances, and which accordingly condemns neither war nor an appeal to force, nor an appeal to courts of law, apart from the occasion which gives rise to them.

With the first of these opinions we are not concerned. The second has always been held by many Christians. It is based especially on Mt 5¹⁸⁻⁴⁸, 26⁵², Lk 6²⁷, 17³. In the early Church it led to a strong feeling against the propriety of Christians serving as soldiers (cf. Tertullian, de Idol. ch. 19—'the Lord in disarming Peter unbelted every soldier'). In later times the Society of Friends have been the most prominent adherents of similar ideas. And Tolstoi, among modern writers of distinction, holds such views in their most extreme form. It has to be remembered, however, (a) that the illustrative sayings of Jesus cannot wisely be generalized into universal precepts. To do this is to ignore the clearly marked feature of His teaching, in which He aimed 'at the greatest clearness in the briefest compass.' (b) If Jesus said, 'To him that smiteth thee on one cheek offer also the other' (cf. Mt 26⁵², Jn 18¹¹), He also told His disciples to sell their garments and 'buy a sword' (Lk 22³⁶, cf. Mt 10^{34, 35}). (c) Jesus laid down a method of dealing with one who has trespassed against another which cannot be brought within the boundary of strict non-resistance, though, indeed, the motive of this dealing is undoubtedly to be a desire for the good of the offender (Mt 18¹⁵⁻¹⁷). The third opinion is that which has generally prevailed among Christians. According to it, the ruling principle of a Christian's conduct is love towards all. This involves at once and without question or limit the forgiveness of all injuries and the crucifying of the spirit of emulation and self-esteem which so often leads to strife. But the manifestation of heart-forgiveness is to be regulated by a wise conception of the injurer's welfare and the welfare of others. These principles, in their mutual interaction, condemn all personal vindictiveness and malice, such an appeal to violence as duelling, that litigious spirit which aims at getting the better of another in a law-court, and all wars of aggression, as well as those which spring from national or personal pride. They do not condemn, however, the establishment of just government by force of arms, nor an appeal to justice and a desire for its vindication by force, nor the use of arms in the protection of the weak.*

There is thus open to the Christian a sphere for the exercise of aggressive courage consecrated to the furtherance of noble ends. To right wrong and to protect the weak are the natural aims of Christian manliness. At the same time it remains true that the Christian is called upon to exercise the courage of endurance much more frequently than that of aggression. And the endurance of the martyr shows a quality of manliness which transcends all others, inasmuch as his courage is made sublime by self-sacrifice.

MANNA.—The miracle of the loaves and fishes, by which Jesus fed five thousand men, stirred the multitudes to fanaticism (Jn 6¹⁻¹⁵). Their first impulse was to make Jesus king by force. On the morrow they followed Him across the sea to Capernaum, hoping that He would feed them again in some supernatural way, and suggesting the giving of bread from heaven as a suitable sign in confirmation of His high claims. Would not the prophet of Nazareth imitate the great lawgiver, who gave their fathers bread from heaven? Jesus turns their thoughts away from Moses to God: 'It was not Moses that gave you the bread out of heaven, but my Father giveth you the true bread out of heaven.' As God gave the fathers literal bread from heaven, so now He is giving to their children spiritual food that nourishes the soul eternally. 'I am the bread of life; he that cometh to me shall not hunger, and he that believeth on me shall never thirst.' 'Your fathers did eat the manna in the wilderness, and they died.' God has a far better gift than the manna that was gathered day by day in the wilderness. 'I am the living bread that cometh down out of heaven: if any man eat of this bread, he shall live for ever; yea, and the bread which I will give is my flesh, for the life of the world' (v. 51).

* Tolstoi, with remorseless logic, declares that a Christian should not interfere with force to prevent murder—a precept which ignores the moral nature of the murderer no less than the claim of the person attacked for protection.

In Rev 2¹⁷ the spiritual blessing promised by the glorified Christ to the victor in life's battle is called 'hidden manna.' JOHN R. SAMPEY.

MANSION (μονή, Jn 14^{2, 23}).—1. 'Mansion,' like μονή, is properly an abstract noun, meaning 'a staying,' 'an abiding.' In English literature it is first found in Hampole's Psalter, 5. 8 (c. 1340 A.D.), 'þai entire in til Godis house of heuen and takis þaire joy and þaire mansyon in þaire perfeccioun.' So in the B text of Piers Plowman, Langland says of Pride (B xiv. 26): 'Arst in the maister than in the man some mansioun he hath' (he dwelleth in the master rather than in the man). The C text (c. 1393) keeps the word while it extends the limits of Pride's abode (xvii. 59): 'Other in the maister, other in the man, some macion he shewith.' But Hampole and Lydgate (1420) also use 'mansion' of a dwelling-place. A charter of Henry VI. (1444) uses it of a hostel, and Fabyan (1512) of the chief residence of a lord, whence it gains its modern meaning of 'an imposing abode,' which is seen even in Shakspeare (2 Henry IV. III. ii. 351). Bacon, however, still uses the word in its abstract sense in the Advancement of Learning (1605), and both Shakspeare and Milton use it of 'an abiding-place' without the suggestion of a building (Timon of Athens, v. i. 218; Paradise Lost, i. 268, viii. 296). From the Vulgate mansiones it is used by Wyclif for 'halting-places' in Ex 17¹, but in translations from the Greek (as Whiston's Josephus, 1737) this meaning represents σταβύς, not μονή, and so has no bearing upon the sense of Jn 14². The Vulgate also uses mansiones in Jn 14², and is responsible for Hampole's use of the English form of the word in the sense of 'dwelling-places.' That sense was confirmed in the language, partly by Chancer (Knights Tale, 1116), but mainly by the influence of Tindale's Version of the NT (1526), 'In my fathers housse are many mansions,' and (2 Co 5¹) 'Our ertly macionun wherein we now dwell,' copied by Milton in Il Penseroso, 92.

2. But while the English 'mansion' and the identical French word maison have retained from their common original only the developed meaning of 'dwelling-place,' the Greek μονή is nowhere in extant literature found with this meaning, save only in Jn 14². Westcott (with Liddell and Scott) explains its use in this verse by the supposed occurrence of the word in Pausanias (x. 31⁷) in the sense of 'a halting-place for the night.' But the ordinary reading in that passage seems impossible Greek, and is certainly corrupt (see J. G. Frazer's note): τέτμηται δὲ διὰ τῶν μονῶν ἢ ὁδοῦ is not an intelligible expression for the traditional meaning, 'there are halting-places at intervals upon the road.' One MS reads μνηῶν, from which W. M. Ramsay conjectures διὰ τῶν Μηρηῶν, 'the road has been carried through the country of the M. (beside Minos' tomb).'

Apart, then, from Jn 14², μονή remains a purely abstract noun, meaning (1) abiding, (2) continuance, (3) rest. The ease with which it passes from the first to the last of these meanings can be seen from Plato, Crat. 437 B, where μνήμη is defined as a μονή, and not a φορά; Ar. Phys. v. 6. 8 (ὥστε κινήσει μονή ἐναντία); Polybius, iv. 41. 4, 5, where it is twice coupled with στάσις; and most of all in Plutarch, whose writings (A.D. 80-120) are contemporary with St. John's Gospel.

Like the classical authors, Plutarch still uses μονή in the literal sense of 'a stay' or 'a continuance': οὔτε μόνῃ ἐν τῷ βίῳ τοῖς ἀγαθοῖς οὔτε ἐξαγωγῇ τοῖς κακοῖς (1042 D), ἀλλὰ καὶ ταῦτοις μόνῃ εἰσὶναι καθήκουσαν εἶναι κάκεινοις ἐξαγωγῇ, 1063 D. But in 1024 F, though μνηῶν answers to τὸ μῆνος, Plutarch opposes it, like Aristotle, to κινήσις: ἔστι γὰρ ἡ μὲν νόησις τοῦ νοούτου κινήσις περὶ τὸ μῆνος, ἡ δὲ δόξα μονή τοῦ αἰσθανομένου περὶ τὸ κινούμενον. So in 927 A the material elements as conceived by Empedocles are reduced to order by the introduction of the principle of love (φιλόστοχος ἐγγενομένος), ἵνα . . . τὰ μὲν κινήσις τὰ δὲ μόνῃς ἀνάγκαις ἐνδεδέχτα

. . . ἀρμονίαν καὶ κοινότητα ἀπεργάσθαι τοῦ παντός, where μονή has the complete meaning of rest as opposed to motion. And in 747 C he uses the plural of 'rests' in dancing; ἐν ταῦτα δὲ αἰ μναὶ πέρατα τῶν κινήσεων εἶναι.

In Jn 14², however, the immediate mention of 'a place' seems to demand a concrete meaning for μναί, though it has no parallel elsewhere. If so, the senses of 'abode' in vv.² and ²³, concrete and abstract respectively, will be derived from the idea of rest that has become attached to the word, as well as from the original idea of remaining. The difference is seen at once when the μόνῃν ποιῆσθαι of Jn 14²³ is compared with the same phrase in Thuc. i. 131: Pausanias the victor of Plataea, intriguing with the Persians in Asia Minor, was 'prolonging his stay to no good purpose' (οὐκ ἐπ' ἀγαθῷ τὴν μόνῃν ποιούμενος), μόνῃν, as the Scholiast remarks, being practically equivalent to ἀργίαν, 'idleness.' In Jn 14²³ the phrase combines, like μναί in v.², the meanings of 'abiding' and 'rest' with that of the 'home' in which the rest is found. All the same suggestions are found in 1 Mac 7³⁸, the only passage in the LXX where μονή occurs: μνησθητι τῶν δυσφημιῶν αὐτῶν, καὶ μὴ δῶς αὐτοῖς μόνῃν ('and suffer them not to live any longer,' RV).

3. The μονή of the Christian in the spiritual world (v.²) and the μονή of God in the Christian (v.²³) are evidently intended to be correlative: 'Abide in me, and I in you' (Jn 15⁴). Their consummation realizes the ideal of Jn 17^{21, 23}; meanwhile they are the NT fulfilment of the two OT ideals of rest: 'Rest in the Lord and wait patiently for him' (Ps 37⁷), and 'Arise, O Lord, into thy resting-place; thou, and the ark of thy strength' (132⁵). Jn 14², that is, refers not only to the perpetual 'rest' or 'home' in the life hereafter, but, like v.²³, to the 'abiding' fellowship with the Divine in this life (Mt 28²⁰, Rev 21³). See artt. ABIDING, and FATHER'S HOUSE.

MANUSCRIPTS.—The aim of the present article is to give a select list of the more ancient or interesting MSS of the Gospels, with a description of the most important or interesting of these. The simplest course will be to divide them into the languages in which they are written, premising that the Gospels were originally written in Greek, and that the versions in other languages are translations, generally direct, from the Greek. The symbols employed to indicate these manuscripts, whether letters or numbers, were invented for the sake of brevity, when they are referred to in an apparatus of variant readings. The standard collection of variants contained in Gospel manuscripts is that of C. Tischendorf (Novum Testamentum Graece: Editio Octava Critica Maior, vol. i., Lipsiae, 1869), and the standard lists of MSS are those contained in the Textkritik des Neuen Testamentes (2 vols., Leipzig, 1900, 1902) of C. R. Gregory, an American scholar domiciled in Germany. The new numbers which von Soden (Die Schriften des Neuen Testamentes, Band i., Berlin, 1902) has given to the Greek MSS are added for the sake of completeness, but it is very doubtful whether they will gain wide currency. Capital letters are used to indicate MSS with uncial writing, which is never later than the 10th cent.; numbers, for those in minuscule writing (9th to 15th centuries and later).

I. GREEK MSS.—(a) Uncials :—

ℵ (= δ 2, von Soden), Codex Sinaiticus (of the 4th or 5th cent.), now in the Imperial Library, St. Petersburg, with the exception of a small portion, which is in the University Library, Leipzig, contains OT (with considerable losses), NT (complete), followed by Ep. Barnab. and the Shepherd. The MS, found by Tischendorf in the Convent of St. Catharine, Mt. Sinai, in 1844, consists of 346½ (NT 147½) leaves of fine parchment, measuring 48×37·8 cm., with four columns to the page and 48 lines to the column. The ink is now brownish; the letters are not very large, and are painfully regular, without breathings or accents, the use of which is only sporadic till the 9th century. The hands of seven revisers, dating from the 4th (5th) to the 12th centuries, can be observed in the MS. This MS shares with B the honour of being considered the purest MS of the Gospels. Tischendorf has been charged more than once with having stolen this MS, but the charges are successfully refuted by Gregory.

Α (= δ 4, von S.), Codex Alexandrinus, in London, British Museum, Reg. I.D. v.-viii. (the NT is in showcases). This MS is of the 5th cent., and consists of 773 leaves (NT 143 leaves) of parchment, measuring 32×26·3 cm., with 2 columns to the page and 49-51 lines to the column. It contains, with some losses, the whole Greek Bible. It was probably written in Egypt, and came in 1098 into the possession of the patriarch of Alexandria, from which place it gets its name. Cyril Lucar, patriarch of Constantinople, and former patriarch of Alexandria, sent it as a gift to Charles I. of England in 1628. About a century afterwards it was presented to the nation. A few lines at the beginning of each book are written in red. The following portions of the Gospels are lost: Mt 1¹⁻²⁵, Jn 6⁹⁰⁻⁸²². It is quite clear that Jn 7⁵³⁻⁸¹¹ never formed a part of the manuscript. A complete facsimile was published in 1878-1880.

Β (= δ 1, von S.), Codex Vaticanus, Vat. Lib. MS Gr. 1209 (in showcases). The MS is of the 4th cent., and consists of 759 (NT 142) leaves of parchment, measuring 27 cm. square, with 3 columns to the page and 42 lines to the column. The parchment is very soft and fine. The uncial letters are small, simple, and written without breaks between the individual words; the first hand wrote no breathings or accents, and punctuation is very rare. The MS is of uncertain origin, and, when complete, contained the whole of the Greek Bible with perhaps the exception of the Books of Maccabees and the Prayer of Manasses. No gaps occur in the Gospels. It has been twice revised, once by a corrector contemporary with the original scribe (called B²), and again by another of the 10th or 11th cent., who worked over the letters and often added accents and breathings. WH consider it our very best MS, and regard the combination BN as practically infallible. A splendid facsimile of the NT part was published by Hœpli of Milan in 1904 (see the notice of it by Nestle in the Theol. Literaturblatt for 6th Jan. 1905), superseding the inferior photograph issued by Cozza-Luzi at Rome in 1889.

Γ (= δ 3, von S.), Codex Ephræmi rescriptus, Paris Bibl. Nat., gr. 9, a palimpsest of the 5th century. Contains, in present form, 209 leaves, written in single columns. The NT portion consists of 145 leaves, and contains parts of every book except 2 John and 2 Thessalonians. Edited by Tisch. (Leipzig, 1843 and 1845).

D^{ev. act.} (= δ 5, von S.), Codex Bezae, in Cambridge University Library, Nn. 2, 41 (in a showcase in Cockerell's Building). This MS is of the 6th cent. (according to Burkitt, of the 4th), and is bilingual (Greek and Latin). It is on parchment, 26 cm. in height and 21·5 in breadth, and contains now 415 (406 + 9 added later) leaves, with one column to the page. When the book is open, the left side is Greek, the right side Latin. Originally it contained probably Mt., Jn., Lk., Mk. (the regular Western order of the Gospels), Apoc., 1, 2, 3 Jn., Acts (Dom Chapman in Expositor, 1905, ii. p. 46 ff.). Now the Gospels and Acts are almost complete, the Apocalypse and 1st and 2nd Jn. have disappeared, and of 3 Jn. there remain only a few verses in Latin. Many hands have been engaged in correcting the MS. It was probably written in Italy, or South France, where it was when Beza acquired it and gave it to the University of Cambridge in 1581. The MS is the only representative of the Western text in Greek, a form of text which was widespread already in the 2nd century. It contains, therefore, many original elements, which have been worked over at a very early date. In spite of this revision, it often agrees with the neutral MSS, ℵB. Scrivener published an accurate and handy edition of the MS at Cambridge (1864), which retains its use side by side with the gorgeous facsimile published by the Cambridge University Press in 1899.

N (= ε 19, von S.), Codex Purpureus Petropolitanus, incomplete and mutilated, the parts being distributed between St. Petersburg, Rome, Patmos, London, and Vienna. It is an uncial, probably of the 6th cent., measuring 32 by 26·5 cm.; has 2 columns to the page, 16 lines to the column, and 227 leaves. The leaves are stained with purple, and the writing is silver, the Divine names being in gold. The MS is very like Σ both in text and external character. The only complete edition is that of H. S. Cronin in TS, vol. v. No. 4 (Cambridge, 1899). He considers N and Σ to be copies of the same lost original. The text is of a mixed character, representing a sort of transition stage between the purity of the older uncials and the corruption of the majority of cursives. While it sometimes supports the former, it also at times provides the earliest known authority for readings which are subsequently almost universal. For particulars see Cronin's valuable introduction.

Ξ (= ε 18, von S.), Codex Purpureus Rossanensis, in the charge of the Archbp. of Rossano, S. Italy. An uncial of the 6th cent., probably later than its brother MS N, it is, like it, purple with silver writing. It measures 30·7 by 26 cm., has 2 columns to the page, 20 lines to the column, and comprises 188 leaves. It contains Matthew and Mark (the latter without 16^{4+end}). Edited by von Gebhardt (Die Evangelien des Matthäus und des Marcus aus dem cod. purp. Rossan., Leipzig, 1883). See under N. The credit of the discovery of this MS belongs to von Gebhardt and Harnack (1879). It contains eight pictures of Gospel scenes, the oldest known.

Ψ (= δ 6, von S.), Athos, Laura 172 (β 52), an uncial of the 8th or 9th cent., measuring 20·8 by 15 cm., has 31 lines to the page, and comprises 262 leaves. It contains the greater part of the NT, but lacks Mt., and Mk. down to 9⁵. The ending of Mk. is like that in L and T¹. After 16⁹ εφοβούντο γάρ, it proceeds as follows: πάντα δὲ τὰ παρηγγελμένα τοῖς περὶ τὸν Πέτρον συντόμως ἐξηγγείλαν: Μετὰ δὲ ταῦτα, καὶ αὐτὸς ἰησοῦς ἐφάνη ἀπὸ ἀνατολῆς καὶ μέχρι δύσεως ἐξαπέστειλεν δι' αὐτῶν τὸ ἰερόν καὶ ἀθαρτόν κήρυγμα τῆς αἰωνίου σωτηρίας ἀμήν: ἔστιν καὶ ταῦτα φερόμενα μετὰ τὸ εφοβούντο γάρ:—'Ἀναστὰς δὲ, κ.τ.λ., up to v.²⁰, and at the end Εὐαγγέλιον κατὰ Μάρκον. It is only in this Gospel that the text is of interest. The character of its readings is set forth in Lake's edition (Studia Biblica et Ecclesiastica, vol. v. (Oxford, 1903) pp. 94-122) [pp. 89-186 can be obtained separately].

Τ^x (= ε 02, von S.), Oxyrhynchus Papyri, vol. ii. No. 208. We mention this papyrus uncial fragment of the 3rd cent. (Jn 1²³⁻³¹, 33-41 20¹¹⁻¹⁷, 19-25), because it is probably the oldest fragment of Gospel MS in existence.

(b) Minuscules :—

1 (= δ 50, von S.), Basel University Library, A. N. iv. 2 (formerly B vi. 27), of the 12th (others say 10th) century. This MS was used for Erasmus' Gr. Test., the first published edition. It gives a good text, which is often in agreement with 118 (= ε 346, von S.), 131 (= δ 467, von S.), and 209 (= δ 457, von S.). Lake has edited the four, taking 1 as the basis, and showing the variants in the others ('Codex 1 of the Gospels and its Allies' in TS, vol. vii. No. 3, Cambridge, 1902). He has also discussed with thoroughness the relations between them. The reader will find his Introduction a valuable lesson in textual criticism. It is sufficient here to quote his conclusion with regard to the text in Mark, which escaped a good deal of the assimilating process which affected the texts of Matthew and Luke: '(1) *fam*¹ in St. Mark seems to form part of a larger family of which the most certain members are *fam*¹³ 22, 28, 565, 700; (2) this larger family seems to represent a local text or local texts which were current in a comparatively limited region in the East; (3) the only definite localities which there is any reason to suggest are Jerusalem and Sinai, and even for these the evidence is insufficient to justify confident assertion' (p. liv). The most noticeable features in the other Gospels are an element akin to NB and a Western element (cf. p. lv).

13 (= ε 368, von S.), Paris, Bibl. Nat., gr. 50, of the 13th century. This MS is one of the group 13-69-124-346-543-788-826-828-983-ε 1053 (von S.)-ε 1054 (von S.), conveniently named by Lake *fam*¹³. The group is also called the Ferrar group, because the relation between 13, 69, 124, and 346 was discovered by Ferrar of Dublin (A Collation of Four Important Manuscripts of the Gospels, by W. H. Ferrar and T. K. Abbott, Dublin, 1877). The studies of Rendel Harris (On the Origin of the Ferrar Group, Cambridge, 1893; Further Researches into the History of the Ferrar Group, London, 1900), Lake (JThSt, vol. i. [1899-1900] pp. 117-120), and von Soden have shed further light upon this group. The archetype appears to have been in Calabria or Sicily in the Middle Ages. Its most remarkable characteristics are the transposition of Jn 7⁵³⁻⁸¹ to Lk 21³⁸, and Lk 24^{48t} to Mt 26⁵⁰ (on the first transposition see von Soden, Die Schriften des Neuen Testaments, i. (Berlin, 1902) p. 486 ff.). The importance of the group lies in the great support which it gives to the Western text.

II. SYRIAC MSS :—

(a) of the Old Syriac translation (Evangelion da-Mepharreshe, 'Gospel of the Separated Ones') :—

1. London, British Museum, Additional MSS, No. 14,451 (No. 119 in Wright's catalogue), and Berlin, Royal Library, Orient. Quart. No. 528. This MS, Codex Nitriensis Curetonianus (Burkitt's C), consists of 82½ leaves in the British Museum and 3 leaves in Berlin; and came from the great Library of the Convent of St. Mary Deipara in the Nitrian Valley, west of Cairo. The greater portion of the MS reached England in 1842. In its original state it contained Mt., Mk., Jn., Lk. (in this unusual order). The portions still extant are Mt 1¹⁻⁸²² 10³²⁻²³²⁵, Mk 16¹⁷⁻²⁰, Jn 1¹⁻⁴² 3⁵⁻⁸¹⁹ 14¹⁰⁻¹², 15-19, 21-24, 26-29, Lk 2⁴⁸⁻³¹⁶ 7³³⁻¹⁶¹² 17¹⁻²⁴⁴. The early part of the 5th cent. is the latest possible date for it. Each page has two columns, each with lines varying from 22 to 26. Each leaf measures 30 by 24 cm. The first edition of this MS is that of Cureton (London, 1858) supplemented by Rödiger (Berlin, 1872), but the definitive edition is that of F. C. Burkitt, who has edited this MS and the following together, the only representatives of the 'Old Syriac version, with an English translation, copious Introduction and Notes (Evangelion da-Mepharreshe, etc., 2 vols., Cambridge, 1904). From this work the details here are taken. A photograph of a page of C is in vol. ii. opposite p. 7, also p. 38 two pages; also in Kenyon's Our Bible and the Ancient MSS, facing p. 155.

2. Sinai, Monastery of St. Catharine; Syr. 30, Codex Palimpsestus Sinaiticus (Burkitt's S). The MS was discovered by Mrs. Lewis and Mrs. Gibson, of Cambridge, in 1892, and has been since studied repeatedly by Mrs. Lewis and other scholars. The MS consists of 182 leaves of vellum (one leaf was stolen in 1902, but afterwards restored; see Exp. Times, xiii. 405; xvii. 396). The upper writing is of the 8th cent., and consists of Lives of Saints. In its original form the MS had 166 leaves, containing the four Gospels in the usual order. Its date is early 5th, perhaps 4th century. Each page contains 2 columns, with from 29 to 21 lines each, and measures 21·9 by 15·8 cm. The Gospels are nearly complete. Of the two MSS this must be regarded as the better representative of the original translation. Complete photographs of it are in Cambridge University Library; Westminster College, Cambridge; Rylands' Library, Manchester: photos of separate pages in Burkitt, vol. ii. pp. 28, 257, and elsewhere.

The Evangelion da-Mepharreshe was so called to distinguish it from Tatian's Diatessaron or Harmony, in which form the Gospels were regularly read in the Syrian Church at first. This Church had its centre at Edessa near the Euphrates, and its language must not be identified with the Aramaic our Lord spoke. The value of the Old Syriac Version consists in the fact that it reproduces the Greek text current in Antioch at the end of the 2nd cent., with a certain amount of contamination from the use of the Diatessaron, which is in origin Italian. It is of the first authority for the constitution of the text of the Greek Gospels. For all problems connected with it the reader is referred to Burkitt's second volume.

(b) of the Peshitta ('simple') translation :—

2. Earl of Crawford's MS 1, now Rylands' Library, Manchester, of the 6th cent. (Gwilliam, No. 11).

13. London, British Museum, Addit. MSS 14,470, of the 5th or 6th cent. (Gwilliam, No. 17).

15. London, British Museum, Addit. MSS 14,453, of the 5th or 6th cent. (Gwilliam, No. 14).

22. London, British Museum, Addit. MSS 12,140, of the 6th cent. (Gwilliam, 31).

There are many other codices, complete or incomplete, of equal antiquity, in other libraries. See Gwilliam's list of 42 MSS in the Tetraevangelium Sanctum by Pusey and Gwilliam (Oxonii, 1901), which is the best edition of the Peshitta, and is provided with a literal Latin translation. As to the date of the Peshitta itself, Burkitt's view that it was prepared by Rabbula, bp. of Edessa from 411 to 435 A.D., has gained wide acceptance. He regards it as 'a revision of the Evangelion da-Mepharreshe, undertaken mainly with the object of conforming the translation more closely to the Greek text as read at Antioch early in the 5th century' (Evangelion da-Mepharreshe, vol. ii. p. 5).

(c) of the Palestinian or Jerusalem translation :—

1. Rome, Vaticanus Syr. 19 (formerly 11), of the year 1030 (Codex A, Lewis-Gibson).

6. Sinai, Monastery of St. Catharine, of the year 1104 (Codex B, Lewis-Gibson).

7. Sinai, Monastery of St. Catharine, of the year 1118 (Codex C, Lewis-Gibson).

Edited by Mrs. Lewis and Mrs. Gibson in the Palestinian Syriac Lectionary of the Gospels (London, 1899). This version is perhaps more closely related to the Old Syriac than to the Peshitta, and may be a revision of the former.

(d) of the Philoceanian-Harklean translation :—

1. Belonging to the Syrian Protestant College in Beirut, but lent to the Union Theological Seminary of New York. Of the 9th cent., and somewhat defective.

22. Florence, Laur. i. 40 (Assem. 3). Of date 757.

25. Rome, Vat. Syr. 266. Of the 7th century.

26. Rome, Vat. Syr. 267. Of the 8th century.

This, the youngest of the Syrian versions, is a revision by Thomas of Harkel (Heraclia) in the first half of the 7th cent. of an earlier version made at the instance of Philoxenus, Monophysite bp. of Hierapolis (Mabog) in the early 6th century. The earlier translation was perhaps made from the Peshiṭta by reference to the 'corrected' form of the Greek text, and Thomas found in Egypt older Greek MSS, which had escaped the enthusiasm of the destroyers, who favoured the 'corrected' text, and inserted some readings from them, adding others in the margin.

III. EGYPTIAN (COPTIC) MSS:— (a) of the Bohairic translation:—

Complete manuscripts are all of late date, none being earlier apparently than the 12th century. On all questions connected with this translation and its MSS, see The Coptic Version of the New Testament in the Northern Dialect [ed. G. Horner]; 4 vols. (Oxford, 1898-1905).

1. Oxford, Bodleian Library, Huntington, 17,* Horner's A, printed entire by him as the basis of his edition. This MS was written in 1174, and contains the Gospels complete, both in Bohairic and Arabic. It is on paper, contains 457 (+5) leaves, and 2 columns to the page, with 20 lines each. It measures 34.5 by 26 cm. The MS has a number of omissions: see the valuable tables of omissions in the chief Bohairic MSS in Horner's edition, vol. i. p. cxxvff.

21. Paris, Bibl. Nat., copt. 16, Horner's C. The MS was written in 1196, and contains the Gospels almost complete, both in Bohairic and Arabic. It is on paper, contains 369 (+2) leaves, and 2 columns to the page, with 26 lines each. It measures 28.5 by 21 cm. The text is perfect, with the exception of a small lacuna, Jn 16⁸⁻¹⁸.

33. Paris, Institut Catholique, Horner's H. This MS was written in 1250, and contains the Gospels complete, both in Bohairic and Arabic. It is on paper, contains 235 (+2) leaves, and 2 columns to the page, with 33 lines each. It measures 25 by 17.5 cm., and contains some beautiful pictures.

(b) of the Sahidic translation:—

Of this there exists only a considerable quantity of short fragments (Gregory gives 91). Some are as old as the 5th century. One is still older (No. 48 Rome, Propag. 65).

(c) of the Fayyum translation:—

Gregory gives fragments of 5 Gospel MSS only, one (No. 2), in the possession of Flinders Petrie, of the 4th century. Of (b) and (c) there is as yet neither a comprehensive edition nor a complete study. Further fragments of both are certain to be discovered.

The Ethiopic, Armenian, Georgian, Persian, and Arabic translations may be here passed over.

IV. LATIN MSS:—

(a) of the pre-Vulgate (otherwise called 'Old Latin,' or 'Itala') translation(s):— a: Vercelli, Cathedral. This MS is of the 4th cent., measures 25.5 by 16 cm., has 2 columns to the page, and 24 lines to the column. The order of the Gospels is Mt., Jn., Lk., Mk., the regular Old Latin order. Much is wanting in Mt 20-27; Jn. is slightly defective; in Lk. much of chs. 1. 11 and 12 has disappeared; in Mk. chs. 1. 4. 5. 15. 16 have suffered greatly; a second but ancient hand has supplied Mk 16⁷⁻²⁰. The text is good, and was, according to tradition, copied by the famous bishop Eusebius of Vercelli, martyred in 371. The book has suffered greatly from neglect and bad treatment. Editions by G. A. Irico (Sacrosanctus Evangeliorum Codex S. Eusebii Magni, Milan, 1748), J. Bianchini (Evangeliarum Quadruplex, Rome, 1749; very accurately reprinted in Migne's Patrologia Latina, vol. xii.), and J. Belsheim (Codex Vercellensis, Christiania, 1894).

b: Verona, Cathedral Library (Biblioteca Capitolare). The MS is of the early part of the 5th cent. (or of the end of the 4th), and is written in silver.

* Gregory wrongly 'Huntingdon, 11.'

The following parts are wanting: Mt 1¹⁻¹¹ 15¹²⁻²³ 23¹⁸⁻²⁷, Jn 7⁴⁴⁻⁸ 12, Lk 19²⁶⁻²¹ 29, Mk 13⁹⁻¹⁹ 13²⁴⁻¹⁶ 20. Edited by Bianchini (see under a) and by J. Belsheim (Codex Veronensis Quattuor Evangelia, Prag, 1904). It was probably a MS like this which was the chief basis of Jerome's revision known as the Vulgate. It is perhaps the best representative of the European Latin versions of the 4th century. There is a photograph of one page in Monumenta Palaeographica Sacra (Turin, 1899).

c: Paris, Bibl. Nat. 254 (Colb. 4051), of the 12th century. Edited by P. Sabatier (Bibliorum Sacrorum Latinae Versiones Antiquae, vol. iii., Paris, 1751; there is also an edition with 'Reims' on the title-page), and by J. Belsheim (Codex Colbertinus Parisiensis, Christiania, 1888). The work of P. Sabatier is still unsurpassed as the most complete repertory of the readings of the Old Latin Bible.

d: This symbol indicates the Latin side of Codex Bezae (D).

e: Palatinus; all that is left is in Vienna (Kais. Lat. 1185) except one leaf, which is in the Library of Trinity College, Dublin (N. 4, 18). The MS is of the 5th cent., and is, with k (see below), representative of a form of text used in the Roman province of Africa (corresponding to modern Tunis). It is very defective, containing about half of Mt., nearly the whole of Jn. and Lk., and about half of Mark. A copy of the MS made before its present mutilation exists in the Vallicellian Library, Rome, as U. 66. The Vienna part was edited by Tischendorf (Evangelium Palatinum, Leipzig, 1847), the Dublin leaf by T. K. Abbott (Par Palimpsestorum Dublinensium, etc., London, 1880); reports on the copy in the Vallicellian Library were published by H. Linke (Sitzungsberichte der Königl. bayer. Akad. der Wissenschaften [Phil.-Philolog. und Hist. Classe], Munich, 1893, Heft 2, pp. 281-287). See also Belsheim (Evangelium Palatinum, Christiania, 1896), and Old-Latin Biblical Texts, vol. ii. (Oxford, 1886), pp. lxxvii-lxxxv, by W. Sanday.

f: Brixianus; in the Capitular Library of Brescia. It is of the 6th cent., and is written in silver. It lacks the last quarter or so of Mark. It was edited by Bianchini (see under a), and is also printed under the Vulgate in Wordsworth and White's edition (Oxford, 1889-1898), as in the opinion of these editors and Hort the type of text which Jerome used as the basis of his revision. The other view with regard to it, namely, that of Burkitt, is that it is an Old Latin text deeply contaminated with the Vulgate (see JThSt, i. [1899] pp. 129-134). With Burkitt's view the present writer agrees. If it be correct (see under q), the result is the disappearance of Hort's 'Italian' class altogether.

ff²: Paris, Bibl. Nat. 17225, formerly Corbeiensis 195. It is of the 5th cent. (C. H. Turner in JThSt, vol. vi. [1904-1905] p. 257), not the 7th (Tischendorf, Gregory, and the Paris authorities). The following parts of the four Gospels are wanting: Mt 1¹⁻¹¹ 16, Lk 9⁴⁸⁻¹⁰ 20, 21 11⁴⁵⁻¹² 6, 7, Jn 17¹⁵⁻¹⁸ 20²²⁻²¹ 21⁸. Published reports of this MS are incomplete and inexact. An exact edition is expected from Rev. E. S. Buchanan, who has made a very careful study of the MS, and has already published a translation of its text of some Gospels (e.g. The Latin Gospels in the Second Century, Part I. 'S. John,' Sevenoaks [1904]), and prolegomena (JThSt vii. 99 ff.).

g¹: Paris, Bibl. Nat. 11553, formerly Sangermanensis 15, of the 8th cent., edited by the Bishop of Salisbury (Dr. John Wordsworth) in Old-Latin Biblical Texts, No. I. (Oxford, 1883).

k: Turin, Nat. G. vii. 15 (formerly of the Irish monastery of Bobbio). This, perhaps the most precious of all Old Latin MSS, is of the 4th (Burkitt) or 5th cent., and represents the text habitually used by St. Cyprian in the early 3rd century. The MS measures 18·7 by 16·7 cm., and consists now of 96 leaves. It contains Mk 8⁸⁻¹¹.¹⁴⁻¹⁶ 8¹²⁻¹⁶ 8, Mt 1¹⁻³ 10 4²⁻¹⁴ 17 15²⁰⁻³⁶. The only reliable edition is that of Wordsworth, Sanday, and White (Old-Latin Biblical Texts, No. II., Oxford, 1886), which is enriched by discussions of the greatest value for the study of all Biblical texts. Side by side with this edition should be consulted the article of Turner and Burkitt, 'A Re-Collation of Codex k of the Old-Latin Gospels' (JThSt, vol. v. [1903-1904] pp. 88-107).

m: Rome, Sessorianus lviii. This MS, of the 8th or 9th cent., contains the so-called Speculum, falsely attributed to St. Augustine, a series of extracts from nearly all the books of the NT. The compilation appears to be of Spanish origin, as the text closely resembles that used by the Spanish heretic Priscillian. Edited by F. Wehrich in the Corpus Scriptorum Ecclesiasticorum Latinorum, vol. xii. (Vienna, 1887).

q: Munich, Lat. 6224, formerly of Freising. It is of the 6th cent., and contains the Gospels, except Mt 3¹⁵⁻⁴ 25 5²³⁻⁶ 4 6²³⁻⁷ 3, Jn 10¹¹⁻¹² 39, Lk 23²²⁻³⁶ 24¹¹⁻³⁹, Mk 17-22 15³⁻³⁶. This, like f, belongs to Hort's 'Italian' class, and stands or falls with f (see above). Edited by H. J. White as Old-Latin Biblical Texts, No. III. (Oxford, 1888).

(b) of the Vulgate revision (made by St. Jerome in 383), the two best MSS out of thousands which exist are:—

am: in the Laurentian Library, at Florence, formerly in the monastery of Monte Amiata, No. 1. This MS was written about the year 700 in the North of England, probably by an Italian scribe, and was taken by Ceolfrid, the abbot of Jarrow, to the Continent as a present to the Pope in the year 716. It measures 50 by 34 by 20 cm. (without the cover), and comprises 1029 leaves, with 2 columns to the leaf, and 43 or 44 lines to the column. It contains the whole Bible. The NT was published by Tischendorf (Leipzig, 1850, and again 1854), but not with perfect exactness. (See Novum Testamentum Domini Nostri Iesu Christi Latine, rec. Wordsworth and White, Pars Prior, Oxonii, 1889-1898, p. xi; and Studia Biblica et Ecclesiastica, vol. ii., Oxford, 1890, pp. 273-324). Wordsworth and White's A.

fuld: in the library of Fulda, Prussia. The MS was written about the year 540 at the wish of Victor, bishop of Capua. The Gospels are written in the form of a harmony. Edited by E. Ranke (Codex Fuldensis, Marburg and Leipzig, 1868), with specimens of the handwriting. (See Nov. Test. etc. Latine, rec. Wordsworth and White, Pars Prior, p. xii). Wordsworth and White's F.

V. GOTHIC MSS:—

1. Upsala University, the 'Codex Argenteus.' The MS is of the 6th cent., and now consists of 187 leaves, which are stained with purple and bear silver writing. The contents are fragments of Mt., Jn., Lk., Mark. (The translation was made by Ulfilas (Wulfila) in the 4th cent., and all surviving fragments are collected in Gabelentz and Loebe's Ulfilas (Altenburg and Leipzig, 1836-1843).

LITERATURE.—Most of the important literature has already been indicated in the course of the article. Reference should also be made to The NT in the Original Greek: The Text revised by Westcott and Hort, vol. ii. Introduction and Appendix (London, 1881 and 1896); Kenyon, Handbook to the Textual Criticism of the NT (London, 1901); Nestle, Introduction to the Textual Criticism of the Greek NT (London, 1901); Hammond, Outlines of Textual Criticism applied to the NT (Oxford, 1902).

ALEX. SOUTER.

MARK.—1. Name and identity.—One, two, and even three Marks have been discovered in the NT. But the identity of the 'John Mark' of Acts with the 'Mark' of St. Paul's Epistles is clearly proved by Col 4¹⁰, where he is called the cousin of Barnabas, and his identity with the 'Mark' of 1 Peter is clearly proved by Ac 12¹². These two passages show that in all the nine places where the name occurs (Ac 12¹², 25 13⁵, 13 15^{36ff.}, Col 4¹⁰, 2 Ti 4¹¹, Philem 24, 1 P 5¹³) the same person is referred to. The curious notion has widely prevailed that the 'young man' of Mk 14⁵¹, 52 was the Evangelist himself, but there is no evidence whatever in its support. Indeed, the words of Papias, 'he neither heard the Lord, nor accompanied Him,' would seem to exclude this and other similar suggestions. In accordance with a well-known custom (cf. 'Jesus Justus,' Col 4¹¹), Mark had both a Hebrew and a Latin name, and the Roman prænomen Marcus is of frequent occurrence. From Ac 12^{11ff.} we gather that Mark occupied a position of some prominence socially in the Church at Jerusalem. His mother's house was evidently a well-known rendezvous for believers. When St. Peter is released from prison, he turns naturally to this place, and on his arrival finds a company of Christians at worship. Several slight indications in the description suggest the house of a person of means (the porch, the slave-girl, the large upper room). The only other information we possess as to Mark's family history is his connexion with Barnabas, who seems to have been a man of standing in the Christian community.

2. Relations with Paul and Barnabas.—When Paul and Barnabas returned to Antioch from Jerusalem, whither they had gone with the offering for the poor, they took Mark with them as assistant, perhaps owing to his kinship with Barnabas (Ac 12²⁵). A little later, he again accompanies them on their first missionary journey as their 'attendant' (13⁵). This word (ὑπηρέτης) emphasizes his secondary position and function. Probably his work was of the nature of business management. He had to look after such matters as lodging, routes, conveyance, and the like. At Perga, Mark withdrew from the mission, for what reason is not stated. That Paul deeply resented his conduct is shown by the refusal to employ his services on a later occasion. It has been assumed that he shirked the dangers of the enterprise, or that he tired of the work. But Ramsay (Ch. in Rom. Emp. p. 61 f.) has taken a more favourable view of his conduct. He holds that there was a change of plan at this point, that the journey into the interior was not in the original arrangement, and that Mark might consider this a good ground for refusing to go on. He had not the same necessity laid upon him as those who had been solemnly designated by the Spirit for this service. He was an 'extra hand,' taken on for casual labour. Barnabas, at any rate, judged Mark's conduct more leniently than Paul, and later on Paul himself modified his attitude. At the outset of the second missionary journey, however, his objection to Mark's co-operation was so strong that it led to a separation between himself and Barnabas (Ac 15^{36ff.}). The latter took Mark with him on a mission to Cyprus, and we hear no more of him in the Book of Acts. When Mark next appears (Col. and Philem.), it is as the 'fellow-labourer' of Paul, who had by this time become completely reconciled to him, and had found him a comfort (παρηγορία, Col 4¹¹) in his imprisonment. Paul speaks in Col 4¹⁰ of a projected visit of Mark to the Colossian Church, and urges his friends there to receive him kindly. 'if he comes' to them. If is probable, therefore, that Mark's previous desertion had created an unfavourable impression over a wide area. Harnack thinks the visit was paid, and that, when St. Paul wrote to Timothy to bring Mark with him (2 Ti 4¹¹), Timothy was to pick him up at Colossæ on his way from Ephesus. Paul had evidently missed the attentions which Mark had been able to give.

3. Relations with Peter.—St. Peter refers to Mark in his First Epistle (1 P 5¹³) as 'my son.' This may imply only a peculiarly close intimacy, but more probably it means that Mark had been converted through Peter's influence. Peter was evidently a frequent visitor at Mark's home (Ac 12), and the friendship had begun there which afterwards became so deep and fruitful. St. Peter's reference in his letter shows also that at this date Mark was with him at 'Babylon,' which most writers now consider to mean Rome. From the familiar words of Papias (see MARK [GOSPEL ACC. TO], ii. 1) we learn that Mark had become the 'interpreter' of Peter, and that Mark 'accompanied' or 'attended' him. Swete thinks he acted as Peter's dragoman, and translated the Apostle's words for his audiences. Peter, it is supposed, would not be fluent in Greek. It is not easy to fit in this ministry to Peter in Rome with the ministry to Paul. Swete thinks it occurred after Paul's death; but it is at least doubtful whether Peter survived Paul. Harnack and Lightfoot may be quoted to the contrary. It is by no means impossible, of course, that Mark may have 'attended' Peter in Rome, and transferred his services to Paul. It would be much simpler, however, to suppose that the ministry was exercised much earlier, and in the real, not the spiritual, Babylon. In any case, Mark's association with Peter was a fruitful one, as it resulted in the composition of the Second Gospel. In this matter Mark seems to have been little more than an amanuensis. According to Papias, the Gospel is really Peter's, and Mark was simply his 'interpreter' on this as on other occasions.

4. Character and position in the Apostolic history.—Mark was thus associated with three notable men in turn, and always in the same subordinate capacity. Jülicher calls him 'Apostelschüler.' Swete thinks this humble position decidedly implied in the terms used of him in Acts and the Epistles. The συνπαραλαβόντες of Ac 12²⁵ suggests an assistant 'of inferior rank.' The ὑπηρετής of 13⁵ indicates personal and not spiritual service. Ramsay (St. Paul the Traveller, p. 71) holds that Mark's subordinate character is displayed by the 'haphazard reference' to him in Ac 13⁵. The same conclusion may be drawn from St. Paul's language in 2 Ti 4¹¹ ('he is useful to me εἰς διακονίαν'). His services to the Apostle in prison probably concerned his comfort and convenience. If, again, Mark was Peter's dragoman, he exercised very much the same 'ministry' for Paul also. We gather, then, from these references, that Mark was a person with a large capacity for being useful in practical matters, but without any special spiritual gifts, and probably without any very great force of character. This opinion may be regarded as receiving confirmation from his conduct at Perga, on the most charitable view of that incident. He does not appear to have been fitted for heroic enterprise, or for a separate responsibility, or for spiritual functions. It is only fair to say, however, that a more favourable opinion has been expressed by writers like Westcott (Introd. to Study of Gospels) and Jülicher (in PRE³). Jülicher points out that St. Paul ultimately came round to the lenient judgment of Barnabas, that Mark never lost his missionary zeal, and also that he remained unaffected by the prevalent party spirit, serving both St. Paul and St. Peter with equal loyalty.

5. Traditions.—Tradition has been busy with Mark's name. The most widely spread is that which assigns to him a mission in Egypt, and the evangelization of Alexandria. This mission is regarded as occupying the gap between the history in Acts and the later ministry to the Apostles. It was also widely believed that he died at Alexandria, receiving (according to some versions) the crown of martyrdom. These traditions cannot be traced back further than a hundred years after the supposed events. One curious fact is preserved in some of the Western traditions. Mark is said to have been κολοβοδάκτυλος, which means either mutilated or stunted in one or more of his fingers. Explanations of this deformity have been offered which possess no probability. But the reminiscence itself may quite possibly preserve a genuine fact; and it is not impossible that this defect may have had some influence in determining the possibilities of Mark's career.

LITERATURE.—The best accounts of Mark are given by Swete (Gospel acc. to St. Mark, 1898) and Lindsay ('St. Mark' in T. & T. Clark's Handbook series) in their introductions. The following may also be consulted: Harnack, art. 'Mark' in EBR (esp. for its good account of the traditions concerning the Evangelist); Jülicher, art. 'Marcus' in PRE³; Morison and Salmond in introd. to their Comm. on this Gospel.

i. THE PROBLEMS TO BE DISCUSSED.—No book of the NT has experienced such a change in public estimation as the Second Gospel. Formerly regarded as comparatively unimportant and receiving little attention from commentators, who in effect re-echoed Augustine's opinion that it was but an abbreviation of the First Gospel, it has of late years been more carefully studied, and has received a juster appreciation. It has now been recognized as a book of supreme importance, as giving us the narrative of the life of Christ in a most primitive form, and as being not improbably the foundation, if not directly at least indirectly, of all the Gospels. It will be necessary, then, in this article first to investigate the statements about its composition in the earlier Fathers and their use of it, and then to examine the Gospel itself, to see what picture it gives of our Lord's Person and work, and what relation it bears to the other Synoptic Gospels. We shall then be able to come to a conclusion about questions of date, authorship, and place of writing, of the original language, and of the integrity of the Gospel. Finally, we will consider the question of an 'Ur-Marcus,' that is, if the Gospel in our hands is the original work of St. Mark.

It will be convenient here to state the results arrived at in this article with regard to some points. The present writer thinks it most probable that the Second Gospel as we have it, or at any rate with the very slightest differences, was in the hands of all the other Evangelists when they wrote; and that the latter freely used the material before them, altering it, or adding to it, or omitting parts of it, as they thought right when following other guides. The theory put forward by Alford (Prolegomena to his Greek Testament, i. 2) and other holders of the 'oral hypothesis,' that the later writers would not have so treated a book which they regarded as inspired or even as authoritative, does not greatly commend itself, as it appears to interpret the feeling of the Christians of the 1st cent. by those of a later age.—The very style of Mk., with its roughness and inelegances, is of great value, and still more is its description of the Saviour in words which were often in after times misunderstood, of the utmost importance as showing a very early record. For these and other reasons a date at least before the Fall of Jerusalem seems to be probable. Further, it is considered likely that the Gospel was written in Greek, and primarily for Roman readers, the last twelve verses being an appendix, not composed as an ending to the Gospel, but having once had an independent existence, and being added later to the Gospel to supply a lost leaf.

ii. THE SECOND GOSPEL IN THE EARLY CHURCH.

—1. Statements as to its composition.—We will first consider those passages of early writers which may be thought to throw light on the composition of Mk., before discussing those which only quote or refer to it; later (§ vii.) we will consider whether the Gospel known to these writers is the same as our Mark.

The first passage which may refer to Mk. is St. Luke's prologue. This shows that some who were not from the beginning eye-witnesses and ministers of the word had already written narratives of the Gospel history, and by implication avers (Lk 1³) that these narratives were incomplete in not beginning 'from the first' (ἀνωθεν); also we perhaps gather that they were not in St. Luke's judgment in good chronological order (καθεξῆς, cf. ἀκριβῶς just before). Internal evidence leads us to think that not improbably St. Luke knew Mk. (see below, § iii.), and, if so, we may have here the first criticism on the Second Gospel; it has some striking resemblances to Papias' account, for which we are indebted to Eusebius (HE iii. 39). Eusebius says:

Ἀναγκασίος τῶν προθέσεων τῶν προεπιβίβασιν αὐτοῦ [sc. τοῦ Πατρί] φωνῆς παράδοσι, ἣ περὶ Μάρκου τοῦ τοῦ ἰσαγγέλιον γρηγοροῦτος ἐπιβίβηται διὰ τοῦτον. 'Καὶ τοῦτο ὁ πρεσβύτερος ἐλάξ' Μάρκος μὲν ἱερωνυμίου Πέτρου γυναικίαι, ὅσα ἱερομνημονίων, ἀκριβῶς ἱεροφάνη, αὐ μόνου τάξου, τὰ ἑστὸς τοῦ Χριστοῦ ἢ λεχθῆναι ἢ πραχθῆναι. οὐτι γὰρ ἴκανοι τοῦ Κυρίου, οὐτι παρηκολούθησεν αὐτῷ, ὑστέρη δὲ, ὡς ἴσθη, Πέτρου, ὅς τρεῖς τὰς χρισίας ἰσχυροῦ τὰς ἡδομκαλλίας, ἀλλ' οὐχ ὡς τερ εὐνταῖον τῶν κυριακῶν ταυόμενος λογίων [v.l. λογίων], ὡς τὸ οὐδὲν ἡμαρτι Μάρκος, ὅσας ἔνα γράφας ὡς ἀπηνυμνησιν. ἐνὸς γὰρ ἰσχυροῦ πρῶτον, τοῦ μὲν ἂν ἴσους παραλιπὼν ἢ φύρασαι τι ἐν αὐτοῖς.' Ταῦτα μὲν αὖν ἰσχυροῦ τῷ Πατρί πρὸς τοῦ Μάρκου. Lightfoot's translation (Apost. Fathers, compend. ed. p. 529) is here appended, and some points where Schmiedel (Encyc. Bibl. s.v. 'Gospels') differs from him are noted: 'For our present purpose we will merely add to his [Papias'] words which have been quoted above, a tradition which has been set forth through these sources concerning Mark who wrote the Gospel: "And the Elder said this also: Mark, having become the interpreter of Peter, wrote down accurately everything that he remembered [Schmiedel: 'mentioned'], without, however, recording in order what was either said or done by Christ. For neither did he hear the Lord, nor did he follow Him; but afterwards, as I said, (attended) Peter, who adapted his instructions to the needs (of his hearers), but had no design of giving a connected account of the Lord's oracles [v.l. 'words']". So then Mark made no mistake [Schm.: 'committed no fault']; but see Lightfoot's Essays on Sup. Rel. pp. 8, 163], while he thus wrote down some things as he remembered them [Schm.: 'repeated them exactly from memory'], for he made it his one care not to omit anything that he heard, or to set down any false statement therein." Such, then, is the account given by Papias concerning Mark.'

Here Papias vindicates Mark from inaccuracy, and from errors of omission, as far as his knowledge went, but finds fault with his chronological order, which was due to his being dependent only on Peter's oral teaching. If this is a correct interpretation of Papias, which account of the Gospel story did he prefer? Lightfoot (Essays on Supernatural Religion, pp. 165, 205 f.) thinks John, Salmon (Intrad. Lect. vii.) thinks Luke; while Schmiedel, in a not very convincing argument, thinks that Papias did not recognize Jn. and Lk. as being of equal authority with Mt. and Mk. (Encyc. Bibl. ii. 1813; see, further, § vii. below). Schmiedel takes no account of Lightfoot's essay 'On the Silence of Eusebius' (Sup. Rel. ii.). However this may be, Papias describes the Second Gospel as being limited to Peter's reminiscences, the writer being the 'interpreter' of that Apostle. This phrase may mean (Zahn, Einleit. ii. 209, 218) that Mark, being Peter's scholar, made Peter's teaching widely known through his written Gospel, or (Swete, St. Mark, p. xxiv) that he was the secretary or dragoman who translated Peter's words into a foreign tongue during the Apostle's lifetime. Papias does not call the work of Mark a 'gospel,' and the word εὐαγγέλιον is not undoubtedly found in the sense of the record of good tidings before Justin (Apol. i. 66, see below), though some find this sense in Ignatius, Philad. 5, 8, and in the Didache 8, 11, 15. In these places, however, it is probably not the written word that is referred to. [For a complete discussion of the Papias fragment see Lightfoot, Ess. on Sup. Rel. v., vi., and Sanday, Gosp. in Second Cent. v. 2].

Justin Martyr (Dial. 106) says that Christ changed Simon's name to Peter, and that this is written 'in his memoirs' (ἐν τοῖς ἀπομνημονεύμασιν αὐτοῦ), and also that He changed the name of the sons of Zebedee to 'Boanerges, which is Sons of Thunder.' But these last words actually occur only in Mk 3⁷, where we read of both names, Peter and Boanerges, together, and in no other Gospel. We may probably dismiss the idea that αὐτοῦ refers to Christ, as if Justin meant 'Christ's memoirs,' and conclude that Justin is speaking of a Petrine Gospel. Harnack (Bruchstücke d. Ev. . . . d. Petrus, p. 37) proposes to find this in the apocryphal Akhmim Fragment which goes by St. Peter's name, and Sanday (*Inspiration*² [Bampton Lectures], p. 310) agrees that Justin used pseudo-Peter. But as there is no other reason to suppose that this apocryphal Gospel ever contained the passage in question,—the fragment lately discovered beginning in the middle of the story of the Passion, —and as Justin elsewhere probably refers to our Second Gospel (see below), it is more reasonable to suppose with Swete (Gospel of St. Peter, p. xxxiii), Salmon (Hastings, DB iii. 256), and Stanton (JThSt ii. 6, and Gospels as Hist. Doc. p. 93 ff.) that he refers to it here. If so, we have another authority for regarding St. Peter as a chief source of Mark. In considering the question whether Justin refers to Mk. or to the apocryphal Gospel, we must note that while some points of contact are found between pseudo-Peter and Justin, there are also some considerable differences (see esp. Stanton, loc. cit.), and that if one borrowed from the other, it is as likely that pseudo-Peter is the borrower as Justin.—The Evangelic narratives are in Justin commonly called 'memoirs'—e.g. Apol. i. 66, 'the memoirs composed by them [the Apostles] which are called Gospels.' From Dial. 103 it appears that he included in the term some not composed by the Apostles themselves but by their followers. He speaks of 'the memoirs drawn up by the Apostles and by those who followed them,' and in this context recalls the (Lukan?) account of the Agony and the drops of blood.

Tatian, Justin's pupil, affords evidence that Mk. was received in his time (c. 170 A.D.) as one of the four Gospel narratives pre-eminently above, and on a different platform from, all others. His Diatessaron is now known to be a harmony of our four Gospels, and probably it was not the first of its kind.

Irenæus is the first explicitly to expound the doctrine of the necessity of a fourfold Gospel (ἔδωκεν ἡμῖν τετράμορφον τὸ εὐαγγέλιον, iii. 11. 8). As the world has four quarters, and as the Church is spread over the whole world, and as the pillar and ground of the Church is the Gospel and the Spirit of life, so it is right that there should be four Gospels. Irenæus finds other equally fanciful reasons for a fourfold Gospel, and identifies our Evangelists with the fourfold appearance of the cherubim, St. Mark being the eagle (see § iii. 1 below). This reasoning, however erroneous, shows that our four Gospels had a position entirely by themselves in Irenæus' estimation; and Dr. Taylor conjectures that he borrowed the idea from Hermas (Witness of Hermas, § 1). In an earlier passage (iii. 1. 1) Irenæus says that Mark was Peter's disciple and interpreter (ἑρμηνευτής, as Papias), and that he handed on to us in writing the things preached by Peter, after the departure of Peter and Paul. In iii. 10. 6 (where the Greek is wanting), Irenæus calls Mark 'interpres et sectator Petri.'

Tertullian (adv. Marc. iv. 5, Migne, P. L. ii. 396) gives similar witness ('. . . licet et Marcus quod edidit, Petri affirmetur, cuius interpres Marcus').

The Muratorian fragment (c. A. D. 170? or perhaps a little later) begins in the middle of a sentence thus: '. . . quibus tamen interfuit, et ita posuit. Tertium Evangelii librum secundum Lucan . . . Quarti evangeliorum Johannes ex discipulis. . .'. Thus the writer had been speaking of two Gospels, which were neither Luke nor John. It is generally recognized that the opening words of the fragment refer to Mk. rather than to Mt., and that the latter had come first, as in Irenæus; but there is some difference of opinion as to their meaning. Swete, Lightfoot, and Chase interpret them to mean that Mark was present at some discourses of Peter; he reported Peter's teaching as far as he had the opportunity. The first word 'quibus' may be the second half of 'aliquibus' some; Chase (Hastings' DB iii. 24) takes 'quibus tamen' as the equivalent of an original οὐ δὲ—for the fragment is a Latin translation from Greek. Zahn (Einleit. ii. 200 f.) thinks that the author of the fragment had quoted Papias as saying that Mark was not a hearer of our Lord, and then qualified Papias' assertion by saying that Mark had been present at some of our Lord's discourses. Compare this with the idea of some later writers (e.g. Epiphanius, Hær. xx. 4, li. 6) that Mark was one of the Seventy (Seventy-two) Disciples; and with the modern opinion that the young man of Mk 14⁵¹ was the Evangelist. But, as Swete shows (St. Mark, p. xxxiii), this is against the words that follow about Luke: 'Neither did he [Luke] himself see the Lord in the flesh.'

Clement of Alexandria (Hypotyp., ap. Euseb. HE vi. 14) says that while Peter was preaching the gospel at Rome, many of those present begged Mark to write down what was said. Peter neither forbade nor urged it. There is a story similar to this told in the Muratorian fragment about John. In HE ii. 15, Eusebius says, on the authority of Clement and Papias, that Peter confirmed the writing; but the passage afterwards quoted by Eusebius from Papias does not bear out this detail. Origen (quoted by Euseb. HE vi. 25) says that Mark composed the Gospel at Peter's instruction (ὡς Πέτρος ὑφηγήσατο), being acknowledged as his son (1 P 5¹³).

It is unnecessary to quote later writers, who could scarcely have other means of information than we have; but we may notice that Eusebius (HE ii. 16) makes Mark go to Egypt and found the Church at Alexandria after he had written his Gospel, and says (ib. 24) that Annianus succeeded him as bishop there in the eighth year of Nero, a statement which Jerome improves upon by saying that St. Mark died then (de Vir. Illustr. § 8). It is also desirable to quote Augustine, as his opinion has had such weight in the Church. He says (de Consensu Evangelistarum, i. 3, aliter i. 6) that of the four Evangelists, Matthew wrote first, then Mark, and that Mark was, as it were, Matthew's follower and abbreviator ('Marcus eum subsecutus tanquam pedisequus et breviorator ejus videtur'). Seldom has one short sentence had such an unfortunate effect in distorting a judgment on a literary work; and largely in consequence of it Mk. has been generally neglected. The Second Gospel seems hardly to have engaged the attention of commentators; and the writer known as Victor of Antioch (quoted by Swete, St. Mark, p. xxxiv) in the 5th cent. (or later), says that he had not been able to find a single author who had expounded it.

2. Early quotations, references, and use.—The use of Mk. by the Apostolic Fathers is not certain, though in some cases quite probable. The quotation in Clement of Rome (Cor. 23) and pseudo-Clement (Ancient Homily, 11), which in the latter is introduced by λέγει γὰρ καὶ ὁ προφητικὸς λόγος, is more likely to be from some lost Christian writing than to be a fusion of Mk 4^{26ff.} and other NT passages; but Polycarp, Phil. 5, διάκονος πάντων, seems to come from Mk 9³⁵. In other cases it is probable that one of our Gospels is referred to, but we cannot be sure that it is Mk. in particular that is before the writer. As an example we may take Polycarp, Phil. 7, which quotes Mt 26⁴¹ and Mk 14³⁸ exactly, and both in Polycarp and in the Gospels the context is about not going into temptation. Pseudo-Clement (§ 2), after quoting Is 54¹ LXX, continues: 'Another Scripture saith, I came not to call the righteous, but sinners,' exactly as Mt 9¹³, Mk 2¹⁷, where 'to repentance' is not in the best manuscripts, but comes from || Lk 5³². But Mt. and not Mk. might have been before Polycarp and pseudo-Clement, though in the latter case the omission of the γὰρ of Mt. makes Mk. more likely. And so with Clement of Rome, Ignatius, and others. The Didache apparently refers to Mt. and Lk., and the name itself seems to be derived from Ac 2⁴²; but though a probable reference (x. 5) to 1 Jn 4¹⁸ makes the writer's knowledge of Jn. likely, there is no trace of his knowing Mark. For the possible references to the last twelve verses in Barnabas, etc., see below, § vi. The use of Mk. by Hermas is very probable. He apparently refers to Mk 3²⁹ 10²⁴ where they differ from Mt. and Lk., in Mand. ii. 2 (οὕτως οὖν ἔνοχος ἔσθι ἀμαρτίας τοῦ καταλαλοῦντος), and Sim. ix. 20. 3 (τοῖς τοιούτοις δύσκολόν ἐστιν εἰς τὴν βασιλείαν τοῦ Θεοῦ εἰσελθεῖν). Indirectly the Shepherd of Hermas supplies a great argument for the antiquity of the Gospels, because it shows the uniqueness of our Lord's parables as there narrated. Hermas essays the same method of teaching, but his attempt is utterly feeble. If the Gospels were 2nd cent. productions, and the words of our Lord had been handed on only by oral tradition, the parables could never have been kept so pure. They would in the course of time, before the narratives reached us in their present form, have assimilated features such as we find in Hermas. [For further references in the Shepherd see Zahn, Hirt d. Hermas, p. 456 ff.; Stanton, Gosp. as Hist. Doc. p. 45].

To Justin's probable reference to the Boanerges passage (see above) must be added Dial. 88, where he speaks of Jesus as 'supposed to be the carpenter' (τέκτονος νομιζόμενος; but Otto's text has νομ. Ἰωσήφ τοῦ τέκτ. υἱοῦ ὑπάρχων). Only Mark (6^s) calls Jesus a carpenter (see § iii. 4 (j) below). Justin also probably quotes from the last twelve verses (below, § vi.).

The use of Mk. by heretics is presumed from references to it in Heracleon, the Valentinians, pseudo-Peter, and the Clementine Homilies (the first two as reported by Clement of Alexandria and Irenæus), for which reference may be made to Swete's St. Mark, p. xxxi; and Sanday's Gospels in the Second Century, ch. vi. p. 177 ff.

The Gospel is found in all the old Versions—Curetonian and Sinaitic Syriac (of the former only 16¹⁷⁻²⁰ is extant), Old Latin, Bohairic, Sahidic; and in all catalogues and Greek manuscripts of the Gospels.

Putting together the statements, references, and quotations, and deferring the question of an editor later than the original writer of the Gospel (see § vii.), we may conclude, (a) that there is valid evidence that Mk. was in circulation before the middle of the 2nd cent.; (b) that ecclesiastical tradition almost uniformly connects the Second Evangelist with St. Peter—the Apostolic Constitutions (ii. 57, Lagarde, p. 85, c. A.D. 375) being the only writing which undoubtedly connects him with St. Paul (οἱ συνεργοὶ Παύλου . . . Λουκᾶς καὶ Μάρκος, cf. Philem.²⁴ Col. 4¹¹); (c) that there was a difference of tradition as to whether he wrote while St. Peter was alive or after his death (see § iv. below). Further, (d) the Alexandrian Fathers Clement and Origen do not mention Mark's preaching at Alexandria—a strange silence; and (e) there is no hint till Hippolytus that there was more than one Mark; apparently the other writers identified the cousin of Barnabas and the disciple of Peter.

iii. THE CHARACTER OF THE GOSPEL AS SHOWN BY ITSELF AND BY COMPARISON WITH THE OTHER GOSPELS.—If we had no information from ecclesiastical writers, we could have made no conjecture as to the authorship of the Second Gospel, as we can in the case of Lk. (by comparing it with Acts) and Jn. (by comparing it with the Synoptics). But from internal evidence we should gather that the author was either an eye-witness of the events described or at least that he had first-hand information. Further, a close examination of the Gospel makes it exceedingly probable that the writer's informant was St. Peter. So that, while we should never from the NT itself have arrived at the name Mark, yet the internal evidence fully corroborates the external, that the author was the 'interpreter of Peter.' The impression left from a study of Mk. is that we have here in effect, though not in form, and not without some additions due to the Evangelist himself, that Apostle's Gospel. It begins the narrative at the point when Peter could give his own recollections—at the preaching of the Baptist and the baptism of Jesus. This, not the Birth-narratives, as in the case of Mt. and Lk., nor yet the account of our Lord's pre-existence, as in the case of Jn., was to Mark 'the beginning of the gospel of Jesus Christ the Son of God' (1^s), whether these words are part of the record or are the title prefixed by an early scribe.

1. Presentation of Christ's Person and work.—Beginning with the preaching of John and our Lord's entering on His ministry, St. Mark describes at length the Galilæan ministry and the slow unfolding of Jesus' claims. Our Lord, for example, does not at once proclaim His Messiahship, nor does He allow evil spirits to proclaim it inopportunely (1²⁸ 3¹², cf. 1⁴⁴ etc.). Even after Peter's confession at Cæsarea Philippi, when the Galilæan ministry was nearly ended, the disciples were charged to tell no man (8³⁰). At first Jesus begins by calling Himself the Son of Man (2¹⁰). Then the crowds begin to see in Him a prophet; His own people and the learned scribes from Jerusalem think Him mad. We might even think, at first sight, especially if we have the Matthæan account (16¹⁰) of Peter's confession chiefly in mind and not the Markan, that the disciples then and then only found out that Jesus was Messiah. But this deduction would be precarious. The account in Jn., which makes the Baptist begin by calling Jesus the Lamb of God and the Son of God, and makes Andrew, Philip, and Nathanael at once recognize Him as Messiah (Jn 1²⁹. 34. 41. 45. 49), bears all the marks of probability. A Judean ministry, as to which the Synoptists are almost silent, must have been carried on simultaneously with the Galilæan preaching. We should expect Jesus, as a religious Jew, to visit Jerusalem frequently; and indeed, if the last Passover were His first visit during the ministry, we could not explain the sudden enmity of the Jerusalem Jews, or the fact of there being Judæan disciples—Judas Iscariot (probably from Keriath in Judæa), Joseph of Arimathea, the owners of the colt at Bethphage and of the room where the Last Supper was celebrated (these evidently knew Jesus), the household at Bethany, and Simon 'the leper.' Also non-Markan portions of Mt. and Lk. imply visits to Jerusalem or a wider ministry than that in Galilee (Mt 23³⁷, Lk 4⁴⁴ BCX, 13²¹. 31st); and in Acts the Apostles at once make their headquarters at Jerusalem, which would have been unlikely if they had only just arrived there for the first time. On that occasion they were perfectly familiar with places and people. But if this be so, we should expect two methods of proclaiming the Person of Christ to have been adopted for these two quite distinct people, of such different characteristics, and separated by hostile Samaria. In Jerusalem, where religious controversy was rife, the question of Jesus' Personality and office could not be postponed; this is shown by the way in which the Pharisees questioned the Baptist. But in Galilee this was not the case, and the revelation consequently was much more gradual. The Apostles, doubtless, had heard the questions asked in Judæa, and did know the claim of Jesus to be the Christ, though perhaps they did not fully realize all that it meant until the incident at Cæsarea Philippi. Thenceforward Jesus speaks to them of His future glory (8³⁸, cf. 9⁷) and of His Passion (8³¹ 9¹². 31 etc.). After the Galilæan ministry (which ends at 9⁵⁰) Mark gives some short account (ch. 10) of journeys in Judæa and Peræa, and it is only on the final approach to Jerusalem that all reserve passes away. In common with all the Evangelists, Mark gives a detailed account of the last days at Jerusalem.

In describing our Lord's Person, Mark emphatically brings out His Divinity. Jesus claims superhuman authority—e.g. 2²⁸ (lord of the Sabbath), 8³⁸ and 14⁶² (coming in glory, the latter in answer to Caiaphas' question, 'Art thou the Christ?'), 12⁶⁷ (the beloved Son and Heir); and especially authority to forgive sins, 2⁵. 10 (the paralytic). He is a supernatural Person: 1¹¹ 9⁷ ('my beloved Son'), 1²⁴ ('the Holy One of God'), 3¹¹ ('the Son of God'), 5⁷ ('Son of the Most High God'), 15³⁹ ('the Son of God' or 'a son of God'). He knows the thoughts of man, 2⁸ 8¹⁷ 12¹⁵, and what is to happen in the future, 2²⁰ (fasting), 8³¹ and 9³¹ etc. (the Passion), 8³⁸ (the Second Advent), 10³⁹ (the sufferings of the Apostles), 13² (destruction of the Temple), 13¹⁰ (the universal gospel), 14²⁷ (scattering of the sheep). His death has an atoning efficacy, 10⁴⁵ (ἀντρον ἀντι πολλῶν), 14²⁴ ('my blood of the covenant which is shed for many').

But still more striking is the emphasis laid on the true humanity of our Lord. The reality of His human body is referred to much as in the other Evangelists—e.g. He is wearied and sleeps (4³⁸, sleep is perhaps implied also in 1³⁵); He eats (14³) and drinks (15³⁹); His 'touch' is frequently spoken of (1⁴¹ etc.) (see GESTURES); the burial of His body is dwelt on in 15^{40f.}. But Mark pre-eminently describes the human soul and spirit of our Lord. Note especially His human compassion (1⁴¹) and love (10²¹), and the more painful emotions (1⁴³ 3⁵ 6⁵ 10¹⁴ 14^{33f.} 15³⁴), for which see below, §iii. 3. Note also the reference to our Lord's human soul and spirit in 2⁸ 14³⁴, and to His human will in 14³⁶. Mark also refers to the sinless limitations of Jesus' human nature. Questions are asked apparently for information (5³⁰ 8⁵ 9¹⁶)—for in these cases an 'economical' questioning seems scarcely worthy. The Evangelist also records the one perfectly certain instance of Jesus' ignorance qua man, 13³² (the Day of Judgment—so Mt.). It is because so much stress is laid in Mk. on our Lord's true human nature that St. Augustine assigns to the Second Evangelist the symbol of the man. Other Fathers vary much in assigning the four symbols, but it is remarkable that each one of the four is assigned to St. Mark in some one or other of the Fathers, Irenæus making him the eagle, Victorinus the lion, Augustine the man, pseudo-Athanasius the calf (see Swete, St. Mark, p. xxxviii).

2. Autoptic character.—In many passages Mk. shows, equally with Jn. and much more than Mt. and Lk., clear signs of first-hand knowledge. In these places Mk. often gives a lifelike touch, though Mt. and Lk. in their parallels have lost it. Such are the stooping down of the Baptist to loose the shoe-latchet (1⁷), the heavens in the act of opening (σχιζομένους [present], 1¹⁰), the 'incoherent and excited remarks of the crowd' at the healing of the Capernaum demoniac (1²⁷ best text, see RV; they are softened down by later scribes of Mk. and by Lk.), the 'house of Simon and Andrew' (1²⁹, where || Mt. and Lk. omit Andrew; in the East it is common for several brothers, even when married, to live in one house, but it required first-hand knowledge to know that Andrew and Peter lived together), Simon starting in pursuit of Jesus (1³⁶), the breaking up of the mud roof to let the paralytic down through it, with other details (2⁴, where Mt. tells none of the small points, and Lk., writing for a Roman nobleman, as has been conjectured, translates these, to him, unintelligible details into the language of Western Europe, and says that the man was let down through the tiles; see Ramsay, Was Christ born at Bethlehem? p. 63), the single pillow, τὸ προσκεφάλαιον, probably a wooden head-rest, in the boat in the storm (4³⁸, Mk. only), Jesus turning round in the crowd to see who touched Him (so Mt., not Lk.), and His glance at the woman (5^{30f.}, Mk. only), His not allowing the crowd who were with Him to come near Jairus' house, a very probable and lifelike detail (5³⁷, Mk. only; Lk. makes Jesus dismiss the crowd on His entering). The scene at Jairus' house is especially vivid in Mk., and is instructive as showing who the Evangelist's authority was. It must have been one of the inner circle of Apostles, i.e. Peter, James, or John (Andrew was not here present). As James died early, and another Gospel was written by (or, at least, depends on) John, we are led to think of Peter as the source. Further instances of lifelike touches are: the five thousand arranged 'like garden beds' πρασιαί πρασιαί (Mk. only) on the green grass (6⁴⁰), the details in the account of the Transfiguration (9^{28f.}, where Mt. and Lk. also are vivid), but especially of the healing which followed, where the story is told from the point of view of the three Apostles, not of those who remained behind (9¹⁴ ἐλθόντες . . . εἶδον ὄχλον, Mk. only), and where Mk. only has the delicate touch (9¹⁷) that the man brought the cataleptic boy to Jesus and applied to the disciples only when he found that Jesus was absent, and other autoptic details; Mt. and Lk. greatly abbreviate this narrative. So Mark alone relates that in the dispute about precedence and in the blessing of the little ones Jesus took the children into His arms (ἐναγκαλισάμενος, 9³⁶ 10¹⁶), and in the latter case that He blessed them fervently (καρηνλόγει). Notice also how Mk. alone tells us of the searching glance of love cast by Jesus on the rich young man and the clouding over of the young man's brow (10^{21f.}), and of the colt tied at the door without in the open street (11⁴; probably Peter was one of the two disciples sent), of Jesus refusing to permit vessels to be carried through the Temple (11¹⁶), of the command to bring a denarius, the Roman coin, into the Temple (where only Jewish coins were current) at the question of paying tribute (12¹⁵). For the Agony in the Garden, see below, 3; but here again we note that the source must have been Peter, James, or John. The account of Peter's denials is indecisive, as he must have been the ultimate authority for all the narratives; but the ἐπιβαλὼν of Mk 14⁷² (see below, 4 (h)) argues the priority of our Evangelist. Exceptional knowledge is evidenced by the mention of the names of Levi's father (Alphæus, 2¹⁴), of the father of the blind man at Jericho (Timæus, 10⁴⁶), and of the sons of Simon of Cyrene (Alexander and Rufus, 15²¹). These and other instances lead us to see in the Second Gospel a graphic account of one who had first-hand knowledge at his command, and, to a large extent, confirm Papias' description of Mark as Peter's interpreter. Mk. consists almost entirely of things of which Peter had personal knowledge. As Eusebius noticed long ago (Demonstr. Evangel. iii. 5, Cologne ed. p. 120 f.), it is silent on matters which reflect credit on Peter. It alone records several Petrine touches. We have, in fact, here in all particulars the Petrine tradition in a far more exact form than in the other Synoptics.

3. Description of the inner feelings of our Lord and of the Apostles.—This is found in Mk. to an extent which argues an early narrative based on intimate personal knowledge of Jesus and of the Twelve. In Mt. and Lk. the painful emotions of our Lord are not mentioned, except in the case of the Agony, and even that disappears in the Westcott-Hort text of Lk. (22^{43f.}); a fact probably to be accounted for by a feeling of reverence due to a slightly later age. In Mk. we find a more childlike boldness in describing Jesus' feelings. See the following instances, which are found in Mk. only: 1⁴³ ἐμβριμησάμενος (denoting sternness: not necessarily anger, but deep feeling); 3⁵ righteous anger and grief; 6⁶ wondering at the people's unbelief (here Mt. retains διὰ τὴν ἀπίσταν αὐτῶν, but omits ἐθαύμασεν; on the other hand, Mt 8¹⁰, Lk 7⁹ have the wonder of Jesus' human mind at the centurion's faith—an incident which was not part of the Petrine tradition and is not in Mk.); 10¹⁴, indignation when the disciples kept back the little children; and especially 14^{33f.}, the Agony in the Garden, where Mk. alone speaks of the surprise (ἐκθαμβεῖσθαι) added to the distraction from grief (δόνημονεῖν) of Jesus' human soul. Mt. changes the former to λυπεῖσθαι while retaining the latter, and Lk. omits the whole passage. If, as seems probable, the passage Lk 22^{43f.} is not an original part of the Third Gospel, it is perhaps a fragment older than Lk. and reflects the same stage of thought as Mark. It is referred to in Justin, Dial. 103.—It is not unlikely that the difference between Mk 10¹⁸ (the rich young man) and Mt 19^{16f.} in the best text (BDN, Origen, etc.; see Westcott-Hort, Notes) is due to the same feeling. Possibly when the First Evangelist wrote, the Markan phrase, 'Why callest thou me good? none is good save one, even God,' may have been misunderstood to imply a merely human Christ. Or perhaps the Westcott-Hort text of Mt. is not original, but is due to an early scribe or editor who disliked the Markan form of the incident. Another example is the πτῶμα of Mk 15⁴³ (so ABDL; Westcott-Hort with AC, etc., read σῶμα). This was a word used of the carcase of a dead animal or of a human being, with a touch of contempt. Mt. and Lk. have therefore altered πτῶμα to σῶμα, as also have some scribes in Mk., from feelings of reverence.

The same thing is true of another matter almost peculiar to Mk., the account of the inner feelings of the Apostles. See 4³⁸, showing the Apostles' resentment against the Lord ('Carest thou not?'), and similarly 4⁴¹, showing their awe or holy fear at the revelation of Jesus' power and Divinity (cf., however, St. Peter at the miraculous draught of fishes in Lk 5⁸); so 10³², showing their amazement and fear, apparently arising from our Lord's manner as He went before them; and 14⁵ ἐνεβριμῶντο, here (unlike 1⁴³) of anger.

A similar result follows from the passages where Mk. tells us that Jesus 'could not' do a thing. The inability is, doubtless, relative and conditional. Jesus 'could not' do that which was inconsistent with His plan of salvation. Yet here the other Synoptists, feeling that the phrases might be misunderstood as taking from the Master's glory, have altered or omitted them. See 1⁴⁵ 7²³, and the specially significant 6²⁴, where οὐκ ἐδύνατο ἐκεῖ ποιῆσαι οὐδεμίαν δύναμιν εἰ μὴ, κ.τ.λ., καὶ ἐθαύμασεν διὰ τὴν ἀπιστίαν αὐτῶν=Mt 13⁵⁸ οὐκ ἐποίησεν ἐκεῖ δυνάμεις πολλὰς διὰ τὴν ἀπιστίαν αὐτῶν, the two possible causes of offence being removed in Mt.

4. Comparison with the other Synoptics.—The indications given in the last two subsections will lead us to believe that the Second Gospel, either in the form in which we have it now, or at least in a form very like that which we have, is chronologically the first of the Synoptics, and that it lay before the writers of the First and Third Gospels. This impression is greatly strengthened by the considerations which follow. We still postpone the question whether the Markan Gospel known to Matthew and Luke is the same as our Mark.

(a) Scope of Mark.—Except about thirty verses, all the narrative that we find in Mk. we find also (and in the same order) in either Mt. or Lk., or in both. This might tell both ways. If Mark were only an abbreviator, borrowing from Mt. and Lk., without much independent information, it would stand to reason that he would have little to tell us that was not found in them. But, then, his Gospel would not be the fresh and vivid, first-hand and autoptic, composition that it is. Therefore we are led to the conclusion that Matthew and Luke borrowed from Mark, and that one or other of them took almost everything that was found in his Gospel.

That Luke borrowed from Mark is seen from another fact. In the Third Gospel there is a long section which is not in the Second (Lk 9⁵¹–18¹⁴). For this, Luke is dependent on some other source. But, having followed the Markan order somewhat closely up to the point where the section begins, he goes back, when the section ends, to within a few verses of the place in Mk. where he dropped it. Thus, Lk 9⁵⁰=Mk 9³⁰; Lk 18¹⁵=Mk 10¹³. This looks as if Mk. (or something very like it) was lying open before the Third Evangelist as he wrote.

(b) Diffuseness and redundancy of Mk. as compared with parallel passages of Mt. and Luke.—The idea that Mark is an abbreviator of Matthew is at once shown to be wrong when we compare parallels. When we do so, we shall find, in almost every case, that Mk. is much fuller than either Mt. or Lk. taken singly. The greater bulk of the two latter is due to their relating many incidents and speeches which are not in Mark. The style of Mk. is somewhat diffuse, and it was necessary for the other Synoptists, if they were to make room for the new matter which they desired to introduce, to prune it considerably. This they did. Instances are: 1³² (Mt. omits 'when the sun did set,' Lk. omits 'at even'); 1³⁵ πρῶτῃ ἔννυχα λῆαν (=Lk. γενομένης ἡμέρας); 2¹⁵ 4¹⁷, where the shorter form in Mt. and Lk. really omits nothing from the sense; 5²² 35 (Mt., abbreviating, puts together the arrival of Jairus who said that the child was dying, and of the messenger who said that she was dead); 5²⁵ (Mt. omits all the Markan details about the woman with the issue of blood, Lk. omits some of them); 6¹⁷ (the parenthetical explanation about the Baptist's death interrupts the course of the narrative in Mt. and Mk., but is greatly abbreviated in the former; in Lk. the story is put in its proper place, but abbreviated to one or two sentences; note Mk.'s redundant εὐθὺς μετὰ σπουδῆς, 6²⁵); 8¹ (the feeding of the four thousand, shortened in Mt., left out in Lk.); 8¹⁴ (the omission to take bread, abbreviated in Mt., whence we should have gathered, if we had not had Mk., that they discovered the omission only after landing, instead of when in the boat, as Mk., which is much more likely); 9³⁸ (the stranger exorcist, omitted in Mt., shortened in Lk.); 13¹⁹ ἀπ' ἀρχῆς κτίσεως ἤν ἐκτίσεν ὁ θεός (=Mt. ἀπ' ἀρ. κόσμου, Lk. different). Many other examples might be given, e.g. 7¹³ 8¹⁵ 37 (cf. Lk.) 12¹⁴ 44 14⁶⁹ 15¹ 16⁸. See also Hawkins, Horæ Synopticæ, pp. 100 ff., 110.

A similar instance of redundancy is the use of pleonastic forms in Mk., e.g. ἐκ παιδιῶθεν 9²¹ (A omits ἐκ, D has ἐκ παιδός, ἀπὸ μακρόθεν 5⁸ 8¹¹ 13¹⁴ 14⁵⁴ 15⁴⁰). These are very seldom found in Mt. and Luke.

(c) Correction of Markan details in Mt. or Luke.—In two or three instances we find a small slip of the pen corrected, as when Mark (12¹) cites as from Isaiah a passage which is really partly from Mal 3¹ and partly from Is 40⁸, perhaps through using a book of quotations in which these passages followed each other, with 'Isaiah' at the top of the page; here the other Synoptists omit the Malachi passage (though they give it elsewhere, Mt 11¹⁰=Lk 7²⁷), thus silently correcting Mark. So Mk 2²⁶ has ἐπὶ Ἀβιάθαρ ἀρχιερέως, which can only mean 'during the high priesthood of Abiathar' (AC, etc., insert τοῦ, which might give the meaning 'in the time of A., who was afterwards high priest'; D, syr⁶¹⁰, and some Old Latin MSS omit the whole phrase; these are scribes' corrections). The || Mt. Lk. have the Markan sentence almost exactly, with the exception of these three words which they omit, no doubt because it is not correct to say that the events happened when Abiathar was actually high priest. In the account of the women at the tomb (Mk 16²) there is some confusion of time (λῆαν πρῶτῃ . . . ἀνατελειαντος τοῦ ἡλίου), probably due to compression, different events being put together, unless, indeed, we accept Wright's suggestion (*Synopsis of the Gospels*², in loc.) that μῆπω has dropped out before ἀνατελειαντος. In || Mt 28¹ there is a similar obscurity: 'late on the Sabbath day, as it began to dawn toward the first day of the week, came Mary Magdalene.' But this is corrected in || Lk 24¹. The women came on the first day of the week ἄρθρον βαθείως (so Jn 20¹ πρῶτῃ, σκοτίας ἔτι οὖσης).

Cases of explanations, or corrections of matter, as opposed to corrections of phraseology, may be seen in Mk 12⁶, where the killing of the heir precedes the casting out of the vineyard, the order being inverted in Mt. and Lk. to make the parable fit the heavenly counterpart; in Mk 13¹⁴ ('abomination of desolation') where || Mt 24¹⁵ adds 'spoken of by Daniel the prophet,' and || Lk 21²⁰ explains by altering to 'Jerusalem compassed with armies'; and Mk 15³⁹ where the words 'Son of God' (so Mt.) are explained by Lk. as 'a righteous man.' In this last case the Markan phrase is probably original, though the centurion would have borrowed it from the Jews without understanding it; Luke gives what the centurion meant in his own mind.

In several cases additions in Mt. or Lk. imply the priority of Mk., the added words probably coming from a non-Markan source, as in the confession of St. Peter, where the account in Mk. (8²⁹) could hardly have been derived from Mt. by abbreviation; and in the warning (Mk 13¹⁸) to pray that the flight be not in the winter (χειμῶνος), where Mt. (24²⁰) adds μηδὲ σαββάτω, changing the case. Or, in some instances, the added words are a gloss; e.g. Mk 8³⁴ (taking up the cross—Lk. adds 'daily'), 10⁴⁰ (to sit on Jesus' right hand or left hand is for those for whom it has been prepared—Mt. adds 'by my Father'), 12¹ (the owner of the vineyard goes away—Lk. adds χρόνους ικανούς, showing special knowledge of viticulture, as it would be several years before the grapes were allowed to ripen).

In some cases, by a turn of phrase, Mk.'s accuracy in minute points is lost in Mt. and Luke. Thus in Mk 4³⁶ our Lord was already in the boat (4¹); the other Synoptists, by an oversight, make Him embark here. In the Charge to the Twelve Mk 6⁸ has 'take nothing . . . save a staff only'; || Mt. and Lk. show an early exaggeration of the command (see Swete, St. Mark, in loc.). In Mk 10¹ Jesus comes 'into the borders of Judæa and beyond (καὶ πέραν) Jordan'; Mt. (19¹) omits καί, as do some lesser MSS. in Mk. (A, etc., have διὰ τοῦ πέραν); but doubtless Mk. is right here,—Jesus went both into Judæa and into Perea. The passage is not in Luke. On the general question of the alterations and omissions of Markan matter in Mt. and Lk. see Hawkins, Hor. Synopt. p. 96 ff. He suggests that several Markan passages might be misunderstood as derogatory to Jesus or to the Apostles, or might otherwise cause offence; and therefore were altered by Mt. or by Lk. or by both.

(d) Correction of Markan phraseology in Mt. or Luke.—The Second Gospel is distinguished by a rough and unpolished style, reflecting the Greek commonly spoken by the Jews in the 1st century. In the parallels of the other Synoptics there are numerous instances of toning down and pruning Mark's unliturgical forms of speech.

As an example, take Mk.'s frequent use of diminutives, often altered in Mt., almost always in Luke. Such are θυγάτριον 5²³ 7²⁵ (not elsewhere in NT)=θυγάτηρ Mt. Lk. (no Lukan parallel to 7²⁵); παιδίον, κοράσιον (the latter a late colloquial word condemned by the Atticists) 5^{30ff.}=κοράσιον Mt. bis = παῖς Lk.; παιδία 10¹³ (so Mt.)=βρέφη Lk.; ιχθύδια 8⁷—Mt. has it once, but soon corrects to ιχθύας (not in Lk.); πλοιάριον 3⁹ (so Jn.), not in Mt. and Lk. (all the best MSS in Mk 4³⁶ have πλοία as in Mt. and Lk., not πλοίαρια as TR); ὑπάριον NBD 14⁴⁷ (also in Jn.)=ὑπίον Mt.=ὄψ Lk.; παιδίσκη 14^{66, 69} (so Mt. Lk. once, but Mt. soon changes it to ἄλλη, Lk. to ἐτερος); κυνάρια 7^{27f.} (so Mt., no Lukan parallel); ψυχία 7²⁸ (so Mt., no Lukan parallel; ψυχίων in Lk 16²¹ is not in the best MSS).

(e) Other colloquialisms are frequent in Mark. These are often corrected in Mt., oftener still in Luke. [Those here marked with an asterisk are expressly condemned by the Atticists]. Such are *κράβατος or *κράβατος 24^{9, 11} (Mt. and Lk. κλίνη, Lk. also κλινίδιον) and 6⁵⁵ (Mt. omits, Lk. has no parallel, Jn. also has the word); συμβούλιον εἰδίδουν [ν.ν. ἐποίησαν, ἐποίησαν] 3⁶, σ. ποιήσαντες 15¹, neither elsewhere in NT (Mt. has σ. λαμβάνειν five times, Lk. different); *ὀρκίζω 5⁷, avoided by Mt. and Lk. (Mt 26⁶³ has ἐξορκίζω); *ἐσχάτως ἔχει 5²³, corrected by Mt. and Lk. (Josephus has ἐν ἐσχάτοις εἶναι, Ant. IX. viii. 6); *σφυρίς [best reading] 8^{8, 20} (so Mt.), colloquial for σφυρίς (see Deissmann, Bibl. Stud. p. 158, Eng. tr.); βλέπετε ἀπὸ 8¹⁵ 12³⁸, probably colloquial or coined by Mark, corrected or avoided in Mt. and Lk.; *μονόφθαλμος 9⁴⁷ (so Mt., Lk. has no parallel); τρυμαλιὰ ραφίδος 10²⁵=Mt. τρήμα ρ.=Lk. τρήμα βελόνης best text (τρυμ. is a late rare word, doubtless colloquial; *ραφίς is colloquial); *κολλυβιστής 11¹⁵ (so Mt. and Jn.; Lk. omits; Jn 2^{14f.} has κερματιστής in addition); ἐκεφαλίωσαν 12⁴, ἄπ. λεγ. in Greek, altered in Mt. and Lk. (see § iii. 5 and § vii. below); ἀγρεύουσιν 12¹³ (=Mt. παγιδείουσιν, both ἄπ. λεγ. in NT; Lk. has ἐπιλάβωνται); κατάλυμα 14⁴ (so Lk., but Mt. omits), a colloquialism, though the verb καταλύω is classical in the sense of 'halting to rest'; εἰς καθ' (κατὰ) εἰς 14¹⁹ (altered in Mt., no parallel in Lk., a colloquialism, εἰς being made an indeclinable numeral, or else κατὰ an adverb, see Deissmann, Bibl. Stud. p. 138); *σύσημον 14⁴⁴ (=Mt. σημεῖον); *ράπισμα 14⁶⁵ (so Jn., but altered in Mt. and Lk.); *εὐσχήμων 15¹³ in the sense 'rich' or 'of honourable estate' (altered in Mt. and Lk.). It is noteworthy, however, that Luke is more particular when correcting Mark than when composing his later treatise, for we find κράβατος in Ac 5¹⁵ 9³³, ὀρκίζω in Ac 19¹³ (cf. 1 Th 5²⁷ ἐνορκίζω best text), and εὐσχήμων in the above sense in Ac 13⁵⁰ 17¹².

(f) Mark's so-called Latinisms must probably be reckoned as being in reality colloquialisms; see § iv. below. Such are κεντυρίων centurio 15^{39, 44} (= ἐκατόνταρχος, ἑκατοντάρχης Mt. Lk.); ξέστης sextarius 7⁴, not in the best text of 7⁸ (Mt. omits, abbreviating; no parallel in Lk.); σπεκουλάτωρ speculator 6²⁷ ἄπ. λεγ. in Greek (omitted in Mt., no parallel in Lk.); κοδράνης quadrans 12⁴² (omitted in Lk., no parallel in Mt., but the word is found in Mt 5²⁶); λεγιών or λεγεών legio 5^{9, 15}, i.e. 'a large number,' which seems to have been its meaning in colloquial Greek (the || Lk 8³⁰ has it, but || Mt 8^{29, 34} omits it; Mt 26⁵³ has the word in its literal, military sense); κῆσος census 12¹⁴ (so Mt., but Lk. φόρος); τὸ ἱκανὸν ποιεῖν satisfacere 15¹⁵ (omitted in Mt. and Lk., cf. Ac 17⁹ λαβόντες τὸ ἱκανὸν satis accipientes). To these must be added δηνάριον denarius 6³⁷ 12¹⁵ 14⁵ and μόδιος modius 4²¹, which both the other Synoptics have retained.

(g) The Aramaic transliterations in Mk. are a source of some perplexity when we ask the cause of their presence (see below, § v.). But in this connexion they are significant, because almost all of them have been removed by the other Synoptists. Even in Mk. they are nearly always accompanied by an interpretation; the other Evangelists, writing later, probably thought it useless to retain them. They are marks of an early hand, desirous of retaining the ipsissima verba spoken.

(h) Corrections of grammar, awkward and difficult phrases, etc.—Under this head we note many instances of smoothing an unpolished style. Thus in 3^{15ff.} Mark writes καὶ Ἰάκωβον, κ.τ.λ., forgetting that he had added a clause about Peter after (NBC*, etc.) καὶ ἐποίησεν τοὺς δώδεκα (Westcott-Hort insert a bracket in endeavouring to make Mk. grammatical—surely a desperate expedient)—the difficulty disappears in Mt. and Lk.; in 4¹¹ ὁμῖν τὸ μυστήριον δέδοται is awkward—in Mt. and Lk. γνωῖναι is inserted and makes the phrase easy—this probably is not a correction proper, but a case of taking a smoother phrase from the non-Markan source of Mt. and Lk. rather than the rough phrase in Mk. (see § vii. 2 below). Note also 4¹⁵ οὗτοι δὲ εἰσιν οἱ παρὰ τὴν ὁδὸν . . . καὶ θῶν, κ.τ.λ., for οἱ θῶν—simplified in Mt. and Lk.; 4²¹ where ἐρχεται is very awkward—Luke removes it, as also Matthew, who narrates the passage in a different connexion; 4²⁴ βλέπετε τί ἀκούετε—Luke's gloss is πῶς (for τί), doubtless a true one (no parallel in Mt.); 4³¹, anacolouthon, removed in Mt. and Lk., which both insert ἐν λαβῶν ἀνθρώπος, here probably following in preference their non-Markan source (as in 4¹¹); 7¹¹, εἰν εἶπη ἀνθρώπος . . . Κορβάν . . . οὐκέτι ἀφίετε αὐτόν, κ.τ.λ., which is grammatical enough though the sense is rather strained—this is smoothed in Mt. (no parallel in Lk.); 9¹ εἰσὶν τινες ὡδε τῶν ἐστηκότων more awkward than the || Mt. τῶν ὧ. ἐ. or the || Lk. τῶν αὐτοῦ ἐ.; 9¹¹⁻²⁸ ὅτι in the sense 'why?' (i.e. 'how is it that . . .')=Mt. τί or διὰ τί, not in Lk. (so ὅτι in 2¹⁶=Mk. Lk. διὰ τί); 9¹², no δέ corresponding to μέν, καὶ πῶς being used instead—in Mt. the order is inverted and the λέγω δέ provides the requisite antithesis; 9¹¹ ἐν ὄνοματι ὅτι, an awkward phrase for 'because'=Mt. εἰς ὄνομα μαθητοῦ (the converse change would be impossible; Swete finds a classical parallel to Mk. in Thuc. iv. 60; there is no parallel in Lk.); 11³ the words in the best text; 'And straightway he will send (ἀποστέλλει, historic present) him back (παλιν) hither,' are part of the message, but (perhaps as being ambiguous) have been omitted in Lk., and altered in Mt. to a prediction that the owner of the colt would comply with the request; 13¹⁴ βδέλυγμα is made ungrammatically masculine (ἐστηκότα), because it is taken to be a man (the participle corrected in Mt. to ἐστός—Lk. completely different); 13¹⁹, the harsh phrase 'those days shall be tribulation' (softened in AV to 'in those days,' etc.) is altered and smoothed in Mt. and Lk. to 'there shall be,' etc.; 14⁶⁵, the difficult phrase ραπίσμων ἐλαβον is omitted in Mt. and Lk. (the reading of TR ἐβαλλον in Mk. arises partly from confusion of βαλ- and λαβ-, partly from the harshness of the original); 14⁷², the difficult ἐπιβαλὼν ἐκλαειν altered both in Mt 26⁷⁵ and Lk 22⁶² to καὶ ἐξελθὼν ἐξω ἐκλαυσεν πικρῶς, but Westcott-Hort bracket the clause in Lk. as doubtful (it is wanting in some Old Latin MSS)—if it is genuine in Lk. (and it has almost overwhelming attestation) we probably have here a case not of correction proper, but (as before) of both Matthew and Luke preferring their non-Markan source to the ambiguous Mk., which was perhaps misunderstood in early times as much as now; whether it means 'when he thought thereon he wept,' or 'covering his head he wept,' or as D and the Latin, Syrian, Armenian, and other versions have it, 'he began to weep.'

The corrections under this head are most significant, and appear to be conclusive as to the early date of Mk. as compared with the other Synoptics. For no writer, having before him a smooth text, would gratuitously introduce harsh or difficult phraseology, whereas the converse change is natural and common.

(i) We may notice some changes made for greater precision, especially by Luke, who, as one would expect, uses more correct medical language. Cf. Mk 2^{28f.}, Mt 9^{28f.} παραλυτικός=Lk 5^{18f.} παραλελυμένος; Mk 2¹⁷, Mt 9¹² ἰσχύοντες=Lk 5³¹ ὑγιαίνοντες. [In Mk 5⁴²=Mt 9²⁵=Lk 8⁵⁵, Lk. Mk. (not Mt.) add the command to give the maiden something to eat,—cf. Lk 7¹⁵ where Jesus gives the widow's son back to his mother: 'in each case He intimates that nature is to resume its usual course' (Plummer, St. Luke, on 8⁵⁵).

Similar corrections for precision are: Mk 6¹⁴ ὁ βασιλεὺς Ἡρῴδης (cf. 6^{22.26f.})=Mt. Lk. Ἡ. ὁ τετρα-ἄρχης (though Mt. has retained ὁ βασ. in 14⁹); perhaps also 6²² τῆς θυγατρὸς αὐτοῦ Ἡρῴδιάδος if the reading of SBD (so Westcott-Hort) be right, in which case either the girl was not Salome but her half-sister, or perhaps more probably αὐτοῦ is used in a loose way to denote that she was Herod's step-daughter—Mt 14⁶ has ἡ θυγάτηρ τῆς Ἡρῴδιάδος, which is more likely to be the truth (the Markan reading is, however, very doubtful); 1¹⁶ etc., where Mark calls the Lake of Gennesaret 'the sea (θάλασσα) of Galilee' (so Mt.), but Luke always, with his superior nautical knowledge, changes the word to λίμνη; and 15³² which says that 'they that were crucified (pl.) with him reproached him' (so Mt.)—the plural is perhaps used only impersonally, or possibly both robbers began to revile and one repented; but Luke, who had independent knowledge of this incident (for he alone relates the penitence of the robber), emphatically corrects the phrase to εἰς δὲ τῶν κρεμασθέντων κακοῦργων (Lk 23³⁹).

(j) Doubtful cases.—We must finally consider some passages in which it is doubtful whether we must attribute to Mk. priority or posteriority. In Mk 6⁵ we find οὐχ οὗτός ἐστιν ὁ τέκτων; where Mt 13⁵⁵ has ὁ τοῦ τέκτονος υἱὸς and Lk 4²² υἱὸς Ἰωσήφ. Here the correction might be on the part of the First and Third Evangelists, who disliked the name 'the carpenter' being given to Jesus, and the fact that they use different phrases points to the probability that they are not here borrowing from their common source or sources; while the correction might be on the part of Mark, who thought that the phrase 'son of Joseph' might be misunderstood by his readers, inasmuch as they had not the birth-narrative before them to explain it. Origen asserts that 'in none of the Gospels current in the Churches is Jesus Himself ever described as being "the carpenter"' (adv. Cels. vi. 36), and perhaps this reading was not in his copy of Mark—a few authorities now extant have a different phrase (but see Westcott-Hort, Notes on Select Readings, p. 24). If the correction is on the part of the Second Gospel, it is probable that our Markan reading is the work of an editor later than Mt. Lk. (but see § vii. below).—In 14^{30.68.72} the cock is said to crow twice, according to the usually received readings; in Mt. Lk. Jn. only one cock-crowing is recorded. Some MSS omit dis in Mk 14³⁰, many (SBe syr^s sin^l etc.) omit καὶ ἀλέκτωρ ἐφώνησεν in 14⁶⁸, some omit ἐκ δευτέρου in 14⁷², others omit dis in 14⁷². If a second cock-crowing was in the Petrine tradition, it is difficult to understand why the other Evangelists should have so completely omitted all trace of it; but it is equally difficult to understand why, if it belongs to the original Mk., and if that Gospel was later than Mt. and Lk., the Second Evangelist should have introduced it; or again why, if it is an editorial addition to Mk., the editor should have introduced it. Perhaps Dr. Salmon's solution is the right one (Textual Criticism, ch. v.)—that originally Mk. had only one cock-crowing, that of 14⁷² (i.e. not in the same place as in Mt. and Lk.); that the omission of SB, etc., in 14⁶⁸ is right; and that some early scribe having by error put in these words, without intending to introduce two cock-crowings, other scribes added dis and ἐκ δευτέρου in the other places to produce consistency. On the other hand, it must be remembered that the omissions in some MSS of Mk. are easily explicable on the supposition that a harmonizing scribe, not finding two cock-crowings in the other Gospels, omitted these words in Mk.; if this be so, the enigma is inexplicable.—In Mk 14⁵⁸ the words χειροποίητον, ἀχειροποίητον may be a comment of the Evangelist's, the simpler words of Mt 26⁶¹ being what the false witnesses really said (Lk. has no parallel). If so, the Markan form would probably be later than the Matthean (see Schmiedel in Encyc. Bibl. ii. 1851). But the introduction of comments such as these, however much in the style of Mt., is not in that of Mk., and there is no reason why Jesus should not actually have used the words, and, if so, why the false witnesses should not have quoted them; their false testimony lay in giving a wrong sense to our Lord's words, rather than in quoting Him wrongly.

A case of possible correction of Mk. may be briefly noticed here, though it does not concern Mt. or Luke. In 15²⁵ we read that the Crucifixion took place at the third hour; Jn 19¹⁴ says that the trial was hardly over by the sixth hour (ὥρα ἦν ὡς ἕκτη), and this looks like a correction of Mk. as to time. But probably this is no correction, whether we take Westcott's solution that John's 'sixth hour' is our 6 a.m., or that of Ramsay (Expositor, 4th ser. vii. 216, 5th ser. iii. 457) and others that the word 'hour' is used in a loose and ill-defined way, or the more probable and ancient view (Euseb. ad Marin.) that there is an error of the digamma, F (=6) for Γ (=3) or vice versa, in the text of the Gospels. If so, our copies of Jn. are probably wrong, since Mk. has three separate notes of time which hang all together, 15^{1, 25, 33} (see Wright, *Synopsis*², in loc., and New Test. Prob. p. 147).

(k) Conclusion from the evidence.—The detailed comparison of Mk. with Mt. and Lk. leads us to the conclusion that either Mk. as we have it now, or at least a Gospel which differs from our Mk. in unessential particulars only, lay before the First and Third Evangelists when they wrote. If the doubtful cases mentioned above, and the instances given below in § vii., be held to argue the priority of Mt. or Lk. over Mk., that would apply only to editorial additions, and the main conclusion would not be affected. Some of the deductions made above may be questioned, yet the cumulative force of the whole is very great. And a careful study of them will at once dissipate the idea that Mark is an abbreviator of Matthew, and will lead us to the conclusion that here we come much closer to the bed-rock of the Gospel story than in either Mt. or Luke. This is the great value of Mk., and it has been left for modern scholars to discover it.

5. Other characteristics of diction in Mark.—The style of the Second Gospel may be gathered to a large extent from what has preceded. For its Aramaic tinge see below, § v. A few favourite modes of speech remain to be noticed. The use of the historic present is especially common, and this contributes largely to the vividness of the narrative. Yet there is great freedom of tenses; we find changes in the same sentence from a past tense to a historic present, and vice versa. Of a few particles Mark is very fond—e.g. εὐθύς 41 times; πολλά as adverb, 1⁴⁵ 3¹² 5¹⁰. 23. 38. 43 6²⁰ 8¹⁰ 9²⁶ 15³; πάλιν 21. 13 31. 20 etc.; πᾶς is used in exaggeration, e.g. 1⁵ 2¹³; accumulated negatives are common, e.g. 1⁴⁴ 2² 3^{20, 27}. In ch. 4 καὶ ελεγεν or καὶ λέγει is so frequent (8 times) that Swete has raised the question (on 4²¹) whether Mark had before him a number of detached sayings of Jesus which he here introduces.

Our Gospel has about ten somewhat striking words which are, as far as we know, ἀπαξ λεγόμενα in all Greek literature. Such are: ἔννεχα 1³⁵ (cf. πάννηχα—A, etc., have ἔννηχον); ἐπιράπτει 2²¹ (D has ἐπισυνράπτει); σπεκουλάτορα 6²⁷ (see above, § iii. 4 (b)); πυγμῆ as adv. 7³, i.e. 'with arm and elbow' (a late Greek meaning—in classical Greek 'with the fist'), so 'completely' or 'diligently' (D has πυκμῆ, 8 πυκνά 'frequently,' and so several VSS, obviously a correction); ὑπερπερισσῶς 7³⁷ (D has ὑπερεκπ.) and ἐκπερισσῶς 14³¹ (A, etc., have ἐκ περισσοῦ); τηλαυγῶς 8²⁵, i.e. 'clearly, though at a distance' (8* C1 Δ have δηλ.); ἐπισυντρέχει 9²⁵; ἐκφαλίωσαν 12⁴ (v.l. -λαίωσαν), see below, § vii.; προμεμινᾶτε 13¹¹. There are also about 70 other words which occur nowhere else in NT, though many are found in the LXX. This, as compared with the other Gospels, is a small number; Lk. has some 250 words not found elsewhere in NT (see Swete, l.c. p. xlv, for careful lists of words peculiar to Mk., or used by him in common with one or more of the other NT writers).

6. Matter peculiar to Mark.—The Second Gospel relates very few incidents not given, or at least referred to, in Mt. or Luke. We have only one parable peculiar to Mk., that of the seed growing secretly (4^{26ff.}), and only two miracles, the healing of the deaf stammerer (μογγιλᾶτος—the v.l. μογγιλᾶτος, from μόγγος 'thick-voiced,' is not well supported) (7^{31ff.}), and of the blind man at Bethsaida (8^{22ff.}). Other paragraphs peculiar to Mk. are: the questions about the dulness of the disciples when they forgot to take bread (8^{17f.}), and about the disciples disputing (9³³); and the incidents of the young man with the linen cloth (14^{51f.}), of the smiting of Jesus by the servants (ὀπηρέται) of the chief priests (14⁶⁵), and of Pilate's wonder, and his question put to the centurion (15¹⁴). See also § vii. below.

iv. AUTHORSHIP, DATE, AND PLACE OF WRITING.—There is no reason to dispute the Patristic statements (§ ii. above) that Mark, the ὀπηρέτης of Paul and Barnabas (Ac 13⁵) and the disciple of Peter, was the author of the Second Gospel. And there is much probability that the statement of Clement of Alexandria, that Mark wrote in Rome, is correct. We cannot, indeed, argue from the Latinism (see § iii. 4 (f)) that he wrote for the Romans, for these words are probably mere colloquialisms in common use in the whole Empire, and, moreover, the Christian Romans undoubtedly spoke, at least in the ordinary way, Greek and not Latin (see § v. 2). But that it was written for Gentiles appears from the general absence of OT quotations, except when our Lord's words are cited (1^{2f.} is an exception; 15²⁸ must almost certainly be expunged from the text, being omitted by NABC* D k syr^{al} etc.); also from the interpretation of Aramaic transliterations and the explanation of Jewish customs: e.g. 7^{2ff.} (washing of hands, etc.) 12⁴² (two mites making a farthing; and the λεπτόν or half quadrans, being a Jewish coin, has to be explained), 15⁴² ('the Preparation, that is, the day before the sabbath'); from the absence of mention of the Jewish law; and from the geographical description of 13³ ('the Mount of Olives' over against the temple'). Chrysostom's statement (Proem. in Matt.), that Egypt was the place of writing, is negated by the silence of the Alexandrian Fathers Clement and Origen, and is probably a mistaken inference from Eusebius, HE ii. 16, which says that Mark was sent to Egypt and preached there the gospel which he had composed. Some moderns have supposed a double publication, one in Rome and one in Alexandria.

The question of date is more difficult. From internal considerations we should certainly assign an early date to Mk., at any rate before the Fall of Jerusalem. The Discourse on the End (esp. 13^{13ff.} 24. 30. 33) is reported as if the fulfilment were only in prospect, and in a manner that would be hardly possible if the siege of Titus had already taken place. This conclusion becomes still more likely when we compare Mk. with Mt. and Luke. The discourse seems to join together two separate things, the destruction of Jerusalem and the end of the world. All the Synoptics begin with the destruction of the Temple. In Mk. and Lk.

* Mk. uses τὸ ὄρος τῶν Ἐλαιῶν here and in 14²⁶; but in 11¹ we must probably accentuate the last word as oxytone—πρὸς τὸ ὄρος τῶν Ἐλαιῶν (B k r)—i.e. the substantive is Ἐλαιῶν, 'an olive grove' (as in Ac 1¹² ἀπο ὄρους τοῦ καλουμένου Ἐλαιῶνας). See Deissmann, Bibl. Stud. p. 208f., and Swete, St. Mark on 11¹.

follows a discourse which apparently speaks of the destruction of Jerusalem, and then the passage Mk 13³⁴⁻³⁷ seems to refer to the end of the world. But Matthew in his accustomed manner weaves together Jesus' sayings which in the other Evangelists are distinct, and mingles together the two events spoken of. Thus the compiler of the Matthaean discourse (we need beg no question as to authorship) evidently thought that the two events would be synchronous, and therefore must have written his account of the prophecy (not necessarily the whole Gospel) before the Fall of Jerusalem. If so, the Markan discourse is earlier still.

So the reference to the shewbread (2²⁶ οὐκ ἔστι, present) seems to imply that the Temple was at the time of writing still standing, and that the presentation of the shewbread still went on. Also the considerations mentioned above in § iii. 3, 4, as to the description of Jesus' inner feelings, the style and details of the Gospel, point strongly in the same direction. If, again, we were to hold the theory of an Aramaic original (but see § v.), we could hardly avoid supposing a still earlier date.

We have then to consider if the external evidence contradicts the internal. The date of two other NT books affects our judgment. (a) If we adopt the early date for Acts (c. A.D. 62), i.e. if we suppose that St. Luke tells us no more of St. Paul's history after the two years at Rome simply because nothing more at the time of writing had happened, we must assign a still earlier date to Lk., and a fortiori to Mark. There is much to be said for this early date of Acts, though many hold that Lk 21²⁰ ('Jerusalem compassed with armies'), when we compare it with Mk 13¹⁴, Mt 24¹⁵ ('abomination of desolation'), betokens a writing after the event described. (b) Papias by implication, and Irenæus (iii. 1. 1) explicitly, say that Mark wrote after Peter's death (see § ii. above)—Irenæus also asserts that Matthew wrote first—while Clement of Alexandria and Origen say that he wrote in Peter's lifetime. Now, if we take the former statement as true, the date of 1 Peter is a difficulty in the way of accepting the internal evidence for the date of Mark. For we can hardly assign a very early date to it (e.g. 1 P 4¹⁶ 'suffer] as a Christian'). There is no great reason for believing that St. Peter died in the same year as St. Paul, and it is quite possible that he survived him for some considerable time, during which St. Mark acted as his interpreter. The indications of a later date in 1 Peter do not then militate against the Petrine authorship of that Epistle. But if Mark wrote his Gospel after Peter's death, the early date to which the internal evidence leads us becomes difficult. While, therefore, we might have agreed with Swete (St. Mark, p. xi) that the witness of Irenæus and Papias is more probable than that of Clement and Origen, if we had nothing else to go by, yet, in view of the strong internal indications of an early date, we are perhaps led to prefer the Alexandrian view that Mark wrote in the lifetime of Peter. Nevertheless Swete's date, just before A.D. 70, is chronologically possible (the order would then be 1 Peter; death of St. Peter; Mk.), but it allows very little time for the Mt. Discourse on the End to be written. Possibly the theory of a double publication might reconcile the Patristic testimony; but, if so, the second edition probably differed hardly at all from the first (see §§ vi. vii. below).

§ v. THE ARAMAIC CHARACTERISTICS AND ORIGINAL LANGUAGE OF MARK.—The external evidence would not lead us to any other conclusion than that the Greek St. Mark as we have it is an original composition, and not a translation from any Aramaic document. We have, however, to consider a noteworthy phenomenon which the Gospel itself brings out—the strong Aramaic tinge which goes all through it. This tinge has led some to postulate an Aramaic original, and to suppose that the Gospel which we possess is a translation. We may first collect together and comment on instances of this characteristic, and then consider how they bear on the question of the original language.

1. Aramaisms.—A characteristic of Mk. is the retention of several Aramaic words transliterated into Greek. Such are:—βαναργές 3¹⁷ (= בנרג, the o or the a being probably an intrusion in the text, or βανηρογές being perhaps the original reading, see Dalman, Words of Jesus, p. 49, Gramm. d. Jüd.-Pal. Aramäisch, p. 112; the syr^{sin} psh is ܒܢܪܓܝܘܬܝܢ, which the Nestorians pronounce bné rargsh, the Jacobites bné [or bnai?] rghesh, both with mute yudh—for a possible origin of these forms see Burkitt, Evang. da-Mephar. ii. p. 280; the Armenian is 'Banereges'); ταλειθά

κόμ 5⁴¹ (= כומ, syr^{psh} ܟܘܡܐ) with yudh quiescent, syr^{sin} wanting; some Greek MSS read κοῦμη; see also below); κορβάν 7¹¹ (= כרבאן, syr^{sin} ܟܘܪܒܐܢܐ, syr^{psh} ܟܘܪܒܐܢܐ, being the usual Syriac name for the Eucharist); ἑφθαθά 7³⁴ (= פתפפת); ἀββά 14²⁶ (= אבא, again in Ro 8¹⁵, Gal 4⁶, see ABBA). These occur in Mk. only of the Gospels, as does the redundant βαπτίματος (ὁ υἱὸς Τιμαίου Βαρ.) 10⁴⁰ (Mt. Lk. give no name; Bartimæus could not be the blind man's own real name, though he may have been known by it; cf. Barjona, Barabbas). Two others are found also in Mt. and Jn., ῥαββέι Mk 9⁵ 11²¹ 14⁴⁵ (= רבי, syr^{sin} cu psh ܪܒܝܐ), ὠσαννά 11⁹ (= אשננה, syr^{sin} cu psh ܐܘܫܢܢܐ); a third in Jn., ῥαββουεῖ Mk 10³¹ (= רב, syr^{sin} cu psh ܪܒܐܘܝܐ), syr^{cu} wanting in Jn. also, syr^{psh} ܪܒܐܘܝܐ, syr^{hkl} ܪܒܐܘܝܐ, perhaps a diminutive); these three are not found in Luke. The Heb.-Aram.

ἀμήν (אמן, syr ܐܡܝܢ) is retained by all the Evangelists, but much less often by Luke than by the others; note also that Mk 3²⁸ ἀμήν λέγω becomes in Mt 12³¹ διὰ τοῦτο λέγω, and so sometimes elsewhere. The Aramaic Word from the Cross is remarkable, Ἐλωι, Ἐλωι, λαμὰ σαβαχθανεῖ Mk 15³⁴

(ܐܠܘܝܐ ܐܠܘܝܐ ܠܐܡܐ ܣܒܚܬܐܢܝܐ, syr^{sin} psh ܐܠܘܝܐ ܐܠܘܝܐ ܠܐܡܐ ܣܒܚܬܐܢܝܐ) with both yudhs quiescent; vv. ll. are ἡλεί D and some old latt., λεμὰ and ζαφθανεῖ D, zaphhani d, zaphani k). The Divine name here is a Hebraized form of the pure Aramaic ܐܠܗܝܐ (syr.

ܐܠܗܝܐ). Ἐλωι recurs in the NB text of Mt 27⁴⁶ (so Westcott-Hort), but the AV and RV text, following other MSS, have ἡλεί or ἡλι (so syr^{sin} ܐܠܝܐ, syr^{psh} ܐܠܝܐ; syr^{cu} wanting), and this would be a correction by Matthew, or (as Westcott-Hort, Notes, p. 21) by a Matthaean scribe or editor, to suit the Hebrew form אֱלֹהִים, which was no doubt familiar from liturgical worship. This reading is probably confirmed by pseudo-Peter, for it apparently underlies his strange phrase ἡ δύναμις μου, ἡ δ., κατέλειψας με, being mistaken for ܠܝܢܐ (syr. ܠܝܢܐ) 'strength.' The object of the Matthaean correction would be to make it more obvious why the people thought that Elijah was being invoked, the form Ἐλωι being much farther from Ἠλέας than Ἠλεί is; and this consideration would point to our Lord Himself having used the pure Hebrew form of the Divine name rather than the Aramaic.

Certain Aramaic (or Hebrew) proper names should also be noted: Kananaïos 3¹⁸ (so Mt., = Lk.

Ac. Zηλωτής; = Aram. ܩܢܢܝܐ, syr^{sin} ܩܢܢܝܐ; Ἰσκαριώθ 3¹⁹, also -ώτης (so also Mt. Lk.; Heb. שׂכר ܩܝܪܝܐ, syr^{sin} ܩܝܪܝܐ; syr^{cu} ܩܝܪܝܐ in Lk 22³);

Βεελζεβούλ or, as B, Βεεζεβούλ 3²² (so Lk., and so Mt. elsewhere), a word of uncertain meaning, perhaps 'lord of dung' or 'lord of habitation'

(syr^{cu} ܩܢܢܝܐ 'lord of flies'); perhaps

Δαλμανουθά 8¹⁰ (eis τὰ μέρη Δ. = ܩܢܢܝܐ ܩܢܢܝܐ, the second word being inadvertently repeated and the real name being dropped (Harris, Study of Codex Bezae, p. 178; but see Dalman, Words of Jesus, p. 66; D has Μελεγαδά, d Magidan, syr^{sin} ܩܢܢܝܐ, syr^{psb} ܩܢܢܝܐ; in || Mt 15³⁹ the best Greek text has Μαγαδάν, syr^{sin} as above, syr^{cu} ܩܢܢܝܐ, syr^{psb} ܩܢܢܝܐ; Γολγοθάν 15²² NB, etc. (ἐπὶ τὸν Γολ- γοθάν τόπον)=Γολγοθά Mt. Jn. (Mt. Mk. translate it by Κρανίου τόπος, Jn. leaves it without translation, Lk. has Κρανίου only; the Aram. is ܩܢܢܝܐ, syr^{sin}

ܩܢܢܝܐ in Mk. but ܩܢܢܝܐ in Mt., and so syr^{psb} throughout, syr^{sin} is wanting in Jn.; syr^{cu} is wanting in all these places; in Lk. syr^{sin} ܩܢܢܝܐ have

The frequent use of a participle and the substantive verb in Mk. may well be due to Aramaic influence, the Aramaic participle with ܩܢܝܐ, for example, forming an imperfect (see W. C. Allen in Expositor, 6th series, vol. i. p. 436); e.g. 1⁶ ἦν ὁ Ἰωάννης ἐνδεδιμμένος, 1²² ἦν διδάσκων (so Mt.), 1³³ ἐπισημαμένη ἦν, and so 2⁶. 18 5⁶ 9⁴ 10²². 32 13²⁵ 14⁴. 40. 54 15⁷. 26. 43. 46; and in some 'Western' texts of 1³⁹ (ἦν κηρύσσων for ἦλθεν κ.) 2⁴ (ἦν κατακείμενος for κατέκειτο); similarly also perhaps a participle with ἐγένετο, as 9⁸ ἐγένετο στίλβοντα, 9⁷ ἐγ. ἐπισκιάζουσα, both altered in Mt. and Lk.; and so whichever way we read 1⁴ (ἐγένετο Ἰωάννης ὁ βαπτίζων . . . κηρύσσων, v.l. ἐγ. Ἰ. βαπτ. . . . καὶ κηρ., altered in Mt. and Lk.).

The use of some prepositions after verbs, etc., is thought to be due to the same cause (Allen, loc. cit.), as ἔρχεται ὀπίσω 1⁷, ἐν σοὶ εὐδόκησα 1¹¹, πιστεύετε ἐν 1¹⁵, λέγουσι περὶ 1³⁰, ἐσθιει μετὰ 2¹⁶, ταῖα ἀπὸ 5²⁹, ἔπαγε εἰς εἰρήνην 5³⁴, ὑγίης ἀπὸ 5³⁴, διὰ τῶν χειρῶν αὐτοῦ 6² (but the Aramaic would have the singular), ἐλάλησε μετὰ 6⁵⁰, λάβη ἀπὸ 12². Similarly also prepositions repeated after compound verbs, as ἐξελθε ἐξ 1²⁸, and so 1²⁶. 42. 45 2¹ 5². 8. 13. 17 6³⁴ 7¹⁷. 26. 29. 31 9²⁶. 28. 45. 47 10¹⁵ etc.; the suggestion apparently being that these represent Aramaic forms like ܩܢܝܐ, ܩܢܝܐ.

Phrases like δύο δύο 6⁷, συνπόσια συνπόσια 6³⁹, πρασιαὶ πρασιαὶ 6⁴⁰ are Aramaic or Hebrew idioms. Also several other Aramaic phrases have been noted, as 'sons of the bridechamber' 2¹⁹ (so Mt. Lk.), 'sons of men' 3²⁸ (see § vii. 2 below), εἶπε δοθῆναι 5⁴³, μία τῶν σαββάτων 16² (positive for superlative), γίνεται καὶ 2¹⁵ (so Mt., not Lk.), ἐγένετο ἦλθεν 1⁹ (Mk. only); and the indefinite use of εἰς = τῷ (for τῆς) 9¹⁷ 10¹⁷ 12²⁸ 13¹ 14¹⁸. 66 (Allen, loc. cit.). Dalman also has made a collection of Hebraisms and Aramaisms in the Gospels (Words of Jesus, p. 20 ff.), though he considers that they do not constitute a proof of a Hebrew or Aramaic original. Of these the following are found in Mk.:—ἐλθοῦσα redundantly used with a finite verb 7²⁶ (ἐ. προσέ- πεσε); ἀφείλ with a term signifying departure where the idea of 'leaving' is not emphasized 4³⁶ 8¹³ 12¹²; καθήμενον and στήκετε where they are superfluous 2¹⁴ 11²⁵; ἀναστὰς used redundantly 2¹⁴ 7²⁴ 10¹. 50 (AC); 'answer and say' 3³² 7²⁸ 9⁵ 10⁵¹ 11¹⁴ 12³⁵ 15⁹, often when no question has been asked; ἐλάλησεν . . . καὶ λέγει 6⁵⁰ (?); ἤρξατο (-αυτο) with infinitive when nothing follows developing the action, 26 times; εὐθέως or εὐθύς, a favourite form in Mk. (45 times)=Aram. ܩܢܝܐ; the use of πρῶσωπον, not only in a quotation like 1², but in the phrase βλέπετε εἰς πρ. ἀνθρώπων 12¹⁴, and some others.

2. Original language of Mark.—The Aramaic tinge in our Gospel is thought by some, e.g. Blass (Philology of the Gospels, ch. xi.) and Allen (loc. cit.), to show that it was originally written in Aramaic. A large number of the real or alleged Aramaisms given above are found in Mt. and Lk.; but it is argued that as they had ex hypothesi Mk. before them, they merely retained a certain number of the Aramaisms of their source. Moreover, the Aramaisms are found not only in the words of our Lord, in which case they might be explained as being due to the faithful reporting of His ipsissima verba, but also in the framework of the Gospel. On the theory of an Aramaic original, Allen explains the frequent use in Mk. of καὶ as a connecting link (cf. Aram. ܘ), and of five particles constantly used, εὐθύς (see above), πάλιν, δέ, γάρ, ἀλλά, other particles being rare. He also explains the favourite historic present in Mk. as coming from the use of an Aramaic present participle for this purpose. In say' (Nöldeke, Syr. Gramm. § 274, p. 190), except in syr^{hkl}, where it is a literal translation. But in the other Aramaic dialects this usage is not so limited; the idiom is found with other verbs, e.g. in Daniel and Tobit, and its presence in an original Aramaic Mk. would bring us to the frequent historic presents in the Greek Mk. The irregularity noticed above (§ iii. 5) of their being mixed up with past tenses occurs also in Aramaic. It is also thought that the difficult εἰς τριάκοντα καὶ εἰς (v.l. ἐν Westcott-Hort) ἐξήκοντα καὶ εἰς (v.l. ἐν WH) ἑκατὸν in 4⁸ (cf. 4²⁰) is explained by the eis (i.e. eis) representing ܘ, cf. Dn 3¹⁹ (but equally well eis might represent an Aramaic ܘ 'at the rate of'); and that the ἔρχεται of 4²¹ and ἐν ὄψματι ὅτι of 9⁴¹ and ἐπιβαλὼν of 14⁷² (see above, § iii. 4 (h)) come from a mis-translation of some (unknown) Aramaic original. In the JThSt ii. 298, Allen suggests that the word κεφαλῶσαν (12⁴) is due to a confusion of ܩܢܝܐ 'they injured' with ܩܢܝܐ, which would be a puzzle to the translator, who rendered it by this coined word, taking it from Aram. ܩܢܝܐ 'a head.' Similarly, Prof. Marshall (Expositor, 4th series, iv. 377) thinks that Mk 5¹⁰ ἔξω τῆς χώρας and || Lk 8³¹ εἰς τὴν ἄβυσσον (Mt. different) are the result of translations of one Aramaic original, ܩܢܝܐ meaning both 'earth' or 'land' and 'below.'

Blass brings different arguments on the same side. They run in two lines. (a) He suggests that St. Luke in Ac 1-12 used an Aramaic source, while the rest of the book was his own independent work. In these twelve chapters Aramaisms abound, while in the rest of the book they are comparatively scarce; and the style of the twelve chapters is rough as compared with St. Luke's own. Blass conjectures that Mark, who, as son of a prominent Christian lady in Jerusalem, was well fitted for the task, wrote the Aramaic source. [With this we may compare Weiss's idea that Mark ended his Gospel at 16⁸ because he went on to write a second work, which began with the Resurrection appearances]. If so, the first work, i.e. the Gospel, would be in Aramaic. (b) Blass thinks that the various readings in the present MSS of Mk., and those shown by Patristic quotations, are relics of different translations of an original Aramaic.

In reviewing these considerations, we must remark that Dr. Blass's first argument rests on pure conjecture. Why should Mark be the writer of the supposed Aramaic source of Ac 1-12? And if so, why must he have written two books in the same language? He was confessedly bilingual, able to write in both Greek and Aramaic. This argument, then, is a halting one. And the second seems scarcely less precarious. The suggestions of Mr. Allen are more substantial. But these also appear to be inconclusive. They certainly show that the Aramaic tinge, strong in all the Synoptics, is strongest in Mark. But this need mean no more than that Aramaic was St. Mark's native language, that in which he thought, as most of the Palestinian Jews would do. The Greek spoken in Palestine was doubtless saturated with Aramaic forms and idioms, and Mark, whose style is comparatively unpolished, discarded them less than the other Synoptists. The theory of an Aramaic original has some formidable difficulties to overcome. Papias had evidently never heard of any but a Greek Mk., and no ecclesiastical writer suggests that the latter is a translation. The external evidence is all against the hypothesis which we have been examining. But so, also, when we look closely, is the internal evidence. It is true that there are many Aramaisms in Mark. Of these, however, we may dismiss, for our present purpose, the proper names, which would be used in Palestine equally whether an author wrote in Aramaic or in Greek. The influence of Aramaic grammar and diction may also probably be dismissed, seeing that the writer doubtless thought in Aramaic. There remain, then, the suggestions of mistranslation, which, however, are too ingenious for verisimilitude, and the transliterations like Talitha Cumi. But the fact that practically in each case of transliteration a Greek interpretation is added, is fatal to the idea that we have here traces of a conservative translator who incorporated bodily the words which he found in the book before him. As Swete remarks (St. Mark, p. xliii), a translator might have either translated the Aramaic or transliterated it; but transliteration followed by interpretation savours of an original writer. A still more fatal objection is the freshness of the style of our Gospel. Even the best translation loses the individuality of the author. But here we have a book in which the individuality is most strongly marked. It can hardly be a second-hand reproduction of any one's work.

If the Aramaic-original theory be true, we must put back the date considerably, as Mr. Allen (loc. cit.) sees, probably to a date before A.D. 60; and then the Gospel is not likely to have been written in Rome. In this last detail the ecclesiastical testimony is again contradicted by the theory.

There is a line of argument which, though interesting, does not really bear on this question. In 5^d, for ταλειθά or ταλιθά, D has θαβιθά, supported by Old Latin tabitha, or thabitha, or thabita, as if the girl's name were Tabitha (cf. Ac 9²⁰). In a Syriac text the transition from  to  would be easy. The Old Latin MS e has the curious reading 'tabea acultha quod est interpretatum puella puella tibi dico exsurge.' But these variations show nothing as to the original language of Mk.; they show only that D and the Old Latin MSS were directly or indirectly influenced by the Syriac versions (see Chase, Syro-Latin Text of the Gospels, p. 109 f.).

Finally, we must consider the statement of some cursive Greek MSS, that the Gospel was written in Latin (Ῥωμαϊστὶ). They add that it was written in Rome, and this is no doubt the explanation of the other statement. It was supposed that if Rome was the place of writing, the Gospel must have been written in Latin. But this deduction is known to be without warrant. Those in Rome for whom the Gospel was written would speak Greek. St. Paul wrote to the Christian community in Rome in Greek, and St. Clement wrote from Rome in the same language. Further, even a cursory examination of Mk. shows that, whatever it is, it is not a translation into Greek from Latin. Thus this idea may be very briefly dismissed.

vi. THE LAST TWELVE VERSES.—The question of the end of the Gospel is one of great difficulty, whatever view we take of the paragraph which now brings it to a close. An endeavour will be made in this section to state and weigh all the principal arguments; it would seem that neither the supporters nor the impugnors of the present ending have quite done justice to the strength of the arguments on the other side. The facts to be considered are as follows. There are three ways of ending the Gospel. The first, here called the 'Short Ending,' stops at 16⁸ ἐφοβούντο γάρ. The second, here cited as the 'Long Ending,' is that of our ordinary Bibles (16⁹⁻²⁰), the last twelve verses. But there is also a third, here called the 'Intermediate Ending,' which runs as follows: πάντα δὲ τὰ παρηγγελμένα τοῖς περὶ τὸν Πέτρον συντόμως ἐφήγγειλαν. μετὰ δὲ τὰυτὰ καὶ αὐτὸς ὁ Ἰησοῦς [ἐφάνη αὐτοῖς καὶ] ἀπὸ ἀνατολῆς καὶ ἄχρι δύσεως ἐξαπέστειλεν δι' αὐτῶν τὸ ἱερὸν καὶ ἀφθαρτὸν κήρυγμα τῆς αἰωνίου σωτηρίας. 'And they immediately (or briefly) made known all things that had been commanded (them) to those about Peter. And after this Jesus himself [appeared to them and] sent out by means of them from the East even to the West the holy and incorruptible preaching of the eternal salvation.' This ending is found in four minor uncials, L (Codex Regius, 8th cent.), ¹² (Fragmentum Sinaiticum, 7th cent.), ⁵ (Fragm. Parisiense, 8th cent.), and ^Ψ (Codex Athous Laurae, 8th or 9th cent.), in all of them as an alternative to the Long Ending, though it would appear that the archetype of the first three, at any rate, ended at 16⁸. The Intermediate Ending is also found in the Old Latin k, standing alone, in several MSS of the Ethiopic prefixed to the Long Ending, and in the margin of syr^{hkl}, of two Bohairic MSS, and of a cursive Greek MS. No one maintains its genuineness; it is clearly written as an end to the Gospel, and is not an independent fragment. It is probably due to an early scribe, who wrote it either because he had before him the Long Ending and objected to it, or because he had before him the Short Ending and thought it abrupt. Swete (St. Mark, p. cviii) conjectures that he was a Western, because of the emphasis laid on the West. Nestle makes him an Egyptian, without giving reasons (Hastings' DB iii. 13). Dobschütz (TU xi. 1, p. 73 f., quoted by Swete) thinks that the ending is part of the 'Preaching of Peter'; but the internal evidence is against this (see above). It is not found in any of the Fathers. Its presence, however, bears materially on the whole question. The only variation in the readings that need be mentioned is that ἐφάνη αὐτοῖς καὶ, which the sense clearly demands, is omitted by L⁷, αὐτοῖς καὶ is omitted by ^Ψ, and καὶ by all the Greek codices,—it has to be supplied from the versions.

The Short Ending is found in NB, syr^{sin}, and also in the oldest MSS of the Armenian and Ethiopic versions. Eusebius says (ad Marin. Quæst. 1, vol. 4) that the Long Ending was not in the 'accurate copies' of his day; later writers copy Eusebius, and do not add to our knowledge. Tertullian, Cyprian, Athanasius, and Cyril of Jerusalem are silent about the Long Ending; and this would be very significant if it were not that Cyril of Alexandria and Theodoret are also silent, though they must have known verses which were in wide circulation in their time. Here we must note, further, that the fact that the Short Ending could scarcely have been the original close of the Gospel (see below), is no argument for the genuineness of the other two extant endings.

The Long Ending is found in practically all the authorities except those mentioned above—in almost all the uncials and cursives, the lectionaries, in the great majority of versions. It is explicitly quoted by Irenæus as a genuine part of Mk. (iii. 10. 6: 'in fine autem evangelii ait Marcus, Et quidem Dominus Jesus,' etc. = Mk 16¹⁹). It is also probably referred to by Justin (Apol. i. 45: ἐξεληθέντες πανταχοῦ ἐκήρυξαν = Mk 16²⁰); possibly by 'Barnabas' (xv. 9, φανερωθεὶς ἀνάβη εἰς οὐρανοῦς; cf. Mk 16¹⁴ ἐφανερῶθη) and Hermas (Sim. ix. xxv. 1, 2; cf. Mk 16¹⁵). But these last two cases are quite uncertain, and there is no evidence at all that any Father before Irenæus knew these verses as part of the Gospel; they may have known them from some other writer. Dr. Salmon argues with some force (Introd., appendix to Lect. ix.) that though NB have not got these verses, yet in this part they are copied from one archetype which probably did contain them. The scribes seem to have purposely omitted something which was in the archetype, leaving a blank or distending the writing, and that something must have been of about the same length as the Long Ending. Salmon conjectures that the scribes of N and B were of the school of Eusebius, and that they left out these verses, though they had them in their original, because Eusebius disapproved of them. No writer before Eusebius is known to have rejected them, and their presence in all later MSS shows that the successors of Eusebius, in spite of his great authority, did not follow his judgment in the matter. If, however, Salmon's argument on this part of the subject is sound, and if NB when cross-examined give evidence, as he says, for the disputed ending and not against it, yet the absence of the ending in syr^{sin} and in Eusebius' 'more accurate copies' remains a stumbling-block to accepting the further inference that the Long Ending is genuine. Mr. F. C. Conybeare has suggested (Expositor, 4th series, viii. 241) that these verses are the work of the Aristion mentioned by Papias as one of our Lord's disciples. In an Armenian MS. of the Gospels written A.D. 936 (only discovered in 1891), the Long Ending is said to be 'of the presbyter Aristion,' and it is not unreasonable to understand Aristion to be meant, the iota having fallen in transcription into Armenian. But the evidence is too late to be of much worth.

The internal evidence is important. It is freely admitted by the supporters of the Long Ending that its style and vocabulary are entirely different from those of the main part of the Gospel; and this consideration is decisive against the authorship being the same. But this does not at once bring us to a solution of all our difficulties. As far as style goes, it does not necessarily follow that the Long Ending is not by St. Mark. Salmon (loc. cit.) suggests that our Second Gospel is, in its present form, the latest of the Synoptics, St. Mark having, indeed, followed the written Petrine tradition more faithfully than the others, and having incorporated it in his Gospel almost in its own words, prefixing 1¹⁻¹⁵ and adding 16⁹⁻¹², inserting also various editorial touches (for which see § vii. 2 below). Certainly both the first fifteen and the last twelve verses of our Gospel show the same system of summarizing events,—Salmon suggests that it was these two passages which led Augustine to call Mark an abbreviator of Matthew,—and so far they might be by the same author. Yet the style of the 'preface' and that of the 'appendix' are not similar. A greater objection to this view is that it supposes in reality a Peter-Gospel not written by St. Mark; but ecclesiastical writers never represent St. Peter as writing a Gospel, either by himself or by any scribe or 'interpreter' except St. Mark. For we notice that this theory will not bear the weight of the additional hypothesis (not Salmon's), that St. Mark wrote a first edition, perhaps at Rome, and afterwards a later one, with added matter, perhaps at Alexandria. The style-argument is decisively against this; moreover, some traces of the original ending would have survived, and the Church to which he gave his first edition would have preserved the words with which that edition closed.

There is one consideration which seems to the present writer decisive against Dr. Salmon's view. The Long Ending could not, like the Intermediate one, have been written—whether by Mark or by another—expressly to finish the Gospel left unfinished at 16⁸. For the beginning of v.⁹ is not continuous with v.⁸. The subject of ἐφάνη had evidently been indicated in the sentence which had preceded; yet the necessary 'Jesus' cannot be understood from anything in v.⁸. Further, Mary Magdalene is introduced in v.⁹ as a new person,—she is indicated as one παρ' ἧς ἐκβεβλήκει ἐπὶ τὰ δαιμόνια,—though she had just been mentioned by name in 15⁴⁰⁻⁴⁷ 16¹, and though she was one of the women spoken of throughout the eight verses preceding the Long Ending. This paragraph, then, must be a fragment of a larger work, and could not have been composed on purpose to end the Gospel. It is, indeed, too much to say that it is a summary of events of the Forty Days, complete in itself, but at least it fits very badly on to the rest of the Gospel.

The presence of the Intermediate Ending also militates against the last twelve verses being the work of St. Mark. It shows that in very early times, how early we cannot say, these verses were not unanimously received. The evidence of Irenæus, however, shows that they were adopted as an ending to the Gospel not later than the middle of the 2nd century.

We must probably, then, dismiss the idea that either the Long or the Intermediate Ending was the work of the Second Evangelist. We have, however, still to consider the problem suggested by the Short Ending.

It is inconceivable that 16⁸, with its abrupt and inauspicious ἐφοβοῦντο γάρ, could possibly be the end of a Gospel; indeed, it seems to stop in the middle of a sentence. Against this it is said that abrupt terminations are not unknown in Greek literature (see Salmon in Hastings' DB iii. 253). Yet in this case such an idea is hardly tenable. It is very unlikely that the Gospel should deliberately end without any incident of the risen life of our Lord and with a note of terror. We have therefore to suppose a lost ending; and the difficulty of accounting for its total disappearance is the strongest argument of the supporters of the last twelve verses. It is not sufficient to pass it by, as is often done by those who impugn them, as a matter of little importance.

It is suggested that the last leaf of the original was early lost, and that the other extant endings were supplied to take its place. The last leaf of a MS is undoubtedly the very one which is most likely, after much use, to disappear. Dr. Salmon points out (loc. cit.) that this idea is based on the supposition that the original completely disappeared. The hypothesis of a lost leaf would account for a partial circulation of shorter copies, but for the complete disappearance of the old ending only if it was Mark's own autograph that lost its leaf before any copy was made from it. But it is difficult to suppose that only one MS of the Gospel existed in Mark's lifetime, and that his autograph was not copied till he died; and if the leaf fell in Mark's lifetime before the autograph was copied, why did not Mark write another?

There is an equal difficulty in the kindred supposition that the Gospel was left accidentally unfinished at 16⁸. Salmon asks why, if Mark died before completing his work, the disciple who gave the work to the world did not add a suitable ending, as Tertius added something to Romans (16²²), and the presbyters (probably) to the Fourth Gospel (Jn 21²⁴)? If suitable endings were added afterwards, why not at the time when the Gospel was first published? And this supposition is against the ecclesiastical testimony, which makes Mark finish his Gospel, and in some cases makes him take it to Egypt.

It cannot be said that these difficulties have been very satisfactorily met. Perhaps in our present state of knowledge the best solution of them is that of Dean Armitage Robinson, who suggests (Study of the Gospels, p. 5) that the Second Gospel was not highly esteemed in the 2nd cent., and that all copies perished but one, which lost its leaf. We know that the Gospel was neglected later on (see above, § ii.), chiefly on account of its shortness, and because it apparently adds little to our information. This may well have been the case early in the 2nd cent.; and if that be so, the circulation of it would not have been nearly so large as that of the other Gospels. It is not, however, necessary to put the loss of the leaf so late. The same state of things might well have existed immediately after St. Mark's death.

The difficulties on neither side can be neglected. But our verdict must be given after weighing probabilities, and to the present writer they seem overwhelmingly to preponderate against the Marcan authorship of the last twelve verses, or even against their being a real ending of the Gospel at all. But they are, nevertheless, like the Pericope Adulteræ, an exceedingly ancient and authoritative record of the words and deeds narrated in them.

VII. IS OUR SECOND GOSPEL THE ORIGINAL WHICH LAY BEFORE THE FIRST AND THIRD EVANGELISTS?—Those who in the present day answer this question in the negative usually take a different line from that taken by Baur and his school. They regard our present canonical Gospel as an edited and augmented form of the original, yet as retaining almost all the characteristic features of that original. This hypothesis is much more tenable than the Tübingen theory, which made all our Synoptic Gospels 2nd cent. productions, and held that the Mk. known to Papias was not our Mk., but something entirely different. These two hypotheses are, in reality, inconsistent, and must be considered separately. [For an attempt partially to combine them see Sanday's Gosp. in Sec. Cent. v. 2, written in 1876, and not since reprinted. It is not known if Dr. Sanday would still maintain the opinions which he then held].

1. Baur, Schleiermacher, Wendt, Davidson, Renan, and others substantially agree in holding the latter hypothesis. Papias says that St. Mark wrote Christ's words and deeds 'accurately' but 'not in order' (see above, § ii.). From this it is concluded that the Mk. of Papias ('Ur-Marcus') was not written 'in order,' but was a disjointed collection of speeches and anecdotes; and, further, was not a Gospel in our later sense of the word, but something of the nature of the Clementine Homilies, a record of the sayings and teachings of Peter. Again, Papias says that Matthew composed the 'oracles' (λόγια) in the Hebrew language, and each one interpreted them (ἠρμήνευσεν, aorist—the interpreting did not go on in Papias' own day) as he could. We need not here discuss the question of the original language of Mt., but the argument which we are now considering is that, whereas our present Gospels resemble one another in general plan, and to a great extent in detail, the Mt. of Papias was very different from his Mk., the former being a collection of discourses, the latter a narrative of the words and deeds of Christ. Renan (Vie de Jésus, p. xxii) supposes that Matthew wrote the discourses and Mark the anecdotes about Christ, and that by assimilation our present Mt. and Mk. took their shape, the former assimilating the anecdotes and adding them to the discourses, the latter adopting the reverse process. A further argument on the same side has been drawn from the evidence of Justin Martyr (see above, § ii.), who constantly quotes the Evangelic narrative, but in words that in many cases differ from our canonical Synoptics, so that if he had the latter before him, we cannot always be sure which he is quoting; we need not here consider whether he used the Fourth Gospel. The conclusion which at one time used to be drawn from Justin's quotations, and from his mentioning one or two things not found in the canonical texts, e.g. that Christ was born in a cave, and that the Magi came from Arabia, was that he used Gospels different from those which we now have. Perhaps also we should insert under this head the fact that a comparatively long section in Mk. (6⁴⁵-8³⁶) is omitted by Luke, from which it is argued by some that Luke's Mk. was not the same as our own. It is also argued that the records of the Two Feedings show that our Mk. is a compilation from two separate originals, one of which narrated the feeding of the 5000, the other of the 4000, and that it cannot be the work, directly or indirectly, of an eye-witness.

When we consider these arguments, we are struck by the fact that they assume several disputable points. It is not at all clear that Papias meant that his Mk. was an unconnected collection of anecdotes; it is quite as probable that he meant that he did not approve of the chronological order of Mk.; and, as we have seen (§ ii.), St. Luke was perhaps of the same opinion. It is also assumed as obvious that Papias meant only 'discourses' by λόγια. Certainly that is the primary meaning of the word. But its use in the sense of 'oracles,' i.e. the inspired Scriptures, is quite common in early Christian times. In Ro 3² τὰ λόγια τοῦ Θεοῦ may, indeed, refer only to God's sayings (as Sanday-Headlam, in loc.; see also Sanday, Gosp. in Second Cent. p. 155), but it is more natural to refer it to the whole of OT. Sanday-Headlam remark that from the time of Philo onwards the word was used of any sacred writing, whether discourse or narrative. Thus, then, we cannot assume without argument that Papias meant only discourses by λόγια. Eusebius (HE iii. 39) tells us that Papias' own work was called λογίων κυριακῶν ἐξηγήσεις (v.l. ἐξηγήσεις), and Papias clearly did not deal only with our Lord's sayings. It is at least quite possible that Papias uses the word λόγια as equivalent to our 'Gospel' (so Westcott, Canon, p. 80 n.; Lightfoot, Ess. on Sup. Rel. pp. 155 n., 171 f.). If so, the argument from the dissimilarity of Papias' Mt. and Mk. breaks down. But even supposing (as living scholars are more willing to grant than were Lightfoot and Westcott) that λόγια in Papias means 'discourses,' his words do not necessarily mean that Matthew wrote sayings only; and we shall be led to the contrary opinion by a great difficulty that meets the hypothesis in question at the outset. There was no time for the process imagined by Renan to take place. Such a process would take a very much longer time in its development than can by any possibility be allowed. And a fatal objection to the hypothesis is that the result would not be that which as a matter of fact has taken place. We should have had a great number of variant Gospels, and the earlier the copies the greater would have been the variations. We should have had no certainty as to which Gospel could rightly claim any given incident, and there would have been in an aggravated form the textual conditions that we find in the case of the Pericope Adulteræ, which appears sometimes in one Gospel and sometimes in another. In reality the four Gospels are perfectly distinct, and have been so as far back as we have any copies of them, the earliest MSS showing as distinct a division between them as the later ones (see Salmon, Introd. Lect. vii.; Lightfoot, op. cit. p. 172 ff.). Justin Martyr tells us that the 'memoirs of the Apostles' (i.e. the Gospels) were read at Christian worship in his time (Apol. i. 67). If the Gospels then read were our canonical Gospels, there is not sufficient time between Papias and Justin for such a revolution to have taken place as is supposed. If, on the other hand, Justin used the supposed 'original Matthew' and 'original Mark,' there is not time between him and Irenæus for the same thing to have happened. As a matter of fact, it is now generally held that Justin knew at least our Synoptic Gospels. This does not mean that he had no other sources of information, such as oral tradition, or even that he did not borrow from an 'apocryphal' Gospel; the 'cave' at Bethlehem, for example, may well have come from some one or other of such sources. But a careful analysis of his quotations from OT shows that he varies from the true text in these quite as much as in his Gospel quotations; and most of the variations probably arise from his trusting to memory. The difficulty of turning to a manuscript without divisions, even for words, is so great, that the memory would be trusted in a far greater degree than with us who have printed Bibles. And, as we should have conjectured, Justin is much more accurate in his longer quotations, where he would be obliged to refer to his manuscript, than in his shorter ones, where it would be less necessary to do so (see, further, Sanday, Gospels in Second Cent. ch. ii.; Salmon, Introd. Lect. vi.). Moreover, we may remark that an 'original Mark' could not have disappeared without leaving any trace; we should have found some quotations from it, or some reference to its being dispossessed by a more modern successor. And the autoptic argument (above, § iii. 2) comes in here with overwhelming force. Our Mk. could not have had its fresh, lifelike character, its evidence of first-hand knowledge, if Renan's idea were true.

The argument from the omission by Luke of a Markan section is inconclusive. He had a long section to introduce (§ iii. 4 (a) above), and it was natural for him to omit something, to make room for his new matter. The section of Mk. is found, in the same order, in Mt., and therefore, if this argument held good, it would be necessary to suppose that, while Luke used an 'original Mark,' the First Evangelist used our present one. Also, two incidents in this section are referred to shortly in Lk., the seeking of a sign and the leaven of the Pharisees (Lk 11^{16, 29} 12¹). The conclusion from 'doublets' is very insecure. There is no reason why there should not have been two Feedings.

2. The hypothesis that our present Mk. is an 'edited' form of the Gospel which was used by Matthew and Luke, is in reality quite different from that which has just been considered. For it supposes that our Second Gospel is very like the original, differing from it only by the insertion of a few editorial touches, at the most by the addition of a few paragraphs; whereas the other hypothesis supposes our Mk. to be entirely different from the original Gospel. Dr. Salmon proposes one form of the hypothesis which we have now reached (Introd. Lect. ix. s.f.). He suggests that our Second Gospel is at once the oldest and the youngest of the three Synoptics; the oldest as giving most nearly the very words in which the Apostolic traditions were delivered, the youngest as respects the date when the independent traditions were set in their present framework. This opinion is largely influenced by his view that the Long Ending is really Markan (see above, § vi.). He supposes that Mark added, besides the first fifteen and the last twelve verses, some other slight portions; and that the remarks about unbelief 3⁶ 6⁵², which are not found in the other Synoptics, are by the writer of the Long Ending (cf. 16^{11, 12}), i.e. by St. Mark, as the editor of the Petrine Tradition. From an opposite standpoint, Schmiedel (Encyc. Bibl. ii. 1844, 1848, 1850 f.) thinks that the canonical Mk. is a later edition, and that several things in it are 'secondary' to Mt. and Luke. One leading consideration urged by him (also by Sanday, Gosp. in Second Cent. v. § 2, p. 149) is that Mt. and Lk. often agree against Mk.; therefore, unless the First Evangelist knew the Third Gospel, or the Third Evangelist the First (both of which suppositions are confessedly improbable), they must have had a form of Mk. which is not ours. But this assumes too much; it supposes that the First and Third Evangelists had no other source (besides Mk.) than a collection of discourses, i.e. that the 'non-Markan document' could not have been a history parallel to Mark. As Schmiedel himself rightly says, this assumption is not necessarily true. But if so, his argument, given above, has little weight. There is no reason why Mt. and Lk. should not have got their agreements as against Mk. from the non-Markan source. There is no reason to believe that the latter carefully avoided everything contained in the Petrine tradition; and if it included some things which were in that tradition, there is no reason why Matthew and Luke should not sometimes have followed it in preference.

As this question of agreement of Mt. and Lk. against Mk. is of great importance in forming a judgment about the Second Gospel, it is necessary to consider some details. As examples, it will suffice to give instances from the first few chapters: Mk 1⁸ πνεύματι ἀγίῳ = Mt. Lk. πν. ἀγ. καὶ πυρὶ; 1³¹, Mt. inserts ἡγέρθη καὶ, Lk. ἀναστᾶσα; 1⁴⁰ and 2³, Mt. Lk. insert (but in different ways) ἰδοῦ; 2³ φέροντες, Mt. Lk. insert (but in different ways) ἐπὶ κλίνης; 2¹² ἐξῆλθεν ἐμπροσθεν πάντων = Mt. Lk. ἀπήλθεν εἰς τὸν οἶκον αὐτοῦ; ἢ. ἐξίστασθαι = Mt. ἐφοβήθησαν = Lk. ἐπλήθησαν φόβου; 2²² ὁ οἶνος ἀπόλυται, κ.τ.λ., Mt. inserts ἐκχείται, Lk. ἐκχυθήσεται, and both transpose ἀπόλλ. ; ἢ. ἀλλ' οἶνον νόον, κ.τ.λ., Mt. inserts βάλλουσι, Lk. βλητέον, but both come from the βάλλει (Mt. βάλλουσι) which had just preceded; 3^{18a}, Mt. Lk. insert 'his brother' (Mt. nominative, Lk. accusative), and both transfer Andrew to a place just after Peter; 3²³, Mt. inserts εἰδὼς δὲ τὰς ἐνθυμήσεις αὐτῶν, Lk. αὐτὸς δὲ εἰδὼς αὐτῶν τὰ διανοήματα; 4¹, Mt. Lk. insert γυνῶναι (see above, § iii. 4 (h)); 4³¹, Mt. Lk. insert ἐν λαβῶν ἄνθρωπος; 5²⁷ ἤφατο τοῦ ἰματίου αὐτοῦ, Mt. Lk. insert τοῦ κρασπέδου. The other chapters give similar results; e.g. Mk 14⁶⁵, Mt. Lk. insert τίς ἐστίν ὁ παῖσας σε; 14⁷², Mt. and (?) Lk. insert καὶ ἐξελεθὼν ἐξω ἐκλανσεν πικρῶς (but see § iii. 4 (h) above). These changes, or most of them, could not, as Sanday (loc. cit.) points out, have been accidental. The same cannot be said of the great majority of the instances often quoted of supposed agreement of Mt.-Lk. against Mk.; most of them are so minute and unimportant that they do not argue any common bond between the First and Third Evangelists except common sense.

Now, the argument which we are considering suggests that these inserted phrases were originally in Mk., but were omitted or altered by a later editor. Is this in the least probable? There is no reason that we can conceive why they should have been omitted or altered. In some cases it is most improbable that anything of the kind should have happened, for it would mean the introduction by a later editor of harsh or difficult phrases not found in Mt. or Lk. (see § iii. 4 (h) above). On the other hand, the theory that the non-Markan source or sources used by Matthew and Luke contained narrative as well as discourses has all the marks of probability, to put the matter at the lowest. See, for example, the non-Markan paragraphs collected in the second division of Wright's Synopsis, which contains the narratives of the Temptation and of the Baptist's preaching; and there are many others. If this be the case, the result is exactly what we should expect. Matthew and Luke sometimes follow Mark rather than the non-Markan source; sometimes one follows the one and the other the other; and sometimes both follow the non-Markan source. Probably no one would have thought otherwise but for presuppositions founded on the λόγια sentence of Papias.

But Schmiedel (loc. cit.) finds in certain passages indications of our Mk. being 'secondary' to Mt. and Luke. Such are 3²⁸ πάντα ἀφεθήσεται τοῖς υἱοῖς τῶν ἀνθρώπων, where || Mt 12³¹ has ἀνθρώποις, but goes on to say: 'Whosoever shall speak a word against the Son of Man, it shall be forgiven him.' The supposition is that the editor of our Mk. did not like this latter phrase, which had been common to Mt. and the original Mk., and omitted it, but kept the words 'Son of Man' by altering the ἀνθρώποις of Mt. to τοῖς υἱοῖς τῶν ἀνθρώπων. It seems much more probable that Matthew got the additional sentence from the non-Markan source; and Mark's 'sons of men' as equivalent to 'men,' a common Semitic idiom, is on a par with his other Aramaisms (see § vi. above). In 7²⁷ occurs a phrase, 'Let the children first be filled,' which is not in Mt., and is thought by Schmiedel to be an insertion in our Mk., showing 'some aversion to Jewish particularism,' as toning down our Lord's answer. Yet Mt 8¹¹ shows much more 'aversion.' In 9¹ the phrase 'the kingdom of God come (ἐλθῆναι)' in (with) power' is thought to be a correction of 'the Son of man coming (ἐρχόμενον) in his kingdom,' Mt 16²⁸, as postponing the Parousia, which the result showed to be not so near as was at first believed. Here Luke (9²⁷) has 'the kingdom of God' simply, which at least shows no priority to Mark. It is much more likely that 'the kingdom of God,' with or without the addition 'come in (with) power,' was our Lord's own phrase, and that Matthew, as is his wont, gives the explanation, no doubt prompted by the belief of the first age that Jesus would return in the lifetime of those 'standing here' (see Sanday in Hastings' DB ii. 635). The awkward turn of the wording in 9¹, used above (§ iii. 4 (h)) as an indication of Mk.'s priority, Matthew smoothing down an awkward phrase, is held by Schmiedel to show our Mk.'s 'secondary' character; he thinks that our Mk. has introduced a 'sense-destroying parenthesis'—surely a very strange thing for an editor to do, whatever an original author might have done. In 11²⁵ we find ὁ πατήρ ὑμῶν ὁ ἐν τοῖς οὐρανοῖς (where || Mt. has ὁ π. ὁ οὐράνιος), the only Markan instance (perhaps 11²⁶ of TR is an interpolation) of an express characteristic of Mt., and it is thought to be an editorial addition. This argument, however, would necessitate the supposition that the first clause of the Lord's Prayer, as given in Mt., was an invention of the First Evangelist, which is very unlikely. It is true that the shorter or Lukan form shows much of Luke's style, and some of the differences between it and the Matthean form seem to be due to Luke himself (see Plummer on Lk 11¹), the Matthean form being probably nearer the original; and Dr. Chase supposes that the first Christians adapted the prayer for liturgical use (TS, Camb., i. 3). But it is quite unnecessary to suppose that the phrase 'Our Father which art in heaven' was first found in Matthew. From Mark's account of the Wicked Husbandmen (12²⁷), where one messenger is mentioned on each occasion, and then, 'in a quite unnecessary and even disturbing manner,' many others, Schmiedel argues the priority of Mt., where several servants are sent on each occasion. It is hard to see any force in this. Matthew is as likely to have corrected Mark (if it be a correction) as our Mk. to have introduced a gratuitous inconsistency (if it be an inconsistency) under the influence of Matthew. In the discourse on the Coming of the Son of Man, after the account of the afflictions, Mk 13²⁴ has: 'In those days, after that tribulation, the sun shall be darkened,' while || Mt. has 'immediately after,' etc. This is said to show the posteriority of a supposed Markan editor who desires to postpone the Parousia, as in the case of 9¹ (above); but as there, so here, it is more probable that Matthew's εὐθέως is an explanation, and Mark's ἐν ἐκείναις ταῖς ἡμέραις is our Lord's own phrase, or nearly so.

Thus, although there is nothing in the nature of things why our Second Gospel should not be an edited form of the original document that lay before Matthew and Luke, the reasons alleged by Schmiedel will hardly convince us that this is the case. Salmon's argument really depends on the view taken of the last twelve verses (see above, § vi.). If on other grounds we believe them to be by the writer who put our Second Gospel into its present shape, then we may accept his theory; but if otherwise, the theory falls.

If, however, we were to accept the hypothesis of a later editor, it would be of interest to trace the portions due to him. We may put aside Dr. Salmon's suggestion (see above) of 11¹⁵ 3⁵ 6⁵ 52 16⁹, unless we accept the appendix as a real ending to the Gospel. But we might hold that several paragraphs peculiar to Mk. are due to this supposed editor; such as 3^{19b}, 20, 21 (accusation of madness by Jesus' friends: though here we might equally hold that the omission in Mt. and Lk. is due to the same feeling as in § iii. 3 above), 4²⁶⁻²⁹ (the seed growing secretly), 7³¹ (explanation about washings), 7³²⁻³⁷ (the healing of the deaf μουχῶλος), 8²²⁻²⁶ (the blind man of Bethsaida), 14⁵¹ (the young man who fled naked), 15²¹ (the names Alexander and Rufus). It might also be thought that the Aramaisms and Latinisms were due to such an editor (but see above, §§ iii. 4 (f), (g), v.). These are points which are peculiar to our Gospel.

But a consideration which militates against such a large amount of editing is that our Mk. retains at once the original roughness and the original freshness of style. If the canonical Mk. is later than and influenced by Mt. and Lk., why did not its editor correct the mistakes and prune the vulgarisms and roughnesses as did Matthew and Luke? While, however, this seems to forbid the idea of any large amount of editing, it is certainly possible that a later editor has introduced a few phrases. Sir J. Hawkins (Hor. Synopt. p. 110) suggests the following as additions: 1¹ Ἰησοῦ Χριστοῦ [also υἱοῦ Θεοῦ?], 5¹³ ὡς διαχίλιοι, 6³⁷ δηρῶν διακοσίων, 8³⁵ καὶ τοῦ εὐαγγελίου, 9⁴¹ ὅτι Χριστοῦ ἐστὶ

(but see above, § iii. 4 (h)), 10²⁹ καὶ ἔνεκεν τοῦ εὐαγγελίου, 10³⁰ μετὰ διωγμῶν, 14⁵ ἐπάνω θηραρίων τριακοσίων, 14⁵⁶ καὶ ἴσαι αἱ μαρτυρίαι οὐκ ἦσαν, and so in 14⁵⁹. But even this hypothesis is not necessary; and on the whole the more probable solution seems to be that our Second Gospel is that which was used by the First and Third Evangelists; in fact, that Mark wrote first of all the Four, and that his work was known to the others.

MARKET, MARKET-PLACE (ἀγορά).—1. Locality and appearance.—The landscape of Palestine was characterized by the number of its villages and the absence of isolated dwelling-houses on the cultivated lands. This was due to the joint ownership and tillage of the village fields and to the importance of living together for common safety. The Oriental always lived in the midst of neighbours (Lk 15⁶⁻⁹), and sought his home in 'a city of habitation' (Ps 107³⁶). The Palestine village had a path of communication leading through it to other villages, and this thoroughfare, or the widest and most central part of it, became the market-place. A few small shops opened upon the roadway representing the simple village traffic in food and clothing, and the manual skill of the carpenter and the blacksmith. In the larger towns the single shop of a kind became a street, row, or enclosed square devoted to the manufacture and sale of particular articles, each being thus known as the fruit-market, the shoe-makers' street, or the khan of the silver-smiths (Jer 37²¹, Jn 5²).

2. Uses and associations.—Beside the fountain or large tree of the market-place to which the village often owed its name and choice of locality, muleteers and other travellers rested their baggage animals, and told of what had happened by the way. There the elders of the village could be met with (Ac 16^{19, 20}), and the children naturally collected and played where there was most to be seen and heard (Lk 7³²). In the market-place, day-labourers gathered at dawn from different quarters and waited to be engaged (Mt 20³). There men met and greetings were exchanged, a scale of distinction being carefully observed, from the recognition accorded to equals and neighbours up to the salutation offered to those whom it was prudent or becoming to hold in honour on account of seniority, family connexion, worldly prosperity, or religious position (Mt 23⁷, Lk 11⁴⁸). On account of the coming and going of strangers and the importation of foreign wares, the Pharisee washed his hands on returning from the market, as he might have unavoidably or inadvertently touched something that was classified as defiling, or that had itself previously come into contact with what imparted such ceremonial defilement (Mk 7⁴).

3. In Gentile towns.—Under the Græco-Roman influences the market-place of an Oriental city became a broad paved way, with a colonnade on each side marking off two side-walks for foot-passengers. Such was the agora of Ephesus (Ac 16¹⁹ 17¹⁷), leading in a direct line, with branching side streets of the ordinary kind, from the canal quay to the amphitheatre at the other end. The street called 'Straight' (9¹¹) in Damascus was thus laid out. In Rome, the Forum was a similar localizing of trade and municipal business.

MARRIAGE (I.).—1. Oriental estimate of marriage.—Of the three great events in family life—birth, marriage, and death—that of marriage was rendered important by the amount of consideration devoted to the choice of son-in-law or daughter-in-law, to the settlement of the customary financial conditions, and to the arrangements connected with the wedding festivities. It was recognized as a step leading to grave consequences, for, in the case of a daughter, if the marriage should prove unsatisfactory, she would likely return to her former home discredited and unhappy, and there would be a feeling of irritation and injustice between the families concerned. An almost equal anxiety attended the arrival of the young wife to live with her husband's parents, and to perform her duties under the often exacting superintendence of her mother-in-law. In a decision thus affecting the whole circle of relatives, it was considered natural and inevitable that both the selection of the individual and the settlement of all financial matters should be decided by the parents and guardians of those about to be married. The impulsive self-will of Esau which showed itself in the contempt of his birthright, led him to set aside the above tradition by marrying two of the daughters of Heth (Gn 26^{34, 35} 27⁴⁶). Woman was not thought of as having a personal existence at her own disposal, but as a unit in the family, and under the protection and authority of her male relatives. In marriage she was practically the purchased possession of her husband, becoming bē'ulah to him as her ba'al, or owner and master.

2. Betrothal.—This was a binding transaction declaring the fact of prospective marriage, and specifying the terms agreed upon by the contracting parties, that is, by those acting on their behalf. Although in both families the intention of marriage might have been decided upon by the parents from the infancy of their children, yet the formality of betrothal was not proceeded with until marriage could be regarded as a possibility in the near future. On the one hand, it was undesirable to make gifts or pay an instalment in a compact that might never be implemented by marriage, and, on the other hand, it was equally undesirable to dedicate a daughter to one who might not live to undertake her support, and thus cause her to be regarded as a widow. During a prolonged interval the man might move to another part of the land or fail to carry out the betrothal stipulations, and then the intended bride would require to get a writing of divorce or separation before she could be betrothed or married to another. While the act of betrothal by the presence of witnesses and the assemblage of friends had the importance of a ceremonial function, yet the spirit of bargaining was generally so keenly aroused, and the process of compromise so protracted and complex, that the situation scarcely admitted of immediate marriage rejoicings. Besides, it frequently happened that an interval of time was needed in order that the bridegroom might render the stipulated service, or acquire the sum of money agreed upon as the present to be given to the father and brothers of the bride. Thus there was usually an interval of a year or two, or it might be of several years, between the betrothal and the celebration of marriage.

3. Ceremony of marriage.—As a welcome sequel following in due time upon the discussion and settlement of the marriage portion and similar matters, the wedding itself was always an occasion of joyful festivity and congratulation. (a) Place.—While in ancient times the marriage doubtless took place occasionally in the home of the bride, yet the fact that the bridegroom came to claim one who had become his by the fulfilment of assigned conditions, and further, the widespread tradition of forcible opposition to her removal from her people, point to the greater frequency of marriage in the house of the bridegroom's parents. Thither the bride was conducted by a company of friends, carrying also her personal outfit and household belongings. If her people were of the peasant class, and she was merely passing to a neighbouring village, she would be already in her bridal dress and seated upon a led horse or mule, while in front of the procession young men and maidens individually engaged in sword-play and dancing. In the larger villages, such as Bethlehem and Nazareth, the robing of the bride was more elaborate, and was carried out by the help of women after her arrival at the new home. On that day, the bridegroom, instead of following the primitive custom of going to claim his bride or to meet her procession on the way, remained absent from the house with his relatives or friends until all preparations had been fully made.

(b) Time.—The marriage generally took place in the evening, so that those coming from a distance might not fail to arrive, and those who were occupied during the day might have liberty to attend. During the evening, as he sat among his friends, the bridegroom, in the exercise of his prerogative as the chief person concerned, signified his desire to move homewards. Upon this the wedding procession was formed. Lanterns and torches were lit to guide him and his companions through the dark, silent streets. Those who were waiting to see the procession pass raised the peculiar Oriental cry of marriage festivity, and thus, as the cry was taken up, the fact of his approach was known along the path in front of him up to the house in which the bride and her attendants were waiting. Owing to the stillness of the air and the slow pace of the illuminated procession, the cry might be heard half an hour before the arrival of the bridegroom. Then those who had merely come to do honour by joining in the procession returned to their houses, and the relatives and invited guests passed in to the wedding ceremony and festivity. These rejoicings were maintained for several days or even a week, according to the worldly circumstances of the family.

Many of these marriage customs are alluded to by Christ in His teaching, as the subject was familiar to His hearers, and any parabolic lessons deduced from it would be easily understood. Thus the bridegroom could excuse himself for not attending the wedding of another, seeing that his own invited guests were returning to pay visits of congratulation and good-will, and would feel offended if they found him absent (Lk 14²⁰). It was a privilege and honour to the guest to be invited to the wedding feast, and an affront to those who invited him if he failed to attend (Mt 22⁸⁻⁹). It was late when the wedding guest returned to his own house (Lk 12³⁶). It was for the bridegroom to tarry until he was pleased to appoint the hour of his coming (Mt 24⁴² 25^{6, 13}). The reference to marrying and giving in marriage, with the Flood at the door, exemplified that pre-occupation of the mind with worldly interests and ambitions by which men forget the transitoriness of life and the precariousness of its possessions. One of the marks of the new Kingdom was to be its power of carrying disruption into the closest and strongest family relationships at the call of loyalty to its larger and higher citizenship (10³⁵⁻³⁷ 12⁴⁶⁻⁴⁹). With such a background of tradition and custom Christ gave to marriage the support of His own presence, and spoke of its Divine origin and temporary nature (Jn 2², Mt 19⁴⁻⁶ 22³⁰). In the Epistles it is evident that the higher conception of marriage prevalent among the Jews was gravely endangered by the inherited views still familiar to the mind, though condemned by the conscience, in the Gentile membership of the Church (1 Co 7). The marriage relationship was used to typify the intimate vital affinity between Christ and the Church (Eph 5²²⁻³³). In Rev 21² the comparison of the New Jerusalem to an Oriental bride adorned for her husband, appropriately sets forth the protracted development and perfected beauty of the Kingdom of God.

The bridegroom's friend (Jn 3²⁹) must be distinguished from 'the children of the bride-chamber' (Mt 9¹⁵), who were simply the invited guests. In Judæa there were two such 'friends,' one acting for the bridegroom, the other for the bride. They conducted all the preliminary inquiries, made the bargains as to dowry, etc., arranged the betrothal, and finally led the betrothed couple to the bride-chamber. They were responsible for the legality of the whole proceedings, and were guarantors of the bride's virgin chastity. The bridegroom's voice, in converse with the bride, assured them pleasantly that their work had been successful. The discharge of the 'friends' functions was liable to gross abuses (see Mishnic tractate Middoth). There was no corresponding functionary in Galilee, and so there is no allusion to him in the account of the marriage at Cana. Similar offices are discharged by the friends of would-be bridegrooms in Palestine to-day. An ardent suitor once sent to the present writer a sum of £40, with the request that it be given to a friend, on condition that he should secure the goodwill of a certain maiden, and the consent of her parents to his suit.

The bride-chamber is probably = Heb. heder, 'the nuptial chamber' (Jg 15¹), in which stood the huppah, the bridal 'bed with a canopy' (Jl 2¹⁶; Gesenius, s.v.). In all the lands of their dispersion the Jews still apply this name, huppah, to the richly embroidered canopy under which the contracting parties stand during the marriage ceremony.

MARRIAGE (II.).—Jesus does not treat of the family from the point of view of the sociologist, but from that of the teacher of religion and morals. The high estimate which He places upon it is to be seen, not alone in His regard for His mother, but more particularly from His use of the institution as His most characteristic analogy for the Kingdom of God. As far as the condition of its future members in the present evil age is concerned, He describes the Kingdom as a social order in which the relationship of men to God is analogous to that of sons to a father; and their relation to each other, therefore, is like that existing between brothers. Jesus also frequently uses figures drawn from marriage customs to illustrate His teaching concerning the coming of the Kingdom. It would be a mistake to see in this use of the paternal and filial relations a survival of that primitive religious concept which made members of a clan the sons of its gods. The usage of Jesus contains no reflexion of such a primitive thought, but rather springs from His high appreciation of marriage as it existed in the conventionalized civilization of the Jews of His day.

1. As an institution Jesus regards marriage as essentially physical, and intended only for the present age. Those who were to share in the blessings of the eschatological Kingdom would neither marry nor be given in marriage, but would be possessed of the non-physical body in the resurrection (Mt 22²³⁻³⁰, Mk 12¹⁸⁻²⁵, Lk 20²⁷⁻³⁶). His teaching at this point is not an endorsement of the view that immortality is to be without personal relations, but is rather a relegation of physical relations to physical conditions.

The Sadducees, in their query which gave rise to this teaching of Jesus, raised the question of the levirate marriage. Jesus' answer does not touch upon that peculiar institution, but deals rather with the nature of marriage itself. He was no social reformer. In all the records of His teaching there is nothing to indicate that He gave to marriage any new social content or custom. Like His Apostles after Him, Jesus accepted marriage as an existing institution which gave rise to practical moral questions. His use of the customs of the time (cf. Mt 22^{2ff.}, Jn 2^{1ff.}) was for the purpose of illustration rather than in the way of either approval or disapproval. It follows that Jesus did not look upon marriage as psychical or spiritual. Such transcendental teaching is foreign to the practical temper of Christianity. In its place is the assumption that the family, like all other members of social life, comes within the region of the great commandment of love. Jesus assumes that the father loves the child, and that brothers love each other. Farther than this His discussions do not go, but the inference is imperative that the relations between husband and wife fall within the great teaching of Mt 5⁴⁴⁻⁴⁸ quite as truly as other social relations of individuals. If quarrelsome brothers are to be reconciled, most assuredly should there be reconciliation between husband and wife.

2. Marriage as a social institution Jesus regards as of Divine origin. It is one of the primal facts of humanity, established by God before the giving of the Law (Mt 19⁶⁻⁹, Mk 10⁶⁻⁹). Jesus grants that because of the exigencies of social development Moses modified the institution to the extent of permitting and regulating divorce; but such modification Jesus evidently regarded as out of harmony with the institution. According to the original Divine purpose, man and wife were no longer two persons but one flesh. That is, marriage was to be monogamous. Any form of polygamy is thus excluded from His ideal.

It is noteworthy that Jesus in His quotation of Gn 2²⁴ does not follow the Heb. reading, in which ai duo of the LXX has no equivalent. Polygamy is not excluded by the Hebrew, but is obviously inconsistent with the LXX statement, and even more so with the inference drawn from the passage by Jesus. It is from this point of view that one must approach the subject of divorce. (See DIVORCE).

3. Jesus, however, does not make marriage a supreme good. Rather is it one of those great goods of an imperfect age which are to be subordinated to the supreme good of sharing in the Kingdom of God, i.e. eternal life. Yet at no point is the sanity of His teaching more in evidence than here. He Himself was unmarried, but He never counsels celibacy. He does not even take the mediating position of St. Paul (1 Co 7⁷⁻²⁹, 32-40). In this particular, as in so many others, He is in such opposition to the Essenes of His day as quite to overbalance any of those superficial resemblances which have been discovered between His teaching and the ascetic doctrines of that sect. At the same time, just because marriage, though a good, is one which must pass with the present age, He teaches that in some cases it must be avoided. Mt 19¹² speaks of those who have made themselves eunuchs for the sake of the Kingdom of heaven, i.e. who, because of exceptional circumstances, have become celibates. In certain other expressions He distinctly recognizes the necessity for some among His followers to leave their families in the interests of a devotion to His cause (Mt 18²⁵, Lk 14²⁶). These sayings, however, are not to be interpreted as in any way a prohibition of marriage, or as an elevation of the unmarried state to a plane superior to that of marriage. To draw such an inference is to misinterpret the entire tendency of His teaching, and to elevate into a controlling position His recognition of exceptional and particularly difficult situations in which one is compelled to practise a supreme self-sacrifice in order to remain loyal to a supreme ideal. The sayings are to be interpreted in accordance with those others in which Jesus concedes the fact that the family circle is not proof against evil influences—sayings which aroused hostility against His followers (Mt 10^{34ff.}, Lk 12⁴⁹⁻⁵³).

The Early Church under the influence of extra-Christian ideals moved along the line suggested by St. Paul towards the approval of the highest state of celibacy. Rev 14⁴ gives the highest honours to those men who have not been married. Clement of Alexandria (Strom. iii. 9. 63) refers to the unauthentic saying of Jesus preserved in the Gospel of the Egyptians, 'I came to destroy the works of the female.' Similarly Clement (ib. 16) reports Jesus as having said, 'Eat every herb, but that which hath bitterness (i.e. maternity) eat not.'

A consideration of this teaching of Jesus leads naturally, therefore, to the genuinely Christian conception of marriage as a relationship which, though in the very nature of the case limited to the physical mode of existence, is yet sacred. The ascetic ideal is thus utterly lacking here as in all the teaching of Jesus, and in its place is to be found all that is normal in the so-called Greek ideal of life, together with the ennobling Christian ideal of love. See, further, ADULTERY, CELIBACY, DIVORCE.

SHAILER MATHEWS.

MARTHA (of Bethany, sister of Lazarus and Mary).—The name (מרתָה 'mistress' or 'lady'), though unique in the Scriptures, is common in the Talmud.* She appears in the Gospel-story on three occasions: (1) when she entertained Jesus on His way to Jerusalem at the season of the Feast of Tabernacles (Lk 10³⁸⁻⁴²); (2) when Lazarus died and was revived by Jesus (Jn 11¹⁻⁴⁶); and (3) when Jesus, on His way to the Passover from His retreat at Ephraim (Jn 11⁵⁴), was honoured with a public entertainment at Bethany in the house of a leading man named Simon the Leper (Jn 12¹⁻¹¹=Mt 26⁶⁻¹³=Mk 14³⁻⁹). Being a notable housewife, Martha was entrusted with the management of the banquet. See ANOINTING, I. 2.

The idea that the scene of this entertainment was Martha's house has given rise to the unfortunate surmise that Martha was a widow, Simon the Leper being her deceased husband. On the supposition that Kyria in 2 Jn 1. 5 is a proper name, the Greek equivalent of Martha, 'lady' (Volmar), it has been surmised that St. John's 2nd Epistle is addressed to our Martha. This is ingenious but untenable, since (1) 'the elect Kyria' would be, not ἡλεκτὴ Κυρία (v. 1), but Κυρία τῆ ἡλεκτῆ (cf. 3 Jn 1); (2) the Epistle is probably addressed metaphorically to a church and not to an individual.

Martha and Mary exhibit a peculiarity frequently observable in families. They were, like the brothers Jacob and Esau, utterly diverse in disposition and temperament. While Mary was impassioned and imaginative, Martha was unemotional and practical.† When Jesus visited her house at the season of the Feast of Tabernacles, He found her busy preparing the festal cheer (see MARY, No. 3). His arrival redoubled her housewifely solicitude, and it angered her when she saw her sister seated at His feet and listening to His discourse, leaving to her unaided hands the offices of hospitality. And when Jesus came to Bethany in tardy response to the sisters' appeal, 'Lord, behold, he whom thou lovest is sick,' Mary was in the darkened home overwhelmed with grief, but Martha had repressed her emotion, and, when word was brought her that Jesus had been sighted making His toilsome approach by the Ascent of Blood, the steep and robber-haunted road up the eastern slope of Olivet, she went out and met Him ere He entered the village. She greeted Him calmly, not without upbraiding for His delay; and when He assured her that her brother would rise again, she took His words in her matter-of-fact way as a reference to the current doctrine of the resurrection of the righteous at the last day, seeing in them merely a commonplace of pious consolation. Very different was her sister's behaviour. When Martha returned home and told her that the Master had arrived and was calling for her, she sprang up and ran to Him, and, in a passion of love and sorrow, flung herself at His feet.

It were, however, unjust to disparage Martha. She was of a practical turn, but she was very far from stupid. She was mistress of the house, and she was as a mother to her unworldly sister. There was evidently a close sympathy between them. During the dark days which succeeded their brother's death, they had been each other's comforters and had unbosomed their grief one to the other. Their constant plaint had been, 'Had the Lord been here, our brother had not died'; and this was the cry of each in turn when they met Jesus (Jn 11²¹⁻³²). Martha was calm and self-possessed, but a great tenderness was concealed beneath her unemotional exterior. She wept less than Mary, but she mourned as deeply. Nor was she lacking in love and reverence for Jesus. Her impatience of Mary's inactivity amid the bustle of preparing the meal was due less to resentment at being left alone to serve, than to anxiety that nothing should be wanting for the comfort of the dear Master. And she believed in His power to help even when Lazarus had been dead four days (Jn 11²²). She lacked some qualities which Mary possessed, but she had others of her own, and Jesus appreciated the excellence of her character. He loved Martha no less than her sister and Lazarus (v. 5).

It is no slight attestation of the historicity of the Lukan and Johannine narratives of the family of Bethany that they faithfully accord in their delineations of the two sisters. On the pages of St. John each sustains the character which she exhibits in the little scene so exquisitely depicted by St. Luke. Here are no imaginary pictures, but portraitures of real personages.

St. John says that the village where Martha and her sister dwelt was Bethany; but St. Luke does not name it, and he has been charged with placing the incident of the meal in Martha's house in Galilee. This idea, however, arises from a misconception of his literary method. Like the other Synoptists, St. Luke was not an original author but an editor of the Evangelic Tradition, and his aim was not chronological accuracy but the exhibition of Jesus. He sifted the ample material at his disposal, and arranged his selections topically rather than historically. Thus at 9^{49, 50}, recounting what befell in Galilee, he records the Lord's rebuke of His disciples' mistaken zeal; then, finding another incident which teaches a like lesson (vv. 51-56), he inserts it in this connexion, though it belongs to the last journey to Jerusalem (cf. v. 51). Having begun this section of the Tradition, he continues it, giving various other incidents of the journey, down to the close of ch. 12. Then he returns to what befell in Galilee, resuming the narrative of the journey to Jerusalem at 17¹¹.

MARY.—1. Mary the mother of James the Little and Joses, one of the women who followed Jesus from Galilee, stood beside the cross, watched the burial, and visited the sepulchre on the Resurrection morning (Mt 27^{55, 56}=Mk 15^{40, 41}, Mt 27⁶¹=Mk 15⁴⁷, Mk 16¹=Mt 28¹=Lk 24¹⁰). From Jn 19²⁵ it appears that she was wife to Clopas. This name is distinct from Cleopas (Lk 24¹⁸), and is perhaps identical with Alphæus, both representing ἄλφαιος. Cf. J. B. Lightfoot, Gal. p. 256. WH write Ἀλφαῖος (see NT, vol. ii. § 408). If this identification be allowed, then (1) James the Little was probably one of the Twelve (Mt 10²=Mk 3¹⁸=Lk 16¹⁵); (2) he was perhaps brother to Levi (Matthew), the son of Alphæus. The latter inference is favoured by (a) the v.l. Ἰάκωβον for Ἀεεῖν in Mk 2¹⁴; (b) the tradition that James, like Matthew, had been a tax-gatherer (Chrysost. in Matth. xxxiii. : δύο τελῶναι, Ματθαῖος καὶ Ἰάκωβος; Euth. Zig. : Ματθαῖος δὲ καὶ Ἰάκωβος ὁ τοῦ Ἀλφαίου, τελῶναι). See artt. ALPHÆUS and CLOPAS.

Hegesippus (in Eus. HE iii. 11. 32, iv. 22) mentions a Clopas who was brother to Joseph, our Lord's foster-father; but there is no evidence that he was identical with this Clopas. Jerome, in support of his theory of 'the Brethren of Jesus,' construes Μαριαμὴ ἡ τοῦ Κλωτᾶ in Jn 19²⁵ as in opposition to ἡ ἀδελφὴ τῆς μητρὸς αὐτοῦ, thus reducing the number of the women by the Cross to three, and making 'Mary the [wife] of Clopas' the Virgin's sister. See J. B. Lightfoot, Gal. p. 255 ff. But (1) it is improbable that two sisters bore the same name, and (2) 'the sister of his mother' was apparently Salome, the mother of the sons of Zebedee (cf. Mk 15⁴⁰=Mt 27⁵⁶).

2. Mary Magdalene.—She is first mentioned (Lk 8²) as one of a company of women who attended Jesus on His second mission through Galilee in the course of the second year of His ministry. She is distinguished by two significant epithets: (1) 'the Magdalene,' i.e. the woman of Magdala (Mejdel), a town on the Lake of Galilee, some 3 miles from Capernaum, at the southern end of the Plain of Gennesaret. The modern Mejdel is a miserable village, but the ancient Magdala was a wealthy place, one of three cities, according to the Talmud, whose tribute had to be conveyed in waggons to Jerusalem (cf. Lightfoot on Jn 12²³). It had, however, an evil reputation, and was destroyed, according to the same authority, for harlotry, so that 'Mary the Magdalene' might be equivalent to 'Mary the harlot' (cf. 'Corinthian Lais'). It is only fair, however, to add that many regard this as very precarious.

(2) 'From whom seven demons had gone forth.' In Jewish parlance, immorality was a form of demonic possession,* and, just as the grace of the Holy Spirit is called 'sevenfold,'† so sevenfold possession might signify complete abandonment to the dominion of unclean passion. Cf. Mt 12⁴⁵ = Lk 11²⁶. It is possible that Mary had been a harlot, that Jesus had rescued her from her life of shame, and that she followed Him out of gratitude. She was one of the devoted women who stood by the cross (Jn 19²⁵, Mt 27⁵⁶ = Mk 15⁴⁰), watched His burial (Mt 27⁶¹ = Mk 15⁴⁷), and came on the Resurrection morning to the sepulchre (Jn 20¹ = Mt 28¹ = Mk 16¹ = Lk 24¹⁰). Finding it empty, she waited beside it weeping, and was rewarded with the first vision of the risen Lord (Jn 20¹¹⁻¹⁸, cf. Mt 28^{9, 10}).

* See Lightfoot on Jn 11¹.

3. Mary of Bethany.—She is first introduced by St. Luke (10³⁸⁻⁴²), who tells how Jesus, probably on His way to the Feast of Tabernacles (Jn 7^{2, 10}) in the third year of His ministry, reached 'a certain village,' and was hospitably received by 'a certain woman by name Martha,' who had a sister called Mary. The Feast of Tabernacles was a season of feasting and friendship. 'They ate the fat and drank the sweet, and sent portions unto them for whom nothing was prepared, and made great mirth' (Ex 23¹⁶, Lv 23³³⁻⁴⁴, Nu 29¹²⁻³⁸, Neh 8⁹⁻¹⁸). Martha, a good housewife, was busy making ready the festal cheer; but Mary, oblivious of all save the Lord's presence, seated herself, in the posture of a disciple (cf. Ae 22³), at His feet and listened to His discourse. Martha, 'distracted about much service,' interposed: 'Lord, dost thou not care that my sister left me alone to serve? Tell her then to lend me a helping hand.' 'Martha, Martha,' He answered, gently protesting against the sumptuousness of His hostess's preparations, 'thou art anxious and troubled about many things, but a few are all we need; or rather,' He added, 'only one thing; ‡ for it is the good "portion" that Mary chose, one which shall not be taken away from her.' At that season, when they were all feasting and sending 'portions,' Mary was thinking not of the meat that perisheth, but of that which endureth unto eternal life.

St. Luke does not name the village where Martha and Mary dwelt. St. John tells us that it was Bethany, and that they had a brother named Lazarus (Jn 11¹⁻⁴⁶). Some months later, when Jesus was at the other Bethany beyond Jordan, whither He had retired from Jerusalem to escape the fury of the rulers (Jn 10⁴⁰; cf. 1²⁸ RV), Lazarus fell sick, and his sisters sent Jesus word. For two days after He heard the news He remained where He was, and only when Lazarus died did He set out. His approach was reported to Martha, apparently the elder sister and mistress of the house; and she went to meet Him and sorrowfully upbraided Him: 'Lord, hadst thou been here, my brother had not died.' Assured of His sympathy and help, she returned home and, finding her sister among the mourners, whispered to her that the Teacher had come. Mary arose, and, hurrying to Him, fell at His feet, crying in the very words which Martha had used, the words which had been on their lips all those sorrowful days: 'Lord, hadst thou been here, my brother had not died.' Cf. art. MARTHA.

Mary appears a third time six days before the Passover, when Jesus was entertained in the house of Simon the Leper at Bethany, and she came in during the feast and anointed His feet (Jn 12¹⁻¹¹; cf. Mt 26⁶⁻¹³ = Mk 14³⁻⁹). See ANOINTING, I. 2.

DAVID SMITH.

MARY, THE VIRGIN.—Historical data for the life of the mother of our Lord are astonishingly meagre. Legendary matter there is in abundance, with regard to her life both before the Annunciation and after the Ascension, but this art. will not touch on this except incidentally.

1. The Virgin Mary was born, we may suppose, at Nazareth. Tradition names Jerusalem (Cuinet, Syrie, Liban, et Palestine, p. 523), but this is quite untrustworthy. Her parents, according to a not improbable tradition, were Joachim and Anna (Protev. Jacob.). There is no reason to doubt that the Virgin, as well as Joseph, belonged to the tribe of Judah and to the family of David (Lk 1^{32, 69}, Ro 1³, 2 Ti 2⁸, He 7¹⁴), although it is almost certain, on the other hand, that both Mt. and Lk. give, not her genealogy, but Joseph's.

The statement of the Test. XII. Patr. (Simeon vii.), which makes Mary a woman of the tribe of Levi, is clearly an erroneous inference from the relationship between her and Elisabeth (cf. Plummer on Lk 12^{7, 36}). Syr^{sin} reads, Lk 2⁵, 'because they were both of the house of David.'

Only one member of her immediate family is alluded to in the NT, viz. her sister (Jn 19²⁵). This sister of the Virgin, was most probably Salome, wife of Zebedee, and mother of James and John. We know from the other Gospels (Mt 27⁵⁶, Mk 15⁴⁰) that Salome was present at the Crucifixion, and it is quite in accordance with St. John's manner to allude thus to his own mother without mentioning her name. The other opinion, that this sister was Mary 'of Clopas,' would (cf. Westcott, in loc., also Mayor, St. James, pp. xix-xx) 'involve the most unlikely supposition that two sisters bore the same name.' The family of the Virgin was connected in some way with Elisabeth (ἡ συγγενὴς σου, Lk 1³⁶), but what the degree of relationship was cannot be known. According to a theory brought forward in connexion with the harmonizing of the two genealogies of our Lord, Mary was a cousin of Joseph her husband (art. 'Genealogy of Jesus Christ' in Smith's DB), but such a theory has little to recommend it. That her family was but a humble one may be inferred from her betrothal to Joseph 'the carpenter,' especially if there be any truth in the tradition as to the disparity of their ages.

2. Some time after their betrothal, which came generally among the Jews a year before the marriage, the angel Gabriel was sent from God to Nazareth to tell her of One who was to be born of her, and who should 'be called holy, the Son of God' (Lk 1³⁵). The simplicity of the narrative bears on it the stamp of truth. Mary was troubled (διεταράχθη), we are told, at the saying, yet she believed at once. Her words, 'How shall this be?' ought not to be taken as an expression of doubt, like the words of Zacharias, 'Whereby shall I know this?' They are rather to be regarded as an 'involuntary expression of amazement' (Grot. 'non dubitantis sed admirantis'). Equally impossible is it to suppose that she believed that the child promised would be the fruit of a future union with Joseph. The words of the angel forbid any such idea. Yet, on the other hand, we need not suppose that the full meaning of the angel's words was at once grasped. There are evident signs in the narrative that this was not so, but nothing that we read mars the exquisite simplicity of her words of humble submission, 'Behold the handmaid of the Lord; be it unto me according to thy word.' Soon after ('in these days,' Lk 1³⁹) the departure of the angel, Mary set out to pay the visit to her kinswoman, which his words would naturally suggest to her. The supposition that her journey was due to the intention of Joseph to put her away in a baseless one. Rather, as it has been said, 'the first but the ever-deepening desire in the heart of Mary, when the angel left her, must have been to be away from Nazareth, and for the relief of opening her heart to a woman, in all things like-minded, who perhaps might speak blessed words to her' (Edersheim, Life and Times, i. p. 152). She arose with haste and set out to seek that relief in the house of her kinswoman in the far-off hills of Judah.

What the city of her destination was we cannot know for certain. Whatever it was, it was distant from Nazareth by almost the whole length of the land. According to a tradition which may be correct (cf. ExpT xv. [1905] 245 f.), it was 'Ain Karim, a village an hour and a half west of Jerusalem.

The opinion held for so long that this city was Juttah is, according to Buhl (GAP p. 163), quite worthless, having originated with Reland in the beginning of the 18th century.

When Mary reached her kinswoman's house, a fresh surprise awaited her in the greeting of Elisabeth: 'Blessed art thou among women.' No longer is Mary to Elisabeth simply 'kinswoman,' she is 'the mother of my Lord.' Doubtless what she had heard from Zacharias of the promises made in regard to their son would fill Elisabeth with hopes of a speedy appearance of the Messiah, and now, by inspiration (Lk 1⁴), she knows that the mother of her Lord is before her. Her greeting is in reality a psalm, brief though it is and overshadowed by the still more wonderful hymn which it called forth in response. The 'Song of Mary' is 'modelled on the OT psalms, especially the Song of Hannah (1 S 2¹⁻¹⁰), but its superiority to the latter in moral and spiritual elevation is very manifest.' That Mary should 'fall back on the familiar expressions of Jewish Scripture in this moment of intense exultation' is very natural (cf. Plummer, St. Luke, p. 30).

Niceta, bp. of Remesiana, in his treatise de Psalmodiæ Bono, names Elisabeth as the author of the Magnificat. This is supported by the Old Latin MSS Vercellensis, Veronensis, Rhedigeranus, and by Irenæus. Origen also knew of the reading, though he did not accept it. The evidence adduced, however, does not seem sufficient to override the verdict of all the rest of antiquity, that the Hymn is Mary's and not Elisabeth's. See, further, art. MAGNIFICAT.

3. Mary remained with her kinswoman in Judah 'about three months,' probably waiting (cf. Lk 1⁵⁶ with v. 36) till after the birth of John the Baptist, and then returned to Nazareth. It is probably at this point that we ought to put the commencement of the narrative in Mt., which records Joseph's intention to put Mary away privily when her condition became known to him, and speaks of his subsequent marriage with her in obedience to the angelic messages. The marriage would afford 'not only outward but moral protection' both to the mother and to the unborn Babe. That the Virgin is still spoken of as ἐμνηστευμένη in Lk 2⁵ is not to be taken as necessarily indicating that the marriage had not yet taken place. Had she not been Joseph's wife, Jewish custom would have forbidden her making the journey along with him. When Joseph went up to Bethlehem to get himself enrolled, Mary went also, not because it was necessary, but because 'she would be anxious at all risks not to be separated from Joseph' (Plummer, in loc.). At Bethlehem, perhaps in the cave where now is the Church of the Nativity, she brought forth her first-born Son, and there, too, she received the visit of the shepherds, whose words as to the sign given them from heaven she 'kept, pondering them in her heart.'

4. There is no need to linger on the next events, —the Circumcision, the Presentation and Purification in the Temple, the visit of the Magi, the Flight into and Return from Egypt,—for these all belong rather to the life of Christ than to that of Mary. Before leaving this part of her history, it may be well to emphasize how much of what we know of the Birth, Infancy, and Childhood of our Lord we owe to accounts given by His mother. That St. Luke's source in the first two chapters of his Gospel was one connected with the Virgin is generally admitted. Whether he received his information directly from her, as Ramsay supposes (Was Christ born at Bethlehem? p. 85 ff.), or whether the information came to him indirectly through another (perhaps, as Sanday conjectures, Joanna), may not be determinable. At least we can say that St. Luke believed that he wrote what he wrote on her authority.

'He does not,' writes Ramsay (ib. p. 74), 'leave it doubtful whose authority he believed himself to have. "His mother kept all these sayings hid in her heart"; "Mary kept all these sayings, pondering them in her heart"; those two sentences would be sufficient.'

5. The Return from Egypt was followed by a life in retirement at Nazareth. Very little do we know of those years. Two verses in Lk. (2^{40, 41}), which tell us of the growth of the Child and the custom of His 'parents' to go every year to Jerusalem at the Feast of the Passover, are all we have in the way of direct statement. Here in Nazareth it was that those brothers and sisters of the Lord, of whom we read in the course of the Gospel narrative, were born to Mary and Joseph (for other views see art. BRETHREN OF THE LORD). Four brothers are named (Mt 13⁵⁵, Mk 6³), but the sisters are mentioned only once (Mk 6³), without any mention of their names.

The silence of the life at Nazareth is broken but once before the commencement of the Ministry. The scene in the Temple (Lk 2⁴²⁻⁵⁰) would claim a fuller consideration in the Life of Jesus Christ. As regards its relation to His mother, we have to notice only two points which emerge from St. Luke's narrative. Mary did not yet understand all the meaning of the angel's words to her regarding the Child that was to be born. The Child's own words would be a reminder to her of His true nature. He must be 'about his Father's business' (or 'in his Father's house'). Then again we see from the passage the lasting impression which the scene left on Mary's mind. 'His mother kept (συνετήρει) all these sayings in her heart.' The tense of the verb covers a long period, up to, and even during, the Ministry. Yet of the Virgin's life during the interval between our Lord's twelfth year and His Baptism we know nothing but what is contained in these words and those which immediately precede, as to her Son's subjection to her and Joseph. It is, however, an easily drawn inference from the absence of any mention of Joseph in the later Gospel narrative, that he died during this interval. Beyond this it is useless to conjecture. 'The Arabic Historia Josephi (cc. 14, 15) places his death in our Lord's eighteenth year, when Joseph had reached the age of 111' (Swete on Mk 6³).

6. The remaining allusions to the Virgin in the Gospels may be briefly recorded. She was present at the marriage feast at Cana (Jn 2¹), after which she went down to Capernaum (v. 12) with Jesus and His brethren and His disciples. She would seem to have been among 'his friends' (οἱ παρ' αὐτοῦ) at Capernaum, who 'went out to lay hold on him' (Mk 3²¹), for the next paragraph tells us of the coming of His mother and His brethren (v. 31). She is mentioned by the unknown woman out of the multitude (Lk 11²⁷), 'Blessed is the womb that bare thee, and the breasts that thou didst suck.' She was present at the Crucifixion, whence the loved disciple, into whose care she had been committed, took her to his own home (Jn 19^{25ff.}). It is not a little remarkable, in view of later developments, that no fewer than three of these allusions seem to guard against an undue feeling of veneration for the mother of our Lord, In the story of the feast at Cana, His words, though not wanting in respect, 'show that the actions of the Son of God, now that He has entered on His Divine work, are no longer dependent in any way on the suggestion of a woman, even though that woman be His mother. . . . The time of silent discipline and obedience is over' (Westcott, in loc.). In the scene at Capernaum the lesson is much the same, though the interference of Mary and our Lord's brethren on this occasion seems to have arisen from a different motive. They are seeking to oppose His work. Before they reach Him He understands their purpose, and declares that the true kinship to the Son of God consists in obedience to the will of God, and not in mere earthly ties. It is, of course, as Swete observes (St. Mark, p. 70), 'a relative attitude only, and is perfectly consistent with tender care for kinsmen, as the saying on the cross shows.' These two scenes at Cana and Capernaum belong to the beginning of the Ministry, and similarly, almost at its close, we have Christ's words, during the last journey from Galilee to Jerusalem, in answer to the saying of the woman above mentioned, 'Yea, rather (μεινόν), blessed are they that hear the word of God and keep it (Lk 11²³).' This adds to and corrects the woman's words. There is no denial of the Virgin's blessedness, only a declaration of that wherein her blessedness consists, a blessedness which may be shared by all who, like her, hear the word of God and keep it.

Why it was that the Virgin was committed by our Lord on the cross to John can be only a matter of conjecture. It may be, as Mayor suggests (St. James, p. xxvii), that her sons, as married men (1 Co 9⁵), were already dispersed in their several homes, while John her nephew was unmarried, and so could more readily accept such a charge. All we know is that 'from that hour that disciple took her unto his own home (Jn 19²⁷).

7. After this the only glimpse we get of Mary is in Ac 1¹⁴, where she is mentioned as continuing steadfastly in prayer with the other women and the brethren and Apostles of the Lord, after the Ascension. Whether she lived the rest of her life in Palestine, or accompanied St. John to Ephesus, cannot be known. Traditions there are, but they vary. According to one, found in Nicephorus Callistus (HE ii. 3), she continued to live with St. John in Jerusalem, and died there in her fifty-ninth year. Another tradition, found in the Synodical Letter of the Council of Ephesus (A.D. 431), makes her accompany St. John to Ephesus, and speaks of her as having been buried in that city.

MASTER (Lat. magister from root of magnus = 'great.' Hence 'master' corresponds to rabbi, which is from רב 'great'; and in AV ραββει is frequently tr. 'master,' e.g. Mt 26²⁵, Mk 9⁵, Jn 4³¹, though in all such cases RV retains 'rabbi').—The word most generally rendered 'master' is διδάσκαλος, which strictly means teacher; and this meaning is given in every case as an alternative reading in RVm, e.g. Mt 8¹⁹ 22¹⁶, Mk 5³⁵ 10¹⁷, Lk 3¹² 8⁴⁹, Jn 11²⁸ 13¹³. 14. In Lk 8²⁴ and 9³³ the Gr. word for 'master' is ἐπιστάτης, a word generally used in the sense not of 'teacher' but of 'chief' or 'overseer.' In Mt 23¹⁰ καθηγητής, rendered 'master,' is more correctly tr. 'leader' or 'guide.' Master was the ordinary title of courtesy and respect paid to a religious teacher. See art. RABBI. MATTATHA.—A grandson of David, named in our Lord's genealogy, Lk 3³¹.

MATTATHIAS.—Occurs twice in our Lord's genealogy, Lk 3²⁵. 26.

MATTATHAN.—Grandfather of Joseph the husband of Mary, Mt 1¹⁵.

MATTHAT.—1. The form of the name (Mt. Matthan) of Joseph's grandfather given in Lk 3²⁴. 2. Another link in our Lord's genealogy, Lk 3²⁹.

MATTHEW (Ματθαῖος, Lachm., Tisch., WH; Marthaïos, TR) is to be identified with Levi, son of Alphaeus, since the Synoptists agree in their description of the feast associated with the publican who is named Levi in Mk. (2¹⁴) and Lk. (5²⁹), and Matthew in Mt. (9⁹). * Levi, according to the analogy of Simon and Peter, may have been the original name and Matthew the acquired; though, according to Ederheim (Life and Times, i. 514), it was common in Galilee for a man to have two names, one strictly Jewish and the other Galilean. Matthew was chosen one of the Twelve, and is placed seventh in the lists in Mk. and Lk., and eighth in those in Mt. and Acts. When called to be a disciple, he was sitting at a toll-house, his place of business. Along the north end of the Sea of Galilee there was a road leading from Damascus to Acre on the Mediterranean, and on that road a customs-office marked the boundary between the territories of Philip the tetrarch and Herod Antipas. Matthew's occupation was the examination of goods which passed along the road, and the levying of the toll (cf. Hausrath, NT Times, ii. 179). The work of a publican excited the scorn so often shown beyond the limits of Israel to fiscal officers; and when he was a Jew, as was Matthew, he was condemned for impurity by the Pharisees. A Jew serving on a great highway was prevented from fulfilling requirements of the Law, and was compelled to violate the Sabbath law, which the Gentiles, who conveyed their goods, did not observe. Schürer makes the statement that the customs raised in Capernaum in the time of Christ went into the treasury of Herod Antipas, while in Judæa they were taken for the Imperial fiscus (HJP i. ii. 68). Matthew was thus not a collector under one of the companies that farmed the taxes in the Empire, but was in the service of Herod. Yet the fact that he belonged to the publican class, among whom were Jews who outraged patriotism by gathering tribute for Cæsar, subjected him to the scorn of the Pharisees and their party (cf. Ederheim, Life and Times, i. 515); and his occupation itself associated him with men who, everywhere in the Empire, were despised for extortion and fraud, and were execrated (cf. Cic. de Offic. i. 42; Lucian, Menipp. 11). Even Jesus Himself named the publicans with harlots (Mt 21³¹). See PUBLICAN, and SEA OF GALILEE, § vi.

Before the call of Matthew, Jesus had resided at Capernaum, had left it, and had gone back to it (Mk 1²¹. 38 2¹); and it is safe to conclude that Matthew, a dweller in or near the city, had heard the fame of Jesus, and perhaps he may have been among those who sought Him (Mk 1³⁷). Jesus, too, may have noticed the publican, and the fact may have led to the call. According to the narrative of that call, which is almost identical in the Synoptics, Jesus said to him, 'Follow me,' and he arose and followed Him (Mt 9⁹). After the call and the answer there was a feast, probably to celebrate the new departure in the life of the publican, at which Jesus met him and his friends.

Certain critics (cf. Keim, Jesus of Nazara, iii. 268 n.) take the words καὶ ἐγένετο αὐτοῦ ἀνακείμενον ἐν τῇ οἰκίᾳ (Mt 9¹⁰) as indicating that the house was that of Jesus; but they can bear this interpretation only if taken in connexion with the preceding words, καὶ ἀναστὰς ἠκολούθησεν αὐτῷ. It is, however, not necessary to establish this connexion, as the writer may simply have made a sudden transition to a paragraph beginning καὶ ἐγένετο.

* Levi's father was not the father of James the Little (cf. Zahn, Einleitung, ii. 263).

If, on the other hand, the connexion must be made, then it is possible to take the narrative as recording that Matthew rose and followed Jesus to the house which belonged to Jesus. Mk. does not indicate the ownership of the house, while Lk. says distinctly that it was Levi's. If we accept the description of Mk. or Lk., we need not conclude that the feast followed immediately after the call, since it may have taken place just before the assembling of the Twelve (Mk 3¹⁴, Lk 6¹³), in the period between that event and the calling of the individual disciples.

At the feast were Jesus and His disciples, and at the table with them were many publicans and sinners. These disciples were also many in number (Mk 2¹⁵), and they must therefore have included others beyond the individuals who had been specially called. The sinners mentioned along with the publicans at the feast were those who violated the Law, or did not try to keep its innumerable commands as set forth by the scribes or interpreted by the Pharisees. Certain scribes and Pharisees had been spectators of the feast, and they asked the disciples concerning Jesus' eating and drinking with sinners; and Jesus Himself, answering them, declared that He had not come to call the righteous, but sinners to repentance. The call of Matthew and the feast with publicans and sinners were the comment of Jesus on Pharisaic separatism; but the action itself did not prevent the separatism which showed itself in the primitive Church, and which involved the rebuke of Peter by Paul.

Beyond the call and the inclusion of the name in the list of the Twelve, there is no mention of Matthew in the NT. On the question of the authorship of the First Gospel, see following article.

JOHN HERKLESS.

MATTHEW, GOSPEL ACCORDING TO.—The power of God unto salvation—to the Jew first, and also to the Greek.—The Gospels of St. Matthew and St. Luke may be characterized respectively as the Gospel of the Jew and the Gospel of the Greek. St. Luke gives us the conception of the Christ as His Person presented itself to the Greek Churches of the West. To them Christ was the Saviour of the world, the Divine Redeemer, whose Good News was equally available for all the children of men, regardless of distinctions of race, or class, or sex. St. Matthew, on the other hand, presents to us the Christ as He was conceived by the Jewish Christians of Palestine. To them Christ was the King of Israel; and the glad tidings of His coming Kingdom were intended first for the Chosen People. It was true that He had foretold the coming of many from the east and the west to sit down in the Kingdom of God (8¹¹), and had bidden His Apostles baptize all nations (28¹⁹); but then it had always been a part of the Divine plan to suffer aliens to enter as proselytes into the fold of Israel, and to partake of the blessings promised to the Chosen People. So it was to be with the new Israel. In the period of preparation for the Kingdom, the gospel was to be preached to all nations for a testimony (24¹⁴), and those who entered by baptism into the Christian Church would become members of that new Israel, which in the days of the Kingdom should be judged and governed by the twelve Apostles as viceroys of the King Messiah (19²⁸).

Of course the distinction here drawn makes itself felt in two respects. First, in the selection of material by the two writers. Each Evangelist has a certain amount of matter peculiar to himself; and it will be found that whilst in the First Gospel this is very largely matter which lends itself to the Christianity of one who was glad to emphasize the prior claim of the Jew to the blessings of the Kingdom, that in St. Luke is predominantly material capable of a more universalistic interpretation. Secondly, in the treatment of the large amount of material which is common to the two Gospels. A good example is to be found in the discourse on the Last Things. Whilst St. Matthew emphasizes the close connexion between the fall of Jerusalem and the Coming of the Son of Man (24²⁹), thus limiting the period during which the gospel could be preached to the Gentiles, St. Luke expands this period to an indefinite length, during which Jerusalem was to be trodden under foot (Lk 21²⁴), thus making space for a long and protracted preaching to the Gentiles.

In the present article we propose to discuss the chief features in the picture of the Person of Christ drawn for us by the First Evangelist, and to consider the bearing of this upon the questions of the author, the sources, the date, and the historical value of the Gospel.

1. Theology of the Gospel.—(1) The Messiah.—Jesus the Messiah was legally descended from David, and through him from Abraham, the father of the Israelite people (1¹). He was the culminating point in the history of His family. In David it had risen to monarchical power (1⁶), but at the period of the Captivity it had lost this dignity. But now again in Jesus the anointed King it had regained it (1¹⁶). He was therefore born 'king of the Jews' (2²). As King He entered Jerusalem (21⁵). As King He suffered the death of crucifixion (27^{38, 42}), and as King He would sit to judge all nations at the Last Day (25^{31ff.}). But He was no mere scion of the Davidic stock. Though legally descended from David through Joseph ben-Jacob, He was also in a unique sense Son of God. As such He was born of the Holy Spirit from a virgin (18²³). Hence He was 'God with us' (v. 23), and this Divine Sonship placed Him in a unique relationship to God. He could speak of God and of Himself as 'the Father' and 'the Son,' as though these terms could only be applied to this relationship (11²⁷); and David himself had recognized by the Divine inspiration this Divine Sonship of his promised descendant, when he applied to Him the Divine name 'Lord' (22⁴⁴). The history of the supernatural birth was, of course, an easy mark for Jewish calumny, but nevertheless it was a fact which had been Divinely foreordained (12²); and in the history of the Davide family there had been women of old time (Rahab, Bathsheba, Tamar, Ruth) whose lives should have taught the calumniators of the Virgin that God overrules and uses circumstances for His own Divine ends. Moreover, if in Jesus the prophecies of a Coming Davidic king, supernaturally born, had found at last their fulfilment, so also in Him were summed up all the many strands in the web of Jewish anticipation. He was 'the Beloved' (3¹⁷ 17⁹) whom God had eternally chosen (3¹⁶ 12¹⁸), and to whom God had eternally given all things (11²⁷) and all power (28¹⁸). He was the supernatural Son of Man, who was to come upon the clouds of heaven (16²⁸ 26⁶⁴ 24³⁰), and to sit upon the throne of His glory to judge all men (16²⁸ 19²⁸ 25³¹). And the events of His life down to the minutest details had been foretold in the OT. Thus Isaiah had foretold the circumstances (12²), and Micah the place, of His birth (2⁵). Hosea had foreseen the flight into Egypt, Jeremiah the massacre of the infants at Bethlehem (v. 17); and the settlement of His parents at the ill-famed village of Nazareth had been the subject of prophecy (v. 23). His herald John had been fore-announced by Isaiah (3³), and the same prophet had foreseen the Christ's ministry in Galilee, with Capernaum as His headquarters (4¹⁴). That He healed the sick was in accordance with a prophecy of Isaiah, and the contrast between His gracious and gentle work and the noisy clamour of His opponents, found anticipation in another passage of the same prophet (12¹⁷⁻²¹). Zechariah had foreseen His entry as King into Jerusalem (21⁵), His betrayal (26²⁴), and the desertion of His disciples (v. 31); and the whole course of His tragic end had been Divinely fore-ordained, and foretold in Scripture (16²³ [τὰ τοῦ θεοῦ] 26^{54, 56}).

Such was the Person of Jesus. He was the Divinely fore-ordained Messiah, the supernaturally-born King of Israel, the unique Son of God. What then had been His work? It is clear that the editor of the Gospel is much more concerned with Christ's doctrine than with His work, with what He had said than with what He had done. He is interested in the events of the life chiefly in so far as they proved Jesus to be the Messiah of the OT, and with His actions either as proofs of His supernatural power over all the known forces of life, or as illustrative of His attitude towards the orthodox Pharisaism of the day. He could, e.g., heal disease, even leprosy, without use of drugs or medical appliances, by the simple exercise of His will (8⁸ 'Speak the word only,' v. 16 'with a word'), the cure being immediate and complete (v. 13 9²² 15²⁸ 17¹⁸). He could control the forces of nature (8^{26, 27}), and could drive out demons from the unhappy beings of whom they had taken possession (vv. 23-24). He exercised upon earth the Divine prerogative of forgiving sin (9¹⁻³), and raised the dead to life (9²⁵). He could feed multitudes with a few loaves and fishes (14¹³⁻²¹ 15³²⁻³⁹). On the other hand, He associated with people who were regarded by the leaders of religion as ill friends for a devout man (9¹¹), and seemed negligent of the rules which the Pharisees had framed as the guides of a pious life. His disciples did not fast (9¹⁴), and broke Sabbath regulations (12²). He Himself performed acts of healing on the Sabbath day (v. 10), and His disciples neglected the regulations about purification of the hands before meals (15²). After a ministry marked by acts like these, He had been put to death by the Romans at the instigation of the Pharisees and Sadducees. He had expected this fate, and had foretold it to His disciples as being ordained of God and prophesied in Scripture (16²¹ δεῖ, v. 23 τὰ τοῦ θεοῦ, 17^{12, 22, 23} 20^{18, 19}). He had promised that on the third day He should be raised again, and this was fulfilled; and He had ascended into heaven.

Now it is clear that the details thus sketched furnish a very small part of the significance of the Gospel to the editor. The miracles proved Christ's power, or illustrated His attitude towards Pharisaism, or showed Him to be the Messiah of the OT. But to what end was He powerful, and, if the Messiah, where was His Kingdom? We might have expected to find a good deal more emphasis laid on the significance of Christ's death, but such emphasis is strikingly absent. The death is rather regarded as without significance in itself, but as a necessary stage in the revelation of the Messiah. He had come to found a Kingdom, but in accordance with the Divine plan had been put to death. Clearly then the Kingdom remained yet to come, and the death was a necessary prelude to glorification. The insistence on the fact that the death had to take place, because it had been foretold in the Scriptures, suggests the inference that to the editor it was a fact which required explanation, a difficult phase in the history of the Messiah rather than the central fact which itself explained everything else in His life. In two passages only is the death referred to as having any purpose or effect, rather than as being simply a thing which had happened as a necessary transition stage from the earthly life to the heavenly monarchy of the Messiah. In one of these Christ is represented as saying that He came to give His life as a ransom for many (λύτρον ἀντι πολλῶν, 20²⁸); in the other He speaks of His blood as shed for many for the remission of sins (26²⁸). It is easy to see how sayings like these could be made the foundation of a theology which would explain the whole of Christ's life from the significance of His death. But it is equally clear that the editor of the First Gospel has recorded them because they formed part of the tradition which had come to him, without seeing in them an explanation of the entire earthly life of the Messiah. They are incidental rather than fundamental to his Gospel.

Thus the facts of Christ's life as here recorded would have been meaningless to the editor without the teaching which he records. It is in that that he finds the explanation of Christ's life. The facts alone were obscure and difficult. Jesus was the Davidic Messiah and also the Son of God. He had entered into human history through the Virgin's womb. He had evinced His supernatural power in all that He did. But then He had allowed Himself to be put to death, because, as He said, the Scriptures had foretold it; and rising from the dead, He had gone into heaven again. But how then was He the Messiah, and where was the Kingdom? The main object of the Gospel is to explain this, and the explanation is given in the great discourses which the editor has formed by massing sayings or groups of sayings.

(2) The Kingdom.—The central subject of Christ's doctrine had been the near approach of the 'kingdom of the heavens.' With this He began His ministry (4¹⁷), and wherever He went He taught this as a good news (v. 23). The Kingdom, He taught, was coming, but not in His lifetime. After His ascension He would come as Son of Man upon the clouds of heaven (16^{27, 28} 19²⁸ 24³⁰), would send His angels to gather together the elect (24³¹ 13⁴¹), and would sit on the throne of His glory (16²⁸ 19²⁸ 25³¹). This would happen in the lifetime of the generation to whom He spoke (16²⁸ 24³⁴ 10²³), immediately after the great tribulation accompanying the destruction of Jerusalem (24²⁹); but God alone knew the exact day and hour (v. 30). Then the twelve Apostles should sit on twelve thrones judging the twelve tribes of Israel (19²⁸). In the meantime He Himself must suffer and die, and be raised from the dead. How else could He come upon the clouds of heaven? And His disciples were to preach the good news of the coming Kingdom (10⁷ 24¹⁴) among all nations, making disciples by baptism (28¹⁹). The body of disciples thus gained would naturally form a society bound by common aims (16¹⁸ 18¹⁷). They would be distinct from the existing Jewish polity, because the Jews as a people, the 'sons of the kingdom,' i.e. those who should have inherited it (8¹²), would definitely reject the good news (21^{32, 42, 43} 22⁷). Hence the disciples of the Kingdom would form a new spiritual Israel (21⁴³ 'a nation') which would include many who came from east and west (8¹²).

In view of the needs of this new Israel of Christ's disciples, i.e. of the true sons of the Kingdom (13²⁸), who were to await His coming on the clouds of heaven, it is natural that a large part of the teaching recorded in the Gospel should concern the qualifications required in those who hoped to enter the Kingdom when it came. They were still to live in allegiance to the revelation of God made in the OT, which was permanently valid. Not a letter was to pass away from it (5¹⁸). Its permission of divorce still held good (v. 32 19^{9ff.}). Christ had not abolished the Mosaic distinctions between clean and unclean meats (see notes on 15²⁰). His disciples were still to take two or three witnesses (18¹⁶); and the Sabbath was still to be held sacred (24²⁰). But they were to search beneath the letter of the OT for its spiritual meaning. Their 'righteousness' was to exceed that of the scribes and Pharisees, because they were to interpret the Law of Moses in a sense which would make it more far-reaching in its effect upon conduct than ever before (5²¹⁻⁴⁸). In particular, their 'righteousness' was to be less a matter of something done that men might see it, and more a right relation to God, taking effect in action known only to God Himself (6¹⁻³⁴). In relation to their fellow-men they were to cultivate humility, and to suppress self-assertiveness (18¹⁻¹⁴); to exercise forgiveness (vv. 15, 21-35); to be slow to judge their fellows (7¹⁻⁵); to do to others what they would have done to themselves (v. 12). In relation to wealth, they were not to hoard up treasure upon earth, but to trust in God's care for them (6¹⁹⁻³⁴ 19²³), seeking first His righteousness and Kingdom. In relation to sexual morality, they were to be chaste in thought (5²⁸); marriage was an indissoluble bond, broken only by adultery (19⁹). But some were called to live single lives for the Kingdom of the heavens (v. 12). In relation to God, they were to pray to Him for their daily needs, for His forgiveness, and for deliverance from the evil that is in the world (6⁹⁻¹³ 7⁷⁻¹¹).

In the above sketch of the picture drawn for us in the First Gospel of the Person and teaching of the Messiah, we have purposely omitted the parables. Most of the parables in this Gospel are parables of the Kingdom. With the exception of 18²¹⁻³⁵, they do not, as in the case of many of St. Luke's parables, inculcate some Christian virtue or practice, such as love of one's neighbour, or earnestness in prayer, but convey some lesson about the nature of the Kingdom and the period of preparation for it. Their interpretation will often depend largely upon the conception of the Kingdom with which the reader approaches them. We are not now concerned with the meaning which they were intended to convey when they were originally spoken. But it should be sufficiently obvious that if we ask what meaning they had for the editor of the First Gospel, and why he selected them for insertion in his Gospel, the answer must be that he chose them because he believed that they taught lessons about the Kingdom of the heavens in the sense in which that phrase is used everywhere else in his Gospel, of the Kingdom which was to come when the Son of Man came upon the clouds of heaven. Thus the parable of the Sower illustrates the varying reception met with by the good news of the Kingdom as it is preached amongst men. That of the Tares also deals not with the Kingdom itself, but with the period of preparation for it. At the end of the age the Son of Man will come to inaugurate His Kingdom. A phrase here, 'shall gather out of his kingdom,' has been pressed to support the interpretation that the Kingdom is thought of as present now. But it need convey no such meaning. The 'good seed' is interpreted as equivalent to the 'sons of the kingdom,' i.e. according to Jewish usage, not they who already live in or possess the Kingdom, but those who are destined to inherit it when it comes. It is not inaugurated until the 'end of the age.' Then when the 'Son of Man' comes, the 'Kingdom' comes; and the method of its foundation is not a gathering of the elect out of the mass of mankind, but a gathering of the wicked from amongst the elect, a gathering of them out of the Kingdom that the righteous may inherit it and shine forth in it. There is nothing here or elsewhere in this Gospel to suggest that the scene of the Kingdom is other than the present world renewed, restored, and purified (cf. παλιγγενεσία, 19²⁸).

The parables of the Mustard Seed and of the Leaven describe the way in which the good news of the Kingdom spreads rapidly and penetrates deeply into human society. Those of the Hid Treasure and of the Goodly Pearl emphasize its value, and teach the lesson that a man must give up all else to enter into it. That of the Drag-Net has much the same application as the parable of the Tares. The doctrine of the Kingdom attracts good and bad alike. But at the end of the age, when the Kingdom is inaugurated, there will be a separation.

In 20¹⁻¹⁶ occurs the parable of the Labourers in the Vineyard. In its present context this seems to be intended to teach the lesson that in discipleship of the Kingdom priority, whether in date of entrance upon discipleship or of position now, will not carry with it special privilege within the Kingdom when it comes. All shall receive the same reward—eternal life.

Of the other parables in the Gospel, 18²¹⁻³⁵ does not bear directly upon the doctrine of the Kingdom, but emphasizes forgiveness as a qualification in all who wish to enter it. 21²⁸⁻³² illustrates the perverse attitude of the Pharisees towards the Baptist's preaching. 21³³⁻⁴⁶ and 22¹⁻¹⁰ are historical forecasts of the fate of the Jewish nation. 22¹¹⁻¹⁴ emphasizes the necessity for all who hope to enter the Kingdom of possessing the necessary qualifications. 25¹⁻¹³ and vv. 14-30 teach the suddenness of its appearance and the necessity of watching for its coming. Vv. 31-46 describes the test by which the King when He comes will admit the righteous into His Kingdom.

Of several of these parables it will rightly be felt that, as originally spoken, they had a wider meaning and scope than that here given, and one which is inconsistent with the narrow limits of the Kingdom to be inaugurated immediately after the fall of Jerusalem. That is quite true. But the question is not, What did these parables mean when they were originally spoken? but, What interpretation did the editor put upon them when he incorporated them into his Gospel? He everywhere seems to use the phrase 'kingdom of the heavens' in its eschatological sense. In four or five passages he has, instead, the 'kingdom of God.' In 6³³ του θεου is probably not genuine (omit του θεου). As regards 19²⁴, a passage borrowed from Mk., the fact that Mt. in 13 other places where 'kingdom of God' occurs in Mk., substitutes 'kingdom of the heavens,' or omits or paraphrases the passage, makes it very probable that 'kingdom of the heavens' should be read here also. In 12²⁸ 21³¹ 43 the editor has retained 'kingdom of God,' not because he regarded it as equivalent to 'kingdom of the heavens,' but because he felt that in these passages the idea conveyed was different from that which his phrase 'kingdom of the heavens' everywhere carries with it; and he therefore retained 'kingdom of God' to mark the difference.

Thus the conception of Christianity as expressed in this Gospel may be summarized as follows. Jesus was the King-Messiah of the OT. He was also the Son of Man of apocalyptic anticipation. But how could the functions ascribed to these two ideals be combined? Only if the King passed through death that He might come again on the clouds to inaugurate His Kingdom. And to those who could read the OT aright, all this had been foretold. Hence the Crucifixion. When Jerusalem fell, the end of the age would come, and the Son of Man would appear. In the meantime the good news was to be preached, and men were to be gathered into the society of disciples of the Messiah.

2. Date and place of composition.—If the dominant conception of the book has been rightly sketched, very important conclusions can be drawn as to its provenance and date. It must have been written by a Jewish-Christian, probably by a Jewish-Christian of Palestine, and it cannot date from long after the fall of Jerusalem. For it is inconceivable that any one should so arrange the words of Christ as to convey the impression that He had taught that He would return as Son of Man immediately after the fall of Jerusalem, if many years had elapsed since that event. And this conclusion as to the early date and Palestinian origin of the Gospel is supported by other features of the book. It is markedly anti-Pharisaic, and strongly Jewish-Christian in outlook.

(1) Its anti-Pharisaism.—This already underlies the stories of the first two chapters, which are most easily explained as a narrative of facts written to rebut Pharisaic calumnies. Christ was born of a virgin, but He was legally of Davidic descent, and the Virgin Mary's marvellous history already found prototypes by contrast in the history of women connected with the ancestors of the Christ. If He went into Egypt, it was in the days of His infancy, and He brought no magical arts thence. If His parents settled at Nazareth, it was that the tenor of prophecy might be fulfilled.

So far the anti-Pharisaic polemic of the writer has been defensive and implicit. In the third chapter it becomes manifest and open. The sayings of the Baptist are so arranged as to form a sermon of denunciation of the Pharisees and Sadducees. They are a 'brood of vipers,' who pride themselves on their descent from Abraham. But right action based on repentance is the only ground for hope of God's favour. The Messiah is at hand, and will sweep away all such false claims with the fire of judgment. In the Sermon on the Mount the same anti-Pharisaic polemic is found. Their 'righteousness' will not admit them into the Kingdom (5²⁰). They are 'hypocrites' whose religious observances are based on desire for personal credit (6¹⁻¹⁷). In 8¹² they are 'the sons of the kingdom,' but nevertheless they will be cast into the outer darkness. It was the Pharisees who complained that Christ ate with tax-gatherers and sinners (9¹¹), and it was they who ascribed His power to cast out demons to Beelzebul (v.²⁴ 12²⁴). They accused His disciples (v.²), and Christ Himself (v.¹⁰), of doing illegal actions on the Sabbath. They plotted to destroy Him (v.¹⁴), and asked a sign from Him (v.³⁸). They condemned His disciples for eating with unwashed hands (15²), and were shocked at His teaching about things clean and unclean (v.¹²), being themselves blind guides (v.¹⁴). The disciples were to beware of their teaching (16¹²). In the last days of the Messiah's life the Pharisees took a prominent part in the events that led to His death. They plotted with the chief priests to arrest Him (21⁴⁵). They planned to entrap Him in His speech (22¹⁵). They tried to entangle Him in argument (vv.³⁴, 41). All this leads up to the tremendous indictment of the scribes and Pharisees in ch. 23. In the narrative dealing with the Crucifixion we read naturally rather of the chief priests and elders than of the Pharisees; but it is the latter, with the chief priests, who effect the sealing of the tomb (27^{62ff.}).

(2) The Jewish-Christian element.—Of course the whole conception of the Kingdom of the heavens as sketched above is Jewish-Christian in character. But there are other Jewish-Christian features in the Gospel. (a) One is the interest shown in St. Peter. He was one of the earliest of Christ's disciples (4¹⁸), and Christ had healed his wife's mother (8¹⁴). He was in some sense 'first' of the Twelve (10²), and it was he who walked on the waters at Christ's command (14^{28ff.}). It was he who first confessed Christ's Messiahship (16¹⁶), and received the promise of high rank in the Kingdom (v.¹⁹). By inserting this passage the editor blunts the severity of the rebuke (v.²⁴), which St. Luke altogether omits. It was Peter who was prominent amongst the three who were privileged to be on the Mount of Transfiguration (17⁴), and it was he to whom the tax-gatherers came as to one who was the representative of the other disciples. It was Peter who acted as the spokesman of the rest (15¹⁵ 18²¹ 26³³, 35), or who was addressed as representing the others (v.⁴⁰). It was he who penetrated into the palace, and there denied that he knew Christ (vv.⁵⁸⁻⁷⁵). If all the Apostles were to sit on thrones in the new age (19²⁸), Peter was to have administrative and legislative power in the Kingdom (16¹⁹).

(b) Another Jewish-Christian feature in the Gospel is the presence in it of sayings which seem to limit Christ's mission and doctrine to the Jewish nation. In His own lifetime He had expressly asserted this of His own activity. 'I was not sent save to the lost sheep of the house of Israel' (15²⁴). On two occasions He had extended His mercy to pagans (8⁵⁻¹³ 15²¹⁻²⁸), but on the latter occasion He made it plain that the grace thus extended to a Gentile woman was only as it were a crumb which had dropped from the table of the Jews, to whom He was sent, and had been devoured by a Gentile dog. He bade His disciples 'go not to the way of the Gentiles, nor to the cities of the Samaritans, but to the lost sheep of the house of Israel' (10⁶); and said they should not have exhausted the cities of Israel before His coming (v.²³). In the new age the Apostles were to rule over a new Israel (19²⁸). Of course, side by side with these sayings from his Palestinian sources, the editor has incorporated others from other sources, which prove that he himself was well aware that Christ had on other occasions foreseen and commanded the admission of Gentiles to the discipleship of the Kingdom. 'Many were to come from east and west' (8¹¹), and the three parables in 21²⁸-22¹⁴ seem to convey the same truth. Further, the good news was to be preached among all nations for a testimony (24¹⁴), and the Apostles were to make disciples of all nations (28¹⁹). But there is nothing in any of these passages to suggest that the editor anticipated the admission of Gentiles to discipleship save on terms similar to those on which proselytes had been admitted to the old Israel;* and it is clear that he saw no difficulty in the preaching to all nations being accomplished within a generation, for the 'end' (24¹⁴) which was to close this preaching was the period of great tribulation accompanying the siege of the city, followed immediately by the coming of the Son of Man (v.³⁰).

(c) A third Jewish-Christian feature is the insistence on the permanent obligations of the Mosaic Law; see above, p. 144^b.

Now all these characteristics of the Gospel point irresistibly to Palestine, and to Palestine in the period before or very soon after the fall of Jerusalem, as the place and date of the composition of the Gospel. The most obvious feature in this connexion is the belief that the coming of the Son of Man would immediately follow the period of tribulation accompanying the siege of the city. But the other features above mentioned point in the same direction. The prominence given to St. Peter is natural enough in traditions which had been collected and preserved in Palestine in the early days of the Church at Jerusalem. The limitation of Christianity to Jews or proselytes, and the insistence on the permanent validity of the Law, reflect the same primitive Christian atmosphere as we breathe in the first few chapters of the Acts, before the pressure of circumstances had compelled the Apostles to recognize that St. Paul must be right, and that under Christianity Jew and Gentile stood on the same plane in the sight of God.

Lastly, the anti-Pharisaic attitude of the editor would be natural in one who knew something of the difficulties of the Jewish-Christian Church in the early days when Pharisaic hatred pursued its members from city to city.

The date thus arrived at affects the whole Gospel and not only portions of it. It is a literary unity, and apart from a few possible later interpolations, e.g. 6¹⁴ (the doxology) 22⁴³ 23³⁵ ('son of Barachiah'), belongs to one editor, and to one period of final composition. The attempts made to argue for a late date for the composition of the whole book from isolated phrases, or to mark large sections as late additions, fail to account for the unity of idea and conception that runs through the whole work, and neglect the cumulative evidence of the conceptions that characterize it for an early date.

118-25 has been claimed as late because the idea of virgin-birth is 'quite foreign to Judaism.' As a matter of fact this idea is thoroughly Eastern (as well as Western), and must have been familiar to every Palestinian Jew who had read the Septuagint. And in other respects the narrative is Jewish throughout. The occurrence of the word ἱεραγία (16¹⁹ 18¹⁷) and the Baptismal Formula (28¹⁹) have been said to betray late date. But there is no possible reason why a Jewish Christian writing about the year A.D. 70 should not have used ἱεραγία to represent whatever Aramaic word was originally uttered; and if the Trinitarian name in v. 19 is not a later gloss, it may well have been used by a Palestinian Christian who was contemporary with St. Paul (cf. 1 Co 12⁵, 2 Co 13¹⁴, and 1 P 1¹², 1 Jn 3^{23, 24}).

3. The Sources.—If, then, we take the year A.D. 70 as an approximate date for the composition of the Gospel, there remain the questions of its sources, its author, and its historical value. The facts about the sources are these:—

(1) The editor has borrowed the greater part of the Second Gospel, and has made it the framework of his narrative. He has altered the order of Mk 1-7²⁴ in order to group the material under subject-heads. He has greatly expanded the discourses. He makes omissions and alterations in phrases relating to the Person of Christ, omitting especially expressions which attribute to Him inability, or desire for information, and terms of human emotion ; and makes a series of somewhat similar changes in clauses relating to the Apostles. For the details of his editorial revision of the Second Gospel, see art. MARK (Gospel), and the Com. on 'Matthew' in ICC, pp. xiii-xl.

(2) The Gospel contains, besides this Markan material, a good deal of matter, almost entirely sayings, which is found also in substance in the Third Gospel. It is generally supposed that this was borrowed by the two Evangelists from a common source, viz. a collection of Gospel material compiled by the Apostle Matthew, and referred to by Papias (Eus. HE III. xxxix.).

The present writer has elsewhere attempted to prove that, so far as St. Luke goes, this is not a very probable theory. Besides these sayings which he has in common with St. Luke, the editor of the First Gospel has also a number of sayings found only in his Gospel. The probability is that he borrowed these peculiar sayings, and most of those common to him and to St. Luke, from the Apostolic collection of sayings mentioned by Papias. If so, it is not very likely that St. Luke had also seen this collection. Rather material from it had passed into some of the many sources which he had used (Lk 1), and were borrowed by him from them. See 'Matthew,' l.c. pp. xli-lxii. Thus Mt.'s second source was the Matthaean Logia or collection of discourses.

(3) What remains of the Gospel, when we have put aside the matter borrowed from Mk. and the sayings drawn from the Logia, consists of a number of narrative traditions. These deal with Christ's Birth and Infancy (chs. 1, 2), with a few incidents connected with St. Peter (14²⁸⁻³¹ 17²⁴⁻²⁷), and with some details connected with Christ's trial and Resurrection (27³⁻¹⁰, 19, 24, 25, 51a-53, 62-66 28¹¹⁻¹⁵). They were all drawn, it may be supposed, from current Palestinian Christian tradition.

(4) Lastly, a number of quotations of a peculiar type, which are introduced by a special formula (1^{22, 23} 25, 6, 15, 17, 18, 23 4¹⁴⁻¹⁶ 8¹⁷ 12¹⁷⁻²¹ 13³⁵ 21^{4, 5} 27⁸), were drawn from a catena or list of OT Messianic passages, which had already been translated into Greek when the editor borrowed them.

4. The Author.—Now, who was the writer who thus welded together the Second Gospel, the Matthaean Logia, a number of Palestinian traditions, and a series of OT quotations, into our present Gospel? From the end of the 2nd cent. the work has been ascribed to St. Matthew. But there are the following difficulties in this ascription :

(1) The same writers who attribute our Gospel to St. Matthew state that he wrote it in Hebrew or Aramaic. Now it is clear that our Gospel was composed in Greek, and is based upon Greek sources. This is certain so far as the material drawn from the Second Gospel is concerned, and probable for the sayings drawn from the Matthaean Logia.

(2) It does not seem very probable that the Apostle Matthew should have written a Gospel from second-hand materials. The work lacks that freshness of presentation which we should expect from an eye-witness of many of the events.

How then explain the ascription of the Gospel to him? Because the book, in a sense in which the statement is not true of St. Luke's Gospel, is based directly upon the collection of sayings compiled by the Apostle. We must, therefore, suppose that the author was an otherwise unknown Jewish Christian of Palestine, who about the year A.D. 70 compiled his Gospel, using as his framework the Second Gospel, but borrowing largely from the Matthaean Logia, and inserting also some Palestinian traditions with which he was familiar. The Gospel, as it left his hand, represents the conception of Christ's Person and work which was dominant in the Palestinian Church in the middle of the 1st cent. A.D. To Christians there Jesus was the Jewish King-Messiah. His life on earth was only the prelude to His sovereignty. For He was to come again as Son of Man at the end of the age, and that was imminent, and would follow immediately upon the final downfall of the Jewish polity.

5. Historical value.—So far as the question of the historical value of the detail given in the Gospel is concerned, we may set aside for our present purpose all that is drawn from St. Mark's Gospel. The value of that is a consideration for a writer on the Second Gospel (see above, p. 133 ff., and cf. the Dean of Westminster's Study of the Gospels, and Burkitt's The Gospel History and its Transmission). The sayings drawn from the Matthaean Logia have behind them Apostolic authority, and, allowing for some change of emphasis and possible accretion in the process of transmission, may safely be taken as representing actual utterances of Christ.

The Palestinian traditions peculiar to the Gospel are probably not all of equal weight. The narrative of the supernatural birth is best attested, because the main fact of the story is supported by the tradition known to St. Luke. Of the rest it is difficult to say more than that they are early Palestinian traditions, and we must abstain from condemning them upon purely fanciful grounds as legendary.

But the question of historical value can be raised in a different form, and one of much greater importance. Allowing the substantial accuracy of the bulk of the detail in the Gospel, and without discussing the precise value and importance to be attached to each separate tradition, how far do the main conceptions of Christ and of His doctrine which run through the Gospel correspond to the historical Christ? Did He teach what is here ascribed to Him?

Something may be learned in this connexion if we consider the method of the Evangelist. He presents to us selections from Christ's sayings, arranged in what is clearly often an artificial and literary manner. A good example of this is the Charge to the Twelve. The nucleus of this consists of a few sayings, recorded by St. Mark, addressed to the Twelve when Christ sent them forth on a journey of preaching in Palestine. But the editor of the First Gospel is so little concerned with the actual historical facts that he omits altogether the statements descriptive of their going forth and of their return. The local and temporary mission in Palestine merges itself in his mind in the wider and universal mission to all nations. He draws from his sources many other sayings which had reference to this wider mission work, and adds them to St. Mark's short discourse, regardless of the fact that some of them were not spoken on that particular occasion. Now, selection and artificial grouping of this kind, useful as it is, inevitably involves over-emphasis. Teaching, which would have explained and counter-balanced that which is recorded, is left out, and impressions are given which would be qualified, if the selection given had been larger, or the grouping less artificial. And combined with this feature of arbitrary selection and artificial grouping may be linked the local character of the Gospel, and the early date of its material. For it is clear that the Jewish-Christian disciples in the early Church stood too near to the life of the Christ to be able to form any adequate conception of the true meaning of His person or His work. Jesus had, we may be sure, said many things that were obscure at the moment of utterance, had spoken sometimes in parable, sometimes in symbol, sometimes in paradox. And the first Christians of Jerusalem did, it is clear, what, after all, others since them have often done, i.e. they interpreted the life of Christ in the light of their own historical surroundings, and selected from His teaching those elements which enabled them to adapt their ideas of His meaning to their own lives, without making an absolute breach with all that life had hitherto meant for them. The development of history is, as we now see, the truest interpreter of much that Christ said, and not until Jerusalem fell could His teaching about the future of Christianity become clear.

We shall expect, then, to find in the Gospel an over-emphasis upon certain points arising from artificial grouping of sayings, and from omission of other aspects of Christ's teaching. We shall also not be surprised to find interpretations of His sayings which the later developments of history have proved to be mistaken. Let us apply this to the chief conceptions of the Gospel.

(1) The permanence of the Law.—If we may judge from the general tenor of the NT evidence, Christ laid down no hard and fast rules for dealing with the difficult problem of the obligations of the Mosaic Law. But on special occasions He seems to have given expression to the idea that particular precepts or sanctions belonged to a by-gone age, and had lost their validity. St. Mark (who is here supported by St. Luke and St. Paul) represents Him as teaching that the tacit sanction of divorce by Dt 24¹⁻⁴ should be set aside as a concession to weakness, and should, from a Christian point of view, be superseded by an ideal view of marriage as a tie which could not be broken. St. Mark again represents Him as implicitly annulling the Mosaic distinctions between clean and unclean meats, on the ground that defilement was moral and internal, not external and ceremonial. And the fact that He taught views of the Law which were not those of orthodox Judaism, is suggested by the statements that the Pharisees attempted to entrap Him into some statement about the Law, or upon subjects with which the Law dealt, which could be used as an accusation against Him (Mk 10² [πειράζοντες], Mt 22³⁵ [πειράζων]). But the history of the early Church proves that it was difficult for the first Jewish disciples to suppose that the Messiah had ever countenanced the view that any part of the OT Scriptures had lost its original hold upon the consciences of men. This is the standpoint of the editor of the First Gospel. Christ had taught that not a letter should pass from the Law until all had been fulfilled, and that anyone who relaxed the authority of the least commandment of the Law should be least in the Kingdom of heaven (5¹⁷⁻²⁰). And not only was there this general statement of the permanent validity of the Law in general, but special laws had been sanctioned and reaffirmed by Christ as still valid and obligatory. Divorce must be sanctioned when there had been fornication (πορνεία) (5³² 19⁹). The saying about clean and unclean had reference not to the Mosaic Law, but to the Pharisaic traditions about eating with unwashed hands (15²⁰). The Christian disciple who had a case against his brother was to take two or three witnesses, that the Mosaic Law might be satisfied (18¹⁶). And in the great tribulation Christians were to pray that their flight might not fall on the Sabbath, lest the Law should be broken (24²⁰). It is clear that the editor regarded the Mosaic Law as still binding in all its details on Christian men. Now it is probable that we must make allowance here for some over-emphasis due to local and national prejudice which interpreted Christ's sayings in the direction which the history of the Jewish people seemed to warrant, and which took effect in the selection, and arrangement, and interpretation of such of His sayings as lent themselves to the impression which it was desired to produce.

The most obvious instance of this process may be found in Mt.'s treatment of Mk 10¹⁻¹². That narrative is perfectly clear, coherent, and decisive. The Pharisees, who knew well that Christ taught a doctrine about the sanctity of marriage which seemed to set aside the sanction of divorce by the Law (Dt 24¹⁻⁴), came to test Him, i.e. to get from Him a direct statement which would enable them to say that He was attacking the Mosaic ordinance. He met their challenge with the expected answer. The permission of divorce by the Law was a concession to human weakness. From an ideal standpoint, the marriage tie was indissoluble. The man or woman* who put away their partner committed adultery. Nothing can be clearer than this, and it is in accordance with the tradition of Christ's teaching, preserved by St. Luke (16¹⁸) and by St. Paul (1 Co 7^{10, 11}). But the editor of the First Gospel has introduced hopeless confusion into the narrative. He represents the Pharisees as asking for an interpretation of Dt 24¹⁻⁴. The Jewish theologians were divided upon the point. Some—the school of Shammai—argued that by רבר ערה some act of unchastity was intended. Cf. Giffin, 90a: 'No one shall divorce his wife unless there be found in her something unchaste' (רבר ערה). They thus placed the emphasis upon the word ערה. But others—the school of Hillel—allowed divorce for any idle pretext, emphasizing the word רבר. Accordingly, the Pharisees in Mt. ask, 'Is it lawful to put away a wife for every cause?' Christ answers, as in Mk., that from an ideal standpoint marriage is indissoluble. The Pharisees appeal to Dt 24. Now clearly Christ should be represented as reaffirming and supporting what He has said by declaring (as in Mk.) that the permission of Dt 24 was a concession to human weakness, and that a higher principle was to be found in the purpose of God as declared in Gn 1²⁷. But, instead, He is represented as saying that πορνεία constituted an exception to the ideal principle. Thus He is made to reaffirm the Law of Dt 24, interpreted in the sense of the school of Shammai, and to acknowledge the permanent obligation of a sanction which He had just criticised.

It seems clear that the editor of Mt. has confused Mk.'s consistent narrative by introducing into it a clause which entirely confuses the point at issue. Now, if we ask why he has done this, we remember that earlier in his Gospel (5³²) he has inserted a saying (probably from the Matthaean Logia) in which this same exception to the general rule occurs. The words are not identical. In 5³² they are παρεκτός λόγου πορνείας, but in 19⁹ (εἰ μὴ ἴτι πορνεία (but BDS³ 33 latt have παρεκτός λόγου πορνείας here also). The two clauses look like alternative renderings of the phrase רבר ערה, which the school of Shammai declared to be the ground of divorce. That is to say, in 19⁹ the editor has blended with Mk.'s narrative another tradition of the Lord's words, which was furnished to him by his Palestinian source; and we have a clear case of a saying of Christ altered in process of transmission to bring it into accordance with the Mosaic Law. Of course the saying of 5³² may be as genuine and original as Mk 10¹⁻¹². It is quite possible that Christ should have on one occasion taught as Mk. represents Him, and on another have sanctioned the necessity of divorce for πορνεία. But there is a good deal of probability in the supposition that, as a matter of fact, He appealed to the ideal view of marriage as a principle which should guide men, leaving it to the common sense of His disciples to realize that when the sin of men makes a breach in the ideal law, such sin drags with it the necessity of divorce. In this case the clause which allows an exception will be an accretion to His words, added in the early Palestinian Church to His simple statement that no man must divorce his wife and no woman her husband, in order to harmonize it with the supposed teaching of the OT, and then transferred by Mt. into Mk.'s narrative.

Another somewhat similar case may be found in Mk 7¹⁴⁻²³—Mt 15¹⁰⁻²⁰. The reading and interpretation of Mk 7¹⁰ are obscure. According to one reading, καθαρίζον πάντα τὰ βρώματα may be a comment of the Evangelist, to the effect that Christ's teaching on this occasion 'purged all meats,' i.e. cancelled the Mosaic distinctions between clean and unclean meats. But however this may be, the narrative leaves on the mind of the reader the impression that the inevitable effect of such teaching as is here recorded would be to make null these distinctions of the Mosaic Law. Now the editor of Mt. clearly wished to avoid this inference. He omits the clause καθαρίζον πάντα τὰ βρώματα, and at the end of the discourse turns the mind of the reader from the inevitable inference by adding the clause, 'But to eat with unwashed hands defileth not a man,' as though the whole discourse had been dealing with the Pharisaic regulations about ceremonial hand-washing. Thus he carries the reader back at once to the previous question, and, so far as possible, prevents him from drawing the natural and inevitable conclusion from the discourse as recorded by Mk.

A somewhat similar desire to avoid words which might seem out of harmony with OT regulations has probably caused the omission in Mt 12⁸ of the clause, 'The Sabbath was made for man, and not man for the Sabbath,' found in Mk 2²⁷.

Lastly, an example of over-emphasis due to arrangement of * For divorce by a woman amongst the Jews, cf. Aramaic Papyri discovered at Assuan, p. 12 (London, G. Moring, 1906).

sayings may be found in Mt 5:17-20. It is quite probable that vv. 18, 19 are genuine sayings of Christ spoken on some occasion when their meaning could not be mistaken, as a paradoxical expression of the permanent value of the moral elements in the OT. But as they now stand they hopelessly confuse the plain tenor of the Sermon. The illustrations given in vv. 21-43 make it clear that the 'fulfilling' of v. 17 meant to make clear the true spiritual meaning of the Law. But vv. 18, 19 interpret πληρῶσαι in another sense; namely, to reaffirm and carry out in detail, which is indeed in harmony with the teaching of Rabbinical Judaism, but is inconsistent with the plain meaning of the rest of the chapter. If vv. 18, 19 be omitted as extraneous to this context, and due to the practice of the editor of bringing together sayings which in any way bear upon the same subject, the meaning of vv. 17, 20-43 is quite clear. Christ did not, as His adversaries argued, subvert the Law. He reaffirmed its spiritual principles, and gave to it a deeper meaning than that arrived at by Rabbinical exegesis. The 'righteousness' of His disciples was to exceed that of the Pharisees, because it would be based upon a more spiritual understanding of the principles underlying the OT revelation.

(2) The near approach of the Kingdom.—A still more difficult problem is raised by the question, Did Jesus Christ promise that He would come again on the clouds of heaven within the lifetime of the generation to which He spoke? The Palestinian Church, as represented by the First Gospel, certainly believed that this was the case. But did they misunderstand Him? And the question may be raised in an earlier form. Nearly all the terms used in sayings of this nature were familiar technical theological terms in use in the apocalyptic writings, which expressed one side of contemporary Messianic expectation. E.g. 'the Son of Man,' 'the clouds of heaven,' the 'coming' of the Son of Man, 'the throne of glory,' 'the coming age,' 'the day of judgment,' the division between righteous and wicked, the condemnation to Gehenna, the inheritance of the Kingdom by the righteous, the feast in the Kingdom, and 'eternal life'—all these formed part of the ordinary mental equipment of every writer who tried to express the hopes of Israel under apocalyptic imagery. Did the Lord use them of Himself, or did the Palestinian Church try to express her faith and belief in Him as the Divine Messiah by transferring to Him the phrases and the imagery of current Messianic belief? Attempts have been made to show that the second supposition is the more probable,* but, so far as the present writer can judge, they have failed in their aim. For it is impossible to disentangle all apocalyptic imagery from Christ's teaching, without entirely destroying the credit of the Gospels as historical records. This kind of imagery and metaphor is, of course, more accumulated in the First Gospel than in the others, and one or two phrases, as, e.g., the 'end' or 'consummation of the age,' and 'the throne of glory,' occur only in it, but still all the Gospels contain a good deal. If Christ did not speak of Himself as the 'Son of Man' and of His 'coming' at the Last Day, and of other similar things, then we have no solid ground for believing that any saying recorded of Him is genuine.

But if we assume that Christ did use of Himself this apocalyptic language, what shall we say of the more important question, Are, then, the conceptions which His sayings, as they are arranged in the First Gospel, seem to convey, to be taken as a part of the real teaching? And here we shall necessarily have to take into consideration the following facts amongst others.

(a) It seems clear that Christ must have given utterance to words which left upon the minds of the early disciples the impression that He had promised to come again shortly. For this conception not only pervades the Synoptic Gospels,

* E.g. it has been argued on linguistic grounds that Christ could not have spoken of Himself as the 'Son of Man,' and that much of the apocalyptic imagery in Mk 13, Mt 24, is due to the blending of a Jewish Apocalypse with genuine sayings of Christ. But the former theory is still unproven, and the second is an unsuccessful exegetical device to solve a difficulty.

but is found in almost every part of the NT literature.

(b) It was, however, inevitable that any expressions of time to which He gave utterance should have been interpreted by His Jewish adherents to imply a short time literally. For if we grant for a moment, for the sake of argument, that He had foreknowledge of the future development of history, it is clear to us now that it would have been inconsistent with His methods of teaching to have unveiled to His disciples the historical details of future ages. On the other hand, He may well have wished that His return should be, as it has been, the soul's pole-star of His lovers in every successive age, and have left the period of His Coming veiled in ambiguous language. In that case the early Jewish Church has been influenced by the contemporary Messianic belief which always placed the coming of the Messiah in the near future, and has selected from Christ's sayings those which were most easily interpreted to convey the impression of the nearness of the Kingdom.

This will partly explain the large part which sayings referring to the near approach of the Kingdom play in the First Gospel. Some of these occur only in this Gospel, as, e.g., 10²³ 13²⁴⁻³⁰, 36-43, 47-50 19^{28a} 25¹⁻¹³, 31-46. In other cases a saying, the original form of which was found in the Second Gospel, has been modified so as to make it express clearly this idea. For example, in Mk 9¹ occur the words 'until they see the kingdom of God come with power.' Although a reference to the immediately preceding verse would naturally suggest that this coming of the 'kingdom of God' was identical with the coming of the Son of Man with His angels, the words taken by themselves might be interpreted by the reader to refer to the Transfiguration which follows, or to some later event, such as the Day of Pentecost, or the Fall of Jerusalem. The editor of the First Gospel has been unwilling to leave them in this ambiguity, and by changing them into 'the Son of Man coming in His kingdom,' interprets them unmistakably of the coming in glory with the angels (16²⁷), which he then believed to be about to take place during the lifetime of some to whom the words were originally spoken. Again, in Mk 14⁶² occur the words 'you shall see the Son of Man sitting at the right hand of the power, and coming with the clouds of heaven.' The editor of the First Gospel (Mt 26⁶⁴) inserts before 'you shall see' the words ἀπ' ἄρου. This phrase is difficult, because the words should mean 'from this present moment' (cf. 'Matthew,' l.c.). But since the period between the Crucifixion and the Resurrection must on any interpretation be excluded, it is probable that the words mean 'you shall soon, shortly, see,' etc. That is again an expression of the belief of the editor that the Second Coming was near at hand. A similar case is found in Mt 24²⁹, where the editor inserts into Mk's discourse the word 'immediately,' thus again linking the Second Coming closely with the Fall of Jerusalem.

These facts suggest irresistibly the conclusion that the editor or the tradition which he follows has, by accumulating sayings of one kind, and by modifying others to some slight extent in order to give them the required meaning, given the impression that the Lord taught a nearness of His coming to inaugurate the Kingdom, which goes beyond what He Himself originally intended. He spoke, no doubt, of the coming of the Son of Man in glory, using apocalyptic language, which He may or may not have intended to be taken literally. The early Jewish Church has interpreted it quite literally, and read into it that element of immediacy which is presupposed in all apocalyptic writings. He forecast, no doubt, the catastrophe to which the shortsighted policy of the Jewish authorities was hurrying that ill-starred people. The early Church linked together these two classes of utterance, and believed that both would receive their fulfilment at the same period.

If, then, we must allow for some over-emphasis, some foreshortening in the presentation of this conception in the First Gospel, we shall naturally ask if there is not evidence that Christ's teaching anticipated, in fact, a longer development of history than that here presupposed. Even within the First Gospel itself many of His sayings suggest a different interpretation from that put upon them by the editor (e.g. the parables of the Mustard Seed, the Drag-net, and see below). And when we pass to the writers who have emancipated themselves from Jewish theological conceptions, we see that Christ's words were regarded as presupposing a longer development of historical events than that suggested by the First Gospel. This, of course, is true of the later Epistles of St. Paul, of the Fourth Gospel, and of St. Luke. And the verdict of the historian must be that the Jewish-Christian interpretation of Christ's words upon this point is not likely to be most accurate, because it is Jewish and because it is early. Rather these two factors would, in the nature of things, concur to impel the first Jewish Christians to an interpretation of His sayings which is one-sided, and in part over-emphasized, just because it is local and early. The best interpreter of much that Christ taught has been the later development of history.

(3) The scope of the Gospel.—It is known that the later Jewish theologians had no strictly formulated views of the relation of the Gentiles to the future Messianic salvation. In some few passages of their writings, especially in the Sibylline Oracles, it would seem as though they looked forward to the admittance of Gentiles into the Kingdom on equal terms with the Jews, simply on the ground of obedience to God (cf. Sib. Or. iii. 740). But the prevailing tendency was very different. When the Kingdom came, the Gentiles would be annihilated; or they would be condemned to everlasting punishment in Gehenna; or they would, if they were righteous, participate in the Messianic salvation, but only as proselytes, or as subjects of the Jewish people.

To the early Jewish Christians, who had been trained in such conceptions as these, it was inevitable that Christ's teaching, if it were universal in ultimate scope and intention, implicitly rather than explicitly should seem to point to a national rather than a universal Kingdom. That this was the belief of the first disciples at Jerusalem, the first half of the Acts bears witness. Only the pressure of circumstances could force the Apostles to go back to Christ's words, and to see that they bore within them the seeds of a belief in a universal, spiritual monarchy, which was quite unlimited in scope. It needed a vision to convince St. Peter of this, and Gal 3 shows how difficult the lesson was for him. In this respect the First Gospel has a twofold outlook. Underlying the surface there may clearly be seen, in the words of Christ which are recorded, expressions which would naturally convey the implication that Christianity was intended to influence all mankind. The gospel was to be preached to all nations (24¹⁴). The disciples were to make disciples of all nations (28¹⁹). Many were to come from east and west, and sit down within the Kingdom (8¹¹). The Kingdom was to be given to another nation, and to be taken from the Jews (21⁴³). But these sayings have all the appearance of words which were interpreted in a limited sense by the editor of the Gospel. If the Kingdom was to come immediately after the fall of Jerusalem, then the preaching to the Gentiles could be but a superficial process. It was to be 'for a testimony.' Moreover, there is nothing in the Gospel to suggest an unconditioned equality of Jew and Gentile. The supposition is rather probable that the editor assumed that such Gentiles as became Christians would do so as proselytes of the Jewish-Christian Church. They were to be 'made disciples,' that is to say, to be merged in the Jewish-Christian Church. If they had not the fitting wedding garment, they would be excluded from the Kingdom; and the garment probably symbolizes, in the editor's mind, the 'righteousness' which was to be greater than that of the Pharisees, only as being based upon a deeper insight into the spiritual intention of the Mosaic Law, which by no means permitted any relaxation of its obligations.

Here again we must, as it would seem, make some allowance for over-emphasis, due partly to artificial arrangement of Christ's sayings, partly to a limited insight into their true scope and meaning, which was due to past religious training. Some lapse of time, some clearing of spiritual vision by the actual facts of life when Christianity came into contact with pagan peoples, was needed before it could be realized that if Christianity was intended for the Jew first and also for the Greek, it nevertheless was to include them both in a position of absolute equality, and to appeal to men without respect to differences of race or creed. WILLOUGHBY C. ALLEN.

MEALS.—The prevalent custom amongst the Jews in the time of Jesus was to have two formal meals in the day. Both these are referred to more than once in the Gospels by the terms ἀριστον and δείπνον (cf. Lk 14¹², where both words occur in the same context), and we know from these writings that it was to either of these meals that guests were invited to partake of the festive hospitality of their friends (cf. 14¹² 11³⁷ 14^{16c}). Besides these, it was customary to have an informal meal at an early hour of the day (ἀκράτισμα or ἀριστον πρωίνον), which was a very light repast, consisting of a piece of bread, or bread with some accompanying relish, such as oil or melted butter (Robinson, *BEP*² ii. 18). This meal is only once referred to in the NT (Jn 21^{12, 15}), and there the word used is the same as that which occurs in the Lukan narrative of Jesus 'dining' (ἀριστῶν) in the Pharisee's house (Lk 11^{37c}).

It is probably this meal which 'the virtuous woman' of Proverbs rises so early to provide (Pr 29⁸³ [LXX]=31¹⁵ [Heb.]), and which at the present time constitutes the breakfast of the populace in Palestine. It is, moreover, probable that it is this meal which is called in the Talmud the 'early snack' (פֶּת שְׁמֵרַת).

though Edersheim refers this descriptive title to the ἄριστον of the NT (see his Life and Times of Jesus the Messiah, ii. 205 n. 3; cf. also Plummer, 'St. Luke,' in Internat. Crit. Com. on Lk 11³⁷).

The mid-day meal, corresponding somewhat to the modern luncheon, was partaken of at hours varying, according to rank and occupation, from 10 a.m. till noon (Shabbath, 10α). It was partaken of immediately after the business of the forenoon was concluded, whether in the market-place (Mk 7⁴), in the synagogue (Edersheim, vol. ii. p. 205; cf. 1 K 13⁷), or during the heat of the middle of the day, when the labourers were compelled to desist from their field work (cf. Ru 2¹⁴). Josephus informs us that the Jews were required by their Law to make their breakfast (ἀριστοποιεῖσθαι) at noon on Sabbath days (Vita, 54, cf. also Gn 43^{16, 25} and 2 S 24¹⁵, where the LXX has ἕως ὥρας ἀρίστου, which is rendered by Pesh. 'till the sixth hour'). This, too, was generally a meal of a simple character, consisting of bread with parched corn, the former being moistened with a little vinegar (Ru 2¹⁴), or of bread broken down into a bowl of pottage, together with some weak or diluted wine (στάμνον οἴνου κεκρασμένον, Bel³³ [LXX, Swete's ed.]). Fish grilled by laying it upon the hot charcoal (ἀνθρακιά) was also a common article of food accompanying the bread (see Jn 21⁹).

The principal meal of the whole day was the δείπνον, which was eaten after the day's work was finished (see Lk 17⁷). This would naturally be about the time of the going down of the sun, which will explain the Lukan narrative of Jesus and the two disciples at Emmaus (πρὸς ἑσπέραν, Lk 24^{29t}). This was the time of the day when Jesus is recorded by the three Synoptists to have miraculously fed the multitudes (ὥρα πολλή, Mk 6³⁵; ὀψίας δὲ γενομένης . . . καὶ ἡ ὥρα ἤδη παρήλθεν, Mt 14¹⁵; ἡ δὲ ἡμέρα ἤρξατο κλίνειν, Lk 9¹²). The Passover was also eaten during the evening, and it was at the conclusion of that festal meal (μετὰ τὸ δεῖπνήσαι) that Jesus instituted the Feast memorial of His death.

We find numerous references to the δῶπνον in the writings of Josephus, from whom we learn incidentally that this was usually an elaborate meal and closely connected with sacrificial feasting; that sometimes it was prolonged to a late hour, which may explain the Preacher's reference to the dangerous habit of over-eating before retiring to sleep (Ec 5¹¹, cf. To 8¹; Jos. Vita, 44, 63, Ant. vi. iv. 1, xiv. xv. 11, etc.; 3 Mac 5¹⁴).

The principal constituent of every meal was bread, which was regarded, indeed, as the meal itself. So much so was this the case, that the word 'bread' (ἄρτος) was used by the ancient Hebrews either for bread in particular or for food in general (see Encyc. Bibl. art. 'Bread,' vol. i. col. 604). It was over the bread that the blessing was pronounced which was thus supposed to have been spoken over all the rest of the solid food eaten during the first part of the meal. So strongly was this held by all Jews, that for them bread assumed a quasi-sacred character, and elaborate rules were devised for its treatment at table (see Edersheim, op. cit. vol. ii. pp. 205-210).

The Hebraistic σῶμα ἄρτον occurs again and again as a synonym for an ordinary meal (Mt 15², Mk 7², Lk 14^{1, 15}, cf. Jn 21¹³, Gn 43¹⁶ [LXX], Ex 32⁹ [LXX], etc., see art. BREAD above and in Hastings' DB, vol. i. p. 315^b). Keeping this fact in mind, we are enabled to feel the force of Jesus' words in His great sacramental discourse (Jn 6²⁶⁻⁵⁹), and also to understand the true reason for the rejection by the Jews of His reiterated claims. It was not that their interpretation of His words was carnal (cf. vv. 52-58). 'There was no gross misunderstanding on their part, but a clear perception of the claim involved in the Lord's words' (Westcott, Gospel of St. John, ad loc.). The phrases in which He couched these claims were such as would present no real difficulty to a thinking Jew, as they might easily be paralleled out of his sacred literature (ὁ ἄρτος τῆς ζωῆς, ὁ ἄρτος τοῦ Θεοῦ, ὁ ἄρτος ὁ ζῶν, ὁ ἄρτος ὁ ἐξ οὐρανοῦ καταβάς). Bread, which is the representative and symbol of all earthly food, is the type of Him who is the Representative Man, imparting life to all who will partake of His Spirit.

On three different occasions we are told that Jesus was the invited guest of a Pharisee; and, so far as the circumstances in each instance testify, it was at one of their ordinary meals that He was present. It is remarkable that it is St. Luke who records all these occurrences, and at the same time it is noteworthy that he uses three different expressions in his wording of the formal invitations (ἵνα φάγῃ μετ' αὐτοῦ, Lk 7³⁶; ὅπως ἀριστήσῃ παρ' αὐτῶ, 11³⁷; σαββάτω φαγεῖν ἄρτον, 14¹). Not only are the invitations couched in varying phrases, but St. Luke uses different words when referring to the attitude of the guests at the meals (κατεκλιθῆ, 7³⁶; ἀπέπεσεν, 11³⁷; συναρακειμένον, 14¹⁵). There is every probability that in each case it was the mid-day meal to which Jesus was invited. It became customary amongst the Jews to make three elaborate meals on the Sabbath day ('Observa diem Sabbati; non Judaicis deliciis,' quoted by Plummer, op. cit. p. 354). So much so, indeed, was this the case, that specially devised rules were made for carrying out the observance of the Sabbath feasts, and special spiritual benefits were supposed to be conferred on those who, overcoming the difficulties interposed by poverty, supplied themselves with the choicest procurable food for that day (see Pesh., viii. 7, and the examples quoted from Shabbath by Lightfoot in his Hor. Heb. et Talm. on Lk 14¹; cf. Edersheim, op. cit. ii. 52, 437; Farrar, Life of Christ, ii. 119 n. 2). It was on the occasion of one of these Sabbath meals that a fellow-guest of Jesus, on hearing Him speak, answered with the exclamation, 'Blessed is he that shall eat bread (φάγεται ἄρτον) in the kingdom of God' (Lk 14¹⁵), referring, of course, to the popular Jewish idea that the Messianic Kingdom was to be ushered in by a banquet, and that feasting was to be the chief occupation of those who shared its glories (cf. Is 25⁶),—an idea which finds a place in the illustrative teaching of Jesus on the universal character of the future Kingdom of God (cf. ἀνακληθῶσονται ἐν τῇ βασιλείᾳ τοῦ Θεοῦ, Lk 13²⁹; see Wendt, Lehre Jesu, Eng. tr. vol. i. pp. 217, 221).

At first sight it may seem strange that Jesus should countenance the Jewish custom of Sabbath banqueting, which was carried to such excess that its character for luxury became proverbial. At the same time we must remember that the principle which lay at the root of this method of feasting was the honour of the Sabbath day (cf. three quotations from Shabbath illustrative of this in Lightfoot, op. cit. iii. 149). Nor was this practice out of harmony with Jesus' views and teaching on the Sabbath rest, so long as it was conducted in a spirit of humility, mutual toleration, and charity (cf. Lk 14⁷⁻¹⁴). It is of interest, and in this respect not without significance, to notice that, on the last Sabbath spent by Jesus before His Passion, He was the chief guest at a festive meal (ἐποίησαν οὖν αὐτῶ δείπνον ἐκεῖ, Jn 12²). This was probably on the evening of the Sabbath day as it was drawing to a close and passing away, when festivities were of the most liberal and elaborate character (epulae lautiores); and it is evident, from the three narratives (St. Luke's story of the anointing of Jesus by the 'woman who was a sinner' [7³⁷] can scarcely be a record of the same event [see, however, Hengstenberg, Com. on St. John, Eng. tr. pp. 1-33, etc.]) that it made a deep impression on the minds of Jesus' followers (cf. Mk 14³, Mt 26^{6t}, Jn 12²). From the way in which St. John dispenses with the use of the nominative before the verb, it would seem that this meal was of a semi-public character, designed to do honour to Jesus, and that the house of 'Simon the leper' was made the meeting-place for all who wished to meet Him (cf. Westcott, ad loc., and Edersheim, op. cit. ii. 357 f.). It is impossible not to be struck with the way in which Jesus makes use of the opportunity afforded by His presence at these meals on the Sabbath, to inculcate lessons of large-hearted charity even when His host is inclined to be the discourteous critic (Lk 7³⁹ 11³⁸, 45ff., 14^{1ff.}, cf. Jn 12^{1f.}). There is no appearance of disapproval in His attitude towards what was tending to, if it had not already become, an abuse, because there were latent possibilities for good in the joyous and festive Sabbath. It was to these possibilities that He directed His attention.

Acting on these principles, we can understand His words and deeds on the evening when He instituted 'the Lord's Supper' (κυριακὸν δείπνον, I Co 11²⁰). As we have seen, the Jewish custom was to constitute the bread the representative food at their meals. In the same way wine was considered the representative drink. Many and elaborate rules were formulated as to the manner in which blessings were to be said over these, and the discussions arising out of the etiquette to be observed degenerated into meaningless verbalism (see Berakhoth, 35a, 36a, 41b, referred to by Edersheim, ii, 206). In spite of this spiritual decadence and barren ritualism, Jesus did what was characteristic of His general teaching. He rescued the primitive act from its debased surroundings, and the wine blessed (τὸ ποτήριον τῆς εὐλογίας) became the means of a partaking of 'the blood of Christ' (κοινωνία τοῦ αἵματος), and the loaf blessed and broken (τὸν ἄρτον ὃν κλάμεν, ἄρτον εὐλογήσας) became the joyful (εὐχαριστήσας) communion of 'the body of Christ' (cf. I Co 10^{16f.} 11²³⁻²⁷, Lk 22^{19f.}, Mk 14^{22f.}, Mt 26^{26f.}). In a spirit somewhat similar He dealt with the elaborate ceremonial washings which His Jewish contemporaries sought to elevate to the rank of a compulsory religious rite (Mt 15² = Mk 7^{2ff.}, Lk 11³⁸; for a description of this Jewish practice during meals, see Edersheim, ii, 207). Not the least remarkable of the lessons, objective and spiritual, inculcated by Jesus was that in which He transformed what had become a tedious and worse than meaningless series of forms into a beautiful example of social service and personal humility (see Jn 13^{4ff.}, cf. Lk 22²⁷). By this single act He gathered up into one the various customs of His day, including the hospitable one of the guests' feet being washed by their host's servants before they sat down to eat, and taught His disciples the dignity of labour in the service of humanity (cf. Mt 18¹⁻¹⁴, see Westcott on 13³, and Plummer, 'St. John' in Comb. Gr. Text. ad loc.). Nor must we omit to note here that the Church's Eucharistic meal constitutes the most emphatic object-lesson of the essential oneness of all Christian people in a brotherhood as extensive as her own borders, as intensive and real as any of the claims of Jesus to rule within the sphere of human thought (cf. πάντες δὲ ὑμεῖς ἀδελφοὶ ἐστε Mt 23⁸; and Philm 16).

Several different words are employed by the Evangelists to denote the bodily attitude of the Jews at their meals, all of which, however, imply that the custom was to recline with the body stretched out (cf. Edersheim, ii, 207). In this respect it is interesting to note the differences in usage, and the preferences for one or more of these words which characterize each of the writers. St. Luke, for example, uses a word no fewer than 5 times which occurs nowhere else in the NT (κατακλιθῆναι, 7³⁶ 14⁸ 24³⁰; κατακλινεῖν, 9¹⁴⁻¹⁵). Hobart states that in his use of the active voice St. Luke is employing 'the medical term for laying patients, or causing them to lie in bed, placing them in certain positions during operations—making them recline in a bath, etc.' (The Medical Language of St. Luke, p. 69; cf., however, Luke 27¹²). As might be expected, this Evangelist exhibits a richer and more flexible vocabulary than the others. On the only occasion of his using the verb κατακείσθαι (Lk 5²⁰ [D has here ἀνακειμένων]) for sitting at meals, he seems to employ it because he has already, in the immediately preceding context, made use of the same word to express a different idea (cf. 5²⁵). The same night, of course, he said of St. Mark, who has this word in the same two senses in the parallel narrative. It is not probable, however, that St. Luke sacrificed his customary literary independence by a verbal copying of St. Mark, who, moreover, uses the same word for Jesus' reclining at Supper in Bethany (Mk 14⁹).

Of the 5 different words employed by the four Evangelists when speaking of sitting down to meals, St. Luke uses all (ἀνακλινεῖν twice, ἀναπτύττειν 4 times, ἀνακίσειν with its compound συν- 5 times, κατακίσειν once, κατακλινεῖν 5 times); St. Matthew uses three (ἀνακλινεῖν twice, ἀναπτύττειν once, ἀνακίσειν and its compound συν- 7 times); St. Mark uses four (ἀνακλινεῖν once, ἀναπτύττειν twice, ἀνακίσειν and its compound συν- 5 times, κατακίσειν twice); St. John is characteristically limited in his use, and employs only two of these words (ἀναπτύττειν 5 times, ἀνακίσειν 4 times without any employment of its compound).

In the narrative of the conversion and call of Levi (Matthew), which is common to the three Synoptists, St. Luke is the only one who expressly states that Jesus was the guest of the new disciple (Lk 5²⁹), the latter having made a feast in honour of his recently discovered Master. St. Matthew uses the vague expression ἐν τῇ οἰκίᾳ (Mt 9¹⁰), which may mean 'inside' as contrasted with 'outside' (ἐπὶ τὸ τελώνιον, 9⁹), where lay the scene of Levi's call (cf. Plummer, ad loc.). St. Mark, on the other hand, seems to have understood that Jesus was the host and not the guest (cf. κατακείσθαι αὐτὸν ἐν τῇ οἰκίᾳ αὐτοῦ, Mk 2¹⁵, where his use of the same pronoun in the same sentence would point to this interpretation; see also συναέκειντο τῷ Ἰησοῦ, 2¹⁵; τῶν συναρακειμένων σοι, Lk 14¹⁰; τοῖς συναρακειμένοις [sc. τῷ Ἡρώδῃ], Mk 6²²). On the other hand, it does not seem at all certain that either of these two writers connected the conversion of Levi with the entertainment (cf. καὶ ἐγένετο, Mt 9¹⁰; καὶ γίνεται, Mk 2¹⁵, which marks the commencement of a fresh narrative). It is improbable that St. Luke acted merely the part of interpreter by introducing his categorical assertion as a gloss (καὶ ἐποίησεν δοχὴν μεγάλην Λεβείν αὐτῷ κ.τ.λ., Lk 5²⁹), thus doing away with a previous ambiguity. It is more likely that he had sufficient oral, if not documentary, authority to justify his statement (the word δοχῆ is peculiar to St. Luke, and is used by him only once afterwards as a general equivalent for ἄριστον ἢ δείπνον, 14^{12f.}); and we have St. Mark's authority for connecting the conversion of Simon and Andrew with hospitality to their newly-found Master and His other disciples (Mk 1^{16ff.}, 29ff.). Whether, however, this partaking by Jesus of a Sabbath-meal in the house of Simon Peter was secondary to the purpose of healing the fever-stricken πενθερά τοῦ Σίμωνος, would be difficult to determine. Nor must we forget the possibility that St. Luke's authority for the statement that Jesus was the guest of His latest convert Levi may have been influenced by the parallel case we are here noticing—the conversion of the brothers Simon and Andrew and the subsequent entertainment in their own house of the newly discovered Messiah (cf. Jn 14¹).

MEASURES.—See WEIGHTS AND MEASURES.

MEDIATOR.—Introductory.—The title 'Mediator' is applied to our Lord in the NT only by St. Paul (1 Ti 2⁵) and the author of Hebrews (8⁶ 9¹⁵ 12²⁴). In Gal 3¹⁹.²⁰ St. Paul's argument implies that there is an important sense in which Christ cannot be fitly called a mediator. Here Moses is described by this title, and the mediator (generic) is sharply distinguished from God. Moses was a person coming between two contracting parties, God and Israel, with the consequence that the law administered by Moses is apparently in opposition to the promises of God which depend upon God only. Obviously Christ is not such a mediator as Moses. He does not come between two contracting parties, for He Himself is the representative human receiver of God's promise, and the Divine Son through whom we receive that promise. He includes both parties in His own Person, instead of coming between them. He is not the instrument of a contract, but the embodiment of a Divine gift. This passage implies that Christ united God and man, two parties previously at variance, in a wholly unique manner. And the same truth is asserted in the verse which calls Him 'the one mediator between God and men' (1 Ti 2⁵). In what sense St. Paul calls Christ a mediator will be shown more fully in § 3.

1. The Synoptic Gospels.—Although these do not employ the title 'mediator,' they throughout imply that the teaching, life, and death of Jesus were mediatorial. The familiar old division of His mediatorial functions into those of Prophet, Priest, and King is roughly correct, though it may be better to designate them as those of Prophet, King, and Redeemer. By such a division we are able to find a more natural place for those passages in the Synoptic Gospels which speak of His atoning work, than if we use the word 'Priest.' We are also able to do more justice to the truth that He revealed Himself as already the Messiah during 'the days of his flesh,' and did not teach that His Messianic Kingdom was only an affair of the future.

(a) The 'wisdom' of our Lord impressed His hearers at Nazareth, and when they were offended at the difference which they noted between Him and His humble family, Jesus said, 'A prophet is not without honour, save in his own country, and in his own house' (Mt 13⁵⁴⁻⁵⁸). Here He seems in some way to claim the office of a prophet. And there are several passages which show that the ordinary people inclined to regard Him as a Prophet. See, fully, under art. PROPHET.

(b) He is also King. He claimed to fulfil the Jewish expectation of an ideal King, the Messiah. This cannot be reasonably disputed, in spite of the fact that this claim did not represent all that He was and all that He demanded. The confession of His Messiahship by St. Peter, the dispute between His disciples for places of honour, and especially the desire of the sons of Zebedee to sit on His right hand and His left, cannot be thrown aside as legendary inventions. Nor can we fail to see the Messianic meaning of His triumphal entry into Jerusalem, His trial and answer to the high priest (Mk 14⁶⁵), and the inscription 'The King of the Jews' upon the cross. Apart from His Messianic claim, His life and His death become unintelligible, although He used the actual title very seldom, and rather avoided it on account of the political associations which clung to it. See, further, artt. KING and KINGDOM OF GOD.

(c) Jesus, who is Mediator in revealing God, is also Mediator in redeeming man. He offered to the Father a sacrifice of perfect human obedience which effected a new relation between God and mankind. It was a reparation to God for the disobedience of man.

In dealing with the redemptive work of Christ, we have to consider as of primary importance the place occupied by His death in the theology as well as in the history of the Synoptics. It is frequently asserted or hinted that He did not foresee His death until an advanced period in His ministry, and that, when He found that it was inevitable, He did not attribute to it any power of obtaining the remission of sins. These two theories do not elucidate the Gospels, but simply contradict them. All the accounts of our Lord's baptism represent Him as hearing the words which declare that He is the Son in whom the Father is well pleased (Mt 3¹⁷, Mk 1¹¹, Lk 3²²). He was, therefore, from the first conscious that He fulfilled the Isaianic picture of the Servant of the Lord, who dies as a guilt-offering for the people. In submitting to baptism, He identified Himself with a race that has sinned; in submitting to the subsequent temptation, He identified Himself with a race which suffers when Satan lures it to sin. He also predicted His death early in His ministry. He is the bridegroom who will be taken away in the midst of joy, and His disciples will fast at that day (Mk 2¹⁹.²⁰). Later, He tells how He has to submit to the baptism of His Passion, and feels anguish until it is accomplished. He dreads it; but He desires it, because it is the necessary preliminary of His kindling a sacred fire on earth (Lk 12⁴⁹). With these words we must compare the question addressed to the ambitious sons of Zebedee, whether they can drink of His cup and be baptized with His baptism (Mk 10³⁸). The baptism and the cup represent the will of the Father with all the suffering which the doing of that will entailed. What that suffering was the story of Gethsemane tells us. It was there that He, with a final effort of His human will, identified Himself wholly with the Servant 'wounded for our transgressions.' But this identification had been outlined long before in the words, 'Whosoever would be first among you shall be servant of all. For verily the Son of Man came not to be ministered unto, but to minister, and to give his life a ransom for many' (Mk 10⁴⁵). This acceptance of death was not a mere example of perfect resignation. He had taught His disciples not to fear those who kill the body (Mt 10²⁸). He had assured them that 'he that findeth his life shall lose it; and he that loseth his life for my sake shall find it' (10³⁹). But the disciple who loses his life for Christ's sake does not necessarily win any life except his own, whereas Christ's death avails 'for many.' With this prediction we must connect the words used at the institution of the Lord's Supper. Assuming that Christ did institute this sacrament, we may also assume that He who taught His own not to fear those who kill the body, did not mean that when His blood was shed 'for many' it was shed to save them from being killed by the Jews or Romans. Whether He did or did not add the words 'for the remission of sins,' He must have meant that a new covenant was being made between God and man. His death had some special value in itself, or else the Church would not have continued to show forth the Lord's death (1 Co 11²⁶). The special value which He attached to His own death is made plain by the account of the Lord's Supper contained in the Petrine Gospel of St. Mark no less than in the Pauline Gospel of St. Luke. The shedding of Christ's blood seals a covenant similar to the initial covenant made by Moses between God and the people (Ex 24³⁻⁸); it consecrates a new people to God. It also fulfils Jeremiah's prophecy of a new covenant, of which the very foundation was the forgiveness of sins (Jer 31³¹). And, like the blood of the Paschal lamb, the blood of Jesus saves His people from a destruction that comes from God. With this sacrifice of Jesus His disciples are to hold communion. They appropriate the atonement, and as they appropriate it, it becomes for them a propitiation.

2. Acts of the Apostles and Epp. of St. Peter, St. Jude, and St. James.—The simple teaching about our Lord conveyed in Acts, more especially in chs. 1-12, and in the First Epistle of St. Peter and that of St. Jude and of St. James, justifies us in placing these books in a class by themselves. They represent a theology which in character, if not in date, is primitive, and in close touch with Judaism.

(a) In Acts Jesus is set forth as Prophet, Messiah, Son of God, and Redeemer. From the first He is the Lord Jesus (1⁶. 21). And at Pentecost St. Peter proclaims that 'God hath made him both Lord and Christ, this Jesus whom ye crucified' (2³⁶). He is the Prophet whom Moses had foretold, and those who will not hearken to Him will be utterly destroyed (3²². 23). His Messianic lordship is repeatedly preached; He is the Holy and Righteous One, the Prince of life, the Saviour, the Stone or foundation of the true temple, the Stone now exalted to be the Head of the corner (3¹⁴. 15 5³¹ 4¹¹). He is Lord of all (10³⁶), and there is salvation in none other (4¹²). Miracles are regarded as His work, though He is no longer visibly present. He is preparing for the 'Day of the Lord,' when the Divine Kingdom will be vindicated, and He has Himself poured out the Holy Ghost to fit the disciples for that day (2³³). Moreover, His unique Sonship is implied in the expression 'the Father' as used in the beginning of the book (1⁴. 7 2³³). Fitly does St. Stephen direct to Him his dying prayer, and Saul declare that He is the Son of God (9²⁰). The whole mission and work of Jesus is therefore mediatorial. His death has also an atoning mediatorial worth. Of great importance in Acts is the identification of our Lord with the suffering Servant of the Lord in Is 53. Our Lord had so identified Himself, as is shown not only by the quotation in Lk 22²⁷ but by the whole tenor of His life from the time of His baptism. In Acts a keynote is struck by St. Peter's words, 'the God of our fathers hath glorified His Servant Jesus' (3¹³). When Philip meets the Ethiopian eunuch he finds that he is reading Is 53, and resolves his doubts by explaining that the vicarious sufferer is Jesus. Acts shows plainly that the Christian Church of the most primitive period applied to Jesus this prophecy. 'Of a truth in this city against thy holy Servant Jesus, whom thou didst anoint, both Herod and Pontius Pilate, with the Gentiles and the peoples of Israel, were gathered together, to do whatsoever thy hand and thy counsel fore-ordained to come to pass' (4²⁷. 28).

These Apostolic words show precisely how the Church regarded the death of Christ. He died, not as any ordinary martyr, but as the Messiah and the atoning Servant. The death was a necessity, not because it was simply inevitable from the surroundings in which Jesus lived and against which He struggled, but because God Himself required it as an indispensable means for the realization of His will for man. It took place by His foreknowledge (2²³), it was foretold by His prophets (2¹⁵). Further, it would have been impossible for the Apostles to attribute this meaning to the death of Christ, unless they had been able to point to the empty grave, to assert that the Messiah lives, and that a direct relation can be established between Him and His sinful people. The Servant in Isaiah, though he died, lived again to 'prolong his days.' And because they were able to assert positively that Christ had risen, the first Christians were able to make the death of Christ a fundamental thing in their gospel. Repentance, faith, baptism, the gift of the Holy Spirit, are the distinctive gifts which flow from the death and resurrection of Jesus Christ. St. Peter exerts himself to deepen a sense of sin in his hearers by pointing to the cross. They tried to destroy the Saviour, but God thwarted their effort by raising Him from the dead. Their act, so far from accomplishing what they desired, fulfilled God's counsel. Let them repent while there is time, before Christ returns to judgment (21⁴-21 31⁹. 20 41⁰. 11 53⁰. 31 10³⁶-43). God offers forgiveness to those who are baptized in the name of Jesus Christ, and He offers the bestowal of the Holy Spirit to make a new life possible (2³⁸).

If we compare this very early doctrine with that of St. Paul, we see that, simple though it is, it is radically the same. And against all modern attempts to represent St. Paul as the first man who inseparably joined together the thought of Christ's death, of sin, and of atonement, St. Paul's own words protest: 'I delivered unto you first of all that which also I received, how that Christ died for our sins according to the Scriptures' (1 Co 15³). He affirms that he received it, and his testimony is true.

(b) In First Peter the mediatorial character of Christ's death is always present to the writer's mind. The doctrine of this Epistle may possibly have been influenced by that of St. Paul, but it is considerably less developed, and is such as we might well expect from St. Peter. The doctrine with regard to our Lord's Person is simple. It is taught that He existed before He was born on earth, for He was not only 'foreknown indeed before the foundation of the world' (1²⁰), which might not necessarily imply a personal pre-existence, but His Spirit was in the prophets before the Incarnation (1¹¹). To Him, as to a Divine Being, glory and dominion are ascribed (5¹¹). In consequence of His resurrection, baptism 'saves' us (3²¹). It has an inward power to cleanse the soul in response to the interrogation of a good conscience, because Christ rose and lives.

But it is the Passion of Christ, the 'precious blood,' that fills this letter with its peculiar glow. By that blood, 'as of a lamb without blemish and without spot,' we were 'redeemed' (1¹⁸. 19). It is a moral redemption, changing a former 'manner of life' into a better type of conduct. His action involved a patient endurance which it is the Christian's duty to imitate (2²¹ 4¹ 3¹⁷. 18). But it is, nevertheless, an objective external fact before it becomes subjective and inward. Christians are 'elect according to the foreknowledge of God the Father, in sanctification of the Spirit, unto obedience and sprinkling of the blood of Jesus Christ' (1²). The life of obedience involves sprinkling with the blood. As the Israelites were received into a unique relation with God at Sinai by being sprinkled with sacrificial blood, so by the blood shed on Calvary, a new elect race is dedicated to God. It is this blood that has an abiding power to cancel sin. What Christ did in His Passion is clearly stated, 'His own self bore our sins in his own body upon the tree' (2²⁴). The word 'bear' means both 'endure,' and 'carry' a sacrifice to the altar. So Christ both endured the consequences of our sins, and carried them to the cross as if they were His own. He suffered for sins which were not His own, and He did it that we might be 'healed.' Again, St. Peter says that Christ 'suffered for sins once, the righteous for the unrighteous, that he might bring us to God' (3¹⁸). He is urging his readers to be prepared to suffer for righteousness' sake; he hopes that their conduct may silence opposition, perhaps that it may bring others to God. But all the power to suffer rightly rests on an event now past. It is the solitary death of Christ 'for sins' that enables us to go to God and sets us right with God. Like St. Paul and like the author of Hebrews, St. Peter regards the death of Christ as the supreme event which established for mankind a free communion with the Father.

(c) The Epistle of St. Jude and the Second of St. Peter do not add to the doctrine of Christ's mediation. The lascivious sect against which the former is directed seems to have denied the reality of the Incarnation and of the Lordship of Christ (v. 4), which the writer regards as essential. He mentions the Holy Spirit, God, and our Lord Jesus Christ together (v. 21), and ascribes glory to 'God our Saviour' through Jesus Christ. 2 Peter also simply assumes the Divinity and mediatorial work of Christ. The writer describes himself as 'the bond-servant and apostle of Jesus Christ' (1¹), describes Jesus as 'Lord and Saviour' (2²⁰), speaks of growing 'in the grace and knowledge of our Lord and Saviour Jesus Christ' (3¹⁸), and of entrance into His 'eternal kingdom' (1¹¹).

(d) In the Epistle of St. James little is said, yet much is implied, respecting the Person of Christ. He is 'Lord' and 'the Lord of glory' (2¹). His is the 'honourable name' (2⁷) which was named over Christians in baptism. He is unquestionably regarded as the Mediator of salvation. For the 'word of truth,' 'the implanted word' (1^{18, 21}), which the Christians have received, has come to them through Christ, and He is called 'the judge' who 'standeth before the doors' (5^{8, 9}). Moreover, the opposition manifested by St. James towards a misuse of Christian freedom is of a kind which implies that he, like the people whom he desired to refute, believed that faith gains blessings from God through Christ. He illustrates the necessity of good works by instances in which 'works' can hardly be distinguished from faith, but are its necessary expression. He insists that God requires a good life; but, no less truly than St. Paul, he insists that a living faith is requisite for salvation. There is no developed Christology, but the writer who calls himself a 'bond-servant of God and of Jesus Christ,' and is so faithful both to the letter and to the spirit of Christ's moral teaching, must necessarily have believed that He is the Mediator between God and man.

3. The Pauline Epistles.—(a) St. Paul's doctrine of the Person of Christ is fundamentally the same in all his Epistles. And his whole teaching concerning the work of Christ is inseparable from the doctrine of His Person. Jesus is the Son of God, who, as such, possesses a superhuman and Divine nature. God is 'the Father of our Lord Jesus Christ' (2 Co 1³), and the Son shares in the spiritual immaterial nature of the Father. In his earliest Epistles, those to the Thessalonians, Jesus is called 'the Lord Jesus,' and each letter closes with the prayer that His 'grace' or unmerited kindness may be with His people. It is assumed that Jesus is exalted to heaven, is the Lord ruling the Church, and that He will return to judge the world. In the second group of Epistles—1 and 2 Cor., Gal., Rom.—there is much teaching about our Lord's Person. He is God's 'own Son' (Ro 8³), and to Him alone belongs the privilege of being 'the image of God' (2 Co 4⁴). St. Paul applies to Christ passages which in the OT refer to Jehovah (Ro 10¹³, 1 Co 2¹⁶ 10²²), and in Ro 9⁵ says that He is 'over all, God blessed for ever.' The Son of God is more ancient than all creation, and 'through him all things were made' (1 Co 8⁶). He existed in heaven before He was 'sent forth' on earth, and this coming to earth was for Him the humiliation of exchanging riches for poverty (2 Co 8⁹). The last two facts are fundamental in the next group of Epistles (Col 1¹⁵⁻¹⁷, Ph 2⁵⁻¹¹).

The third group of Epistles—Phil., Col., Eph.—illustrates these doctrines more fully. Ph 2⁵⁻¹¹ lays special stress upon the self-sacrifice involved in the Son of God taking 'the form of a servant.' In heaven He had 'the form of God,' but He 'emptied himself, taking the form of a servant, being made in the likeness of men.' This likeness is elsewhere called 'the likeness of sinful flesh' (Ro 8³). In Colossians, St. Paul attacks a superstitious theosophy which taught that worship ought to be paid to some intermediate beings who come between God and the world—a theory which implied that God could not come into direct contact with matter. Against this St. Paul insists upon the mediatorial work of the Son of God in both creation and redemption. He declares that the Son is the 'image' or adequate counterpart of the Father, and the 'firstborn of all creation,' i.e., not the first being created, but, as the context shows, 'born before all creation' (Col 1^{15, 16}). All things were created in Him, since their existence was conditioned by His thought; by Him, since it was through His power that they came into being; unto Him, since all creation finds in Him the summit of its evolution. All things cohere in Him (Col 1¹⁷), and it was God's purpose that all things should be summed up in Him (Eph 1¹⁰). The sum total of God's attributes dwells in Him bodily (Col 2⁹). And the Church is an organism without which Christ deigns to regard Himself as incomplete, because without the Church His incarnate life would not continue to be manifested. It is an extension of the Incarnation. It is a body in which Christ Himself lives and works (Eph 1²³), the suffering of its members completes His own (Col 1²⁴) by making possible a further application to mankind of His saving power.

The Church therefore exists to promote a certain relation between God and man. That relation is one of union and communion. The new confession which is taught to us by the Spirit of God's Son is expressed in the words 'Abba, Father.' The very Aramaic word used by Jesus in His communion with the Father in Gethsemane (Mk 14³⁶) is used by St. Paul to describe the Christian's attitude towards God. The prominence given by St. Paul to the love of God for man, for all men, for sinners, is unceasing. His certainty of God's love rests on all that Jesus did and does, but the most fundamental proof of it was that Jesus died. By this God commends His love toward us (Ro 5⁸). This makes it obvious that God will give us all things (8²). And this equally proves the love of Christ (2 Co 5¹⁴, Eph 5^{2, 28}). The death of Christ is, therefore, the highest proof of the love of the Father and the love of Jesus for mankind. The mediatorial work of the Son of God is a process involved in the whole relation of His Divine Person to the world. But it was focussed in one great event—His death.

(b) St. Paul's teaching about the death of Christ is entirely consistent. He teaches that there are two great elements in the process of the individual man's reconciliation with God. The first is his faith in Christ, who died as a sacrifice on our behalf. The second is that inward, vital, and ethical union with Christ, the 'life-giving Spirit' (1 Co 15⁴⁵), involved in our baptism 'into Christ.'

To suppose that his language about dying as our 'ransom' or 'price' (1 Co 6²⁰ 7²³, 1 Ti 2⁶, Tit 2¹⁴) is inconsistent with our need of identification with Christ, or that the moral identification excludes the need of a sacramental identification, is to create an imaginary false antithesis. Sacrifice, rightly understood, implies communion with the object sacrificed. And sacraments convey the power which is taken and used by that moral choice which is called 'faith.' Baptism begins our new supernatural life (Ro 6⁴), the Lord's Supper imparts to us sustenance for that life (1 Co 10¹⁶). In both we enter into union with a Christ who died, and died 'for us' and 'for sins' (e.g. 2 Co 5¹⁴, Gal 1⁴, Ro 8², Eph 5²⁵). That death had a special meaning for mankind as a whole, for God the Father, and for Christ Himself.

(i.) The death of Christ effected a reconciliation.—By it we were reconciled to God (Ro 5^{9, 10}, Eph 1⁷). This is because God was in Christ reconciling the world unto Himself (2 Co 5¹⁹), and those who were 'alienated and enemies' Christ has reconciled in the body of His flesh through death (Col 1²²). The action of Christ is identical with the action of God. In Christ living and Christ dying God was present, 'not reckoning trespasses.' He came to pardon when He might have punished. The cross, therefore, manifests the love and pity of God. And the reason why the love of Christ specially 'constraineth us' is 'because we thus judge that one died for all (therefore all died); and he died for all, that they which live should no longer live unto themselves, but unto him who for their sakes died, and rose again' (2 Co 5¹⁴). We feel the constraint of love when we see that Christ died a death which was a substitute for our death. If the Son had not died, we should have been left to experience the death of a sinner who is alienated from God. The work of reconciliation was done by the Father through the Son,—done outside us before it was done in us.

(ii.) The death of Christ removes the wrath of God.—Sinners are exposed to God's wrath (Ro 1⁸. 32 2³ 5¹⁰ 11²⁸). This wrath is not vindictiveness, but the attitude of a loving Father towards that which destroys the very life of His children. The wrath of God is removed when, 'through faith,' the sinner accepts Jesus as a 'means of propitiation' (Ro 3²⁵). God justifies, acquits as righteous, those who avail themselves of that force which wipes away their sins. In providing this means of propitiation, God did something to counterbalance all His previous forbearance towards sin. He manifested His righteousness, His disposition to treat men according to a perfect moral law. When sin is passed over, righteousness is not manifested. But it was demonstrated when God showed that He could not forgive except at the tremendous cost of sending His Son to be a means of propitiation by His blood. The death of the Son was an oblation and a sacrifice to the Father (Eph 5²), wholly acceptable to the Father on account of the sinlessness and love of the Sufferer; and it is wholly adequate to the needs of the human soul, because it simultaneously removes the sinner's sin and his fear of the judgment of God.

(iii.) Christ is not regarded by St. Paul as literally punished for the sins of all mankind.—These sins are not transferred to Jesus, for men who do not accept Him as their Saviour have still to answer for their sins. They are still under the wrath of God (Ro 1⁸). Nor were the sins of those who God foresaw would repent literally transferred to Jesus. In the Hebrew conception of the sin-offering, the offering was 'most holy,' which would have been impossible if sin had been transferred to it in any literal manner. At the same time, Christ is said to have been made 'sin' (2 Co 5²¹) and to have been made 'curse' for us (Gal 3¹³).

The first passage may mean that Christ was made a sin-offering; the second may mean that Christ in some way fulfilled the type of the scape-goat (Lv 16²¹), which symbolized the disappearance of the iniquities of the children of Israel. Both these interpretations are somewhat uncertain. What is certain is that in 2 Co 5²¹, Gal 3¹³ St. Paul means that Christ was treated as a sinner in order that sinners might become righteous; that He chose to die by crucifixion, a death which in Jewish eyes was symbolical of God's curse; and that in dying He realized God's curse or condemnation on the sins of the race of which He had chosen to be a member. There is no question of a literal personal punishment of Christ. It was a voluntary entrance on His part into a state in which, by a profound sympathy, He felt our calamity as though it were His.

Our Lord Himself had shown the connexion between His death and the forgiveness of our sins. The primitive Church had believed and experienced the reality of this connexion. And St. Paul, in preaching what he calls 'the word of the cross' so fully and vividly, was 'faithful' to 'the much' which was committed to Him by the risen Christ. He preached, as no other man has done, the Name which means that Christ saves His people from their sins.

4. The Epistle to the Hebrews.—(a) The subject of the Epistle to the Hebrews is 'the world to come' (2⁵). This world to come already exists and has existed from the Creation. But it is regarded as still to come, because it has not yet been fully realized in time. It is a heavenly spiritual counterpart of this temporal material world in which we live. The material world, and the Jewish system of worship which belongs to this world, are not, in the strictest sense of the word, real. Christianity is the perfect religion, and is superior to Judaism, because its origin, worship, and priesthood belong to the heavenly world of which Judaism is only a shadow. The Revealer of Christianity belongs to the heavenly world. It is on His mediation that the existence both of the material and of the spiritual world depends. He is the 'effulgence' or 'radiance' of God's glory, i.e. of God's nature as shown to things created, and the impress of His essence; 'upholding all things by the word of His power' (1³). The Son, through whom the Father made the worlds, was appointed heir of all things prior to creation. By His almighty word (cf. 'God said' in Gn 1)—a word which is itself an act—He carries the world to its goal. This Son, as essentially Divine, is above the angels, and is the object of their worship (1⁷). He is above Moses, as the son of a house is superior to a servant, and as the founder of a house is superior to one who is only a part of the edifice itself (3²⁻³).

(b) But Jesus is especially our sympathetic High Priest 'who hath passed through the heavens' (4¹⁴). Great stress is laid upon the fact that He endured all that we endure, sin apart. Having taken flesh and blood, and become in all things like His 'brethren,' He passed through temptations, shed tears, suffered death. His human prayer to God, offered during His agony, was heard on account of His 'godly fear.' He was strengthened to bear His burden, and was made perfect for His saving work by the discipline of His sufferings. He manifests the highest degree both of sympathy and of probation, and is therefore the Representative of man to God. He is able to enter with full sympathy into the lot of ignorant and erring man. He also possesses the other essential qualification of a High Priest, for He was Divinely appointed. He who proclaimed Him to be His Son, declared Him to be a priest for ever after the order of Melchizedek (5⁵⁻⁶). In the reality of His human experience and sympathy, and in the fact of His Divine calling, He resembled the Levitical priests. But He differed from them profoundly. They were sinful: He was sinless. They must offer sacrifices for themselves: His offering was solely for others. They served a temporary sanctuary: He ministers perpetually in heaven. He further differs from them because He is a priest after the order of Melchizedek. The priesthood of Melchizedek had these two great characteristics: it was especially royal, and it was independent of any genealogy; whereas the priesthood of the Levitical priests was not more royal than that of all the Israelites, and their title to it rested on their descent from Levi. Christ is King as well as Priest; and as His Being had no beginning, the silence of Scripture about the ancestry of Melchizedek assimilates him to Christ. And since Abraham the father of Levi paid tithes to Melchizedek, he acknowledged his inferiority, and compromised the Levitical priests by so doing. Their priesthood is lower than that of Melchizedek, which was an archetype of that of the Son of God (7¹⁻¹⁰).

(c) The sacrifice of Christ had these notes. (i.) It was the expression of the perfect obedience of His will to the will of the Father. No animal sacrifices can take away sins. They rather bring sins to remembrance than purge them away. Bulls and goats cannot give to God a conscious, voluntary, moral sacrifice. This the Son gave; He satisfied the will of God by so doing: 'When he cometh into the world he saith, Sacrifice and offering thou wouldest not, but a body didst thou prepare for me. . . . Lo, I am come to do thy will, O God' (10⁵⁻⁷). By the offering of Christ's body, which was prepared by God to make this great sacrifice possible, the will of God was satisfied, and by that will we are 'sanctified.'—(ii.) It is one, and need not be repeated yearly. Every day the Levitical priests offer sacrifices which cannot cancel sin. In contrast with the ineffectiveness of those sacrifices, offered by priests still standing day by day, Christ offered one sacrifice on the cross, and then the adequacy of His offering was proved by His sitting down on the right hand of God (10²²). His offering is valid for both past and future, and delivers men from 'the transgressions that were under the first covenant' (9¹⁵), in addition to giving a new power to those who live after the Incarnation has taken place.—(iii.) It is the basis of a 'new covenant' between God and man.

The best commentators differ somewhat with regard to the meaning of 9^{15, 16}. But the natural explanation is that since the word διαθήκη meant both covenant or alliance and testament or will, the word is used in both senses, and the author was conscious of no logical difficulty in so using it. He means that God's people, their sins having been taken away by Christ, are able to enter upon that inheritance, that rest of God, bequeathed to them by Christ, who Himself removed the encumbrance of past sins which barred access to it. But the idea of covenant is more fundamental. The only sacrifice of the Old Covenant which the Jews never repeated was that which established the original relation between God and the Hebrew people (Ex 24³⁻⁸). This was dedicated with blood. So was the New Covenant, the blood of the Son being 'the blood of the covenant' (10²⁹). And by it the whole region of man's approach to God, the system of 'the heavenly things' themselves, was cleansed from the taint of sin. In 10²⁹ the writer has in mind the words spoken by our Lord in instituting His Supper.

(d) The effect of Christ's death on man is specially described by the ritual words 'purify' (καθαρίζειν), 'sanctify' (ἀγιάζειν), and 'make perfect' (τελειοῦν). These words do not exactly correspond with the terms of later theology. They are primarily ritual words, though they involve a truly ethical conception as used in this Epistle. They mean to remove the sense of guilt (9¹⁴) or 'evil conscience,' to dedicate to God (10^{10, 29} 13¹²), to bring to that full enjoyment of spiritual privileges which the Levitical priesthood could not effect (7¹¹). The result of this work done by Christ is our sense of forgiveness and free access to God through Christ (4¹⁶).

(e) The Ascension is the culminating point of the Atonement as offered by Christ to God. As a High Priest after the order of Melchizedek, i.e. with an eternal priesthood which belongs to the world to come, Christ offered Himself upon the cross (7²⁷ 9²⁴⁻²⁸). But as the Aaronic high priest carried the sacrificial blood on the day of Atonement into the Holy of Holies, so Christ entered heaven 'through his blood' having obtained 'eternal redemption' (9¹²). He now exercises a priesthood which is after the order of Melchizedek, but at the same time fulfils the type of the Aaronic high priest's action within the veil. He still remains High Priest and acts as such (6²⁰). Because He abideth for ever He hath His priesthood unchangeable (7²⁴). He manifests Himself to God for us (9²⁴), continuously interceding on our behalf (7²⁵). Into all His intercession the value of His offering is put, so that He is 'the minister of the sanctuary' above. His work is still of a sacerdotal nature, 'it is necessary that this high priest also have somewhat to offer' (8¹⁻³). The 'somewhat' is His blood or life. His blood retains its sacrificial efficacy, pleads to God for pardon, and speaks peace to man.

'We have an altar' (13¹⁰). Unlike the Jews, even the Jewish priests, who were unable to partake of the sin-offering offered on the Day of Atonement, Christians may partake of Christ.

The 'altar' of which they eat has been variously interpreted as the cross, the altar in heaven, and the Lord's table. The first seems to be excluded by the fact that according to the writer's argument the cross corresponds with the place outside the camp where the sin-offering was burnt, not with the altar in the tabernacle. Whether the altar here is the heavenly altar or the Lord's table (cf. Mal 17. 12, Ezk 44¹⁶ 41²²), a reference to the Eucharist is included. And in that rite the pleading of Christ's death by the Church is joined with the present intercession which He makes in heaven.

The special value of the Epistle to the Hebrews is that it presents to us the mediatorial work of Christ as a work of Divine worship. Without worship, Christianity would be merely a philosophy. And the author satisfies one of the deepest needs of the human soul when he teaches us the relation between Christ and His people in the life of intercession, a life which is for the Christian one of faith and confidence by virtue of all that Jesus did and does. The author also teaches us something of the philosophy of religion. St. Paul's view of Judaism is wholly true, but it is not the whole truth. And this Epistle, with its peculiar dignity and calm, and a devotion to Christ not less real than that of the Apostle of the Gentiles, gives us a fresh insight into the Divine wisdom which made Judaism 'a sacred school of the knowledge of God for the world.'

5. The Johannine writings.—(a) The Apocalypse.—Whether the Apocalypse be the work of John the Presbyter, or, as the present writer believes, the work of John the Apostle, its doctrine of the mediatorial work of Christ is of high importance. The book is full of the exaltation of Jesus. He is the Messiah, the unique Son of God (1⁶ 3⁵ 14¹), the Divine Word (19¹³). He is the lion of the tribe of Judah, the root and offspring of David (5⁵ 22¹⁶). He is the Lord's Messiah (11¹⁵). By His resurrection He has become Ruler of the kings of the earth, many royal diadems are on His head, and He is King of kings and Lord of lords (1⁵ 19¹² 17¹⁴ 19¹⁶). He has all authority, an authority given Him by God (3²¹). His terrible might is suggested by the description of His feet, His voice, His eyes, and the sound from His mouth (14¹⁴). With God He shares the throne of heaven (22¹⁻³), with Him He receives ascriptions of praise from the angels and the redeemed (5¹³ 7¹⁰). He comes seated on a white cloud, like the figure in Daniel's vision (14¹⁴). He is the Morning Star who brings in the day of grace (22¹⁶). The coming of Christ is the coming of God, and when the coming is accomplished God is called He 'who is and who was,' and no longer 'the coming one' (1⁴⁻⁸ 4⁸, cf. 11¹⁷ 16⁵). He holds the keys of death and Hades (1¹⁸), He is 'the first and the last, and the living One,' 'the Alpha and the Omega' (17¹² 22¹³).

From the beginning to the end the book contains deep appreciations of the mediatorial work effected by Christ's death. (i.) It is a great demonstration of the love of Jesus (1⁵). (ii.) It is a death which implies that a redeeming work was then accomplished, and that the Christian enjoys a liberty which was won by that death; 'He loosed us from our sins by his blood; and he made us to be a kingdom, to be priests unto his God and Father' (1⁵⁻⁶). And in 5⁶⁻¹⁴ the Lamb is praised in the words, 'Thou wast slain, and didst purchase unto God with thy blood men of every tribe and tongue.' The Lamb is 'standing, as though it had been slain'; it is not dead, but has the virtue of its death in it. (iii.) The abiding power of the death of Christ is shown in this, that it is the source of moral purity and of moral victory under persecution. Even the virgins who follow the Lamb reach heaven only because Christ 'purchased' them (14³⁻⁴). And the martyrs slain by persecuting pagan Rome overcame the dragon 'because of the blood of the Lamb, and because of the word of their testimony' (12¹¹). The blood of the Lamb therefore did something in the past, for it released mankind from sin by the ransom paid to God. And it does something now, for it enables us to live and witness as Christ lived and witnessed. The mediatorial power of the blood of Christ is therefore a power without which the Christian life can be neither begun nor continued.

(b) The Prologue of St. John's Gospel contains an assertion which is of essential importance for all subsequent Christian theology. The Divine Λόγος, the Word who 'was God,' became flesh, and was incarnate as Jesus. This Word is both the expression of God and God expressed. The origin of the title is to be sought mainly in the OT and in Palestinian tradition. But St. John's use of it was probably partly determined by its common occurrence in Greek philosophy, and more especially in the writings of the Alexandrian Jewish philosopher Philo. His doctrine of the Λόγος is more moral and less metaphysical than that of Philo, more Jewish and less Greek. Philo's dominant idea is that of the Divine Reason, St. John's is that of the Divine Word, the manifestation of the Divine will. The Jewish Targums use the phrase Memra or Word for God as manifested in His action on the world, and in Wis 18¹⁵ the almighty Word of God is described as leaping down from heaven to smite the Egyptians. The term as used by St. John denotes inherence in God, as a thought or conception inheres in the mind—mediatorship between God and the universe of a kind which implies that God Himself comes into touch with the universe—and it requires as its complement the other title 'only-begotten Son.' In Philo the Λόγος remains a vague cosmic force, in St. John it is a definite Divine Person who becomes Man. See, further, art. LOGOS.

(c) Although in the Fourth Gospel the word Λόγος is applied to the Son of God in the Prologue only, the same doctrine pervades the whole book. 'We beheld his glory' (1¹⁴) is shown to be true by the record which follows. In the Synoptics, Jesus seems to speak most of His own ministry and of men; here He rather speaks of Himself and His relations to the Father. There He frequently distinguishes Himself from His disciples in His relations to the Father; here He takes the same attitude more decisively. He declares Himself the Son of God (5²⁵ 9³⁵⁻³⁷ etc.), the Son in a unique sense (3^{16, 35} 5¹⁹⁻²² etc.). Distinct from all others there exist the Father and the Son (3^{35, 36} 5¹⁹⁻²²). The Father is the Source of the Son's being and action (5^{19, 26}). He does works in the Son; the Father and the Son know one another (10¹⁵ 8²⁵). They love one another (5²⁰ 14³¹ 15⁹); they abide in one another (8²⁹ 14^{10, 11}). They are one, ἐν (10³⁰ 17^{11, 21, 22}). As the Father has life in Himself, He has given to the Son life in Himself (5²⁶). So to see or to reject the Son is to see or reject the Father (8¹⁹ 14⁹ 15²¹⁻²⁴). Men must render similar honour to the Father and to the Son (5²³). The Son existed before He came into the world: He was before Abraham (8⁵⁸), He was glorified with the Father before the world existed (17⁹): He came from heaven and returns to heaven (6⁶²). The Father sent Him into the world (3¹⁶) to fulfil a certain mission (5³⁶ 14³¹ etc.), to speak, judge, and act in His Name (8³⁶ 10^{32, 37}).

But the chief object for which the Son came was to save the world (3¹⁷) and to give it eternal life (3^{16, 36} 4¹⁴ etc.). And Jesus is Himself the life (14⁶), and came that men might have it more abundantly (10¹⁰). He is also the light of the world (3¹⁹ 8¹² 12⁴⁶), because He teaches men to know God and His Son, and this knowledge is eternal life (17^{2, 3}), Jesus is therefore the Mediator of the life and the light of God for men. How are they to receive it?

We receive eternal life by attaching ourselves to the Person of Jesus Christ. We must believe on Him (3¹⁶). We must obey the Son if we are to escape from the wrath of the Father (3³⁶). We must believe His claim or die in our sins (8²⁴). We must abide in Him, as the branches in the vine, and abide in His love as He abides in His Father's love (15¹⁻¹⁰). Other conditions of salvation remind us of our Lord's teaching in the Synoptics. It is necessary to be born again of water and the Spirit (3³⁻⁷), and to eat His flesh and drink His blood (6⁵²⁻⁵⁹).

The last injunction reminds us that the Divine life which is in Jesus becomes available for the Christian by virtue only of His death. It is sometimes held that Jesus is represented in this Gospel as saving men by revealing to them the truth about God, a revelation made in His own Person. But it cannot be said with justice that the mediatorial work of Jesus in this Gospel is only of this prophetic nature. St. John records a great deal about the death of Jesus which implies that the death has a propitiatory character in the Gospel as well as in the First Epistle. In 1²⁹ the Baptist describes our Lord as the Lamb that taketh away the sin of the world. This must have a sacrificial meaning, for only by sacrifice could a lamb be conceived as taking away sin. In three passages (3¹⁴ 8²⁸ 12³²) our Lord speaks of Himself being 'lifted up.' Men will look to Him for life as the Israelites looked to the brazen serpent which Moses uplifted in the wilderness. Again, after He has been lifted up by the Jews, they will know that He is the Messiah. Lastly, He says, 'I, if I be lifted up from the earth, will draw all men unto myself'; the Cross, followed by the Ascension, will be the means of attracting Gentile as well as Jew. So He is the Good Shepherd, whose very vocation it is to lay down His life for the sheep (10¹¹). His laying it down is wholly voluntary, but it is God's purpose and His own for His earthly life (10¹⁷). St. John regards Caiaphas as unconsciously prophesying that Christ would die for the well-being and the union of all God's children (11⁵²). In 12²⁷ He dreads the appointed 'hour' or crisis, which He nevertheless knows to be the hour when He will be glorified (12²³), this glory being the manifestation of His character in the great passage from His trial and death to His Ascension (cf. 17⁵). He ascends to heaven by the way of the cross; and this ascent shows, as nothing else can, what He is. He also compares Himself in 12²⁴ to a grain of wheat which bears fruit only if it dies, otherwise 'it abideth by itself alone.' Here our Lord makes His whole influence depend upon His death; because He is to perish, He will be the source of life to others. 'Greater love hath no man than this, that a man lay down his life for his friends' (15¹³). His death is therefore the fullest revelation of His love. And in 17¹⁹ He sanctified Himself, deliberately dedicated Himself to the Father in death, that so He might establish for men a dedicated relationship with God.

Ch. 6 throws further light on our Lord's teaching about His Atonement. The great discourse therein contains three sections, the first Christological (6²⁶⁻⁴⁰), the second more definitely Soteriological (6⁴¹⁻⁵¹), the third Eucharistic (6⁵²⁻⁵⁹). In the first, Jesus requires belief in Himself as the living Lord, and bread of God. In the second, He asserts that He is the living bread, and that He will give His flesh for the life of the world. In the third, He speaks of the necessity of eating His flesh and drinking His blood. The flesh and blood must mean not Himself merely, but Himself as affected by a violent death, and a death endured, as He has declared, for the life of the world. The act of communion is represented as an exalted act of faith by which man appropriates Christ's atoning self. All this implies that the death of Christ is propitiatory; the sacrifice is dedicated to God, and it cleanses man's sin when man appropriates it. If we consult 8²⁴ and 3³⁶, we see quite certainly that the result of this sacrifice is that God's wrath is removed. The sin of the world is exposed to His wrath, and this wrath on His part means death on man's part. It is such wrath as can be felt only by perfect love. And the saving effect of Christ's death is this, that it established between God and man that relationship which enables individual men to escape from sin, wrath, and death, and attain a vital union with God.

(d) In St. John's First Epistle the doctrine of Christ's mediation is clear. The Apostle insists upon the historical truth of the atoning work of Christ, and upon the existing witness of that work. In 5⁶⁻⁸ he opposes the Docetic theory concerning Jesus and His work, and declares that the crucifixion was as true an experience of Christ as His baptism. He who by baptism associated Himself with repentant sinners, by crucifixion endured what that baptism foreshadowed. The Holy Spirit makes these two saving events penetrate our hearts, and the water of Christian baptism and the blood of the Eucharistic cup bear testimony to His witness. In 2^{1, 2, 4⁸, 10} 1⁷ it is shown that the death of Jesus has a direct relation to the sins of the world, for it is their propitiation; to His own righteousness, for only the perfectly Righteous could establish God's law of righteousness; to His present intercession for man, for He is the Advocate of man by virtue of what He has already done for us. The Apostle further implies in 1⁷⁻⁹ that the Christian needs a continuous purification. He is unforgiven and uncleansed unless he continues to 'walk.' His salvation is ethical. It is made possible by something which he did not do, and could not do, for himself. But it is not something which he can secure eternally by a momentary choice.

Conclusion.—The writers of the NT unite in various ways in teaching that Jesus is the Mediator between God and man in the whole work of reconciliation which the human conscience requires. In the whole of His teaching and His contest with evil He satisfied the Divine law of Righteousness. Further, by His perfect sympathy He entered into the situation and the misery of sinful man; a truth which is unintelligible when regarded as an external legal transference of guilt, but intelligible and moral when regarded as the voluntary act of love. In giving Himself for man, He gave Himself to God, offering in His own Person to God all that devotion which God, who is holiness and love, could desire from His children. In so surrendering Himself to death, He acquiesced in the justice of God's condemnation of the sins of the human race, of which He had chosen to become a member. All sin inevitably tends to death, not by any arbitrary appointment but by its very nature, and Christ accepted death as the symbol of God's judgment on man's sin. Lastly, Christ is our propitiation, because He gives us inwardly that power, that communication of His own life, which cleanses us from sin. He enables us to die to sin, and thus within us, as outside us, does not suspend but establishes the law of Righteousness. All this is possible if Jesus is truly God and perfectly man; having an actual original solidarity with our race previous to the choice of any individual member of it, and that new solidarity which He establishes between Himself and all who consciously come into a moral and sacramental union with Him.

MEEKNESS.—1. The quality defined.—The Christian virtue of meekness has suffered the misfortune of being seriously misunderstood. In the popular mind it has been so conceived as to forfeit the right to be considered a virtue at all, being regarded as the equivalent of weak compliance—the temper of one devoid of manly vigour, who tamely allows himself to be slighted and injured without protest or resistance. That this conception is a caricature of meekness, is apparent in view of Christ's Beatitude (Mt 5⁹); for not only is it incredible that our Lord should have pronounced a blessing on those of feeble character, but the nature of the promise attached to the Beatitude implies that in some sense meekness is a strong and victorious quality. Whatever it be, we must presume it to be a virtue replete with energy, robust and manly, the very opposite of everything that is weak. Otherwise Christ's words are reduced to an absurdity.

In the NT use of the word, meekness (πραῦτης, πραότης) is commonly interpreted as meaning gentleness of disposition, peaceableness of temper in the face of provocation and wrong. It is the spirit of one who is not easily provoked, but keeps under control the natural instinct to assert oneself and to retaliate. It is the opposite of irascibility and the spirit of revenge. That is to say, it is conceived as a disposition restricted in its exercise to a man's relation with his fellow-men. But in reality meekness has a deeper and wider significance. It is, to begin with, a disposition towards God, the humble submission to the Divine will, the quiet acceptance of the discipline of life as coming from One who in infinite wisdom and love directs the destinies of men. This is made clear by the Biblical history of πραῦς. In the LXX, πραῦς is most frequently employed as the tr. of ὑπάκουος—one who bows himself down in lowliness beneath the hand of God. The πραεῖς are the class of afflicted ones who accept their sorrows without murmuring, and yield themselves in trust and in hope to the will of God. When Jesus pronounced His blessing on 'the meek,' it was this class of humble, uncomplaining, God-fearing sufferers that He had in view. His appropriation of the words in Ps 37¹¹ is conclusive proof of that. That 'the meek' of the Beatitude have so often been exclusively conceived as those who are peaceable and unvindictive in their dealings with their fellow-men, is due to the fact that the Greek conception of *πραῦτης has governed the interpretation, instead of the conception represented by the underlying Hebrew word. At the same time, this common interpretation of πραῦτης is not to be rejected as alien to the NT meaning. The attitude of humble submission to the will of God carries with it of necessity a disposition of gentleness and forbearance towards men who are harsh and provocative in their dealings, not only because they are to be regarded as the instruments of the Divine discipline, but because only through the loving restraint of angry and vindictive feelings can the gracious will of God be done in human relationships. The primary significance of meekness is the calm and trustful acceptance of God's will, when it is adverse, as meaning our good; but this involves in regard to our fellow-men the quiet and patient endurance of scorn, annoyance, and opposition.

2. Meekness in relation to God.—Regarded as the submissive attitude of the soul towards God, meekness has its root in a humble, childlike faith. To use the words of Gregory of Nyssa, humility is 'the mother of meekness.' Humility and meekness are kindred virtues; hence they are often mentioned together (Eph 4², Col 3², cf. Mt 11²⁹). Humility is the soul's attitude induced by a proper sense of one's creaturely weakness, ignorance, and unworthiness in presence of the Most High; meekness is the attendant disposition, born of humility, which constrains the soul to bow without complaining before the will of God in the hard and perplexing experiences of life. The soul that thus bows meekly beneath the Divine discipline is not open to the reproach of feebleness or insensibility; it is meek, not because it is too callous to feel the pain of sorrow and misfortune or too spiritless to protest against it, but because it bends in lowly and childlike trust before the unsearchable wisdom and love of God. Where there is faith in the universal operation of the all-wise love of God, meekness shows itself in the unrummured surrender to the Divine will and in the patient endurance of that will. And from this attitude towards God there flows the blessing of peace. Meekness is the channel by which the gracious love of God is communicated to the soul as waters of refreshment and rest. This is the truth taught under a different figure in Mt 11²⁹. Meekness is the easy yoke of Jesus which enables the weary and heavy-laden to bear the discipline laid upon them without chafing and complaining. Amid outward conditions which are hard and oppressive, they who like Jesus are 'meek and lowly of heart,' who bow before God with a profound sense of His infinitely wise and perfect will, find 'rest unto their souls'; they are freed from that inward restiveness and discontent which aggravate the outward burden and wear away the strength. Not only is meekness a strong and heroic quality which curbs the natural impulse to fume and rebel against God's will, but it is the means whereby the soul is reinforced by a Divine power to endure life's discipline with courage.

* See, for the Greek conception of πραῦτης, Aristotle, Nic Eth. iv. 7.

Meekness before God is, then, the natural ethical outcome of humble faith in the Divine Father who in unerring wisdom and holy love orders the life of men. It is seen in its crowning manifestation in Jesus Christ (cf. 2 Co 10¹), for whom alike in the tasks which He undertook and in the sorrows which He bore the Father's will was supreme. When faithfulness to His mission brought upon Him unmerited suffering, He endured it in meekness, assured that it was God's holy will for Him. That His meekness was not merely a passive virtue, but one that was pervaded by a moral vigour and strength of purpose, is made clear by the conflict in Gethsemane. In the prayer of lowly submission, 'Not my will but thine be done,' we see the meekness of Jesus, in respect of God's dealings with Him, in its divinest light. The agony and the bloody sweat, the prayer, 'If it be possible, let this cup pass away from me,' not only set in vivid relief the moral grandeur of Christ's willing acceptance of His Father's will, but they show with convincing power that true meekness is not the easy outcome of insensibility or tameness of spirit, but the victory of a strong nature over personal desires which conflict with the will of God.

3. Meekness in relation to men.—When we think of meekness in regard to the wrongs and opposition of men, we find that it is characterized by the same heroic qualities and is attended by similar blessed results. It is a virile and noble thing. The outward garb of meekness may, indeed, be worn by men in whom there are none of the robust and gracious qualities which make true meekness so worthy of admiration and honour. There are those who, by natural disposition, are timid and compliant, who have not manliness enough to resent injustice, who do not retaliate when they are wronged simply because they dare not. Similarly, there are those who, when slighted, show no sign of resentment, because they are too dull to feel an affront, or because they are controlled by feelings of scorn or by considerations of self-interest and policy. Of none of these can it be said that he is meek, nor does his conduct deserve our admiration. True meekness, which is worthy of all honour, is seen only in those who, with an acute sense of wrong, control the natural impulse to show anger and to retaliate, not from fear, or pride, or policy, or scorn of others, but because in obedience to the will of God they accept the provocation or wrong as discipline, and as an opportunity for showing the Divine spirit of patience and love. The meek man is not quick-tempered or vindictive, because, swayed by feelings of benevolence and love, he remains master of himself. Where there is no love, there is no meekness. 'Meekness is the power of love to quell the ebullition of anger, to restrain the violent and hasty temper' (Martensen). The irritation may be keenly felt; the temptation to retaliate may be very strong; but love keeps the upper hand and imposes calmness and self-restraint. It follows from all this that true meekness is not open to the contemptuous charge, so often brought against it, of softness and mean-spiritedness. It is a strong quality, for it means victory over the hot desire to retaliate; it is a gracious quality, for it means love triumphing over the selfish and self-assertive impulses of one's nature, in its anxiety to avoid the embittering of friendly relations and to subdue ill-feeling by gentleness and kindness.

Meekness, then, is an expression of the love which 'is not easily provoked' (1 Co 13⁷). It is the self-restraint imposed by love when one is irritated or suffers a personal wrong. But this gentle and peaceable disposition is not inconsistent with a burning indignation at the injustice and evil conduct of men, when wider interests are concerned. The meek man is not bound over to keep the peace at any price. Meekness does not mean incapacity for indignation. When the interests of the Divine Kingdom are at stake, in the face of flagrant and defiant wrongdoing, the duty of the meek is not silence and self-repression, but indignant and active opposition to evil. Indignation has a vastly greater moral value and influence when it proceeds from one who in personal matters endures provocation with calmness and self-restraint. It is the meekness of Jesus that makes His anger so terrible. When He was subjected in His own person to insult or wrong, He bore it with patience and with compassion on those who wronged Him (1 P 2²³). When He was wounded to the heart by the treachery of Judas, and the betrayal was sealed by a hypocritical kiss, His answer to the traitor showed how superior He was to the natural resentment of men: 'Comrade, is it for this that thou art come?' (Mt 26³⁰). When He hung upon the cross in agony, He was so far master of Himself and so deeply moved by compassion for His enemies, that He found some ground for extenuating their conduct and prayed for their forgiveness. But when the interests of the weak and helpless were involved (Mt 18⁶), when the sacred name of religion was profaned (Mt 21¹²), and the Kingdom of God was thwarted by those who were so blind as to imagine they were defending it (Mt 23^{13a}), 'the wrath of the Lamb' flamed on the heads of the wrong-doers. So far from anger being inconsistent with meekness, it is only when meekness is associated with it that anger has a pure moral worth. The wrath of an irascible and violent man is deservedly discounted; that of a meek man scorches where it falls. Even when it is most vehement, the indignation that is associated with meekness is kept within bounds. It is not allowed to degenerate into uncontrollable and self-willed passion. Behind its severity there is the moderating power of love, which even in the act of showing indignation regrets its necessity (cf. Mk 3⁵).

In the matter of personal wrongs, meekness is shown in the refusal to retaliate in the spirit of the aggressor. It will not requite evil with evil. Much rather will it endure the wrong and yield no room in the heart to the spirit of revenge. The motive for this meek endurance of wrong is love, which does not suffer us to forget that the wrong-doer is a brother-man, whom we should strive to win to penitence and friendly relations by patience and forbearance (Gal 6¹, 2 Ti 2²⁵, Tit 3²).

Whether there should be any bounds to this acceptance of personal wrong is a question which has been brought into great prominence in our day by the teaching of Tolstoi. According to the Russian moralist, who has preached with great power the Quaker doctrine of non-resistance to evil, the old right of requital was abolished by Christ; not only should there be no private retaliation against wrong, but there should be no recourse to any legal tribunal when one has suffered injury or injustice. The law of non-resistance in Tolstoi's view is absolute; when we are wronged, we should suffer meekly in the hope that through our meekness evil will be overcome of good. Against this interpretation of the law of Christ in an absolute sense we have to set not only Christ's own example, when in the sacred name of justice He challenged the man who smote Him at the bar of judgment (Jn 18²³), but also the whole tenor of the Christian law. When Jesus, in inculcating meekness and love to our enemies, said, 'Resist not evil' (Mt 5³⁹), the context shows that He was not laying down a law which should be rigidly interpreted according to the letter, but that He was requiring a new spirit—the spirit of forbearance and love in dealing with those who wrong us. Christ's aim in requiring meekness of His followers was a moral aim—the furtherance of the Divine Kingdom, the lessening of the amount of evil in the world—a result which the meek endurance of wrong often brings with it in the disarming of enmity and in the quenching of the fires of ill-will, whereas retaliation adds to the evil and inflames the bitterness that already exists; but when it has become clear that forbearance and patience with a wrong-doer only confirm him in his evil courses, Christian love not only does not forbid but actually requires, in the interest both of public righteousness and of the wrongdoer himself, recourse to a civil tribunal that requital may be given. So long as there is any reasonable hope that meek endurance of wrong will turn the wrongdoer to a better frame of mind, we should be willing to suffer injustice; but when that hope has proved itself vain, there is nothing inconsistent with the spirit of meekness and Christian love in securing that justice shall be done and evil defeated by the procedure of civil law.

4. The dominion of meekness.—Meekness, though feeble to all outward seeming, is 'a world-conquering principle' (Tholuck). 'Blessed are the meek,' Christ said, 'for they shall inherit the earth.' 'To inherit the earth' (or, rather, 'the land') was originally the formula for the Israelitish possession of the Promised Land (Gn 15⁷, Dt 4³⁸). In OT times, however, it had already, as in Ps 37^{9, 11}, become 'a symbolic expression for the totality of Divine blessing and Messianic happiness' (Holtzmann). On the lips of Jesus the phrase has a spiritual significance; it expresses the highest good along with the collateral idea of world-wide influence. The inheritance of the earth by the meek does not come through outward possession, but by spiritual sovereignty. The meek, in accepting God's will in His disciplinary dealing with them, are not in bondage to earthly things, but are their true masters. They derive from life the highest good that it can bestow. They who rebel against the appointments of Providence miss the real gains of life. Only when the conditions of life are seen to be instinct with spiritual significance and intention as the expression of God's will, do they yield up the purest blessings that are hidden in them, and become the means of inward enrichment (cf. 1 Ti 6⁶). Further, they who are meek under provocation and wrong have a large spiritual dominion. They are the true rulers of men. Human hearts are won only by gentleness and love. God's Kingdom on earth grows not by requiting evil with evil, but by overcoming evil with good. That is the sovereignty of the Cross. And the future is with the meek. They are destined to have a world-wide dominion. Because God reigns and they accept and do the will of God, they are on the winning side. Meekness will one day claim the whole earth for its own, when men, conquered by the meek endurance of the Cross, bow humbly before God and live together in peace and brotherhood.

MENTAL CHARACTERISTICS.—There can be no full appreciation without some analysis; the friend who is understood is loved the better. That 'love is blind' is singularly false, save when the word is restricted to an unworthy meaning. True love gives insight always; and the power it gives of divining what to others is invisible is a species of analysis. There is no question, however, of analyzing Divinity. Divinity realized in humanity is what we know in Jesus Christ. In God Incarnate there can be nothing which is not human, though nothing which is human only. An attempt to analyze the mental characteristics of the Lord Jesus is therefore an attempt to appreciate the human manifestation which God has made of Himself. The first condition must be reverence, and the study is best undertaken with St. Paul's teaching (1 Co 2⁶⁻¹⁶) in mind, for success is to be reached only if 'we have the mind of Christ.'

1. Perhaps the first characteristic to notice is the way in which the mind of the Lord Jesus was always so thoroughly alive to everything around Him. In the single glimpse afforded of His boyhood this appears strikingly; for no one can read Lk 2⁴¹⁻⁵¹ without feeling the eagerness with which He looked on Jerusalem for the first time consciously, and threw Himself into the best life of the festival. He was instantly at home in the Temple, and ready to listen and to inquire of the Rabbis there with a keen grasp which amazed them. Later on, the same ready observancy, which not merely noticed but entered into every phase of life, is again and again to be remarked. Now it was the flowers of the country side that won His attention (Lk 12²⁷), now the games of the children in the market-place (7³²), now the habits of the wild creatures (9⁵⁸), or their unconsidered treatment in captivity (12⁶), now the details of the yeoman's employment (Mt 13⁸⁻¹², Lk 13¹¹), now the unnoticed self-denial of a poor woman in a crowd (Mk 12⁴³). Just as readily He gave keen attention to the life of long ago told in the Scriptures of His race. For Him the characters appearing in the stories of the past were all real and vivid; e.g. Naaman (Lk 4²⁷), David (Mt 12⁹), Zachariah (Mt 23³⁵). With no less alacrity He noted the current events which made a popular impression (Lk 13⁴), and the far more momentous movements of national life which others too often overlooked (21²⁰, Mt 16¹⁻³).

2. In close connexion with the foregoing characteristic stands the fulness of vital force in the Lord Jesus. Of most persons it is true that the emotional, or the intellectual, or the volitional faculties dominate and give the general colour to the temperament, but in Him all were supremely strong. The vehemence of His feelings was such as would have overbalanced the will or unsteady the intellect of another; but He never lost balance or clarity. The lucid understanding which never failed in things great or small would have subordinated feeling, or even sapped its strength, in most; but the calm sweep of His discernment never made Him less warm-hearted towards 'one of the least of these my brethren,' and He condemned at once any use of reason which restrained responsiveness, as when His disciples were inclined to check the children brought to Him and He was 'moved with indignation' (Mk 10¹⁴), or when He promptly defended the woman's 'waste' of the costly ointment which her uncalculating love so gladly spent on Him (14⁶). Yet neither warmth of feeling nor reach of understanding ever warped His will to excuse or palliate in any wise, or made His resolution waver. Nothing could be sterner or more unsparing than the way in which He turned on almost the best-loved and aptest of His disciples, and this, too, directly after His whole heart had gone out to him in welcome and in grateful sympathy for the trust and insight he had just shown (Mt 16^{17, 23}). The narrative of the Temptation in the wilderness, which must have been derived from the Lord Himself, can hardly be paralleled in its dauntless determination, except indeed by the narrative of how He followed out in His work the ideal here resolutely formed, and never faltered in following it still when it led Him through the valley of the shadow of death.

3. What has been said of the poise of these three mental factors, which are found in every living action of every living soul, though hardly ever balanced evenly, must be extended in Jesus' case to a wider range. There is nothing more remarkable than the perfect proportion of His nature. Those characteristics which are found singly in others, and which are commonly antithetic and even incompatible, are found alike, and at one in Him. He was passionate: 'He looked round with anger' (Mk 3⁵); 'Jesus wept' (Jn 11³⁵, cf. Lk 19⁴¹); 'Jesus looking on him loved him' (Mk 10²¹); 'Ye serpents, ye offspring of vipers!' (Mt 23³³). But who was ever so patient? cf. Mk 4⁴⁰, Jn 16¹², and the whole scene of His trial and crucifixion. He was full of reverence for the past; scrupulous in His respect for authority (Mt 23²), and very sensitive to the sacred associations of ancient institutions (Mk 11¹⁵⁻¹⁷, Lk 19^{41, 42, 22¹⁵}). But He held Himself entirely untrammelled by either precedent or outward enactment (Mt 5^{17, 18^{ff.}}), and appealed without hesitation to the conscience and instinct of every man, as to a sufficient and trustworthy test (Lk 13^{15, 16}). His was an imaginative and contemplative mind; He loved to withdraw to the desert country by Himself, or with a handful of intimate friends, and to spend long hours in personal devotions. Even when work pressed upon Him, and He 'had no leisure so much as to eat' (Mk 6³¹), feeling the harvest waiting to be reaped was far too great for His little band of fellow-labourers to cope with, He still spent what seems to have been an astonishingly large proportion of His time in seclusion. But never was a dreamer of dreams so intensely practical. Hard and prolonged work He undertook with zest, then slept at once and soundly, and woke ready for any effort or emergency at the instant (4^{1, 2, 33-39}). And His practical ability is strikingly apparent in other ways; e.g. He was so sure in the handling of men (Lk 9⁵⁷⁻⁶², Jn 3¹⁻¹⁵ 11⁶⁻¹⁶), so capable of picking out and dealing with the precise thing needing to be done at any given stage or moment (Mt 17²⁴⁻²⁷, Jn 7³⁻⁸ 11⁶⁻¹⁶). He was remarkably tolerant, and again and again gave offence to narrower minds by the width of His sympathies and the leniency of His judgments. Particularly is this illustrated by His relations with 'publicans and sinners,' which exposed Him to disgraceful calumny (Mt 11¹⁹), of which He recked nothing; but His tolerance was also too great for His own followers to understand it (Mk 9³⁸⁻⁴¹), and great enough sometimes to shame the bitterest opponents into silence (Jn 8⁷⁻¹¹). Yet no one could be more rigid on occasion, as in His treatment of the Phœnician mother (Mt 15²³⁻²⁸), or more inexorable in condemnation (23¹³⁻³⁶, Mk 3^{28, 29}). His humility was profound, and has changed the estimation of this quality in the eyes of mankind. 'I am in the midst of you as he that serveth' (Lk 22²⁷), He would say, or show them even more vividly in deed (Jn 13¹⁵). 'I am meek and lowly in heart' (Mt 11²⁹) was what He felt as He welcomed the weary, and gave thanks that the highest wisdom was 'revealed unto babes.' Yet never were such tremendous assertions made by any one about himself, or such unflinching emphasis laid upon the place he must hold in the eyes of others, and the claims he made upon them: 'He that loveth father or mother . . . son or daughter, more than me, is not worthy of me. And he that doth not take his cross and follow after me is not worthy of me' (10^{37, 38}); 'The Spirit of the truth shall glorify me, for he shall take of mine and shall declare it unto you. All things whatsoever the Father hath are mine' (Jn 16¹³⁻¹⁵). Again, the stern independence which would not bend to make a 'hard saying' more easily acceptable, but would let all who would not receive it go their way, even if His closest intimates were to be included (6⁶⁶⁻⁶⁸), and which justly called forth F. W. Robertson's rejoinder, 'Don't care was crucified on Calvary,' was no less characteristic of Him than that craving for sympathy which went with His sensitive and affectionate nature, and led Him to beseech the companionship of those whom He could best trust in such hours of agonized prayer as are recorded on the Mount of Transfiguration and in the Garden of Gethsemane. On the one hand, He always saw things just as they are, undistorted by His own feelings, unconcealed by custom or convention, neither excused nor glorified, if faulty, by their associations, nor hackneyed or degraded by their common abuse. This holds equally of the smallest details of the natural world (Mt 11⁷) or of human life (Lk 14⁷ 15^{8, 9}), and of the greatest forces at work in the world (Mk 13²). All this marks Him out as a genuine realist. But, on the other hand, beyond all others He was an idealist. For Him the most real world was that Kingdom of heaven which He always felt to be 'at hand'—within direct and instant reach. It was His own most positive experience not to 'live by bread alone,' but to satisfy the needs of His nature with food and drink that were spiritual (Jn 4^{13, 14, 34}). The story of the Temptation is perhaps the purest idealism ever written: but glimpses into His thoughts which are subsequently afforded show how the habitual working of His mind was on no lower level of idealism (Lk 10¹⁷⁻²⁴). Again, He was intensely individualistic in His point of view (Mt 6^{3, 6, 17}), and, even in the widest sweep of forecast on the fate of the world, did not fail to regard each several individual in and for himself; in fact, His influence has given the world a different and a deeper conception of the worth and meaning of individual lives, and has gone far towards the making of the best modern thoughts of personality. But none the less He was quite free from the segregative and disintegrating individualism which has been the bane of Puritanism and Benthamism and other phases of thought in which the individualist standpoint has been prominent. And the aims He set forward were always communal. E.g. His followers were described as 'a flock,' 'a church,' 'a vine,' in which the severance of a member involved its utter futility. The 'Kingdom of God' was the one great end for which all were to live and work (6³³), careless of personal needs; and no condition for association with Himself was more imperative than that every one should 'disown himself' completely (Mk 8³⁴⁻³⁷). But what is most remarkable of all is not that these and other antithetic characteristics, which are in other cases met with singly, were found in concurrence and in full development in the mind of the Lord Jesus, but that in Him they were in such perfect proportion and such intimate relation that they were not opposing tendencies at all. To say that it is impossible to indicate which way the balance of contrasted impulses inclined, so stable was the equipoise, is not enough. These things, which in other natures are conflicting, were in Him mutually supporting and at one. In nearly all minds one can detect more or less cleavage and internal strain, but that of the Lord Jesus was wholly annealed, showing only the finest temper without any tension.

The fulness, balance, and unity of the Master's nature make it impracticable to use in His case what is the commonest and readiest way of portraying a person. This is to throw into the foreground of the picture those features in which the character is exceptionally strong, or those deficiencies which mark it off from others, and to leave as an unelaborated background the common stuff of human nature. Thus by sketching the idiosyncrasies, and casting a few high-lights, the man is set forth sufficiently. But what traits are there in the Lord Jesus which stand out because more highly developed than other features? Where are His follies or defects? Nothing truly human was wanting in Him, nothing was exaggerated. The fact which distinguished Him from all others was His completeness at all points, so that in the first and in every succeeding generation of His followers the greatest have declared, 'Of his fulness we all receive' (Jn 1¹⁶). And this surely is what we must expect to be its mode if we try to conceive of a Divine Incarnation. Even as Christ's power and presence give to such as trust Him 'perfect wholeness' (τινὴν ἀσφαλῆσαν ταύτην, Ac 3¹⁶), so the power and presence of the Infinite realized in humanity is disclosed in a 'perfect wholeness' which raises every human feature and faculty above itself, and compels the confession, 'In him dwelleth all the plenitude of the Godhead bodily-wise' (Col 2⁹). It is difficult to mention more than four features which can fairly be called personal traits of the Lord Jesus. These are: His keen appreciation of the beauty of the natural world; His fondness for little children, whom again and again He held up for the reverence of His disciples, and whom He Himself looked upon with a feeling akin to awe (Mt 18¹⁰); His love of being on a height (many of the cardinal points in His career were on the hill-tops, just as the crises of temptation were on 'an exceeding high mountain,' and when He was 'set on the pinnacle of the temple,' cf. Mt 51 14²³ 15²⁹ 17¹ 28¹⁶ || Mk 3¹³); and His love of being often alone. On the other hand, if one seeks for personal characteristics due to the marked absence of anything that most men share, there is nothing that can be named, except that, unlike others, He was without 'the defects of His qualities.' Thus exaltation never passed into ecstasy; zeal never into rashness or one-sidedness; sympathy never into sentimentality; determination never into obstinacy; conscience never into scrupulosity; the habit of moral discrimination never into casuistry; standing indignation against the hypocrisies of the day never made Him censorious; a wonderful tenderness of heart left Him stern and uncompromising; and an energy which rejoiced in work, and shrank from nothing, never led Him to become exacting towards others or inconsiderate of their weakness.

In this connexion a word must be said on His relation to the stock of Israel. All His personal habits and customs, all His information, His religious premises, found their starting-points in the national life and customs of Israel, and in the Scriptures and other current ideas of its noblest minds belonging to previous days. And He never hesitated to adopt and use freely the practices and religious language which He found in the Israel of His age. But it is impossible, for all that, to regard Jesus as a typical, or as a perfect Jew. He had indeed all the best characteristics of the greatest sons of Israel, and notably of the prophets of 'the past'; their zeal for righteousness, their fear of God, their tenacity of purpose, their noble scorn of the littleness of the earth and all that is in it in comparison with 'the high and lofty One that inhabiteth Eternity, whose name is Holy' (Is 57¹⁵). But He was likest them just where they were least representative of the race from which they sprang, just where they towered above their fellow-countrymen and were least appreciated by the latter. He rose above them all; and while nothing truly Jewish was discarded or denied, the Jew was left below. He was fully conscious of this Himself, and so the term by which He continually named Himself was at once the simplest and the greatest that a human being can bear—He was the 'Son of Man.' It is a title all can use, but He alone exhausts. And to this day it continually receives corroboration from many quarters, for His disciples, drawn from many racés, never find Him alien to their own needs. To the Oriental believer Jesus is an Oriental, to the Western He has all the Western nature. The ancient Greek philosopher, the modern Hindu, and the Negro slave, no less than the British subject, see indeed different aspects of Him salient, but none feels in Him a national character which makes Him a foreigner from their several points of view.

4. A few negative observations are required, as they serve to define more clearly some of the characteristics of the Lord Jesus. (a) He was sinless. Amidst men whose eyes were sharpened by envy to detect the least fault, and who tried many times to ensnare Him in His words because they despaired of tripping Him in wrong conduct, He threw down the challenge without misgiving: 'Which of you convicteth me of sin?' And none dared take it up, either then or later (Mk 14²⁶): nor in the sixty generations that have passed since then have any such ethical advances been made that, looking back from our present vantage ground, we can point to anything as sin in Him. But His sinlessness did not consist merely in the fact that no act of full-grown sin could be discovered. There was no taint anywhere in Jesus' mind. Everything bore the bloom of perfect spiritual health and maturity. Spiritual disease could find no foothold whence to spread its poison, not even in the hours of spiritual conflict and internal agony. 'One that hath been tempted in all points like as we are, apart from sin' (He 4¹⁵), is the only possible description of Him. (b) He made no use of limiting qualifications in His sayings, or similar reservations in His action. He did not use 'ifs' and 'buts,' but spoke with simple decisiveness on the most complex questions. At times He would carry this to the length of paradox, and bid a man struck on one cheek turn the other to invite a blow. At other times He would restate a problem to strip it of those adventitious difficulties with which it is enveloped in common minds; as when He met the unuttered question whether He would break the Law by healing on the Sabbath, by putting the inquiry, 'Is it lawful on the Sabbath day to do good, or to do harm? to save a life, or to kill?' (Mk 3⁴). But more often He went straight to the centre of the matter in hand with a simple directness which made all qualifications needless: His dealing with the Sadducees' puzzle (12¹⁸⁻²⁷) is a striking instance. This can be done only by one whose 'eye is single.' (c) Jesus was never critical. More nearly than anywhere else one seems here to discover a deficiency in Him; for the critical faculties are of great value, and in some minds are in admirable vigour. In Him they were in abeyance. And yet it is plain this resulted from no want of faculty. He could on occasion prove Himself matchless in dialectic; and in more than one controversy with skilled opponents He used this dialectic power with crushing effect. What could be finer than His appeal to the image and superscription of the tribute-money when plied with the insidious question, 'Shall we give, or shall we not give?' (12¹⁴); or than His rejoinder to the challenge of His own authority, 'The baptism of John, was it from heaven, or from men? answer me' (11³⁰),—a rejoinder which not only silenced objectors, but went to the root of the question they raised as to the criterion of 'authority'? His dialectic skill sometimes passed into biting sarcasm, as when He pointed out how the scribes and Pharisees witnessed to themselves that they were the sons of them that slew the prophets, by the way they garnished their tombs (Mt 23²⁹⁻³¹). Here are all the faculties for critical efficiency, but the Lord Jesus was never critical. The fact seems to be that His mind was too creative. In minds of lesser stature, criticism may hold an honourable place, and often serves a very useful purpose; but it is always a second-hand way of winning truth. The truly creative mind does not need it, and does not use it, but reaches truth by direct intuition, or makes it spontaneously. He did so.

5. The last observation leads on to the mention of three mental characteristics which can hardly be separated, and which are all inwoven in the very fabric of Jesus' mind. His thoughts were always concrete, not abstract; His intellectual processes were intuitive, not argumentative; His views were ever positive, not negative. It has been very truly pointed out that 'only the widest generalizations and concrete facts are definite' (Hort); whatever lies between these extremes is more or less indefinite. Most minds are occupied mainly with this intermediate region, adding some degree of generalization to each fact of experience, and qualifying the largest generalizations by some accommodation to groups of facts observed. And to this is due not a little of the indefiniteness of most men's thoughts. But it was otherwise with the Lord Jesus. If He dealt with generalizations at all, He generalized out and out, dropping all half-way descriptions and limitations. He did not, therefore, shrink from inculcating principles which have often since been questioned on the ground that they are not of universal application. E.g. 'Give to him that asketh of thee' (Mt 5⁴²),—though experience shows too surely how much moral mischief may be done by indiscriminate charity; 'Ask, and it shall be given you' (77),—though prayers by no means always win what has been prayed for; 'It is easier for a camel to go through a needle's eye than for a rich man to enter into the kingdom of God' (Mk 10²⁵),—though wealth used worthily is no such bar to entry, and must itself be regarded as a 'loan from the Lord.' There is a definiteness in these unrestricted duties which could not have been attained by any carefully qualified rules of conduct. But more often the Lord Jesus adhered to concrete facts, and did not generalize at all. So, when any case came before Him, He dealt with that, and did not treat it as a precedent to govern others generally similar. Thus He told the rich young ruler to 'sell all he had and give to the poor, and follow him' (10²¹). He certainly meant this to be done literally and at once; but it would be ruinous to turn this counsel into a command binding upon all rich men. It was never so intended, but was the particular remedy for the 'one thing lacking' in that one young man. No rule is to be directly drawn from the Lord's treatment of the woman in the Temple, or of Zaccheus, or of Judas Iscariot, which would apply to all adulteresses, or renegades, or traitors: each was dealt with as the particular need required.

This was one leading reason why the use of parables was such a very characteristic feature in Jesus' teaching; they have been said, in fact, and not without reason, to be the most characteristic of the Lord's recorded sayings. They enabled Him to put the lesson He desired in the concrete instead of the abstract. So, when asked, 'Who is my neighbour?' He gave no general answer, but an actual instance occurring on the road (Lk 10^{30ff.}). Probably the scribe to whom this was first spoken never found himself in circumstances that were similar; but if he gained the higher standpoint which this story gave him, and saw into the very heart of truth in that one case, he would be able, like thousands of others who have heard the story since, the better to answer his own question in his own circumstances.

It was a consequence of this love of the concrete, and avoidance of that vagueness which belongs to all that lies short of the widest generalization, that Jesus never gave definitions. Instead, He fixed the type in some particular fact or instance. In His teaching there was no theorizing, no abstract discussion, no systematic theology. Nor was there any care to lay down principles for the organization or policy of His Church in times to come. The nearest approach to this last is in such passages as Mt 18¹⁵⁻¹⁷, or the directions given before the first mission (10⁵⁻²³); but in these nothing is more noticeable than the utter absence of all abstractions, and all provisions for distant contingencies, every idea being expressed in concrete form, and in immediate connexion with the conditions of the work in hand. And yet in all this there is no mere particularism. Each single fact on which He looked was seen by Him in its real relations to all else, and in the light of the highest and widest principles. There is true insight into human needs in the saying that 'little thoughts do not suit with little duties. It is in the fulfilment of simple routine that we need more than anywhere the quickening of the highest thoughts' (Westcott). With Jesus that was instinctive. Any fact in His sight was serious, was sacred; for it was not merely an illustration of a wider truth, rather it was an actual embodiment of eternal reality. He looked on the 'flower in the crannied wall'—no more—and saw it with such penetrating insight that to Him it was eloquent of 'what God and man is.' He showed just the same intuitive recognition of truth in His estimate of a man, or His grasp of a religious principle. Whether it were the purpose and use of the Temple, or the religious customs and conventions of the day, or practical problems involving conflicting considerations, like that set to Peter by the question, 'Doth not your Master pay the half-shekel?' (17²⁴), or inquiries on the outer confines of human thought, such as those concerning eschatology and the life beyond death, the Lord Jesus always looked into the very heart of the facts before Him, so that all accessories and accidents seemed to drop away and leave the truth in its naked simplicity under His eyes. He completely disregarded the things which for most minds overlie and confuse the essential issues, and fixed His gaze on those positive points round which all the rest was accretion. His mind therefore concerned itself but little with negatives in any case. One most important consequence of this was that He always saw whatever good there was in any man, and paid comparatively little heed to the evil which might be there also. He did not stay to combat or correct the latter, but freed and reinforced the former so that it grew till no place was left for the evil, and it was expelled. In His hands all the old negative commandments were transformed into positive ideals; and all were summed up in the one great ideal of loving God and one's neighbour (Mk 12²⁹⁻³¹), which was itself set forth in no lower form than the very highest, 'Ye shall be perfect, as your heavenly Father is perfect' (Mt 5⁴⁸). And in full accordance with this habit of mind, the judgments which from time to time He passed on men about Him were determined rather by what moral worth they had or lacked, than by what faults were in them. The most unsparring condemnation fell upon the Pharisees, whose lives were strict and reputable, and free from the gross and careless vices of the multitude. He denounced their whole moral and religious activity as an 'hypocrisy,' because it was one great negation. They were not 'sinners'; but with all the opportunities for good which more than others they possessed, their hearts and lives were empty. He portrayed them, and showed the futility of their whole religious method, by describing a man out of whom the unclean spirit has been driven, and whose house is then cleaned and left vacant. The cleaning out is not disputed, but all the more surely does the vacancy invite new tenants; and if no good spirit occupies the house forthwith, 'the last state of that man cometh worse than the first' (Lk 11²⁶). So in His pictures of God's final judgment the condemnation falls not usually on those against whom crimes may be alleged (though these find mention, e.g. Mk 12⁹, Mt 22⁷), but on the thoughtless maids found without oil; on the servant who took good care of his talent but never used it; on the guest without a wedding garment; on those to whom it is said, 'I was an hungered, and ye gave me no food; I was thirsty, and ye gave me no drink; I was a stranger, and ye took me not in; naked, and ye clothed me not; sick, and in prison, and ye visited me not' (Mt 25³²). The whole point of view of Jesus in this is in strong contrast with that of the Judaism of His age, which aimed at attaining holiness by an earnest and elaborate endeavour to eliminate unholiness and defend the shrine of the soul from trespass.

One aspect of these last-mentioned characteristics may be summed up in a word, by saying that the make of Jesus' mind was that which is found in the greatest poets. They all combine, as lesser men cannot, the realist and the idealist. Their ideas are concrete, not abstract. Their minds work by intuition, not by argument. Their interests and thoughts are positive; and they are all more or less insistent that—

'The evil is null, is nought, a silence implying sound.'

And much of the Lord's teaching shows that the sense of form and the feeling for language which belong to them were His in a remarkable degree. Perhaps it was not entirely the power of His own personality, nor yet the substance of what He said, but also in part the music of its expression, that enabled Him so often to throw a spell over His hearers; e.g. 'All bare him witness, and wondered at the words of grace which proceeded out of his mouth' (Lk 4²²); 'The people all hung upon him, listening' (19⁴⁸); 'The officers answered, Never man so spake' (Jn 7⁴⁶). There is, of course, the truest poetry in many of His sayings and in His parables; and His teaching teems with flashes of imagery such as only the highest poetry presents. Even in form of language some of His sayings lack little of the rhythm and music of poetical expression. But we have to remember that He wrote nothing that remains, and that nothing has been reported in His original words. The best we can expect to find in the NT is a good and faithful translation; and who can translate poetry? But a doubt must remain whether any literary vehicle could carry the full poetic inspiration of the Lord Jesus. Poems, however truly living, are the reflexions of life. The Life itself was inherent in Him (Jn 5²⁶), and He came to impart it, not to reflect it (10¹⁰). So His 'poems' (ποίηματα) are the souls which, generation after generation, He has created anew, the ideals which have transformed, and are transforming, the world; even as St. Paul said of his disciples, 'Ye are an epistle of Christ ministered by us, written not with ink, but with the Spirit of the living God' (2 Co 3³). See, further, art. POET.

6. There are some things more properly described, perhaps, as features of character than as mental characteristics, but the distinction is such a narrow one, being a difference in the point of view and not in the facts, that they must be mentioned, though as briefly as possible. The profound reverence of Jesus' mind is one. Not only does this appear in every relation to His Father in heaven, and in the way He taught His disciples to look up to Him, but also in His delicate respect for all those who sought His help, and the sensitive regard He showed for the spiritual responsibility of each person, on which He never trenched. Another is His simplicity. He loved a simple life in outward things, rebuking Martha for her too ample provision when so little was needful (Lk 10⁴¹), and teaching His followers to spend little care on the wealth and comfort which He held so lightly, and to pray only for 'daily bread.' But simplicity is still more strikingly characteristic of the nature and process of His mind. Though more than any other that has ever lived He was 'many-sided,' He never gave the impression of a complicated nature. With the directness of a child He always turned to the point in hand; and no one was ever more free from that hesitancy which is so often found in those who are the best able to see both sides of a question. With sympathy unflinching and unlimited, He still was simple, and could put the loftiest thoughts into simple terms. That is always a characteristic of a really great—though not of every great—mind: never was an instance of it comparable with this one. Closely akin to this is the fact that Jesus was never disconcerted or bewildered, nor did He ever lose presence of mind in the most difficult or dangerous situations. Rather, in times of trial, there was a heightening of His serenity of mind; for trial and sorrow made stronger appeal to His faith, which was always responsive. μη μετρωπιζεσθε was a counsel most characteristic of Him (Lk 12²⁹); and it was this habitual trust in the Father that enabled Him in the very hour of impending agony to make His followers the bequest of peace—His peace (Jn 14²⁷ 16³³).

7. Two matters of importance remain to be mentioned, distinct but by no means unconnected—(a) Jesus' characteristic outlook upon life, and (b) His method as the Saviour of the world.

(a) One cannot escape the feeling that while others look only at the surface of life, the Master looked through its surface and saw its depth: we see life usually in two dimensions, He looked at it in three, and so saw reality. Of course, from His standpoint all its proportions were very different from those which appear to us. The most striking expression of what is meant is to be found in Browning's description of Lazarus as given in the Epistle of Karshish. But while Browning had learnt the nature of this larger view, converting all proportions, from Him who called back Lazarus to earth, he represents it as a double prospect in Lazarus, with none of that translucent unity which is its essential feature in the Lord Jesus. The Beatitudes are an instance. Their chief effect, and it cannot be doubted their chief purpose, is to set the hearer on a new standpoint, and so enable him to gain a new view of life. It is no paradox that the poor are blest, while all men congratulate the rich; and this is not said to give emphasis to the aspect which is too much overlooked. It is simply the truth of life, seen as the eyes of the Lord Jesus saw it when He looked round on His disciples gathered there, all destitute of earth's possessions, but with a light in their eager faces as they 'hung upon him listening' which told of the 'righteousness and peace and joy in holy inspiration' which showed that theirs was the Kingdom of God (Ro 14¹⁷). All whose reading of experience goes deep can see, or partly see, why He counted sorrow blest, and gentleness, mercy, purity, and love the treasures of man's real enrichment. Another instance is the prayer He gave to His disciples when they felt the need of being taught how to pray. There is an unearthliness in it, and a grasp on the real depths of life, such as no other prayers disclose. God's glory, and His Kingdom, and the joy of fulfilling His will, fill up all the foreground; and the remainder of the view includes brief mention of bare needs here, and then fuller appeal for the deeper needs of forgiveness, and of the shelter of Him who is our 'shield and our exceeding great reward.' Hardly less striking is the way in which He enforced the duty of simple truthfulness, His words calling up vividly the awful picture of the Evil One leaning over the soul that talks loosely, to ply it with 'suggestions' which then find unsuspecting utterance as readily as those which the hypnotist gives to his unconscious 'subject' (Mt 5³⁷, with which cf. Lk 22⁵¹). There were times when the Lord expressed strongly this contrast between the view which men took of life and that which He took (Lk 16¹⁵), but more often His reference is a mere allusion. The difference culminated in that most characteristic and central idea on which He so often dwelt, that a man must 'lose his life to find it' (Mk 8³⁴⁻³⁷ ||, cf. Mt 10³⁹, Lk 17³³, Jn 12²⁵). Death itself was accordingly transfigured in Jesus' eyes: it neither put a limit to life nor made a breach which destroyed its continuity. Death was for Him 'sleep'; a sleep from which He awakened more than one, and from which 'in the last day' He would awake and raise up 'every one that beholdeth the Son and believeth on him' (Jn 6⁴⁰). For Himself, He looked through death to His own resurrection, which He again and again told His disciples to expect as the day of His departure drew nearer; and for the rest, He recognized death with all its miserable and misleading associations as little as might be, and refused even to speak of it if this could be avoided (11¹¹⁻¹⁴). With His strong sense of the continuity of life there went, however, a very remarkable reserve about the future. Concerning it He disclosed nothing of detail; nothing that trust in the love of God and the assurance of life's continuity do not themselves imply. He plainly said He did not know the course of the future, and His disciples must not expect to do so (Mk 13³², Ac 1⁷). But He never showed Himself averse to adopting the current religious language which rested on the prophecy and apocalypses of the past, to clothe those ideas which He wished to impress about the life to come; though it may well be that the eschatological passages in the Gospels are considerably coloured and confused by the fact that they have come through the medium of disciples who were not equal to following their Master's higher thoughts.

It is in connexion with this far profounder view of life which we find in Him that we are best able to understand the 'powers that worked in' the Lord Jesus (ἐνεργούσιν αὐτῷ δυνάμεις ἰσχυροῦς, Mk 6¹⁴), and His consciousness in regard to them. The term 'miracles' can hardly fail to prove misleading, as it is so closely associated with the 18th cent. point of view, which considered them as exceptions to natural law, and as owing their evidential value to the fact that they were exceptions. That view is quite obsolete and impossible now to a really scientific mind; it was always singularly unappreciative of 'the mind of Christ.' There can be no doubt that Jesus Himself felt complete certainty that He did wield powers of an extraordinary and practically limitless kind (cf. Mt 26⁵¹⁻⁵³), and that His contemporaries never dreamt of disputing the fact. But to Him they were certainly 'unnatural' nor 'supernatural.' The distinction drawn by the latter term is quite alien to His mind, and inconsistent with His point of view; for Him the continuous character and flow of life was a fundamental idea, and the one unbroken reality included equally what we describe as 'natural' and 'supernatural.' The 'powers' of which He was conscious had their proper place and scope in life as He saw it; and if it is not possible for us to assign this, or to explain them, that is due probably to the single fact that, as already said, we try to see the reality of life from the standpoint of two dimensions, and can succeed so little in seeing it from that of three as He did (cf. Mt 16¹⁹ 18¹⁸, Jn 20²³).

(b) The method which the Lord Jesus followed in carrying out His purpose as the world's Saviour was no less unique than His outlook on life, and it was the direct result of the latter. In the ordinary sense of the term He was no reformer; He did not try to make the institutions which He found serve their end better, nor did He seek to substitute one expedient for another, to attain more successfully the aims before Him. He felt that His Kingdom was 'not of this world,' and all He sought was to open its portal to believers. He did not pit His Kingdom against those of the world to overthrow the latter; rather He refused to let His followers do this or to do it Himself (Mt 26⁵²⁻⁵⁴). Nor did He attempt to withdraw His followers from the world, as other religious leaders often have done, that they might serve God with less distraction. Even His prayers were not for change of the world itself, or the delivery of His disciples from it (Jn 17⁹⁻²¹). Though His whole life was sacrificed to save the world, He just left the world alone. As in His teaching there was little that was negative, so in His work He tried to undo nothing. It is very surprising how content He always seemed to be to accommodate Himself to the use of any means or circumstance that lay ready at hand, while so unbending in aim throughout. Thus He spoke the religious language of Judaism, practised the customs in Israel, and respected its institutions, however much they were degraded and abused. He paid His half-shekel to the Sanhedrin and His tribute-money to the Cæsar without protest. Browning again brings out with striking effect this feature of the Master's in his portrait of Lazarus, whose 'especial marking . . . is prone submission to the heavenly will,' so that he tries to change nothing; but here again this characteristic, being isolated, lapses into quietism as it never did in Lazarus' Master. For, however willing Jesus was to use and leave unreformed the things around Him, none of these ever bound Him. If there was fault or falsehood mingled with what He borrowed for the moment, He left that on one side and moved on towards His goal unaffected. He saw the truth too clearly to be diverted by aught else, and the truth made Him free. And He led His followers into the freedom that was His own. So, while He abstained from all political intervention, and declined to be mixed up with the ordinary business of life (Lk 12¹⁴), and left religious institutions and traditions where He found them, He nevertheless revolutionized all life. There is no department of human activity in the world to-day—except in some of its backwaters which have not yet felt His influence—which is not profoundly altered in consequence of His life and work and words. His confidence that it would be so never faltered; He saw here the supreme scope of the law of 'life through loss.' So He declared beforehand the result which is yet in progress under our eyes—'I, if I be lifted up out of the earth, will draw all men unto myself' (Jn 12³²). Of what import are the foam flakes which float upon its surface to him who plunges into the mighty stream of life? Jesus' view of life, and His method of saving men, both so original, both so characteristic, are both vindicated in full by the results. They are alike summed up in the joyous conviction which many and many a soul has uttered when lifted to His higher plane, and which even the world itself has been forced to suspect, though not to share: 'If any man be in Christ, there is a new creation!' (2 Co 5¹⁷, Gal 6¹⁵).

MERCY.—1. Mercy of God.—Mercy is 'that essential perfection in God whereby He pities and relieves the miseries of His creatures' (Cruden). In the OT the mercy of God (חַסְדִּים, רַחֲמִים; חַסְדִּים, חַסְדִּים) is sought and celebrated in view of distress caused by sin (Ps 51¹, La 3²²), or more frequently where no connexion with sin is expressed (Ps 89¹ 118¹). Sin and the distress which is the consequence of it are not always separated in thought (Ps 41⁴ 79^{8, 9}).

In the NT a clearer division can be made of places where the mercy spoken of is temporal or spiritual. Those who came to Christ for help asked for mercy, that is, for pity and relief (Mt 9²⁷ 15²² 17¹⁵ 20³⁰; cf. Mk 5¹⁹). The word used is ἐλεεῖν, while Christ's twofold response is expressed by σπλαγχνισθεῖς, 'moved with compassion,' and by His act of healing (Mt 20³⁴). Along with these may be placed Lk 1⁵⁸, Ph 2²⁷, 1 Co 7²⁵, where particular instances of mercy are mentioned. On the other hand, the words ἔλεος, ἐλεεῖν are used of the whole of God's saving work in Christ (Lk 17^{2, 78}, Ro 11³⁰, 2 Co 4¹, Eph 2⁴, 1 Ti 1^{13, 16}, Tit 3³⁻⁷, Jude 21). In the publican's prayer, 'God, be merciful to me the sinner' (Lk 18¹³), the more exact translation is 'be propitiated' (λάσθητι), as also in He 8¹² (ἔλεος). In these places the obstacle of sin is recognized, and the mercy described is such as overcomes sin.

Generally in the NT sin is described not only as the source of human misery, but as itself the greatest evil from which men need to be delivered; and accordingly the work of God's mercy is to save from sin (see Eph 2⁴⁻¹⁰, Tit 3⁷). In Ro 11³⁰⁻³² something is said of the Divine purpose in permitting sin, so that we may believe that the severities of God's judgments are not inconsistent with 'that essential perfection of mercy whereby He pities and relieves the miseries of His creatures.' But of this as creatures we have not the final right to judge (Ro 9^{15, 23}). A deepened sense of the hopelessness of separation from God brings it about that no other deliverance is to be for a moment compared with salvation from sin (Eph 2¹⁻⁴; cf. Gal 1⁴, Jude 2¹).

This is also seen to be the meaning of mercy when the method of God's mercy in the Gospel is considered, and the aim of it.

(1) Its method.—Christ's work teaches us that God's mercy seeks a higher good for men than the relief of temporal distress. We must think of Christ as abiding in the constant sense of the mercy of His Father, and communicating the same to men in word and deed. 'Be ye therefore merciful (οἰκτιρῶνες), as your Father also is merciful' (Lk 6³⁶). 'Love one another, as I have loved you. Greater love hath no man than this' (Jn 15^{12, 13}). That is to say, the mercy of God beginning with compassion went on to action, in the Incarnation and Atonement. 'This is he that came by water and blood' (1 Jn 5⁶). 'I lay down my life that I may take it again. . . This commandment have I received of my Father' (Jn 10^{17, 18}, cf. 1 P 1¹⁹).

Following upon the work of Christ, it is said of believers that they have obtained mercy (2 Co 4¹, 1 Ti 1^{13, 16}, 1 P 2¹⁰); and that they look for the mercy of the Lord Jesus Christ unto eternal life (Jude 2¹). And mercy is still continuously needed, asked for, and received by believers (He 4¹⁶, Ph 2²⁷, 2 Ti 1^{16, 18}). Also the prayers in 1 Ti 1², 2 Ti 1², Gal 6¹⁶, 2 Jn 3, Jude 2, indicate that it becomes us to go in prayer to seek the mercy which it remains always with God to bestow. It is noteworthy that mercy is added to the usual 'grace' and 'peace' of the salutations just in those places where some more intimate affection and tender sympathy is naturally to be expected (e.g. Gal 6¹⁶, the Letters to Timothy, and Jude's Epistle). Whatever there is painful in the experience of believers constitutes for them a new need of the Divine mercy, and is to be explained as a part of God's purpose of greater good by saving them more and more completely from sin.

(2) Its aim.—The aim of God's mercy is expressed in Christ's words, 'That ye may be the children of your Father which is in heaven' (Mt 5⁴⁵). The parable of the Unmerciful Servant (Mt 18²³) sets forth the purpose of God negatively, and in 1 Jn 2⁵ 4^{12, 17} the positive side is given. God's mercy or love to us comes to perfect realization when we have learned to be like Him. Because He loves us He will have us to be merciful, that we may be at our best. In this way also the progress of the Kingdom of God among men is assured, as we see in a concrete instance in 2 Co 4-7 (cf. Ac 20¹⁸⁻³⁵).

2. Mercy of man to man.—We have seen that it is the aim of the Divine mercy to reproduce itself in the spirits of men. As mercy has two parts, pity and active beneficence, we are commanded to love not in word, neither in tongue, but in deed and in truth (1 Jn 3¹⁸). This is Christ's teaching in Mt 9¹³ 12⁷ 23²³, and in the parables of the Good Samaritan (Lk 10³⁰) and of the Sheep and the Goats (Mt 25³¹), as well as in that of the Unmerciful Servant (Mt 18²³). From these we learn that if gratitude to God does not avail to make men merciful to one another, they will be dealt with by penalties (see also Ja 2¹³ 3¹⁷, 1 Jn 2⁹⁻¹¹ 3¹⁵). This right disposition of heart is a product not so much of enlightenment of the mind as of such experiences as touch the springs of affection. The passage in 2 Co 4-9, beginning 'as we have obtained mercy' (and, indeed, the whole Epistle), is a treasury of evangelical motives to philanthropic conduct. 'Our mouth is opened unto you, our heart is enlarged' (6¹¹). Similarly, in the case of St. Peter, 'Thou knowest that I love thee. . . Feed my sheep' (Jn 21¹⁷; cf. Ro 12¹ 'I beseech you . . . by the mercies (οἰκτιρμοί) of God that ye present your bodies a living sacrifice').

Selflessness, and the constraint that Christ's love lays upon a believer, are the important features of his behaviour in this matter of mercifulness. 'Though I be nothing'; 'I will very gladly spend and be spent for you' (2 Co 12^{12, 15}). 'I am debtor . . . as much as in me is, I am ready' (Ro 1^{14, 15}). 'The love of Christ constraineth us' (2 Co 5¹⁴). 'We ought to lay down our lives for the brethren' (1 Jn 3¹⁶). When we look at Christ's own life for an example, we do not find in His case the indebtedness of one who has been forgiven, but we do find the readiness of unreserved surrender to His Father's will. 'I came not to do mine own will' (Jn 6³⁸). 'My doctrine is not mine, but his that sent me' (Jn 7¹⁶). 'I have not spoken of myself' (Jn 12⁴⁹). Thus the mercy of God does not work in vacuo, but in the concrete example of Christ and of men possessed by His spirit, and made vehicles of His mercy (Ro 11³¹, 1 Jn 4¹²).

In the OT the word ἔλεος 'mercy' is used of the duties of piety between kinsmen (Gn 20¹³), or persons who are in covenant with each other (21²³). And it might seem in conflict with this that one of the most striking instances in which an appeal for mercy is disallowed in the NT is that of the rich man to his father Abraham (Lk 16²⁴). Similarly, Christ subordinated the ties of kindred (Lk 14²⁶) even with Himself (Mk 3³⁵, Lk 11²⁸) to the higher bonds of the Kingdom of God. Nevertheless the effect of Christian faith is to strengthen, and not to weaken, all the ties of human affection, raising them into the region of religion. The early motto of Christ's ministry was, 'I desire mercy and not sacrifice' (Mt 9¹³ 12⁷); the same thought pervades the later chapters of the Gospel of John (13-17) and his First Epistle, passim, while both in Acts (20³⁸ 21¹³) and in his Epistles there is evidence of the overflowing, self-forgetting affection of St. Paul for the Christian Churches. The rule of pity and of active helpfulness is the teaching and the practice of Christ and His disciples. Mercy is the note of the Christian temper. See, further, artt. GRACE, KINDNESS.

MERIT.—The idea of merit in general is one which attaches to human conduct on the pre-supposition of the existence, in the first place, of a moral law; in the second place, of free-will in man, enabling him to obey it; and, in the third place, of some system of rewards and punishments, by which the worth of obedience to the Law is recognized, and equally the unworth of disobedience is demonstrated. That conduct is meritorious, or possesses merit, which corresponds with the moral law, and at the same time is voluntary; and, as meritorious, it claims honour or reward. This is the general ethical conception of merit (cf. Martineau, *Types of Ethical Theory*³, ii. 80 ff.). The theological use, however, of the conception, and still more of the term ('merit,' meritum), involves further specifications, which follow, on the one hand, from the connexion of the idea with other theological ideas, e.g. those of God, of His grace, and so on; and, on the other hand, from the different analogies under which, from time to time, the relation of God to men has been conceived. Here we have two special cases of the use of the conception to consider: (1) its use in the Gospels; (2) the use not only of the idea, but also of the theological term 'merit' in reference to the work of Christ.

1. The idea of merit in the Gospels.—We note, first, that the use of the conception is frequent in the Gospels in connexion with a general view of God as the Judge and Rewarder of good and evil deeds. This conception of God was in fact that dominant at the time of the ministry of our Lord, God's relation to men being commonly viewed under legal analogies. Compare the statement of Schultz (op. cit. infr.):—

'When Christianity entered into the world and found its first expression in the dominant Jewish circles, as well as among the spokesmen of the idealistic Hellenic popular culture, the thought of a Divine repayment deciding according to legal standards, and therefore of a merit or demerit of men according to which their fate was to be settled, was a self-evident axiom. . . . With faith in God as the representative of the moral order of the world, there appeared to be self-evidently given the faith that He rewards and punishes according to the rule of human law.'

This statement of Schultz may be supplemented, with regard, in particular, to the doctrine of the Pharisees, which forms at once the background and the contrast of the teaching of Jesus, by the accounts of H. J. Holtzmann, NT Theol. i. p. 62 ff., and of Weber, Jüd. Theol. 2. p. 277 ff. In the Pharisaic theology the legal conception of God takes the sharpest possible form. The Law is thought of as the sum of so many precepts, the performance of each one of which establishes a separate and definite merit or claim to reward (Weber, p. 380 ff.).

'Just like a heavenly book-keeper, God reckons and calculates according to a standard quantitative as well as qualitative—here the sum of performances of the law and meritorious works, there the sum of transgressions and misdeeds' (Holtzmann, p. 63).

The idea of merit, however, does not end with the performance of the Law: it also attaches to 'good works,' i.e. voluntary acts beyond the strict requirement of the Law, but which are taken account of in the same way before God's judgment-seat, and avail to make up the shortcomings of a man's account. The principal of these good works are almsgiving and works of charity (Weber, p. 284). Finally, the idea of merit is brought specially into connexion with the question of ultimate salvation.

'The judgment on men before the heavenly court of justice takes place with reference to the question whether the man shall live or die—whether he shall be found worthy of the future Kingdom of God or not' (Weber, p. 278).

The teaching of Jesus now proceeds in agreement with the theology of the Pharisees, in so far as He not only continually speaks of the rewarding of our works by God, but also represents the Kingdom of God itself under the point of view of a reward, which is awarded to the performance of 'righteousness.'

We have the general idea of work and reward in Mt 6^{1-2, 3, 4, 6, 16, 18, 10⁴¹, 42, 20¹⁻⁷, 24⁴⁵⁻⁵¹, 25¹⁴⁻²⁸, Mk 9⁴¹, Lk 6³⁵, 10⁷, Jn 4³⁶. For the Kingdom of God (life, or eternal life) as reward, cf. Mt 6²⁰, 19^{17, 25³¹⁻⁴⁶}, Mk 10^{29, 30}.}

The limitations set to the idea of merit in the teaching of Jesus, as compared with its use in the theology of the Pharisees, are, however, very striking. (a) First of all, we have to notice the change involved by the difference in the conception of God. While with the Pharisees the idea of God as Lawgiver and Judge is dominant, with Jesus this idea is subordinated to the conception of God as Father. The idea of reward itself, in fact, is connected with that of God's Fatherhood (Mt 6^{1, 4, 6, 18}). What this implied is thus stated by Schultz:—

'Since Jesus has taught His disciples to see the true understanding of their relation to God in the figure of child and father, then the thought of merit in the sense of the law is in general completely irreconcilable with the figure' (p. 15).

Only an ethical, not a legal, conception of merit is therefore possible along the lines of the teaching of Jesus.

(b) Jesus criticised the Pharisaic doctrine of reward according to strict legal merit, by teaching that the reward which God gives is not according to debt, but according to grace. We have here to remember that when Jesus illustrates, as He frequently does, the relation of God to men by that of a master and his household servants (cf. Mt 24⁴⁵⁻⁵¹, 25¹⁴⁻³⁰, Lk 17⁹), this excludes the idea of legal merit.

'A seryant in the sense of antiquity cannot win merit. He is δούλος ἀχρηστος, even when he has done all he should (Lk 17⁹). The Lord can reward him, but that remains at bottom an act of good-pleasure' (Schultz, p. 15).

The point is made still clearer by the one parable where Jesus introduces a relation in which merit and reward are possible, speaking not of household servants, but of hired labourers (Mt 20¹⁻¹⁶). Here

'He emphasizes in intentional paradox that the lord in his goodness will not bind himself to this rule—that he indeed redeems his promise, but reserves to himself the right to transcend the measure of the law in free sovereignty' (ib.).

Cf., on the same point, Holtzmann (i. p. 196):—

'This remarkable parable annuls the idea of reward in applying it, completely destroys the relation of merit and right, of performance and reward in general.'

We note, finally, to the same effect, the gracious abundance of the reward in Mk 10³⁰, Mt 24^{46, 47}, 25²¹⁻²³, Lk 6³⁸.

(c) Another criticism which Jesus passes on the legal idea of merit is that it is too external. God, the Father, looks at the heart. The better righteousness, which admits to the Kingdom, is an inward righteousness (cf. Mt 5^{20-6¹⁸}). But this affects the whole conception of merit and reward.

'The reward belongs to the personality which reveals itself in the work, not to the performance as such. . . . Thus, what appears as reward is at bottom the recognition of the worth of the personality. . . . It is the conduct of life, the πράξις, which appears in the single acts, and is rewarded (Mt 16²⁷). . . . as it is the love shown to the brothers of Christ which is recognized in the judgment (Mt 25^{34ff.})' (Schultz, p. 14).

To sum up, then, we do not in the teaching of Jesus get a completely unified doctrine of merit, but we get clear indications of the lines which such a doctrine must follow. It must be ethical rather than legal; must connect itself with the conception of God's Fatherhood, and with the idea of His free grace, rather than with that of His strict retribution according to law; and must have regard not to external actions only, but to the inward motive. The conditions are fulfilled if we recognize human merit as the worth to the Heavenly Father of the conduct of His sons when judged by the inward motive of filial obedience, and its reward as the recognition of this worth by His Fatherly love, which gives to His children who seek His Kingdom both this chief good and all things else that they need (Lk 6^{32, 33}). As regards the individual actions of God's children, the idea of merit is not to be connected with them apart from the general context of filial conduct in which they stand; nor is the idea of reward to be connected with particular Divine gifts apart from the gift of the Kingdom. Only on the background of the general conception of the reward of filial conduct by the gift of the Kingdom can particular gifts appear as the reward of particular actions.

2. The merit of Christ.—The definite theological doctrine, in which the term 'merit' is employed as a terminus technicus of the subject, lies beyond the NT. But it is anticipated in the latter, in so far as we there have a doctrine of Christ's work as man, in which ethical standards are applied to the subject. (a) In this doctrine it is above all upon His death that attention is concentrated, as the point in which the character of His saving work specially appears. We have first the idea of Christ's death as an act of obedience to God (Ro 5¹⁹, Ph 2⁸, He 10⁵⁻¹⁰). Further approximation to the idea of a merit of Christ is contained in the references to the worth of His death in procuring the salvation of men. It is a ransom (Mk 10⁴⁵), a price (1 Co 6²⁰). In the idea of sacrifice once more we have both the idea of the worth to God of Christ's death as self-surrender, and of its worth for men in procuring salvation (Eph 5², He 10⁵⁻¹⁰). [The important series of passages further defining the sacrifice of Christ as an expiatory sacrifice is not brought in here; since these passages, so far as they contain this additional idea, belong properly to the Scripture proof of the doctrine of Christ's work, not as directly meriting salvation, but as making satisfaction for sin, and so making salvation possible. In virtue of the general idea of sacrifice contained in them, apart from the specification of it as expiatory, they may, however, be added to the proof of the doctrine of merit]. We have, further, references in the NT to the recognition of Christ's death by God. On account of it the Father loves Him (Jn 10¹⁷); because of His obedience in it God exalts Him to universal lordship (Ph 2⁹⁻¹¹). [Compare the Divine recognition of the worth of the work of the Suffering Servant in Is 53¹⁰⁻¹²]. (b) The conception of the work of Christ is not, however, confined to His death. His life is a ministry to men (Mk 10⁴⁵). His work (Jn 17⁴) includes the manifestation of the Divine name to the disciples (v.⁶), the giving to them of the words received from the Father (v.⁸), the keeping of them from the evil in the world (v.¹²), as well as His final sacrifice (v.¹⁹). Moreover, it is not only the death of Christ, but His work throughout His life, that God recognizes in glorifying in turn the Son who has glorified Him (vv.¹⁻⁴). And, finally, both Mk 10⁴⁵ and Jn 17 imply that the work of Christ in His life and death is all of a piece; since in both passages, but especially in Jn 17, there is no break in the way in which the culminating work of the death is added on to the work of the life.

Summing up our results, we have in the NT the basis of a doctrine of Christ's merit as the worth to God (and men) of His human work carried on throughout His life, and culminating in His death. This worth of Christ's work is estimated by God along the lines of Christ's obedience to His will (the work of Christ being that which the Father has given Him to do (Jn 4²⁴ 17⁴)). It is recognized by God in the special love with which He regards Christ in the accomplishment of His work, and outwardly by His exaltation or glorification. It is to be noted, however, that while the position of lordship is viewed as the reward of the work of Christ, the salvation of men is not viewed in the NT as its direct reward, but rather as its fruit or effect (Jn 12²⁴). Christ saves, according to NT conceptions, by His earthly work, but not by means of it as a quantum which can be detached from His Personality, and rewarded by the salvation of men [as in the conception of the ecclesiastical doctrine of Christ's merit, presently to be discussed]. Instead of this, we have the conception that through His work He becomes a saving Personality, or, as Rothe puts it, that through it He 'qualifies Himself to become a Redeemer' (*Theol. Ethik.*² iii. p. 104). Our salvation follows from His work; since the Christ, who lived to minister to men, to make known to them the words which the Father had given Him, and to keep them from the evil, and persevered in His work to the death in perfect obedience to the will of His Father, thus offering up His life as a sacrifice to God, by this very work and the Personality achieved through it, exercises a saving authority and influence over men (Jn 12³²; cf. the similar idea in Is 53¹¹, where the righteous Servant justifies many through his knowledge, and thus sees of the travail of his soul and is satisfied). But the open recognition of Christ's work by God in the exaltation of Christ, which begins with the Resurrection, also contributes to His saving power over men (cf. Ro 4²⁵ 'raised for our justification'); inasmuch as a human personality influences us not only by its inner worth, but also through the outward manifestation and revelation of that worth. Thus in the NT the Saviourhood of Christ is connected specially with His Lordship (Ac 5²¹, 2 P 1¹¹). The name which is above every name (Ph 2¹¹) is the name of salvation (Ac 5¹²). Cf. also the use of the name Christ, which implies both Saviourhood and Lordship, in special reference to the state of exaltation (Ac 2³⁶; St. Paul also always thinks of the risen Lord as the Saviour). It is at this point that the way in which human salvation can be regarded as the 'reward' of the work of Christ becomes clearest, inasmuch as the exaltation which is His direct reward puts Him in the position to reap the full fruit of His travail in the salvation of souls.

Two more points are necessary to complete our outline of the suggestions of the NT towards a doctrine of Christ's merit. In the first place, there is required (c) a closer definition of Christ's saving power. What is the work by which He saves? It is, above all, the revelation of the holy love of God in Christ's life and death, which moves men at once to faith in God as revealed in Him, and to repentance (μετάνοια, change of mind from love of sin to love of God), and thus brings them into that communion with the Father which is the essential ground of all the blessings of salvation. Christ's love towards men and His holiness, in the absolute unity of His Person, are a manifestation of the love and the holiness of God, as existing in a similar absolute personal unity; and the trust and repentance which Christ inspires are directed through Him to God. For proof of these statements, the following passages, amongst others, may be referred to. According to Jn 1¹⁴⁻¹⁸ the grace and truth of Christ declare the invisible God. In Ro 5¹⁵ the grace of Christ is equivalent to the grace of God. In Ro 8³⁵⁻³⁹ the love of Christ reveals the love of God. Further, in Jn 17²¹⁻²⁵ the Father whom Christ reveals is the holy, the righteous Father. Jesus awakes not only trust in the love of God (Ro 5⁸ 8³⁵⁻³⁹), but also repentance towards God (Ac 5³¹; cf. the Pauline idea of baptism into Christ's death and resurrection as involving a death to sin and new life unto God, Ro 6¹⁻¹¹). Finally, to know God as revealed in Christ is eternal life, or the sum of all blessings (Jn 17³).

(d) In the second place, the above definition of the work of Christ as the revelation of the holy love of God, throws further light upon the 'reward' of Christ. We saw that while this meant primarily the recognition of Christ's work by God in His exaltation, it involved indirectly the fruit or effect of the work of Christ, as realized through this. But now it appears that the whole conception of the reward of Christ by God is subordinate to the idea of the immanence of God in His work. The work of Christ is not only the work which God has given Him to do (Jn 4³⁴ 17⁴), but God works through Him; so that the value to God of the work of Christ consists ultimately in His voluntary self-surrender to be the personal instrument in the world of the saving revelation of God, and the recognition of this work by God in the exaltation of Christ, which yields Him the fruit of His work in the salvation of men, is, at the same time, included in the execution of God's own purpose of salvation. Thus the ethical doctrine of the work of Christ culminates ultimately in the wholly religious view of it (2 Co 3¹⁹; cf. the subordination of the work of Christ to the grace of God in Ro 3²⁴⁻²⁸).

Such is the outline of a doctrine of Christ's merit, as sketched in the NT. The agreement of it with the ethical lines of Christ's own general teaching on merit, as previously stated, is apparent. There is the same stress on the inner motive of obedience, the same domination of the whole subject by the idea of God's Fatherhood; while the exaltation of Christ is the analogue of the gift to His people of the Kingdom, in which they share His Lordship (Lk 22²⁹, 2 Ti 2¹²).

Very different is the ecclesiastical doctrine of Christ's merit, which, beginning with Anselm's Cur Deus Homo, extends throughout both the Catholic and the Protestant scholasticism. Here an idea of merit is applied to the work of Christ, which is essentially the same as that of the Pharisaic theology, rejected by Jesus. This idea exists as a general conception illustrating the relation of man to God from the time of Tertullian onwards, who introduced from the vocabulary of Roman law the term meritum, and its cognates mereri, promereri, demereri, to define it (cf. Harnack, Dogmengeschichte 3, iii. p. 16, n. 1). As employed by Anselm to elucidate the work of Christ, it includes the following points. (1) The work of Christ is regarded as a voluntary work or performance, lying outside of the sphere of Christ's proper obligation to God. Anselm thinks of Christ as bound as man to obedience to God in His life, but as sinless man, free from obligation to die: hence His voluntary death is a work, which He can and does offer to God to procure the salvation of men. (2) The value of this work to God is estimated, not qualitatively by its motive, but quantitatively by the dignity of the Person who performs it. (3) The reward of Christ's work follows from God's justice, and the conception of this is equally external with that of the work itself, the reward being transferable from Christ to His people just like a sum of money. 'Whom could He more justly make the heirs of His debt (i.e. the reward which God owes Him), which He does not Himself need, than His relatives and brethren?' (Cur Deus Homo, lib. ii. cap. 9).

The Catholic schoolmen after Anselm, and the Protestant schoolmen after them, continue the Anselmic doctrine of merit, not, however, without many changes. Of these the most important are as follows. Peter Lombard, following Ph 2⁹⁻¹¹, adds that Christ merited not only salvation for us, but exaltation and glory for Himself (Sent. lib. iii. dist. 18). Thomas Aquinas and Duns Scotus no longer deduce the reward of Christ's merit from God's justice, as does Anselm, but either from a relative justice or equity, such as that implied in Roman law by the relation of father and son, or lord and slave (Aquinas, Summa Theologie, ii. 1. 104. 1), or from God's mere good pleasure (Scotus in Sent. lib. iii. dist. 20, qu. 1). By the Protestant schoolmen the material content of Christ's merit is enlarged by the addition of the general obedience of Christ's life, as voluntary, to the special voluntary obedience of His death (which latter they view not as a gift to God, but as an endurance of the penalties of sin). None of these changes, however, essentially alters the Anselmic conception of merit. Two points in particular stand fast throughout, viz. the idea of Christ's work as something voluntary and unowed, and the entirely external conception of it as a quantum, whose value can be assessed and rewarded by another quantum of corresponding value. Only in the idea, first fully developed, after Bernard and Lombard, by Aquinas, and continued especially in the Reformed theology, that the 'transfer' of Christ's merit to His people is mediated through His mystic unity as Head with them as His members, is the hard, juristic outline of the Anselmic doctrine transcended (cf. Summa Theol. iii. 46. 1). By the end of the Protestant scholasticism, however, the disparateness of the traditional idea of merit from anything in the NT had become clear to the theologians within Protestantism of a critical tendency. The Arminian Limborch says of this idea, along with that of satisfaction: 'Since they do not stand in Scripture, but have been invented by men, no one is bound to the meaning of them any further than it can be construed from the phrases of Scripture, to elucidate the sense of which they have been applied' (Theologia Christiana, lib. iii. cap. 21. 1). In the period of theological reconstruction since Schleiermacher, the general tendency of theologians, so far as they have not simply repeated older ideas, or dissolved theology into philosophy, has been either to reject the term 'merit' altogether, as being too much associated with the scholastic conception of it, or, if it has been retained, to reinterpret it along more Scriptural lines. Ritschl, above all, has succeeded in transforming into firm dogmatic conceptions the outlines of the NT doctrine, as above stated. See his exhaustive treatment of the whole subject in Justification and Reconciliation, vol. iii. [Eng. tr. p. 434 ff.].

ROBERT S. FRANKS.

MESSENGER.—The word is formed from 'message' with intrusive nasal. It is used as the equivalent of ἀγγελος in its primary meaning of one sent on a message or to make an announcement. So it occurs frequently in the OT (representing מַשְׁלֵחַ of Heb. and ἀγγελος of LXX), and in the Gospels in Lk 7²⁴ 9⁵². It is to be observed, however, that in 'messenger' the emphasis is on the sending or mission, while in ἀγγελος it is on the message or proclamation. Philologically a truer equivalent is ἀπόστολος; and accordingly in two instances (2 Co 8²³, Ph 2²⁵), where missionary preachers are so described and where some special mission is in view, the latter is the Greek term used.

1. Towards the close of the OT the term seems to have acquired the meaning of a special or inspired teacher. Thus in Hag 1¹³ the prophet styles himself 'messenger' as the bearer of Jehovah's message. A similar meaning is at least probable in Job 33²³. And this usage is in some degree paralleled in the modern tendency to seek a definite 'message' in the literary works of distinguished poets and thinkers. The most important use of the term is in Malachi, a prophet whose name [if מַלְאָכִי be, indeed, his name; cf. Mal 1 and the Comm. ad loc.] means 'my messenger.' He uses the term three times and in three applications. First, it is a designation of the true priest, whose work is to conserve spiritual knowledge and teach the law of God (2⁷). Secondly and thirdly, in 3¹ it is applied to a forerunner, and to the 'messenger of the covenant,' who seems to be identical with the Person styled 'the Lord whom you seek.' These two applications are in the NT interpreted of the Baptist and the Messiah respectively. The words of the prophet with reference to the forerunner are with a change of pronoun ('thee' for 'me') repeated in identical form in each of the Synoptics (Mk 1², Mt 11¹⁰, Lk 7²⁷). In these quotations, as in Lk 9⁵², the messenger is one sent before to proclaim or to prepare. The direct application of the term to Jesus is not made in the NT, though a kindred idea is frequently expressed: in the saying which occurs in all the Gospels, 'He that receiveth me receiveth him that sent me' (Mt 10⁴³, Mk 9³⁷, Lk 9⁴⁸ 10¹⁶, Jn 13²⁰ 12⁴⁴); in the frequent Johannine phrase 'whom God hath sent,' and in the commission (Jn 20²¹); and even in the term 'gospel' (εὐαγγέλιον), which is expressive of what Jesus described Himself as anointed of God and sent to preach (Lk 4¹⁸). The conceptions of Christ as the Revealer of the Father and the incarnate Word are also kindred; and it might be argued that the language of Malachi was in the mind of the writer of the Epistle to the Hebrews in 1² 3¹ 7²² and throughout. R. SCOTT.

2. In He 6⁵⁰ our Lord is spoken of as our Forerunner (πρόδρομος) 'within the veil.' This is the only place in the NT where the title is used. A πρόδρομος (in the literal sense) was a messenger sent in front of the main army to examine the ground, clear the front of obstacles, or notify the presence of an enemy to the main body advancing behind (i.e. a scout, light-armed soldier, or spy). Here it is connected with the priestly work of our Lord. He has entered within the veil 'for us,' as our 'high priest for ever after the order of Melchizedek, i.e. in our interest, namely, to obtain pardon for us (9¹²), to represent us in the presence of God

(v.24), and to open up for us an entrance into heaven itself (10¹⁹) (Lünemann in Meyer's Com.). Probably, however, the military connotation is not to be entirely ignored. Just as an army advances securely under cover of its scouts far in front, so the army of believers moves on through the valley of the shadow of death without fear, knowing that our great Forerunner is in front. He has encountered and conquered death for us, so that we have no need to fear anything. This thought is beautifully elaborated from another point of view in Jn 14²⁻³. When Jesus came back for a moment from the silent land, it was not with an air of terror or defeat, but as a conqueror, crying 'All hail!' (Mt 28⁹). There is nothing to fear in the Beyond whither Jesus has gone before us 'to prepare a place for us.' E. GRIFFITH-JONES.

MESSIAH is the English word based on the Greek representation of the original Hebrew or Aramaic. The Gr. reproduction assumes the varied forms Mesias, Mesias, and Mesias, corresponding to the Hebrew מָשִׁיחַ and the Aramaic מְשִׁיחָא. The Heb. is the normal katil form, meaning 'anointed,' which is tr. into Greek in the term which has become so familiar, χριστός, the agnomen of our Lord. The Heb. מָשִׁיחַ was a term applied pre-eminently to the king, who was designated to office by the ceremony of anointing (1 S 9¹⁶ 10¹, 2 K 9²⁻³ 6). Priests were consecrated to office in like manner (Lv 8¹², cf. 4³⁻¹⁶).

i. ANOINTING OF KINGS.—The custom of anointing the king, from which his designation as 'messiah' arose, is connected with magical usages of hoary antiquity, based on the conception that the smearing or pouring of the unguent on the body endows the human subject with certain qualities. Thus the Arabs of Eastern Africa believe that an unguent of lion's fat inspires a man with boldness, and makes the wild beasts flee in terror from him. Other illustrations may be found in Frazer's *Golden Bough*², ii. 364 ff. The Tell el-Amarna inscriptions show that this custom of anointing the king with oil prevailed in Western Asia at least as far back as B.C. 1450. The passage to which we refer occurs in a letter from a certain Rammân-nirâri of Nuḥâssi in Northern Syria addressed to the king of Egypt, in which it is stated that a former king of Egypt [Thothmes III.] had 'poured oil on the head' of Rammân-nirâri's grandfather and established him as king of Nuḥâssi.* Frazer's great work has rendered us familiar with the supernatural endowments of a king who was regarded as a quasi-deity.† That ancient Israel also believed that the royal dignity involved supernatural Divine powers, and that the oil poured upon the king conveyed these powers (like the 'laying on of hands'), can hardly admit of doubt. The oil, like the sprinkled blood in a covenant-rite ‡ (Ex 24⁶⁻⁸), possessed a magical virtue.§

Like the priest, the king was regarded as a Divine intermediary, and assumed the supreme ritual functions of a priest in his own person. Among the ancient Semites, especially the Babylonians and Assyrians, the earthly ruler or king was considered to be the supreme God's representative or viceroy. Sometimes he declares himself the 'son of the deity' (e.g. in the opening line of Ashurbanipal's cylinder-inscription he calls himself binutu Ashûr u Bêlit, 'offspring of Ashur and Beltis'; cf. the language of Ps 27), or 'favourite of the deity' (cf. the name of the Bab. monarch Naram-Sîn, 'beloved of Sin.' Sargon calls himself in the opening of his Nimrûd insc. 'the favourite of Anu and Bel'). Further parallels in the case of Nebuchadrezzar may be found in Schrader, COT ii. 105 ff. See also Tiele, Bab.-Assyr. Gesch. 491 ff. Tiglath-pileser I. (B.C. 1100) calls himself issakku (PA-TE-SI) of the God Ashur (Prism-Insc. col. vii. 62. 63), i.e. Ashur's plenipotentiary. That in this sacred function priestly office was involved may be readily inferred. Thus Ashurbanipal (like Sargon) calls himself not only the šaknu or viceroy of Bêl, but also the šangu or priest of Ashur. Similarly the Homeric kings offer sacrifice on behalf of the people. As Robertson Smith remarks ('Priest' in *EBR*⁹), the king in both Greece and Rome was the acting head of the State-religion. So also in ancient pre-exilic Israel, David and Solomon offered sacrifices (2 S 6^{17a}, 1 K 8⁶³) in accordance with the tradition of the age.

‡ According to Westermarck, the blood shed possesses a magical power of conveying a curse ('Magic and Social Relations' in Sociological Papers, vol. ii. p. 160). In the case of a covenant the curse falls if the covenant be not fulfilled.

§ Thus shields were smeared with oil to render them or their owners immune (2 S 12¹, cf. 1s 21⁵. Saul's shield was un-anointed, and so its owner perished).

ii. UNIQUE POSITION OF DAVID IN HEBREW THOUGHT.—Among the Hebrew anointed kings or messiahs, David came in course of time to have a special significance. His importance was enhanced by the history of the three centuries that followed his reign. No Israelite or Jew living in the year B.C. 730 could have failed to note the striking contrast between the unbroken continuity of monarchs of the seed of David sitting on the throne of Jerusalem and the succession of brief dynasties and usurping kings who followed one another on the throne of Samaria. The swiftly passing series of short reigns terminated by violence which filled the space of 15 years in Northern Israel from the close of the dynasty of Jehu (which lasted nearly a century) to the accession of Hoshea, Assyria's nominee, to the dismembered kingdom, deeply impressed the prophet of Ephraim, who exclaims:—

'They have appointed kings, but not from me (i.e. Jahweh);
I have made princes, but I knew them not' (Hos 8⁴).

It is not surprising, amid the rapid changes of rulers and the disasters wrought by foreign invasion, that Hosea should have prophesied the discipline of exile for his faithless countrymen, and as its final issue that they should return and seek Jahweh their God and 'David their king.*' For amid all the vicissitudes of the last three centuries the seed of David had survived every peril. The 'sure mercies of David' to which the Jews still clung, though with feeble hope, in the dark days of exile (Is 55³), began in the age of Isaiah to take root in the national imagination. Though Judah was destined to suffer terrible chastisements, yet as a result of the disciplinary trial 'a remnant would return' (i.e. be converted) to Jahweh, and Jerusalem would be preserved from the onslaughts of the Assyrian foe. The Immanuel prophecy, which contained the assurance of God's presence among His people, delivered to the doubting Ahaz and his unbelieving court during the dark days of B.C. 735, became the germ of a great series of Messianic passages which are found in Is 9¹⁻⁶ [Eng. 2-7], which was probably composed soon after B.C. 701, in 11¹⁻⁹, and, lastly, in 32¹⁻³. In the first the Messiah is portrayed as a military conquering hero, 'breaking in pieces the oppressor's mace'; in the second, the sounds of discord cease, and He, sprung from Jesse's stock, is the ruler of justice and peace in God's 'holy mountain' of Zion, where even the powers of violence and injustice are turned into submission to a Divine authority. In the last He is again the King who shall reign in righteousness, 'a hiding-place from the wind, a covert from the tempest.'

* There is not a shred of evidence to show that this clause is not genuine in Hos 3⁵. It is difficult to see why, if the idea 'had its roots in Isaiah's time' and not in that out of which Ezk 34²³ 37^{24c} 45⁵⁻⁹ and Jer 30⁹ arose (Harper, ad loc.), we should follow Wellhausen in rejecting the clause. Nowack rejects the entire verse.

All these passages, as well as Is 22-4, are regarded by Duhm as Isaianic. On the other hand, Cheyne, Hackmann, and Marti hold that they are post-exilic,* but on what the present writer considers to be insufficient grounds. The subject is discussed by Cheyne in his Introd. to Isaiah, pp. 44 ff., 57 ff., and 173-176; also by Hackmann, Die Zukunftserwartung des Jesaja, pp. 126-156, and by Marti in his Commentary on the above passages; cf. also his Gesch. der Isr. Religion 4, p. 191 footn., 255 ff. On the other side, see the Commentaries of Duhm and Dillmann-Kittel (1898) on these passages, and the Century Bible, Com. on 'Isaiah' by the present writer. Kautzsch, in his elaborate art. 'Religion of Israel' in Hastings' DB (Extra Vol. p. 696*), admits the reasonableness of the view here advocated.

After the gleams of hope awakened by Hezekiah and the deliverance of Jerusalem, and after the glowing anticipations of an ideal Messianic King clothed with Divine powers, to which Isaiah in the early years of the 7th cent. gave expression, there followed a time of reaction when these high hopes suffered temporary eclipse. Men's hearts became sick of waiting. The long reign of Manasseh, followed by the brief reign of Amon, was a period of religious as well as political decline. On the other hand, the reign of Josiah reawakened the hopes of the faithful adherents of Jahweh, and it is significant that Messianic expectation revives in the oracles of Jeremiah. In 23⁵⁻⁸ (cf. 30⁹) he foretells the coming days when a righteous branch or shoot shall be raised unto David, who shall reign prudently and execute judgment and justice. In his days Judah shall be saved and Israel dwell secure, and the name by which he shall be called is 'Jahweh is our righteousness.' This fragment probably belongs to the earlier utterances of Jeremiah, and upon it Zechariah in the opening years of the post-exilic period bases his well-known prophecies (3⁸ 6¹²), in which Joshua and his comrades are addressed as tokens of the coming of Jahweh's servant 'the branch' (3⁹). In 6¹² it is made clear that Zerubbabel of the seed of David is meant, who is destined to complete the building of the Temple.† With the passage in Jer 23⁵⁻⁸ cf. also 30⁹ 33¹⁵ as well as Ezk 21³² 34²³⁻³¹ 37²⁴. In Jeremiah less stress is laid on the personal and material features, more emphasis placed on the ethical. Also it appears from several passages that Jeremiah thought rather of a succession of rulers of Davidic descent than of a single ruler. But in determining this question the utmost critical caution is required. Thus 33¹⁴⁻²⁴ is regarded by most critics as a later addition to the oracles of Jeremiah (see, e.g., Giesebrecht's Com., and Cornill in SBOT). Certainly after the time of Jeremiah the personal features in Messianic prophecy became fainter. 'There shall not be cut off from David one that sits upon the throne of the house of Israel' (Jer 33¹⁷), points to a succession of rulers at a time when the hopes of Israel still clung to the 'sure mercies of David.' But this utterance, as we have already seen, belongs to a later time than that of Jeremiah. Zephaniah and Obadiah make no reference to the Messianic King. When we consider their historic environment, this is not surprising. For royalty in Judah was rapidly

* Recently Prof. R. H. Kennett has discussed Is 91-7 in JThSt (April 1906), and would assign it to the Maccabean period. The epithets are referred to Simon the Maccabee.

† Duhm deals very arbitrarily with these passages. Jer 23⁵⁻⁸ was not the genuine utterance of Jeremiah, but a post-exilic addition. Zec 3⁸ 6¹² are badly corrupted, and later editors have sought to eliminate the name of Zerubbabel from the original oracle, because Zechariah's prophecies with respect to him were not fulfilled.

Probably Mic 5¹⁻⁸, like Jer 23⁵⁻⁸, may be assigned to the earlier years of the reign of Josiah, when the religious and political outlook of Judah appeared more hopeful, and the overthrow of Assyria seemed as probable as it did to Isaiah after B.C. 701 (Is 93. 4 [Heb.]). We may assign Nah 22-31⁹ to the same period.

declining in power and prestige. The last kings of Judah became mere puppets in the hands of foreign princes, who pulled the strings from the banks of the Nile or of the Euphrates. Under these circumstances the ideal of a Davidic ruler ceased to appeal as powerfully as it did a century earlier, and ultimately gave place to another. It is marvellous that it continued to survive after the rude shocks of a hundred years.

Its survival is probably due to Ezekiel, the priest-prophet, herald of restoration, of hope and of reconstructive effort. This prophet was an earnest student of Israel's past, and read its records and its oracles. The influence not only of his great elder contemporary Jeremiah, but also of the earlier prophets Hosea and Isaiah, is unmistakable. The influence of the first and the last is clear in Ezk 34²³⁻³¹ 'And I will set over them a shepherd, and he shall feed them, even my servant David; . . . and I the Lord will be a God unto them, and my servant David a prince in their midst.' Here, as in the case of Jer 23⁵⁻⁸, David represents a succession of Davidic descendants sitting on his throne. When we turn to Ezekiel's ideal scheme of the restored Jewish theocracy (chs. 40-48), we find that the secular prince of Davidic lineage falls into the background, and his functions are subordinated to the ecclesiastical routine. The same fate in the early post-exilic period befalls the somewhat shadowy, if stately, figure of Zerubbabel in Zec 4 and 6 (cf. Hag 2²³), who was soon destined to subside into the background in the presence of Joshua the high priest, the natural and legitimate head of the newly constituted Church-nation. In truth, the Messianic King rapidly becomes a vanished ideal of prophecy. In the closing verses (14-20) of Zephaniah (obviously an addition belonging to the late-exilic or early post-exilic period) it is Jahweh who is Israel's King in the midst of His people, their mighty Hero who wards off the nation's foes (vv. 15-19).

When we turn to the Deutero-Isaiah (40-55), we find that an entirely new ideal, to which reference has already been made, had displaced the earlier and older one created by Isaiah. In place of the national-Messianic King we have the national-prophetic ideal of the Suffering Servant of Jahweh, through whose humiliation and sorrow the sinning nation shall find peace. God's anointed king, who is not of Davidic descent at all, but the Persian Cyrus, is the chosen instrument for accomplishing the Divine purposes with respect to His servant Jacob (44²⁸ 45¹⁻⁴). We shall have to note how profoundly the Deutero-Isaianic portraiture of the Suffering Servant came in later times to modify the Hebrew ideal of the Messiah, and to constitute an entirely new conception which the Hebrew race only partially and very slowly assimilated, and whose leaven worked powerfully in the Messianic ideal of the 'Son of Man' in the consciousness of Christ and His immediate followers.

When we pass to the Trito-Isaiah (56-66), which probably arose in the years that immediately preceded the advent of Nehemiah, we find that the old ideal of the Davidic Messiah, which Ezekiel and Haggai attempted with poor success to revive, has altogether disappeared. Not even in the lyrical collection (60-62) is the faintest note to be heard of a Messianic Jewish King. The prophecies of Malachi are equally silent. We have to wait for centuries—perhaps as late as the declining days of the Hasmonæans—before the Davidic Messianic King definitely and clearly reappears.

Before we pass to the Greek period (B.C. 300 and later), it is necessary to refer briefly to a series of OT passages of a Messianic or reputed Messianic character. (1) Gn 3¹⁵ (belonging to the earlier Jahwistic document, J) can only by a strained interpretation be regarded as Messianic at all. The seed of the woman and the serpent (representing the power of evil) are to be engaged in prolonged conflict, in which both suffer injury. In this struggle it is not expressly stated which side will triumph (so Dillmann). (2) Gn 49¹⁰ is exceedingly obscure. The rendering, 'as long as one comes to Shiloh' (Hitzig, Tuch), is doubtful in point of Hebrew usage, and difficult to sustain historically; 'until one comes to Shiloh' seems quite as difficult to sustain historically. The Greek versions attribute to the phrase an obscure Messianic reference, but interpret שלה as a late Hebrew compound form with a relative, which can be accepted only after making violent assumptions.* Giesebrecht ingeniously proposed to read in place of שלה the form שְׁלָה 'his ruler.' He rightly argues that to read שְׁלָה as the LXX presupposes, immediately followed by לוֹ, constitutes a very awkward and intolerable combination.† If we accept this emendation, the passage may be regarded as Messianic. But it is most probably an insertion moulded on Ezk 21³², for it stands in no immediate relation to the verses that precede or follow.‡ (3) 2 S 7⁴⁻¹⁷. Here vv. 15, 16 are the expression, placed in the mouth of the prophet Nathan, of the sentiment of reverence to the House of David, which took its rise in the latter part of the 8th century. Budde refers this speech of Nathan and the following prayer of David to a later period than the other more primitive sections of the historical narrative, and we may reasonably follow him in ascribing this passage to the 7th cent.—not improbably the same period as that in which Jer 23⁵⁻⁸ and 30⁹ arose.§ (4) Nu 24¹⁷ 'A star hath marched (? gleamed) out of Jacob, and a sceptre hath arisen out of Israel, and hath broken in pieces the sides (temples) of Moab, and hath destroyed all the sons of Seth' (?). The text is here difficult, and many points are uncertain. The entire series of Balaam's oracles are brought together by the redactor of the J and E documents, and the reference of the lyric passage just cited may be either to David (2 S 8²) or to Omri (cf. insc. of Mesha, lines 4-8, and art. 'Omri' in Hastings' D.B.)¶ Its Messianic interpretation by early Christian writers (Justin Martyr, Irenæus), as well as by Rabbi Aqiba, who referred it to Bar Cochba in the days of Hadrian (cf. also the Targums of Onkelos and Jon.), need not detain us. (5) Dt 18¹⁵ 'A prophet shall Iaiweh thy God raise up unto thee from thy midst from thy brethren, like unto me. To him shall ye hearken.' This passage is quoted in Ac 3²² 7³⁷ as having an individual Messianic reference. But the context (cf. the verses that immediately precede) clearly proves that the reference is general, and not individual. The Israelites are not to pay heed to the magician or soothsayer, but to God's true prophet, like Moses, whom He will raise up in Israel from time to time (see Driver's Com. in ICC). (6) Lastly, we have a series of Psalm passages. Ps 2 (esp. v. 5⁸), 72, 89, 110 may be taken as the most conspicuous examples of the revived Messianic expectation. They all belong to the Greek period. Ps 2, like Ps 1 (both without superscription), was evidently placed by the redactors at the head of the Psalm collection, and belongs to a late period. Ps 2, like Ps 110, originates from the Maccabean days, when the old conception of the national deliverer from foreign enemies, which was created by Isaiah after Judah's emergence from a desperate crisis, once more revived.

Before we come to deal with the later phases of Messianic expectation, we would here note the historic evolution of three distinct lines of anticipation respecting the human agency whereby Israel's salvation and the establishment of a Divine and righteous rule would be effected. (1) The righteous Messianic warrior-king of Davidic descent. (2) The prophetic sufferer portrayed in Is 40-55, and esp. in 52¹³-53¹²—a conception which may also underlie the obscure passage Zec 12¹⁰, 11. (3) The prophetic ideal, based mainly on Dt 18¹⁵, which came to be identified with the heraldic prophet of 'the great and terrible day of the Lord,' the Elijah of Mal 4⁴ [Heb. 3²²], or was identified with the Messiah Himself (Ac 3²²). Cf. Mk 6¹⁵ 8²⁸, Jn 1²¹ 6¹⁴ 7⁴⁰, and Wendt's Teaching of Jesus, i. p. 67 f.

iii. TRANSFORMATION OF THE MESSIANIC IDEAL THROUGH APOCALYPTIC.—The kingdom of righteousness and the fear of the Lord, or what is expressed in the Biblical phrase the Kingdom of

* LXX τὰ ἀποκείμενα αὐτῷ, 'that which is reserved for him.' The LXX in some variants has ἰω; ἂν ἰδῆς ὃ ἀποκείται, 'till there comes he to whom it (? the sceptre) belongs,' which is the rendering of the Targ. of Onkelos and also of Jerusalem. This most clumsy and almost impossible construction is apparently due to the influence of Ezk 21³², where, however, we have a subject for the relative clause, viz. שְׁלָה.

† Beiträge zur Jesaja-kritik, p. 29, footnote. It is difficult to understand the acquiescence of Gunkel in the construction presupposed in the alternative rendering of the LXX variant (cited in the previous footnote).

God, was not to be attained without a struggle against opposing forces political and moral, or without the instrumentality of a personal leader, sometimes an anointed king of Davidic descent, through whom the victory was to be won for Israel. For throughout we find that Israel, or a purified remnant, stands at the centre of the whole movement towards righteousness, and becomes more or less identified with it. Accordingly, the closest connexion subsisted between the national Messiah and that future state of blessedness, a restored theocracy, which became the steadfast expectation of the Jewish race since the destruction of Solomon's temple in B.C. 587. At first it was believed that the desired consummation would not long be delayed. The existing generation and the earthly scene in which the prophet lived would behold the great day of the Lord and the advent of the salvation foretold. But ever since the days of Amos, and still more after the discipline of the Exile, the horizons of time and space expanded.

1. After the Exile and the return of the Golah (exiled Jews), the advent of the fulfilled hopes of a Divine kingdom of righteousness was still delayed, and the Messianic age seemed as far off as ever, even after Nehemiah and Ezra had worked at their task of reform. As time went on, the disappointed expectations of post-exilic Judaism bred among the spiritual leaders a spirit of hopelessness as to the political outlook, and this is echoed in their religious hymns: 'Does Jahweh cast off in abhorrence for ever; will he no more be gracious? Is there an end to his kindness for evermore' (Ps 77⁸⁻⁹ [Heb.]); cf. Pss 22, 37, etc. Trust in Jahweh still survived, and His faithful followers clung to the Tôrah (Ps 19⁸⁻¹² [Heb.] and 119 passim), but Messianic expectation languished. The outlook of the present time was hopeless. But amid the enlarged horizons of time as well as space to which we have referred, the thoughts of some of the most spiritual minds in Judaism were directed to the transcendental and ultimate. In that world God would finally vindicate Himself and His ways to the expectant faith of Israel. A distinction began to be established between the present and the future age or æon. The former is corrupt, and hopelessly delivered over to Satan and the powers of darkness. Victory will come in the latter. As we approach the time of Christ, the distinction between the present age (הַיּוֹם הַזֶּה or αἰὼν οὗτος) and the age to come (הַיּוֹם הַבָּא or αἰὼν μέλλων) becomes sharply contrasted, and the transcendental features and colouring which invest the latter, and the final conflict with the heathen or demonic powers (Gog and Magog in Ezk 38, 39, attributed by some recent critics to a later hand than Ezekiel) characterize the new and later phase of Messianic expectation. This final agony or conflict, called in later times the 'Messianic sufferings or pangs' (הַיְסוּד הַמְּשִׁיחִי), which was to usher in the new age, was no longer confined to earth. It was universal and cosmic. These apocalyptic features (which first meet us clearly in that latest addendum to the Isaianic oracles, Is 24-27) now impress themselves on Messianic expectation, though by no means always; cf. Mk 13⁶⁻³⁷, Jn 16¹¹, 20-22.

2. Another feature of equal importance, which begins to emerge in apocalyptic literature, left its impress on Messianic expectation, viz. the belief in the resurrection of the dead. The first clear intimations of this faith are to be found in Is 26¹⁹, Dn 12². In the older apocrypha (Sirach, Judith, Tobit, 1 Mac.) it is absent. In the later (2 Mac 7⁹, 14, 23, 29, 36 12⁴³, 44) it is obviously present. In the Wisdom of Solomon it takes the form of a happy life after death for the just (3¹⁻⁹ 4⁷ 5¹⁶ 6²⁰).*

* Schürer, GVF 3 ii. 508.

hardly necessary to emphasize how profoundly this belief in the resurrection of the righteous (the most primitive form of the doctrine limited the resurrection to them) moulded the Christology of St. Paul. For to St. Paul, Christ is the Second Adam, endowed with the πνεῦμα ζωοποιόν (1 Co 15⁴⁵), in whom all His faithful followers are made alive (v. 22); cf. Ro 6³⁻¹¹. See Volz, Jüd. Eschatologie, pp. 237-248.

3. The pre-mundane existence of the Messiah was another mode of the larger transcendental mould of thought which apocalyptic reveals. Belief in the ante-natal existence of the Messiah was only part of a general tendency of Jewish speculation. The new Jerusalem, the Temple, and Paradise existed before the creation of the world (Apoc. Bar 4³ 59³, Assumpt. Mosis 1⁴. 17). The Midrash on Pr 8⁹ even goes beyond this, and expressly mentions the Messiah among the seven things created before the creation of the world, viz. the Throne of Glory, Messiah the King, the Tórah, ideal Israel, Repentance, and Geheuna.* The pre-mundane existence of the Messiah is also certified in the Targ. on Is 9⁶ and Mic 5². In these metaphysical conceptions, stimulated, as we may with considerable probability believe, through the Platonic doctrine of archetypal ideas which passed in the great stream of Hellenic influence over the Jewish Diaspora, we clearly discern what Charles aptly calls a Semitic philosophy of religion.† By this doctrine of pre-mundane existence the things of God were lifted above the universal lot of change and decay, and brought into the realm of adamantine permanence. As Baldensperger acutely remarks, it became, in the minds of reflective and pious Jews, a guarantee against loss.‡ We need not labour to set forth how profoundly it affects NT thought, especially Pauline and Johannine (2 Co 8⁹, Ph 2⁷; cf. 2 Co 4⁴, Col 1⁵, He 1² 2¹⁰, Jn 1¹⁻³).

4. Messianic titles.—(a) Among the most significant for students of the NT is that of 'Restorer,' which is probably involved in the epithet Ta'eb, which occurs in the apocalypse of the Samaritan liturgy for the Day of Atonement. In the day of Ta'eb it was believed that the sacred vessels of the Temple would reappear which had been concealed on Mount Gerizim,§ and it has been conjectured that this same idea of Restorer underlies the epithet Tawo (Greek τάων) in Assumpt. Mosis 9¹. In the literature of the time of Christ we frequently meet with this conception of the Messiah. Thus in the Testaments of the Twelve Patriarchs (Test. Levi, 18), which may have originated about a century before Christ's birth, the Messiah is regarded as the coming restorer of the Paradise lost by Adam's transgression. In Ac 3²¹ the καίρο ἀποκαταστάσεως clearly reflect this tradition. This function of 'restorer' was evidently ascribed to the Messiah and not to God's messenger Elias, referred to in Mal 3¹. 23⁶. [Heb.]

(b) Other significant epithets, as 'Son of a woman,' prob. in allusion to Is 7¹⁴, appear, if the text be sound, in the Book of Enoch (Similitudes) 62⁵ 69²⁹.|| This is of interest when we compare the Pauline 'son of a woman' (Gal 4⁴). On the other hand, the designation 'horned,' or 'two-horned' (Be'reshith Rabbá, 99), based apparently on Dt 33¹⁷, belongs to Jewish literature subsequent to the 1st cent. and need not detain us here. Far more significant is the title which plays so large a part in the Synoptic Gospels, viz.:

(c) 'Son of Man.'—The employment of this phrase as a Messianic title dates from the Maccabean period, and in this specific sense meets us for the first time in Dn 7¹³. Its earlier occurrence in the OT requires no exposition here. At the time when the Book of Daniel was written, Jewish apocalyptic was directed to the conception of a great final Divine judgment at the close of the present age, whereby the coming age was to be ushered in. We no longer see the figure of a Messianic King of Davidic descent. His place is taken by a mysterious symbolic portraiture which, as Volz correctly argues,* is not angelic. It stands contrasted with the four animal symbolical shapes previously described, and especially with the last beast with the ten horns, 'dreadful and exceedingly strong,' which had 'great iron teeth that devoured and brake in pieces.' In sharp distinction from these monstrous and bestial world-powers which are finally to be destroyed, we have a mysterious figure in human shape.† In v. 27 its significance is explained. It represents 'the people of the saints of the Most High.' As H. J. Holtzmann correctly observes, it is intended to express 'a world-empire which is human and not brutal, which is ethical and noble and not immoral, which is like man, stamped with the likeness of God' (Gn 1²⁶). That this human and humane world-empire was to be Jewish and not Gentile, is obvious to the reader of Daniel's apocalypse.

The 'Son of Man' has a yet more definite and distinguished rôle in the Similitudes of the Book of Enoch (chs. 37-71), written probably after B.C. 100. Here He is obviously a supernatural personality and not a symbolic figure, or indefinitely expressed as 'like a son of man.' The Son of Man is not mere man. This is clearly shown in ch. 39, where a cloud and whirlwind carry Enoch away and set him down at the end of the heavens. There he sees the mansions of the holy, and among these latter 'the Elect One of righteousness and faith,' which is another name for the 'Son of Man' (v. 9). Moreover, He sits on God's throne (51³), which is also His own throne (69²⁷, 29), possesses universal dominion (62⁶), and all judgment is committed to Him (69²⁷). Various alternative titles are given to Him, viz. 'the Righteous One' (38², 3 53⁶), and 'the Elect One' (39⁶ 40⁵ 45³⁴). We note meanwhile that the Son of Man is also Judge.

Accordingly, we conclude that while the term in Daniel is symbolical of the human rule of God's people Israel, in Enoch it is the designation of a supernatural personality, who holds universal empire and wields the office of Judge.

When we pass from this apocalyptic use of the title 'Son of Man' to its employment in the Synoptic Gospels, we observe a great change. It was without question Christ's favourite designation of Himself. It is noteworthy that in the Synoptics the term relatively occurs twice as often as it does in the Fourth Gospel. It occurs 30 times in Matthew, 14 times in Mark, and 25 times in Luke. In John it is found only 12 times.

Christ's employment of the term is by no means uniform. Consequently we are in danger, as Bousset points out, of giving a one-sided interpretation to the expression, either by taking it predominantly in the eschatological sense of Daniel or the Book of Enoch, or as signifying ideal typical man (as

With reference to the pre-existence of the Messiah (not His name only, as Volz seems to assume in Jüd. Eschatologie, p. 217), see Enoch 48²⁻⁶, and cf. Charles' notes (and 62⁷). 'Name' here connotes existence as in the Babylon. Creation tablet (lines 1, 2). On the other side, as against the Jewish belief in Messianic pre-existence, see Dalman, Worte Jesu, p. 245.

Schleiermacher assumes).^{*} Probably Charles is on the right path when he interprets the Synoptic use of the phrase as involving a combination of two contrasted ideas—the transcendent conception of apocalyptic and the Deutero-Isaianic ideal of Jahweh's Suffering Servant.[†] It is certainly possible that the latter was the prevailing conception in Christ's personal consciousness rather than the former or eschatological use of the phrase; while the former was the interpretation of the title which dominated the thought of the Synoptic writers, and came to be impressed on the utterances of Jesus. This view seems to be sustained by the fact that in Aramaic the term 'Son of Man' (ܫܢ ܥܡܐ)

means simply 'man.' On the other hand, it is difficult to believe that Jesus could have employed so colourless and vague a designation of Himself; and Bousset is probably right in his contention, as against Wellhausen, that such a term, employed in Aramaic, could easily come to acquire a special eschatological significance.[‡] In all probability, Jesus on certain momentous occasions so used it. How far it was weighted with the significance that the phrase conveys in the Book of Enoch, when the expression was actually employed by Jesus, it is difficult to say. It is hardly necessary to believe that in the personal consciousness of Jesus the superadded notion of pre-mundane existence was attached to the term, though Jn 8⁵⁸ ('Before Abraham was, I am') would fairly point in this direction. We certainly have no clear right to infer it from Mk 12⁶. Moreover, there is some weight in the suggestion which a few scholars, including Bousset, have put forth, that the term 'Son of Man' has been placed in the mouth of Jesus in many cases when He simply used the first personal pronoun.[§] That He did, however, employ the phrase in an eschatological sense of Himself, and with a full consciousness of the sublime dignity which it conferred, cannot be denied. Thus, in answer to Pilate's question (Mk 14⁶²; cf. Mt 26⁶⁴, Lk 22⁶⁹), He quotes the well-known Daniel passage (7¹³), declaring that men would see Him, the Son of Man, sitting at the right hand of power (i.e. of God), and coming in the clouds of heaven. This utterance is certified by the three Synoptic Gospels; and all three agree in giving it a decisive influence in the trial of Jesus before the Sanhedrin. This testimony, however, carries us one step further. It is hardly possible to dissociate in the consciousness of Jesus the assumption of this high eschatological dignity without including in it the judicial function. The Oriental king was also judge. As King or Messiah, Jesus had, with full consent from Himself, been already acclaimed (Mk 11⁷⁻¹¹), and, with the title of 'King of the Jews' placed on the cross by the Roman governor, He was crucified (Mk 15²⁶; cf. vv. 12, 18, 32). Moreover, His preaching of the Kingdom of God was closely bound up with the conception of impending judgment. 'Just as He could not dispense with the ideas of the kingdom and the judgment, if He wished to make Himself intelligible to His countrymen, so He could not dispense with the Messianic idea if He wished to be intelligible to Himself' (Bousset).^{*} It is easy to draw the necessary corollary. In the designation 'Son of Man' applied by Jesus to Himself in an eschatological sense, there was involved the other conception which meets us in the Similitudes of the Book of Enoch, that of universal judge.[†]

But the eschatological side is not the only, nor is it the most important, aspect of the conception of 'Son of Man' in the mind of Jesus and the Synoptic writers. Far greater, viewed from the ethical standpoint, was the human aspect of the lowly Suffering Servant suggested by the Deutero-Isaiah. This certainly could never have been invented by the Synoptic writers. It is of the very essence of Christ's thought respecting Himself. It is nevertheless remarkable that the locus classicus of the NT writers who reflected on the mystery of the Messiah's crucifixion, viz. Is 53, was never, so far as we can gather from the Synoptic writers, quoted by Jesus Himself, with the doubtful exception of Lk 22³⁷. That this prophecy, however, must have been in His mind, seems fairly clear from Mk 10⁴⁵ 12²⁶⁻¹⁰; cf. Jn 13¹²⁻¹⁷ and Lk 24^{25, 26}. Accordingly, the title 'Son of Man' had a twofold significance. It is employed when Christ's claims to power and authority are asserted, both now and in His future Kingdom and glory. The 'Son of Man' has power to forgive sins (Mk 2¹⁰). He is Lord over the Sabbath (Mt 12²⁵). He will appear clothed in power at the last day (Mk 14⁶²). But the title is also used in immediate connexion with His human nature, lowliness, poverty, suffering, and death. 'The Son of Man came eating and drinking' (Mt 11¹⁹, Lk 7³⁴); 'the Son of Man hath not where to lay his head' (Mt 8²⁰, Lk 9⁵⁸); 'is betrayed' (Mk 14²¹); 'came not to be ministered unto but to minister' (Mk 10⁴⁵); suffers and is condemned (Mk 8³¹). The paradox of this twofold antithetic significance is solved by the positive truth which underlies it. The peculiar and special function of dignity and privilege which belongs to the 'Son of Man' rests on an ethical basis. He that has come to serve, suffer, and give His life a ransom for many, will pass through agony and death to His place of exaltation in the clouds of heaven (cf. Ac 3¹⁸ 8³² 17³ 26²³). Upon this basis St. Paul and his successors have built. We also are to suffer with Him, that we may share in His glory (Ro 8¹⁷). The Kenotic doctrine of Ph 2⁶⁻⁷ is reared on this foundation of the teachings of Jesus respecting Himself as 'Son of Man,' whereby we learn that He was 'made perfect through sufferings,' and became 'the leader of our salvation' (He 2^{9, 10}).

(d) 'Son of God' is a designation frequently applied to Jesus in the Gospels, and is applied by Jesus to Himself as the expression of His vivid consciousness of God's presence in His life, and the intimate bond that united Him to the Father (Mt 11²⁷). In His native Aramaic, Abba was the mode of address in prayer that came most naturally to His lips, and became a tradition in the worship of the early Christian Church (Ro 8¹⁵). That the relation claimed by Jesus was a special one, is indicated by His use of the expression 'my Father' in Mt 11²⁷ 18³⁵ 20²³, whereas in Mt 6³² 10²⁹ God is spoken of to the audience before Jesus as 'your Father.' More significant still is the designation of Himself as 'beloved Son' in the parable of the Vineyard let out to Husbandmen (Mk 12⁶), and also by the voice which spoke to Him from heaven at His baptism (Mt 3^{16, 17}, Mk 1^{10, 11}, Lk 3^{21, 22}). Upon this unquestionable basis of language employed by Jesus respecting Himself, the frequent application of this designation 'Son of God' to [§] Bousset's Jesus (Eng. ed.), p. 138. Bousset thinks that it was not till the closing months of His ministry that this title was assumed; 'in face of the threatening doom of final failure . . . only briefly and sparingly did He adopt the name' (p. 192 f.). Some colour is given to this view, that the Synoptic writers have frequently supplied the phrase in Christ's discourses, by comparing ἐν τῷ ἑαυτοῦ in Mt 5¹⁰ with the parallel ἐν τῷ νόῳ τοῦ ἀνθρώπου in Lk 6²². But in the extremely severe limitation imposed by Bousset on Christ's employment of the term we are unable to concur.

Christ in the Pauline Epistles, and of the same phrase with the epithet μωγουενης in the Johannine writings, was obviously founded. In the memorable scene at Caesarea Philippi, when Jesus questioned His disciples as to their belief respecting Himself, Peter, according to the Matthew tradition, replied, 'Thou art the Messiah, the Son of the living God' (Mt 16¹⁶). This would seem to imply that the expression 'Son of God' was a Messianic title. But in this connexion two things should be noted: (1) Mk 8²⁹ gives Peter's reply in the briefer form 'Thou art the Messiah.' (2) There is scarcely any evidence in later Jewish literature to indicate that the phrase 'Son of God' was used as a Messianic title.* This is the more remarkable when we remember Ps 27 'Jahweh hath said unto me, Thou art my son, this day I have begotten thee,' and the old Semitic conceptions of divinity which attached to kingship, reflected in Assyrian inscriptions (see above, p. 171). Probably the stern monotheism of later post-exilic Judaism tended to suppress language which seemed to attribute Divinity to an earthly human personality.

(e) 'Son of David' is the most characteristic, as it is the most traditional and historic, designation of the Jewish Messiah. It expresses the most representative type of Messianic expectation, if we understand by that term an anointed Jewish king who was to be the national deliverer. This conception, as we have already seen, had its roots in the days of Isaiah of Jerusalem, and revived in the age of Jeremiah and Ezekiel, and even survived in attenuated form to the early days of post-exilic Judaism. But in later Jewish literature belonging to the Greek period we notice a remarkable absence of any allusion to a Messianic king of Davidic descent who at the end of the ages will erect his throne. That the expectation still survived, and at times found expression, especially as we approach the period of the Maccabæan struggle, seems fairly clear from such Psalms as 2, 72, 110. On the other hand, we find no reference to a Messianic deliverer of the seed of David in Joel, Is 24-27, Sirach, Daniel, Enoch (chs. 1-36, the Vision of Weeks and the hortatory discourses), Book of Jubilees, Assumpt. Mosis, Sib. Or. 3⁹⁸⁻⁹⁹. The figure of the Messiah is absent also from Tobit, Judith, 1 and 2 Maccabees, Wisdom, Baruch. It is true that we do find mention of the Messiah, or allusion to Him, in the visions of animals in Enoch (chs. 85-90), in Sib. Or. 3, in Philo (de Præm. et Pen. 16), and also in Apoc. Bar 29³⁰ and 2 Es 7²⁸; but the figure holds a secondary position, and is far more shadow than substance.

Bousset, in reviewing this literature (both pre-Christian and extending to A.D. 100), endeavours to solve the problem of this absence of Messianic expectation.† The causes are twofold. First comes the patent fact to which reference has already been made in a previous page. The Jew had entered into a larger world, and his eschatology was therefore framed on these larger dimensions of time and space in which the final catastrophe was to be vast and world-wide. The world of the Jew was no longer Palestinian or even Western-Asiatic. It was the world ruled by the successors of Alexander, and the yet greater world ruled by the Caesars. Moreover, Greek culture had begun to enter deeply into the mind of Judaism. To the cultured Jew the figure of a Davidic-Messianic king seemed incongruous and provincial amid these larger political and intellectual horizons. Secondly, the establishment of the line of Maccabæan rulers left large circles of pious Jews well content. In the latter part of the rule of Jonathan, and during the days of Simon and Hyrcanus,

* The passages where the term 'Son' occurs in 2 Esdras (728 1332, 37, 52 149) as well as in Enoch (1052) are all extremely doubtful. The Aramaic original is lost; and it is held by many scholars, including Drummond, Spitta (Zur Gesch. und Lit. des Urchristentums, ii. 9), as well as Charles, that Christian hands have worked over these texts and have inserted the expression 'Son.' See Volz, Jüd. Eschatologie, p. 213, who regards Drummond's conjecture as probable, that the phrase 'Son' of God may sometimes have arisen from the Gr. rendering ταύς for 'servant' (ἄγγελοῦ). See also N. Schmidt's art. 'Son of God' in EBI, col. 4694.

the Jew might well have believed in the advent of a Messianic age. Now, the Maccabees were of priestly descent, and came, therefore, from the tribe of Levi. It is therefore not surprising that the seed of David of the tribe of Judah faded for awhile into comparative insignificance; cf. Charles' note on Enoch 90³⁷.

But the old hopes bound up with the Messianic king of David's line were by no means extinct, though they appeared sometimes to be dormant. There were Palestinian Jews as well as Jews of the Diaspora, and there were uncultured Jews both in the countryside and in the towns, influenced by old traditions and the expectations still kept alive by the Law and the Prophets read in the synagogue, as well as the literary Jews who pored over the Book of Wisdom or consoled themselves with the Visions of the Book of Enoch amid their blighted political hopes. Moreover, the spell of the Hasmonæan line of princes did not last for ever. The 1st century B.C. witnessed a great change as compared with the second. Life was no longer under Aristobulus I. and Alexander Jannæus what it was in the great days of Judas, Simon, and John Hyrcanus. The Hasmonæan princes were regarded as usurpers, and the political aspirations of the race began to turn once more to the seed of David. The ordinary uncultured Jew did not trouble himself with apocalyptic dreams of new heavens and a new earth, and probably there were many cultivated Jews who had little taste for the Book of Enoch. These would read with far greater satisfaction the Psalter of Solomon, especially Ps 17⁵⁶, with its references to the familiar words of Prophecy and Psalm:—

'Thou, Lord, didst choose David to be king over Israel, and didst swear unto him concerning his seed for ever, that his kingdom should not fail before thee [2 S 7:13-16, Ps 89:4-5]. Then, through our sins, sinners² arose against us, attacked us, and thrust us out. Those to whom thou didst make no promise took away with violence (our honour). . . . They laid waste the throne of David with insolent shouting. But thou, O God, wilt cast them down and remove their seed from the earth, when one that is a foreigner † to our race arises against them. According to their sins wilt thou recompense them, O God . . . (v. 29). Behold, O Lord, and raise up for them their king, the son of David, at the time which thou, O God, knowest, that he may reign over Israel thy servant; and gird him with strength that he may break in pieces unjust rulers. Purge Jerusalem with wisdom and righteousness from the heathen that trample her down with destruction. May he thrust out the sinners from the inheritance, utterly destroy the pride of the sinners, and as potters' vessels with an iron rod break in pieces all their substance' [Ps 29].

The Psalter of Solomon, not inaptly called by Ryle and James 'the Psalms of the Pharisees,' clearly reveals by its contents that it belongs to the period B.C. 70-40. Its chief interest for us consists in the strong indications which it gives of the reviving Messianic hopes of Israel at this time under the Roman yoke. Palestine was ready to respond to any bold or able adventurer like Judas, Theudas, or Bar Cochba, the last of whom was supported even by the distinguished Rabbi Akiba. The Synoptic Gospels furnish clear evidence that the national expectations which were directed to a Davidic Messiah in the middle of the last cent. B.C. still prevailed in the days of Jesus. The very form of the Matthew and Luke traditions respecting our Lord's birth exhibits an endeavour to conform to the prevalent expectation that the Messiah would be of Davidic descent. (1) The divergent pedigrees in the two Gospels trace the genealogy of Joseph, the reputed father of Jesus, from David. (2) Both lay stress on Bethlehem as Christ's birthplace, in conformity with the oracle in Mic 5².

Quite apart from the form of the Gospel narratives and the predisposition of the writers, the facts of the life of Jesus furnish conclusive evidence of this strong current of Messianic expectation.* We know that on repeated occasions, especially towards the close of His career, He was acclaimed as Son of David: Mt 9²⁷ (cf. Mk 10^{47, 48}) 12²³ 15²², Mk 11¹⁰ (Mt 21^{9, 15}). A survey of the facts, however, leads to the conclusion that Jerusalem in South Palestine was the centre of this national movement of Messianic anticipation, and that its pulses become weaker as we pass to the Jewish populations farther removed from this centre.

(f) We also find the title 'comforter' (עֲזָרָה mēnahēm) bestowed on the Messiah of Davidic lineage. In Jn 14^{16, 26} 15²⁶ 16⁷ παράκλητος is forensic in origin='advocate,' hence comes to mean 'helper' (see Weiss, ad loc.). It has therefore nothing to do with the above Messianic title. See Wünsche, Leiden des Messias, p. 112; Bousset, *Relig. des Jud.*² p. 261. We find a Menahem, son of Judas the Galileean, appearing in Jerusalem as a messiah, and after a brief interval overthrown (Volz, Eschat. p. 210).

iv. ATTITUDE OF JESUS TOWARDS THE MESSIAHSHIP.—This subject involves some delicate problems which do not admit of easy or immediate solution. Several questions present themselves, and the answers to these enable us to define approximately the attitude of Jesus towards the Messiahship. (1) What was the popular impression created by the Personality and ministry of Jesus? (2) In what form did Jesus regard Himself as Messiah, and how was this related to the popular impression or the current Messianic expectation? (3) At what time did the Messianic consciousness possess Jesus, and when was it proclaimed?

1. In reference to the first question, the following facts may be noted: (a) During the Galilean period of His ministry Jesus was designated a prophet; and of this He was plainly conscious (Mk 6⁴). Yet in popular estimation He was considered to be endowed with powers so remarkable that some supposed Him to be Elijah (6¹⁵), the precursor of the Messiah (Mal 3^{1 4}), or one of the great prophets returned to life (Mk 8²⁸; perhaps Jeremiah or Isaiah, cf. 2 Mac 2⁵ 15^{14f.}, 2 Es 2¹⁸). This seems to have been the general opinion respecting Jesus down to the close of His life (Lk 24¹⁹ 'a prophet mighty in deed and word'). (b) On the other hand, when Jesus passes into Judaea, He is confronted by the powerful current of Messianic expectation which looked for a king of David's line (Mk 10⁴⁸ 11^{9, 10}). Probably an attempt to draw Him into this path of Messianic claim and revolt against Roman imperial authority underlies the question as to tribute-money (Mk 12¹⁴).

2. As to the form of Christ's own Messianic consciousness and its relation to the popular impression and the South Palestinian expectation, we note: (a) That the narrative of the Temptation (Mt 4^{5ff.}, Lk 4^{5ff.}) points to the conclusion that early in His public ministry the path of a material or worldly Messiah-king was deliberately renounced (cf. Jn 6¹⁵ 18³⁶). (b) At an early period Jesus promulgated the fundamental principles of the Kingdom of God, and was fully conscious of His plenary authority to declare them even in opposition to the sacred Mosaic Tōrah which He announced Himself prepared to fulfil ('Ye have heard how it hath been said . . . but I say unto you'). Yet though the expression 'kingdom of God (or heaven)' is often on His lips, He does not name Himself as 'king.' (c) He was evidently conscious of a higher vocation and dignity than the designation 'prophet' involved. For (i.) He never called Himself 'prophet,' though popularly acclaimed as such; (ii.) the prevailing designation of Himself which He adopted was, according to the Synoptics, 'Son of Man,' which, we have already shown, implied a high eschatological function and dignity; (iii.) He also regarded Himself as 'Son of God' (cf. Mk 1^{10, 11}), though He restrained the announcement of the title (Mk 3^{11, 12}). (d) He was wholly out of sympathy with the popular national and materialistic conceptions of Messiahship with which Southern Palestine at this time was rife. This we can clearly discern in His warning against false prophets and messiahs (Mk 13²², Mt 24¹¹⁻²⁴), who attempted by violent revolutionary means to force on the advent of the 'kingdom of God' (Mt 11¹²). From these data the conclusion may be derived, that Jesus from very early times—even as early as the date of His baptism, according to the triple tradition of the Synoptics—was conscious of His unique relation to God as His Father, and of His Messianic dignity and mission, but that He filled it with an ethical as well as apocalyptic content. It was for this reason that He hesitated to declare Himself as Messiah at the opening of His public ministry, knowing the perils of the material and unspiritual conceptions with which the national expectations of the Jews invested the name. The true representation of His Person and of His mission was to be found in the apocalyptic title 'Son of Man.' He was thinking of the exalted cosmic spiritual dignity which attached to this title when, in answer to Pilate's question, He acquiesced* in the ambiguous honour 'King of the Jews' (Mk 15²). The name connoted to Him the same personal authority as He claimed in the previous reply to the high priest (Mk 14⁶²). So the Fourth Gospel interprets the enigmatic answer of Jesus to Pilate (Jn 18³⁶, cf. also 19²¹).

3. With reference to the time when the Messianic consciousness possessed Jesus, and when His Messiahship was proclaimed, few will dissent from Bousset's dictum, that it is highly probable that the tradition is right in dating Jesus' awakening to the Messianic consciousness from the moment of His baptism, that is, before the opening of His ministry.† As we have already indicated, there were, nevertheless, powerful motives which dictated the withholding of His claims from immediate public announcement. It is evident that the significant declaration which He drew from Simon near to Caesarea Philippi, that He was the Messiah, and more than prophet, marks the decisive point after which His Messianic title was generally proclaimed. Though He still imposed upon His followers great reserve (Mk 8³⁰), we find that shortly after this He is hailed by the blind Bartimaeus (Mk 10⁴⁸) and by His enthusiastic followers (Mk 11^{9, 10}) as 'son of David,'—a title which He probably regarded with mixed feelings.

v. VARIED FEATURES IN THE MESSIANIC EXPECTATION CURRENT IN THE TIME OF CHRIST.—1. That the Messiah of Jewish traditional expectation would be endowed with the virtues of justice and understanding through the Spirit of God, was an obviously fundamental conception derived from the old Isaianic prophecy, Is 9⁷ [Heb.⁶] 11^{2f.}, cf. Ps 72. These ethical qualities are reproduced in varied forms in, e.g., Ps-Sol 17, Test. of the XII. Patr., Levi 18. In this last passage the Hasmonæan priest-princes seem to hover before the writer's imagination. In this portraiture the Messiah is king and priest of the whole earth; the nations of the earth and the angels in heaven rejoice over him. All iniquity disappears under his sway. He again opens Paradise, and the devil (Beliar) is bound by him. It is not easy to be quite sure whether Christian elements have been interpolated here as elsewhere in the Test. of the XII. Patriarchs. Moreover, in the Sibyll. Oracles (3⁹⁶⁻⁹²) the Messiah is called a 'holy king' of universal sway. In the Psalms of Solomon (17^{36, 41, 42}) the sinlessness of the Messiah is emphasized, and expressly referred to his endowment with the Holy Spirit (cf. Mt 3^{16, 17}, Ro 1⁴).

* The present writer, though with considerable hesitation, differs from Swete's comment upon the words ὁ υἱὸς τοῦ θεοῦ in Mk 15² (Mt 27¹¹). For Pilate appears to have understood these words as an affirmation of his own suggestion (Mk 15⁹); so also the Roman soldiers (Mk 15¹⁸, cf. v. 20). Cf. Lk 22^{70f.} with 23³.

2. The element of mystery and marvel shrouds the appearance of the Messiah, cf. Apoc. Bar 29³ (text, however, somewhat doubtful; see Charles) 32¹, 2 Es 7²⁸, Test. of the XII. Patr., Levi 18, Sib. Or. 3⁶⁵². According to Targ. Jon. on Mic 4⁸, the Messiah is already in the world, but is concealed owing to the sins of the people; see Schürer, *GJV*³ ii. 531 ff. With this tradition cf. Jn 7²⁷.

3. The Messiah is to be preceded by a messenger of God who is to purify Israel (Mal 3^{1, 3}).—This angel of the Covenant is identified by Malachi (or perhaps by an interpolator) with the returning Elijah (4^{5f.} [Heb. 3^{35f.}]). This passage, we know, exerted a far-reaching influence over later times; cf. Sir 48^{10, 11} and Mt 17¹⁰⁻¹³ (Mk 9^{11f.}).

4. The scattered tribes of Israel are to be gathered together to Jerusalem, and Jerusalem and its Temple rebuilt.—Often we find that the apocalyptic features of a heavenly Jerusalem usurp the place of the terrestrial lineaments of the older forms of Messianic anticipation; cf. Rev 7^{4ff.} 21^{10ff.}. Here, again, the sources of these traits are found in the OT, i.e. in exile and post-exilic literature: Ezk 39^{27ff.}, Is 11^{11, 16} (which tell of the gathering of the Diaspora from Assyria, Babylon, Egypt); cf. Is 27^{12, 13} 35^{8ff.}, Mic 7¹², Is 60^{4, 9} 66²⁰. In many cases these expectations may be called by the general term 'Messianic,' but are without the presence of a Messiah. God brings about the blessed change, not by a gradual evolution of the earthly order, but by a mighty destruction of world-empires, in which Israel's foes (pre-eminently Edom) are overthrown without the instrumentality of any human or superhuman intermediary. Perhaps the most characteristic passage is Is 27¹³ 'In that day the great trumpet shall be blown, and all who are being lost in Assyria, and are driven into Egypt, shall come and bow to Jahweh in the holy mount in Jerusalem.' Similarly in the earlier Enoch 90^{33ff.}, Ps-Sol 11, and Bar 4³⁶⁻⁵³, and even in Philo (de Exsecrationibus, § 8-9, de Præm. et Pen.; see Schürer³, ii. p. 515), where the ethical traits are not forgotten.

Moreover, the rebuilding of Jerusalem is the reflex of the Deutero-Isaianic utterances, and also of Ezk 40-44. 47, Sir 35^{13ff.}, To 13¹⁵⁻¹⁸ 14⁵, Enoch 90²⁸. According to Ps-Sol 17³³, this restoration of Jerusalem is to be the work of the Messiah.

5. The Messiah as a martial personality is based on the portraiture of Is 9^{3, 4} 11⁴, Ps 27⁹, and this trait frequently recurs in the literature of the 1st cent. B.C. and later; cf. Sib. Or. 3⁶⁵², 2 Es 12^{31, 33} (where the Messiah is the lion which is to destroy the Roman empire), also Apoc. Bar 70^{9, *} and esp. Ps-Sol 17²²⁻²⁵. It is significant that this trait is absent from the NT except in Rev 19¹¹⁻²¹, in which the atmosphere is Judaic rather than Christian.

6. The conception of Messiah ben-Joseph or ben-Ephraim belongs to much later Jewish literature, and need not detain us. See Bousset, *Rel. des Judentums*², p. 264 f.

7. The ethical and universal traits of the Jewish Messiah and of Messianic expectation are, however, meagre and even conspicuous by their absence. The blight of materialism or national exclusiveness rests upon most of the later Jewish literature of Messianic hopes. We scarcely have a hint of the Messiah as the bearer of a new and higher revelation of God's nature or will to mankind, or of His function as a redeemer from sin. The horizons are the horizons of the Jew. With the exception of Philo and the writer of Sib. Or. 3, who were evidently Hellenic in sympathy and culture, we have but little to remind us that the Jew felt any interest in other nationalities and their future. Jewish apocalyptic presents a singularly contracted world, though it be an entire universe. For that universe, when it is not limited to Palestine, is to be governed by Israel only. The visions of the Book of Enoch suffer from these painful limitations. The Similitudes in the description of the last struggle with the heathen restrict the scene to the Holy Land (Enoch 56). Similarly in the Psalms of Solomon the eschatology is limited in its scope to Palestine. Seldom do we meet with any hint or suggestion of the conversion of the Gentiles. Is 49⁶, with its glorious ideal of Israel's mission as a light to the Gentiles, is almost wholly forgotten. The might of the Gentiles is to be broken, and world-empires are to be destroyed. The heathen nations are to be tributary vassals to the new Israelite power which Jahweh will erect, and of which the restored Jerusalem will be the centre. The Gentiles may make pilgrimages to the Holy Land, but only Israel may dwell there. See Bousset, op. cit. pp. 268-270.

The features of the 'Suffering Servant' portrayed in Is 53 are almost totally absent in the version of the Targum of Jonathan, composed in the first two centuries of the Christian era, when the influence of the Maccabean age still affected the Messianic conceptions of Judaism. The traits of Is 53 and 49⁶ are quite foreign to the Messianic ideals of Judaism in the 1st cent. A.D. The cross of Jesus was to the Jews a stumbling-block (1 Co 1²³); cf. Volz, op. cit. p. 237; Dalman, Der leidende und sterbende Messias, p. 6 f.; Schürer³, ii. 554 f.

vi. JESUS THE TRUE SPIRITUAL FULFILMENT OF PROPHECY AND ISRAEL'S REAL MESSIAH.—The volcanic uprising of the Jewish race under Judas Maccabeus and his brothers against the efforts of Antiochus Epiphanes to suppress the national worship, exercised a profound influence upon the Hebrew nation and its ideals. For the future spiritual progress of Israel the results were permanently injurious. Religious ideas became warped by particularism, and the thoughts of the race diverted from the noble universalist conceptions of prophecy, especially of the Deutero-Isaiah, to the study of the Tôrâh, as Israel's national heritage, with its ever growing mass of legal requirements and ceremonial punctilios. Piety then became a rule of thumb, and an elaborated endeavour to secure merit took the place of the old prophetic ideals of righteousness. All this is summed up in the single word Pharisaism. Pharisaism was born of the strong national movement of which the heroic episodes of the Maccabean struggle were the outward embodiment. Out of this movement emerged, on the one hand, a vehement reaction against Hellenic ideas and usages, and the exaltation of the Tôrâh as Israel's paladium; while, on the other, there emerged the Napoleonic legend of the Jewish race, which became the prolific source of messiahs whose abortive careers were quenched in blood, until the final heroic effort of Bar Cochba, hailed as the fulfilment of Balaam's prophecy by Rabbi Akiba, was extinguished in the reign of Hadrian. But the noble spiritual ideals of Hebrew prophecy—of Jeremiah and the Deutero-Isaiah—could not be entirely suppressed by Pharisaism. As Friedländer in his recent stimulating work has pointed out,* the liberal movements which prevailed in the Jewish Diaspora which was surrounded and penetrated by Hellenic influence, prepared the way, especially through the writings of Philo, for the advent of Christ; and the same writer enables us to discern more clearly how the highest ethical ideals of the Hebrew Messiah were realized in Jesus. The husk of nationalism, which clung to Jewish apocalyptic and left no place in its Messianic conceptions for the redemption of the Gentile world, was remorselessly cast aside by Jesus: 'I say unto you, that many shall come from the east and west, and shall sit down with Abraham, and Isaac, and Jacob in the kingdom of heaven, but the children of the kingdom shall be cast out into outer darkness' (Mt 8¹¹⁻¹²). What the Messiah-prophet of Nazareth declared in His oracles, St. Paul, His greatest disciple, fulfilled. For Judaism had been diverted by Pharisaism from its true prophetic mission marked out for it in the dark days of its exile, but was enabled at last, by its greatest latter-day Prophet, the Divine 'Son of Man,' and by His great Jewish disciple and Apostle to the Gentiles, to accomplish its real vocation in spite of itself; cf. Is 42¹⁹, 2 Co 3¹⁴.

METAPHORS.—A metaphor is a blossom of one tree on the branch of another; it is a figure of speech by which a word or phrase is lifted to a meaning to which it is not literally entitled. A simple tropé is a metaphor condensed. Similes are metaphors explained. Parables and allegories are similes or metaphors elaborately extended, and do not come into the scope of this discussion (see PARABLE). In this article we shall not attempt to catalogue or classify the metaphors used in the Gospels, or to distinguish in any technical way between the metaphors and other closely-related figures of speech, but shall use the word in its broadest sense.

Macbeth (Might and Mirth of Literature) restricts the term 'metaphor' unduly (cf. Gardiner, Kittredge and Arnold, Mother Tongue, 1902). Wendt (Lehré Jesu), notwithstanding the classic character of his general treatment of the figurative language of the NT, does not give specific attention to the metaphors in the speech of Jesus and their relation to the more extended symbolic and parabolic teaching of the Gospels. Votaw, in his valuable art. 'Sermon on the Mount' in Hastings' DB, Ext. Vol., classifies NT figures of speech as metaphorical, symbolical, hyperbolic, and figurative. But evidently the last term includes all the classes previously mentioned, while many of the hyperbolic expressions, even in the instances cited by Votaw, contain veiled metaphors. Every one who listened to Jesus mentally supplied the resemblance between the 'gnat' and the ritual peccadilloes which these men, so scrupulous of their meat and drink, 'strained out,' and between the 'camel' and the gross sins against the moral law which they swallowed so complacently. So the 'eye' which was to be plucked out (Mt 5²⁹) and the 'beam' which was not plucked out (7³) evidently were the man's pet sins.

A simple metaphor expresses the resemblance (or identity) between two dissimilar objects or ideas by applying to one a term which can literally designate only the other, as 'This is my body' (Mt 26²⁶). An abbreviated or veiled metaphor is one in which the assertion of resemblance is not expressed but implied. Sometimes a veiled metaphor sparkles in a phrase, as: 'water of life,' 'sons of thunder'; or even in a single word used in a non-literal, ideal, or peculiar sense, to be determined by the context or by current usage, as: 'cross,' 'yoke,' 'grace,' 'flesh,' 'the Day,' 'the Wrath,' 'darkness,' 'to wash,' 'to sleep' (cf. use in Synoptt., John, and Paul, of ποσθήριον), 'to drink,' 'to walk' (περιπατέω), and scores of other words constantly used in the NT with an ethical meaning, the force of which is grasped only after the mind has made the connexion between their literal and non-literal meanings. All the Gospels refer to 'death' as a 'sleep.' This was not uncommon among the Jews of that era. But John's Gospel uses a different and more tender word (κοιμάομαι), and adds to the usual metaphorical conception the idea of sleep being an invigorator which brings health to the sick and makes the tired man ready for the work of a new day (Jn 11¹²⁻¹³). Other expressions, such as 'Get thee behind me, Satan' (Mt 16²³), 'Destroy this temple, and in three days I will raise it up' (Jn 2¹⁹), may be taken at random as examples of veiled metaphors, the connexion between the literal and spiritual meanings being mentally supplied. Many of the deepest teachings of the NT are embodied in words or phrases which cannot be fully understood until their metaphorical meaning is grasped.

All Oriental language is pictorial. This is especially true of the words of Jesus, not only as reported in the NT, but in other sayings reported by the early Fathers and in the recently-discovered Logia. To insist upon taking the Sermon on the Mount 'just as it reads,' would often mean to insist upon taking it as no one listening to Jesus would have understood it. This metaphorical method of speech was habitual with Jesus (Mt 13³⁴, Mk 4¹¹), where παραβολή does not mean 'parable' in the modern sense, but metaphorical comparison, and was used, so His disciples thought, to hide the meaning of His words from all except the inner circle of believers. It certainly, however, as Wendt has suggested, quickened the attention of His hearers, and enabled His teaching to be carried more easily in the memory.

Notwithstanding the marked difference in vocabulary, style, and thought found in the various Gospels, they all agree, when reporting the speeches of Jesus, in putting a metaphorical spiritual meaning into even the simplest words, such as 'sheep-fold,' 'door,' 'key,' 'lamp,' 'bread,' 'water,' 'fish,' 'life,' 'birth,' 'travail,' 'death,' 'love,' 'hell' (γέεννα), 'paradise,' etc. This is true even in the case of reporters who themselves lacked poetic and spiritual insight, and who not infrequently misunderstood the inner meaning of Jesus' words.* Sometimes, as in the references to 'meat' and 'leaven' (Jn 4³²⁻³⁴ 6²⁷⁻⁵⁵, Mt 16¹², Mk 8⁷, Lk 12), the deeper meaning of our Lord's words was understood before the Gospels came into existence. In other cases it is plain that even the Gospel writer did not catch the meaning of the words which he reports.

In all parts of the NT, social, civil, and regal terms are applied, often with a new depth of meaning, to our Lord and His Kingdom. Not only such terms as 'king,' 'Lord,' 'Master,' etc., but υἱὸς θεοῦ and σωτήρ are titles given to the Roman emperors of the 1st and 2nd cents., while ἀδελφός was the common term used for members of various heathen esoteric associations of that period, and 'birth' the technical term for the rite of initiation. So the papyri have shown that 'presbyter,' 'scribe,' 'prophet,' etc., were technical terms used for officials in the heathen temples. This means only that the members of the early Christian community were accustomed to use the ordinary language of their times. It is difficult to tell what new ecclesiastical colouring was originally given to the titles of the early Christian officials, or what new ideas were from the very beginning expressed by the old terms 'faith,' 'salvation,' etc. That the latter terms, though identical in form, expressed ideas radically different from what they did when used in the LXX, is acknowledged by all critics—how much more, then, did these ideas differ from those conveyed by the same terms when used in the heathen Mysteries?*

* Such misunderstanding does not seem so strange after one examines the contemporaneous literature. In the Talmud (Pesachim) an entire section is given to the discussion whether a man may eat the leaven of a Gentile, and with what kind of water dough must be kneaded.

The command to baptize or believe on, in, or into the name of Jesus,—found in all parts of NT,—receives a new force from the papyri, where, in heathen temples, the property bought 'into the name of God' emphasizes the Divine ownership.†

The different NT writers are marked by certain striking peculiarities in their use of metaphors. St. Mark, in his peasant's Gospel, rustic but picturesque, uses many metaphors which all writers following him could but repeat. So his simple metaphors grow into extended metaphors or illustrations in the later Gospels. Yet certain strong expressions, evidently metaphorical, are, either because of their uncouthness or implications, ignored by the later and more reflective writers. That the disciples are to be 'salted with fire' (9⁴⁹), and that even in this life they are to be rewarded with a hundred 'mothers,' etc. (10³⁰) are peculiar to Mark.‡ But when the force of these metaphors is caught, each statement strengthens our Lord's argument.

So the statement that Jesus spat on the blind man's eyes and on the dumb man's tongue (8²³ 7³³), though omitted for obvious reasons from the other Gospels, becomes peculiarly impressive when we remember that spittle, according to all ancient thought, represented the essence of a man's inner spirit, the quintessence of himself, and therefore played, from the earliest ages, a leading part in magic and witchcraft. By this acted metaphor Jesus proclaimed symbolically that it was His very essence that healed. Cf. also Jn 9⁶, where the action of Jesus possibly receives a new meaning when we remember that in the Talmud the dust of certain districts in Jerusalem was clean and of other districts unclean—not because of the district being insanitary, as is suggested in the Talmudic text. It, instead of spitting on the tongue, He 'spat out,' this would receive explanation from the custom of the Jews to spit in contempt when idols were mentioned; as also in the early Church, where converts coming to baptism spat out as a sign that they renounced the kingdom of Satan. Cf. JE, art. 'Alenu.'

In Mk., believers who have 'salt' within them (9⁵⁰) have brotherly love; in Mt., those who love their enemies are salt (5¹⁰⁻¹³).§ In Mk., the word is a lamp (λύχνος) which must not be hid (4²¹, cf. Lk 8¹⁶, 18); in Mt., it is the believer (5¹⁵), or his 'eye' (spiritual vision or intent), if clear and healthy (ἀπλοῦς, 6²²), which is the lamp shining forth from the inward centre of life (φῶς, 5¹⁴)—which Jn. sees to be the eternal Word, Christ Jesus (1⁴). In Mk., disciples are compared to sheep (6³⁴ 14²⁷); in Mt. they are sheep (10⁶ 15²⁴ 26³¹, cf. 18¹²), while in Jn. (10²⁻²⁷) a long, elaborate discourse is based upon this well understood metaphor.¶

* See, e.g., Deissmann, Bible Studies, 1901, pp. 73, 233; Percy Gardner, Exploratio Evangelica (1899); cf. Ramsay, 'Greek of Early Church and Pagan Ritual' (Expos. Times 1898), p. 9.

† See Deissmann, pp. 142, 147, 197; Moulton, Gram. NT Greek, (1906), has shown that the prepositions are practically identical in meaning as used in the papyri.

‡ Mt 19²³ is doubtful, and at any rate ὄψ is omitted.

§ Compare the proverb yet to be heard in Jerusalem, 'What salt is it that keeps money good?' Answer: 'Charity.'

¶ Jülicher (Die Gleichreden Jesu, p. 120) looks upon the narrative as contradictory and suspicious, because at one time Jesus is represented as the Door and at another as the Shepherd

Both Mk. and Mt. teach that he who 'findeth his life shall lose it,' but Lk. enlarges the meaning of ψυχή until it includes the whole man (9²⁵). Mt. alone says, Have no anxiety for your life, 'for each to-morrow will be anxious for itself' (6²⁵⁻³⁴), though both Mt. and Lk. remark that even the birds, which have neither farming implements nor granaries, are cared for (6²⁶ 8³⁰, cf. Lk 12²²⁻²⁴). The metaphorical allusion to new wine in fresh wine-skins, Mk 2²², is explained in Mt 9¹⁷ and enlarged in Lk 5³⁷. The patch which in Mk. and Mt. tears out a larger hole from the old garment, is in Lk. condemned for two altogether different reasons (5³⁶)—the necessity of tearing a new piece of cloth in order to get the patch, and because it would be a different kind of cloth. Every one who heard this remark in either form would be caught by the unspoken metaphor: Judaism cannot be patched by this new doctrine of Jesus; it must be replaced by it. The gospel is no patch; it must replace the old and worn-out garment. In Mk. there is only a brief allusion to the coming of the Son of Man (13²⁴⁻²⁷), in Mt. an extended description.

'Let the dead bury their dead' (8²²); 'Cast not your pearls before swine' (7⁶); 'Do men gather grapes of thorns, or figs of thistles?' (7¹⁶), are some of the striking expressions found in Mt. alone, as also the declaration that no man should be called 'father' (23⁹); cf. the acted metaphor (17²⁶), nowhere else recorded, by which Jesus metaphorically claims that the God of the Temple is His Father, when He declares His legal exemption from the Temple tax. There are a number of peculiarly picturesque and humorous metaphors for which we are indebted to Matthew. The Pharisees are 'white-washed tombs' full of putridity (23²⁷); 'blind guides of the blind' (15¹⁴ 23¹⁶, 24); 'wolves in sheep's clothing' (7¹⁵). One who truly exhibits the law of righteousness (which is unselfishness and love) does not let his left hand know what his right hand doeth (6³); but these men blow a trumpet before them, not only when they give alms, but when they pray (cf. the remark in the Teaching of the Twelve Apostles [xii. 1], that a teacher of the true doctrine is known to one who 'has understanding of the right hand and the left'). They make long prayers and 'devour widows' houses' (23¹⁴ or 13[?]). These hair-splitting theologians, so particular in their eating, strain out the gnat but swallow the camel (23²⁴).* Christ's yoke does not gall (11³⁰), but these men lay upon the shoulders of others burdens which they will not move even with the finger (23⁴). For such is the 'weeping and the gnashing of teeth' (8¹² 13²², 50 22¹³ 24⁵¹ 25³⁰, elsewhere only Lk 13²⁸). These satiric pictures of the theologians of the day are peculiar to Matthew. Both Mt. and Lk. refer to the same individuals as hyper-critics, who are greatly disturbed by the mote in their brother's eye, although they have a beam in their own. Forgetting their own infirmity and need of immediate surgical assistance, they use the other eye, which must also have been sympathetically afflicted, in spying out and ridiculing the speck of dust in the eye of their neighbour (Mt 7³⁻⁵=Lk 6^{41f.}). Nothing in Hogarth is better than that.

In Lk., several of the Beatitudes concerning the poor and hungry take on a distinctly different meaning from what they had in Mt. (5³, 6); the words 'poor' and 'hungry' (6²⁰, 23) having perhaps obtained a settled ecclesiastical, non-literal meaning.

who enters it; but no Oriental would have criticised the use of these varying metaphors.

* All the Synoptists report the saying of Christ that it is easier for a camel to go through a needle's eye than, etc. (Mk 10²⁵, Mt 19²⁴, Lk 13²⁵). The Talmud has the same expression, excepting that an elephant takes the place of the camel (quoted by Arthur Wright, Some NT Problems, p. 127).

The storming of the Kingdom of heaven by those who upset the Law in their anxiety to hurry into the Kingdom of the gospel, while obscured in Mt. (11²²), is explained in Lk. (16^{16, 17}). The mixed figures used by Mk. (4¹⁴⁻¹⁶) and Mt. (13¹⁹),—sometimes similes and sometimes metaphors,—representing men in one breath as both soil and seed, disappear in Lk.'s beautiful symmetrical narrative (8^{55r}). He, too, is responsible for the injunction 'Make for yourselves purses which wax not old' (12³³), and for the attractive Orientalism 'son of peace' (10⁶) added to Mt 10¹³, and for the less commendable addition that the descent of the Spirit at the baptism of Jesus, which Mk. and Mt. had said to be 'like a dove,'—and which Jn. explains to have been 'as a dove,' i.e. in a softly, floating manner (Moulton),—was 'in bodily form' (3²²). Instead of Mt.'s metaphorical reference to the Pharisees as painted sepulchres (23²⁷), beautiful to look at but foul within, Lk. makes Jesus speak of them as unsuspected graves (μνημεία) which defile every one who comes near them (11⁴⁴). The 'mountain' of Mt. (17³⁰), which can be cast into the sea by any disciple who has faith as fully alive as a mustard seed, becomes a 'tree' in Lk. (17⁶). The 'seventy-seven' acts of forgiveness required of Jesus' disciples, according to Mt. (18²²), are expressed with equal truth and vigour by Lk. when he reduces that number to 'seven' (17⁴). The satirical remark that wealth can build a man an 'eternal tent' (Lk 16⁹), and the hyperbole that one must 'hate' (μισέω) his father and mother in order to be a true disciple of Jesus (14²⁶), are original with Lk.; as also the statement that the disciples must 'win their souls' (21¹⁹), and that the Pharisees take away the 'key of knowledge' (11⁵², cf. Mt 16¹⁹).

Lk., which shows more attention to literary style than any other NT writing except the Hebrews (Moulton), uses far fewer original metaphors. This is because it was not a first-hand work, but a compilation (1³). Even the beautiful reference to Jesus as the Sun-rise (17⁶) looks back to the OT; and the terms 'torment' and 'fixed gulf' in the Dives parable, which are peculiar to Lk., are found in the medical works of that period; while the word used for the life immediately after death—Paradise—is the word for the garden of delight in which our first parents dwelt (Gn 2⁸ LXX). In Lk., as truly as in Jn., the Baptist not only preaches the whole gospel, social, ethical, and sacrificial, but uses the favourite metaphors of Jesus; while Elisabeth and Mary, Zacharias and Simeon, all speak in blank verse, every line being filled with OT imagery. The nautical metaphors of Lk. are few and doubtful (cf. Ezpos. vi. viii. [1903] 130). It does not even use the striking phrase 'fishers of men' common to both Mk. and Mt.

In the Fourth Gospel we have not many new figures of speech, but all the old ones are filled with new contents. Even the old title 'Son of Man' becomes exalted (1³⁷ 5²⁷). In the Synoptt. Jesus points out the way; in Jn. He is 'the Way' (14⁶). In the Synoptt. He gives life; in Jn. He is 'Life,' and 'the Life' (1⁴), and large infences are drawn from this. He is also called 'the Resurrection' (11²⁵). In the Synoptt. Jesus is like a shepherd, but in Jn. He has become both Shepherd and Gate of the fold (10^{7, 11}). In the Synoptt. Jesus speaks the word; in Jn. He is 'the Word,' and the term has taken into itself a new and mystic meaning: ὁ λόγος has come to mean the eternal thought of Jehovah given visible utterance, the sacred Tetragrammaton manifested in flesh (1¹⁴), whose word (ὁ λόγος) or words (τὰ ῥήματα) are a part of His own Divine essence, to abide in which is to abide in Him (5³⁸ 8³¹). Either term expresses the creative, cleansing, protecting power of the Divine Name.

The unity of the spoken word with the speaker is metaphorically regarded as an identity equivalent to that between Christ and the Father (14¹⁰, cf. 10³⁰). But the unity of the word with the speaker, or of Christ with His Father, is no closer than that between the Christ and His true disciples. He abides in them and they abide in Him (6⁵⁶ 15⁴ 17²⁶; cf. 6⁷⁰, where Judas, because of his relationship with Satan, becomes diabolos). So all believers may become one 'as thou, Father, art in me and I in thee' (17²¹). The Christ, the 'only begotten' (1^{14, 18} 3^{16, 18}), is the Vine (15¹), His body a sanctuary (2¹⁹); even while on the earth He is 'in heaven' (3¹³), and holds His disciples and all things in His hand (10²⁸ 3³⁵). Those in whom the Word abides (15⁷) and who abide in the Word (8³¹)—these metaphors being interchangeable—cannot 'taste death' (8⁵²), nor even 'look on death' (8⁵¹).

In Jn., more than in any other Gospel, metaphors become an important factor in doctrinal development. These mystic figures of speech indicate the growth of the Church in theological development, and have also played no little part in shaping the later doctrines of Christendom. A freely translated expression in the Psalms concerning the manna which came from heaven is made the occasion, metaphorically interpreted, of deep and beautiful teachings concerning the heavenly origin of the Christ and His power to give life (6^{33-35, 51}). To eat Him is the only way to gain life (6^{51, 53, 58}). So Jesus is the well of salvation out of which men may draw water with great joy (cf. Is 12³); not only satisfying their own thirst thereby, but becoming living fountains which send forth floods of life-giving water such as came from Jesus Himself (4¹⁰⁻¹³ 7³⁸). In the Acts (8³²), Jesus goes as a lamb to the slaughter; in Jn. He is the Lamb (1^{29, 36}) 'exalted' upon the cross-altar (3¹⁴ 12^{32, 34} [ὑψώω is peculiar to Jn.]).

MILE.—See WEIGHTS AND MEASURES.

MILL (μυλῶν), MILL-STONE (μύλος, λίθος μυλικός).—The hand-mill used in Palestine consists of two stone discs, from a foot to a foot and a half in diameter, the upper being about 2 in., the lower 3 in. thick. A porous stone of black basalt is preferred, as being sufficiently hard and not so liable as ordinary limestone to become glazed by the friction of the two surfaces against each other (Job 41²⁴). The stones are usually flat, but not infrequently the concave face of the upper stone rests upon the corresponding convex of the lower one, so as to facilitate the passing out of the flour in the act of rotation. The lower stone is always the heavier of the two, because it is thicker and because it is often a little wider, with a rebate or raised rim; and the upper stone fits into the recess thus formed. The flour then escapes from an opening several inches long where the rim of the lower stone has been cut away. The upper stone has an opening through the centre for the reception of the upright wooden pin projecting from the centre of the lower stone. Into this hole the wheat is poured in the process of grinding. The upper stone has near the circumference a wooden peg a little over two handbreadths in height, and when the stone is being turned by two women (Mt 24⁴¹), sitting on opposite sides of it, each grasps the peg continuously with one hand and alternately draws it to herself and pushes it away. Partly on account of their position in sitting, and partly to keep the edge of the skirt away from the cloth spread for the flour, they usually draw up the dress to the knee (Is 47¹⁻²). The sound of the hand-mill grinding the flour for the daily bread was suggestive of home life under conditions of peace and prosperity, and its cessation betokened turmoil and distress (Ec 12^{3,4}, Jer 25^{10,11}). The μύλος ὄνικος, or donkey stone of Lk 17², may simply mean the revolving upper stone of the common hand-mill, as having the more active share in the work of grinding. If the reference be to the larger kind of stone driven by animal or water power, the allusion would be a case of emphatic hyperbole, like the passage of a camel through the slit of a needle (Mt 19²⁴). In Rev 18²¹ it is a strong angel that is described as casting such a stone. See, further, art. 'Mill,' with illustration, in Hastings' DB. G. M. MACKIE.

* For Oriental parallels to the Logos in other Oriental religions, see JRAS, April 1906.

ὑπηρέτης is originally 'a rower' (from ἵρισμα, —the ὄρι pointing to his being under the direction of the κυβερνήτης or steersman, who was the navigating officer: Encyc. Brit. 21. 808). It is commonly used in class. Gr. in the sense of 'a doer of hard work,' 'an assistant' or 'apparitor' or 'inferior officer,' but still retains the meaning of 'one who is under the direction or control of another' (e.g. ὑπηρεταί is the term employed by Xenophon for the adjutants or orderlies of a general).

In Bibl. Greek 'the word covers a wide range of offices,' but still retains this meaning: e.g. Mt 5²⁵ (the officer of a court of justice = πρᾶκτωρ, Lk 12⁵⁸), Mt 26⁵⁸, Mk 14^{54, 65}, Jn 7^{32, 45, 46} 18^{3, 12, 18, 22} 19⁵, Ac 5^{22, 26} (the Temple police, or apparitors of the Sanhedrin; cf. Hastings' DB iv. 715^b; Encyc. Bibl. iv. 4650; Swete, St. Mark, xii. 329, 335). In Jn 18³⁶ our Lord says, 'If my kingdom were of this world, then would my ὑπηρέται ('officers,' RVm) fight'; with which cf. (for a similar connexion of ὑπηρέται) LXX Pr 14³⁵ δεκτοὶ βασιλεὶ ὑπηρέτης νόμων, Wis 6⁵ (kings) ὑπηρέται ὄντες τῆς αὐτοῦ (i.e. God's) βασιλείας. In Ac 26¹⁶ ὑπηρέτην points to the service of complete subjection into which St. Paul was called to enter, when Jesus appeared to him as the Risen Lord. He and Apollon and Cephas are ὑπηρέται Χριστοῦ (1 Co 4¹). Lk's ὑπηρεταί τοῦ λόγου may be due to his having heard St. Paul use this and similar expressions, and describes the αὐτόπται τῶν πεπληροφορημένων πραγμάτων in their service of entire subjection to the gospel (here τοῦ λόγου = 'the gospel' as in other Lukan passages, Ac 6²⁻⁴ 8⁴ 10⁴⁴ 11¹⁹ 14²⁵ 16⁶ 17¹¹). 'ὑπηρέτης and διάκονος are often used interchangeably' (Hort, Ecclesia, 210; cf. Trench, Synon. ix. (near end); Hastings' DB iii. 378^a).

In Lk 4²⁰ the ὑπηρέτης is the synagogue official called the hazzān, who during public worship 'hands the copy of the Scriptures to the reader, and receives it back from the hands of the man who has read the final lesson. . . . The hazzān rolls up the Torah roll after the reading, and, after holding it up to view, deposits it in the press' (Hastings' DB iv. 640^b; cf. Edersheim, Life and Times of Jesus, i. 438). Chase conjectures that John Mark was originally a hazzān or synagogue attendant (Ac 13⁵; Hastings' DB iii. 245^b).

2. λειτουργία: Lk 1²³ αἱ ἡμέραι τῆς λειτουργίας αὐτοῦ, 'the days of his ministration,' i.e. the week during which he was on priestly duty in the Temple.

Λειτουργία is of common occurrence in LXX in the sense of ritual service (= עֲבֹדָה Nu 8²² 16⁹ 184, 2 Ch 31²; cf. Diod. Sic. i. 21 (of the Egyptian priesthood), τὰς τῶν θεῶν θραυσίας τε καὶ λειτουργίας). At Athens the λειτουργία (from obsol. ἔργον = ἰργάζομαι, and λῆϊτος, λῆϊτος [fr. λαός]) were State burdens of a peculiar kind laid on the citizens, e.g. defraying the cost of public choruses, or of the training of athletes, or of feasting one's fellow-tribesmen (Xen. de Rep. Ath. i. 13; Becker, Charicles, sc. iv. n. 23; Dict. Antiq. ii. 27). The use of λειτουργία in a ritual sense is not peculiar to LXX, the Papyri having shown that it was common in Egypt, and in particular that the services in the Serapeum were designated by this title (Deissmann, Bible Studies, 138; cf. Moulton, Expositor, vi. vii. [1903] 116).

Lk. speaks of the prophets and teachers at Antioch λειτουργούντων τῷ Κυρίῳ, by which prayers to Christ are probably meant (Ac 13²). λειτουργεῖν and the group of words connected with it are used, as in LXX, by the writer of Hebrews of the ministry of the tabernacle (9²¹ 10¹¹); metaphorically, of the more excellent ministry of Christ as High Priest in the heavenly sanctuary (8²⁻⁶); they are also applied to the ministry of angels (1⁷⁻¹⁴). St. Paul speaks of civil rulers as λειτουργοὶ θεοῦ, thus ascribing to them a sacred function (Ro 13⁵). Evidently the ritual sense of this group of words is always present to the mind of the Apostle when he has occasion to use them (Ro 15¹⁶ 'Paul the ministering priest, the preaching of the gospel his priestly function, the believing Gentiles his offering' [Gifford], Ro 15²⁷, 2 Co 9¹², Ph 2¹⁷ 'the Philippians the priests, their faith the sacrifice, the apostle's life-blood the accompanying libation' [Lightfoot], Ph 2^{25, 30}; cf. Westcott on He 1, p. 231). Those passages also show that Christ's ministers are sacrificing priests only in the same sense as the rest of the members of the Christian brotherhood, who render λειτουργία to God and to men by 'the work of faith, and the labour of love' (cf. Hastings' DB iii. 377^a; Lightfoot, Philip. 2 p. 182). — The application of λειτουργία to the prayers offered at the dispensation of the Lord's Supper is a comparatively late ecclesiastical usage (Cheetham, Dict. Chris. Antiq. ii. 1018; Lightfoot, l.c. 261; Trench, Synon. xxxv).

3. διάκονος, διακονεῖν, -εἶσθαι (διηκόνουν, διηκόνησα, later impf. and aor. for ἐδιακόνουν, ἐδιακόνησα).—

The derivation of διάκονος is uncertain. If Buttmann's conjecture is right (Lexil. i. 218), that the root of the word is an obsolete verb διακω=διώκω, it may have originally meant 'a messenger.' Prellwitz (Etymol. Wörterbuch, 74) connects it with =ἰγκονία, 'to be active,' the long α being explained as arising from δια+α=α weak form of the iv in ἰγκονία. The original meaning would then be 'one who is quick and active in service.' The Greek usage of the word is fully dealt with by Hort (Ecclesia, 202 ff.), who quotes, amongst other passages which bring out its menial associations, Plato, Gorg. i. 518 A, where it is said that, except gymnastics and medicine, 'all other arts which have to do with the body are servile and menial (διακονικαί) and illiberal.' Hort also shows that by later Greek writers it was sometimes used in a lofty figurative sense, e.g. by Epictetus, Dissertationes, iv. 7. 20, 'For I think that what God chooses is better than what I choose. I will attach myself as a minister and follower (διάκονος καὶ ἀκολουθεῖς) to Him; I have the same movements as He has, I have the same desires; in a word, I have the same will (συνθίλω).' Long's translation, 348.—'The true proper Greek sense' is 'an attendant whose duty it is to wait on his master at table.'

In the Gospels, διάκονος and its derivatives are used in the sense of preparing or serving a meal, Mk 1¹³ (|| Mt 4¹¹), Mk 1³¹ (|| Mt 8¹⁵, Lk 4³⁹), Lk 10⁴⁰ 12²⁷ 17⁸, Mt 22¹³, Jn 2^{5, 9} 12²; in the same sense, figuratively, Mk 9³⁵ (not exactly || Mt 23¹¹, Lk 22^{26, 27}), Mk 10^{43, 45} (|| Mt 20^{26, 28}), Jn 12²⁶; of ministering service generally, Lk 8³, Mk 15⁴¹, Mt 27⁵⁵ 25⁴⁴. διάκονος does not occur in St. Luke, who uses δὲ διακονῶν (22^{26, 27}).

The passages in which 'minister,' 'to minister,' are the renderings adopted in AV and RV, are the following: (i.) Of the ministry of angels, Mk 1¹³ (|| Mt 4¹¹) οἱ ἄγγελοι διηκόνουν αὐτῷ, cf. Gn 28¹², 1 K 19⁵, Dn 10²¹, Jn 1⁵¹, Lk 22⁴³, He 1¹⁴, 1 P 1¹². Christ's nativity, His temptation, His agony, His resurrection, His ascension, were all accompanied by their sympathetic ministrations.—(ii.) Of Peter's wife's mother, Mk 1³¹ (|| Mt 8¹⁵, Lk 4³⁹) διηκόνει αὐτοῖς at the Sabbath meal immediately after the fever left her. 'Et nos ministreremus Jesu' (Jerome, quoted by Swete, in loc.).—(iii.) Of the ministering women, Lk 8³ (Mk 15⁴¹, Mt 27⁵⁵) αἰτῶντες διηκόνουν

αὐτῷ [αὐτοῖς] ἐκ τῶν ὑπαρχόντων αὐταῖς, and continued doing so till the close of Christ's life on earth. αἴτινες (=tales quæ) may imply that they had the heart as well as the means to minister to Him. Lk. has much to tell us about the women friends of Jesus (c.g. 10³⁸⁻⁴² 11²⁷ 23²⁷ 24²²).—(iv.) The great sayings about service being the path to true greatness, Mk 9³⁵ πάντων διάκονος, 'minister of all,' RV (not exactly || Mt 23¹¹, Lk 22^{26, 27}), Mk 10^{43, 45} (Mt 20^{26, 28}, which is followed by an extensive interpolation of a similar tenor in DΦ, Hastings' DB, Ext. Vol. 345^a) ἔσται ὑμῶν διάκονος . . . καὶ γὰρ ὁ υἱὸς τοῦ ἀνθρώπου οὐκ ἤλθε διακονηθῆναι ἀλλὰ διακονῆσαι.—Promotion to true greatness is not effected by such methods as are adopted by 'the princes of the Gentiles' to gain or to retain supreme power; nor does it depend on an act of partiality, such as the sons of Zebedee imagined might be exercised in their favour if they applied for it in time. It is regulated by fixed spiritual laws, or by the general principle that honour comes in the Kingdom of God by disinterested love. As 'to get pleasure you must forget it' (Seth, Eth. Principles, 66; W. L. Davidson, Theism, 372), so to be great you must cease to think of greatness and humble yourself to serve others, which includes the being quick to discern and open-hearted to minister to their needs, even to the sacrificing of yourself for their good. They who shall have the highest place in God's household are they who take the duties of its humblest member, the δούλος, upon themselves; and they who shall be qualified to sit down at the feast of salvation are they who fulfil the work of the διάκονος at table, who wait upon those whom God regards as His guests, and minister to their wants (cf. Menzies, Mark, 200). Jesus sets forth this principle in the most touching manner as that of His own life (cf. Ac 10³⁸). He is Himself the living embodiment of the truth which He teaches. In saying that He 'came not to be ministered unto, but to minister,' He does not mean that the ministrations He is receiving are not welcome, but He defines the main object of His sojourning in this world, and speaks of Himself not as the Guest whom the whole world will delight to honour, but as the humble attendant upon those who are in want; not as the Benefactor who is to be raised by men to the highest earthly glory, but as One who is come to serve them (seeing that on account of the state they are in there is no other way in which He can effectually and completely serve them) by the surrender of life itself (cf. Mk 15³¹). This was Jesus' path to the most exalted greatness. It led to there being given Him by God 'the name which is above every name' (Ph 2⁹, cf. He 2⁹), and also to His receiving from man the undying homage of his heart, together with the confession of the tongue that his highest ideal of human goodness and service is now realized in Jesus. So, when we follow His example and are lifted out of ourselves by His Spirit of ministering love, everything that came to Him will come to us, according to the measure in which we, who are infinitely inferior to Him, will be found meet for it,—God's approval of our life, increasing influence for good, that true greatness which consists in our becoming better able to elevate and bless our fellow-men (cf. Caird, Univ. Sermon, 260), and to minister to them in the highest way by leading them to righteousness (Dn 12³), and which may also comprehend the power to minister to them in a higher state of being (cf. Mt 25²¹, Lk 19¹⁷).*

—(v.) Mt 25⁴⁴ πότε . . . οὐ διηκονήσαμέν σοι; those words supplement in a solemn way the sayings just commented upon. Ministering love is not only the path to true greatness, it is also the indispensable condition of future exaltation with Christ. He who 'for our sakes became poor,' who turned the light of His infinite pity upon the world of hunger, poverty, and misery, still calls the hungry and poor and miserable 'His brethren,' and accounts their cause His own. Not to have ministered to their needs is not to have ministered to His (cf. Lowell, 'The Vision of Sir Launfal'; and 'The Legend of St. Martin's Cloak,' Farrar, Lives of the Fathers, i. 630). At His coming in glory, Christ will declare His love to those who have loved, and will admit them as 'joint-heirs with Himself'; but He will reject as unmeet for companionship with Him those who have not taken the position among their fellow-men which He showed them how to take when He said, 'Εγὼ δὲ εἰμι ἐν μέσῳ ὑμῶν ὡς ὁ διακονῶν (Lk 22²⁷, cf. Jn 13⁵).—These sayings of Jesus virtually create a new standard of social ethics. They give to the prophetic teaching of the OT on considerate and brotherly conduct (רַחֵם, see W. R. Smith, Proph. 160, 407; Driver, Sermons on OT, 221, 232) the breadth and completeness which it yet lacked. 'If we wish to feel the contrast of the Pagan and the Christian ideals of greatness, we have only to compare the Aristotelian picture of the μεγαλόψυχος, the proud aristocrat who lives to prove his independence and superiority, with that other picture of a Life that poured itself out in the service of others' (Seth, Eth. Principles, 264).

Later Stoicism 'sometimes expressed with much warmth the recognition of the universal fellowship and natural mutual claims of human beings as such' (Sidgwick, Hist. of Ethics, 120), but this was really inconsistent with the hard isolation of the individual that was the fundamental basis of Stoicism (Lightfoot on Ph², 'St. Paul and Seneca,' 296), and the practical results of such teaching were small (Lecky, Europ. Morals 12, ii. 78-79). Numerous coincidences are found between the teaching of Jesus and the humane sayings of Seneca, Epictetus, and Marcus Aurelius. But, as Lightfoot observes (l.c. 291), 'an expression or a maxim, which detached from its context offers a striking resemblance to the ethics of the Gospel, is found to have a wholly different bearing when considered in its proper relations.' Stoicism was wholly wanting in humility, which is the very foundation of ministering love as taught by Jesus (cf. Westcott in Smith's DB ii. 857^b, iii. 1380). With Him, such love is not an occasional precept of benevolence, but, as Harnack says (What is Christianity? 98), it is 'the religious maxim.'

The following passages will show some of the results produced by our Lord's teaching in Christian thought and life. There are differences of διακονίας (1 Co 12⁵), but the manifold faculties for 'the work of ministering' are gifts from the Exalted Lord (Eph 4¹²), and each disciple has received a gift of some kind to be laid out in Christian service (1 P 4^{10, 11}). Some are called to the ministry of the word (Ac 6⁴, 2 Co 3⁶ 6⁴, Col 4¹⁷, 1 Th 3², 2 Ti 4⁵), to testify the gospel of the grace of God (Ac 20²⁴) and win men to faith (1 Co 3⁵); God has committed to such 'the ministry of reconciliation' (2 Co 5¹⁸). Some as attendants and comrades can strengthen the hands of those engaged in this work; St. Paul was thus helped by Timothy and Erastus (Ac 19²²), by Tycheus (Eph 6²¹, Col 4⁷), by Onesiphorus (2 Ti 1¹⁸), by Mark (2 Ti 4¹¹), by Onesimus (Philem 13). Some can render invaluable help in the local churches, as Stephanas and his household at Corinth (1 Co 16¹⁵), and Phœbe at Cenchræ (Ro 16¹). Ministering to the wants of the poor, the sick, the stranger, the prisoner, was constantly called for (Ac 6¹⁻², Ro 12⁷, He 6¹⁰, cf. 10³⁴, Rev 21⁹). A collection (two are mentioned) is a διακονία (Ac 11²⁹ 12²⁵, Ro 15²¹, 2 Co 8^{4, 19, 20} 9¹⁻¹² 13), and St. Paul speaks of his journey in charge of the latter as itself a part of the ministration (Ro 15²⁵ παρίσταμαι . . . διακονῶν τοῖς ἄγλοις, see Gifford's note). The above passages show that 'a faithful minister of Christ' (Col 17, cf. 1 Ti 4⁹) is one who combines with the stated ministry of the gospel the service of his fellow-men in things temporal and external.—Thus διάκονος, διακονία, in showing men the path to greatness, have themselves attained to greatness. It is true of words as well as of persons, that God as revealed in Christ 'hath exalted them of low degree' (Lk 1⁵²).

MINISTRY.—The word 'ministry' as now used in English has two leading senses: (a) service rendered, and (b) an official class, especially ecclesiastical. The latter has no place in this discussion, which has regard to the public service rendered by our Lord during His life on earth. In this connexion it describes both the period of the service and its contents. The word comes from the Latin minister, properly an adjective, but in its substantive use signifying an 'attendant' or 'servant' who usually performed services of a personal and more or less menial nature. It was also sometimes used of public or religious functionaries. In Greek there are three words which more or less nearly correspond to the Latin minister, namely, διάκονος, λειτουργός, ὑπηρετής. See preceding article.

i. The Nature of our Lord's Ministry.—In the mind of Jesus Himself there lay the ideas of both sacrifice and service as the essential principles of His mission among men.

1. The first element to be noticed is service. This presents a threefold aspect: (a) It was notably and characteristically a ministry of teaching. The frequent mention of His teaching, the reports of His discourses and sayings, and the fact that He was often called 'Teacher,' emphasize as all-important this function of His ministry. The varied character, the weighty contents, the marvellous power and the sweet charm of His teaching, are familiar thoughts to students of His life. But we must remember also the arduous nature of this work. The bodily toil, the mental strain, the spiritual intensity, all were great; and these were increased by the constant opposition of critics and foes, and by slowness of comprehension on the part of His friends. (b) But incidental to and accompanying this work of teaching was Christ's great ministry of help and healing. All the narratives show how large a place this occupied in His public life. Here, too, His labours were vast in sum, and made extraordinary demands—as many indications show—upon His sympathy and strength. (c) Closely related to His teaching, but not exactly identical with it, was our Lord's ministry of founding His Church. The selection and training of His Apostles and other disciples, involving many details of precept in regard to both the principles and the positive institutions of the Kingdom of God, were elements of the first importance in the earthly work of Jesus.

2. The other element is that of sacrifice. This was no less prominent in the ministry of Jesus than service. (a) In the Synoptics there is a progress of thought in regard to the fact and meaning of His sufferings. After Peter's confession near Cæsarea Philippi, Jesus began to impress on His disciples the certainty of His approaching death (Mt 16^{16, 21}); at the Transfiguration, Moses and Elijah talked with Him of His 'decease (ἐξόδος) which he was to accomplish at Jerusalem' (Lk 9³¹); soon after (Mt 17^{22f.}) He again spoke of His coming death. The self-giving character of His sufferings is indicated in the manner in which they are spoken of in Lk 9²²⁻²⁴, Mt 20²², as compared with Lk 12⁵⁰; and the severity of this experience as being something more than death alone, however painful, is indicated in the passages noted, and powerfully enforced by the Agony in Gethsemane and the events of the Crucifixion. Finally, the atoning value of Christ's sacrifice is pointed out in Mt 20²⁸—the words 'and give his life a ransom for many,' and in the accounts of the Last Supper (Mt 26²⁷⁻²⁸, Mk 14²⁴, Lk 22^{19, 20}). (b) In the Fourth Gospel the sacrificial note is even more distinct. It appears in the announcement of the Forerunner (Jn 1^{29, 36}), in the great saying to Nicodemus (3¹⁴⁻¹⁶), in the discourse at Capernaum (6^{32, 33, 48-51}), in the parable of the Good Shepherd (10^{11, 15, 17, 18}), in the remarks on the visit of the Greeks (12²⁰⁻³³), and in the words of comfort to the disciples (15¹³). (c) How strongly the Lord must have impressed this view of His ministry upon the minds of His disciples, is shown in utterances of Peter and of Paul in their addresses and in their Epistles, in the elaborate argument of the Epistle to the Hebrews, and in the representations of the Lamb in the Apocalypse.

ii. The Extent of our Lord's Ministry.—In regard to the extent of the public ministry of Jesus, three main questions present themselves: How long did it last? How much territory did it cover? How much labour did it include?

1. Duration.—On the point of duration the principal things to be considered are the limits, the dates, and the resultant theories of scholars. (1) The limits of the public ministry of Jesus are properly placed between His baptism and His burial, leaving out at the beginning the thirty years of retirement and preparation at Nazareth, and at the end the forty days of occasional appearances after His resurrection. The determination of the time between is a hard problem.

(2) The principal dates to be determined in our Lord's life are those of His birth, baptism, and crucifixion—the duration of the ministry depending upon the latter two, but involving the first. If it were possible to fix with certainty any two of these, the problem would practically be solved; or, if even one could be placed beyond doubt, it would be greatly simplified. But as a matter of fact scholars have never been able to decide positively on any one of the dates. A full discussion is not called for here (see art. DATES), but the salient points must be presented.

(a) For the Birth of Jesus, we know that it occurred in the reign of the emperor Augustus (Lk 2¹⁻⁶), and not long before the death of Herod the Great (Mt 2¹⁻¹⁹). Herod died probably not later than B.C. 4, as is made out from statements of Josephus (see DATES), and thus it appears that by an early error (of Dionysius Exiguus, an abbot of the 6th cent.) the generally accepted era of Christ's birth has been irrevocably fixed a few years later than the actual time. The probable date of the Nativity is somewhere between B.C. 6 and 4.

(b) For the Baptism, we know that it took place at some time within the 'fifteenth year of Tiberius Cæsar' (Lk 3¹⁻²), for this was the time that John began to baptize, and Jesus was among those who received the rite at his hands (Mt 3¹³, Mk 1⁹, Lk 3²¹); but none of the accounts gives any definite note as to the exact point during the ministry of John when the baptism occurred. St. Luke states (3²³) that 'Jesus when he began (presumably His ministry or teaching) was about thirty years old.' But neither His exact age nor the exact point of His 'beginning' is indicated. The probability is that He was either just thirty, or from one to three years past that—hardly under thirty. So that here we have no certain number of years to add to the already uncertain year of the Lord's birth. If we take B.C. 4 as the Birth date and add thirty years, it brings us to A.D. 26 as the probable year of the baptism; but if St. Luke's 'about thirty' be extended two years, it would be 28. Now, as to the 'fifteenth year of Tiberius,' that was probably the year 28, but may have been 26. Augustus died in A.D. 14 (Aug. 19), and, if the beginning of the reign of his successor Tiberius be reckoned from that date, the 'fifteenth year' would begin in Aug. 28, and the baptism of Jesus would be at some time in the twelve months following. But it is possible that St. Luke dates the beginning of Tiberius' reign from the time he was associated in the government with Augustus, i.e. in A.D. 12; and so the 'fifteenth year' could begin in Aug. 26.

On this, however, it is proper to remark that the more common mode of reckoning would be from the actual sole reign, and not from the previous association of an emperor in the government.

(c) For the Crucifixion, we know that it occurred during the governorship of Pontius Pilate in Judæa (all the Evangelists), and this administration covered about ten years, from A.D. 26 to 36. Other data (see DATES) help to fix upon near the central part of this period as the time of the Crucifixion, between 28 and 31, more likely 29 or 30.

(3) These uncertainties have given rise among scholars to a number of different theories of the duration of our Lord's ministry. It will be sufficient to mention three, among which choice, according to what seems to be the greatest probability, should be made.

(a) The short period theory. This assigns but a little over a year to the ministry. According to it, the Baptism probably occurred early in the year 29, that is, during the fifteenth year of Tiberius, reckoning that to have begun in Aug. 28, and the Baptism to have taken place early in the year following. The first Passover (Jn 2¹³) came soon after, and the last Passover just a year later. Between these two Passovers lay the whole ministry, hence this theory is called the bipaschal view. To obtain this result, the feast of Jn 5¹ is held not to be a Passover; the text of Jn 6⁴ is regarded as incorrect (on slight documentary evidence), and read as omitting 'of the passover,' and so leaving this also an unnamed feast. After disposing of these two feasts, the order of feasts mentioned in John is fixed as follows: Passover (2¹³), A.D. 29; Pentecost (5¹), nameless or omitted (6⁴), Tabernacles (7²), Dedication (10²²), and Passover (11²⁵), spring of A.D. 30. With this scheme derived from the Fourth Gospel, the data furnished by the Synoptics is made to harmonize by slighting the indications of a time of nearly ripe grain (Mt 12¹, Mk 2²³, Lk 6¹), which it is hard to locate if there were only two Passovers in the whole series of events. But this theory is defended (see von Soden in Encyc. Bibl.) on the following grounds: (i.) That the correct interpretation of the 'fifteenth year' of Tiberius is from the date of his sole reign, and therefore is A.D. 28-29. (ii.) The events of the Gospel narrative are too meagre to have extended over more than a year. (iii.) This view was held by many of the Fathers as early as the 2nd century. The only one of these grounds that has any real force is the first, and as to that it may be replied that we are not compelled to put the Crucifixion in 30, and thereby limit the time to one year. The second ground is entirely subjective—to many other scholars it seems far too short a time for all the events (with their implications of others and of intervals) to have taken place. As to the third ground, it may be said that the Fathers were not unanimous, and they had only the same data for forming opinions that modern and more accurate chronologers have. Besides its inadequacy to account for all the facts, this theory deals in an arbitrary way with the text of Jn 6⁴ and with the indication furnished by the incident of the grain fields (Mt 12¹ etc.).

(b) The long period theory. This holds that there were four Passovers in the ministry, and is hence called the quadripaschal theory. It dates from Eusebius in the 4th cent., and is held by many modern scholars. This takes the unnamed feast of Jn 5¹ to be a Passover, holds to the commonly received text of Jn 6⁴, puts the Baptism early in 27 and the Crucifixion in 30, thus making the ministry extend over three years. But there is difference of arrangement of details even among those who hold this view, and it is not at all certain that the feast of Jn 5¹ can be fixed as a Passover.

(c) The medium period theory. This holds that the feast of Jn 5¹ is not a Passover, and that there were only three Passovers in the ministry—so the tripaschal theory. As to what feast it was, and as to the arrangement of all the details, there is much difference among the advocates of the medium period. But from a year and a half to two and a half is the time allowed by those who reject both the other theories. If the Baptism occurred in the autumn of 28 or early spring of 29, then to get in three Passovers it will be necessary to put the Crucifixion in 31—to which there are serious objections. But if the Baptism was in 26-27, then the Crucifixion could be assigned to 29, which is not improbable. It must be said in view of all these difficulties, that no positive convictions in regard to the duration of the ministry are, in the present state of knowledge, tenable, but the probabilities are upon the whole in favour of a ministry of more than one and less than three years' duration.

2. Localities.—In regard to the topographical extent of our Lord's ministry we have a much simpler question to deal with. His labours extended throughout Palestine, and on a few occasions to contiguous lands. (a) Judæa, in several different places, and more especially Jerusalem, witnessed some of His most important deeds and teachings. (b) Galilee, however, was the principal scene of His teaching and healing work. The Lake and its cities,—Capernaum with others,—Nazareth, Cana, and other towns and a number of villages, the plains and mountains of populous Galilee shared in the deeds of His busy life. Two certainly, and probably three, separate tours of the whole of Galilee are mentioned: (1) Mt 4²³, Mk 1³⁸, Lk 4⁴; (2) Lk 8¹; (3) Mt 9³⁵, Mk 6⁶,—though it is possible that (2) and (3) are the same. (c) In passing through Samaria several times (Jn 4⁴⁶, Lk 9^{52ff.} 17¹¹) He paused to perform some work of mercy. (d) Into Phœnicia, 'the region of Tyre and Sidon,' He went at least once (Mt 15²¹, Mk 7²⁴). (e) Several visits to districts contiguous to Galilee, to the east and north, are mentioned, namely, the visit to Gerasa or Gadara during His Galilæan ministry (Mt 8²⁸, Mk 5¹, Lk 8²⁶), to Decapolis (Mk 7³¹), to the unknown Magadan (Mt 15³⁹) or Dalmanutha (Mk 8¹⁹), and Caesarea-Philippi (Mt 16¹³, Mk 8²⁷). (f) In regard to the region beyond the Jordan commonly known as Peræa, there are interesting notices, but some uncertainties. The first notice is in the account of John's baptism as taking place at Bethany beyond Jordan (Jn 1²⁸). Much later there was a ministry of uncertain duration in Peræa (Jn 10⁴⁰, Lk 13^{22. 32}), and still later a journey through the same region on His last visit to Jerusalem (Mt 19¹, Mk 10¹).

3. Labours.—The extent of our Lord's ministry is also to be regarded from the point of view of the labours He performed during its course. (a) The actual labours recorded by the Evangelists are considerable in sum. (b) That these were only samples and specimens of His work is distinctly and repeatedly implied. (c) Pointed allusions to the magnitude of His work are frequent (Mt 4²³⁻²⁵, Mk 1³²⁻³⁴, Lk 4^{14. 15}, and many similar passages). (d) There are many indications of the insistent demands upon His attention (e.g. Mk 1³⁵⁻³⁷ 21. 2 37^{-9. 20} and similar ones), of His weariness and need of rest (Jn 4⁶, Mk 4^{35ff.} 6³⁰⁻³², and others), once of the anxiety of His relatives (Mk 3^{21. 31}). (e) The enormous amount of His unrecorded labours is distinctly asserted (Jn 21²⁵).

iii. Results of our Lord's Ministry.—When we attempt to sum up the results of our Lord's ministry, we have to distinguish between those which were gathered during His life and those which have been maturing through the centuries following.

1. During His life.—Briefly, we should here have in mind: (a) the multitudes who were reached by His personal influence both in His teaching and His healing; (b) the number of particular adherents won, including the Twelve and all other disciples mentioned in the Gospels, together with those mentioned or alluded to in the early chapters of Acts; (c) the training of the Twelve for their work after His departure; and (d) the establishing of the institutions of the Kingdom of God—preaching, the ordinances, the Church.

2. Since His ascension.—The history of Christianity for nineteen centuries only partially describes the outcome of Christ's short ministry upon earth. It is indeed a commonplace, but withal a glorious truth, to say that no other term of service in any man's life, whether longer or shorter, was ever so potent an influence or so formative a force for all that is best in human affairs.

MINSTRELS.—See FLUTE-PLAYERS.

MINT (ῥόδισμον, mentha) is mentioned only in Mt 23²³ and the parallel passage Lk 11⁴², where it is represented as being subject to tithe. It is a familiar garden herb, belonging to the natural order Labiatæ. The species commonly grown in Palestine is horse-mint (M. sylvestris), and there can be little doubt that this is the mint of Scripture. It is extensively used for culinary purposes, and is also highly valued as a carminative. Mint was probably one of the 'bitter herbs' with which the Paschal lamb was eaten.

MIRACLES.—The process of thought and research, both theological and scientific, has led to a position where belief in the actuality, in the career of Jesus, of those remarkable activities and manifestations summed up under the comprehensive and popular term 'miracle,' is made possible if not inevitable. The prevailing negative attitude of science shows signs of being abandoned in view of enlarging understanding of the possibilities both in Matter and in Spirit, and theology is coming to see that the miraculous events recorded of Him who was the Son of God and the Regenerator of the Race must not be conceived of in any sense or degree a violation of the order of Nature; and that viewed in this way they become, instead of difficulties and stumbling-blocks in the way of faith, some of its most convincing reinforcements. It is scarcely too much to affirm that a belief in these occurrences as vital parts of the Christian revelation is rising, compared with which all previous belief is feeble and superficial. Without being unduly optimistic, we may anticipate that the 'ages of faith' in every department of Christian truth, and not least in that of miracle, are yet to come. This consummation is being prepared for in modern conceptions of the Order of Nature, of Human Personality, and of the Divine Being.

1. Modern conceptions of the Order of Nature. Christian advocates are becoming thoroughly disposed to accept unreservedly the scientific teaching of the Unity of Nature, carefully guarding the admission from being read as the Uniformity of Nature. They recognize and take account of the inalienable connexion between cause and effect by which the Universe consists. They do not regard the miracles of the Gospels as in the least degree arbitrary interruptions of the Order of Nature, but rather as a revelation of the infinite extent of that order. The ancient antagonism between the Natural and the Supernatural has broken down, and the two spheres are seen to be one, regarded from opposite poles. Grave objections lie against the term 'supernatural,' which is entirely un-Scriptural, and many modern thinkers prefer the term 'spiritual' to express the animating and sustaining Power which pervades all things. Without the spiritual the physical universe has no ground of being, and nothing exists, not the least fraction of the material, still less anything of human affection and sympathy and personal life-force, apart from the Universal Life. If the term 'supernatural' be retained, it must be on the distinct understanding that while all things may be conceived of as supernaturally sustained, it may with equal propriety be asserted that the whole Universe, including not only the physical but the mental, moral, and spiritual in human personality, is a part of the Order of Nature. The powers and sympathies that work in man cannot be separated from that order, and it is most natural, most agreeable to the whole constitution of human nature, that it shall be animated, sustained, and governed by the Divine Power and Life. Men of science, moreover, are increasingly willing to admit the necessity of the spiritual and rational as the ultimate ground of the physical; and recent investigations into the make of the so-called 'atom,' and the vast potentialities of Matter, will further develop the distrust of all dogmatic assertion that nothing in the nature of the events recorded in the Gospels and called 'miracles' is possible or credible. Sir Oliver Lodge (Hibbert Journal, October 1902) writes:

'The root question or outstanding controversy between science and faith rests upon two distinct conceptions of the universe: the one, that of a self-contained and self-sufficient universe, with no outlook into or links with anything beyond, uninfluenced by any life or mind except such as is connected with a visible and tangible material body; and the other conception, that of a universe lying open to all manner of spiritual influences, permeated through and through with a Divine spirit, guided and watched by living minds, acting through the medium of law indeed, but with intelligence and love behind the law; a universe by no means self-sufficient or self-contained, but with feelers at every pore groping into another supersensuous order of existence, where reign laws hitherto unimagined by science, but laws as real and as mighty as those by which the material universe is governed.'

2. The nature of Human Personality.—Researches, anthropological and psychological, into the nature and possibilities of man have greatly multiplied during the present generation, and something of the vast region of potentiality lying above and beneath and beyond all that is actually realized has been revealed. The conception of the ideal human personality has been immeasurably enlarged and exalted. Psychological investigation is only in its infancy, and yet enough has been arrived at to make it certain that the powers of humanity remain essentially unfathomed. Beneath or above the ordinary consciousness of man, and beyond the powers which at present his will controls and organizes, are other and larger powers at present uncontrolled and unorganized by the personal force, but manifest in exceptional phases of human life, such as dreams, hypnosis, clairvoyance, clairaudience, somnambulism, or unwonted excitement and spiritual exaltation. We may call man, as we are acquainted with him, a personality, a living centre of original will and action, made in the image of the Deity. But yet it is far truer to regard him as a personality which has not yet arrived, the mere rudiment of a personality whose powers, as he controls them, reach out beyond his control to regions of potentiality as yet unrecognized, and showing that the true personality is vastly greater and mightier than the present actual. 'Man partly is, and wholly hopes to be.' The powers at present possessed and controlled by man are the veriest suggestion of the powers that are his by right of nature, made as he was for intimate alliance with the Divine Being. But the perfect Personality was realized in the Son of Man who was also Son of God. The perfect Personality cannot be conceived of apart from the Divine Personality, for it is of the very essence of the Ideal Man that his nature shall be possessed and controlled by the Divine. By the Divine power the human nature consists. And the Lord Jesus plainly marked it as the essential condition of His power that He was morally and spiritually one with God.

3. The Divine Nature.—A wholesome feature of modern conceptions of the Being of God is their sense of mystery. Holding fast, on the one hand, to the essential knowableness of the Deity and to His self-revelation as the centre of all Divine action, theologians, on the other hand, admit the impossibility of giving dogmatic expression to the mode of the Divine Being. 'In mystery the soul abides,' not only the Divine but even the human soul. But taking the teaching of the Lord Jesus, interpreted as it was by His life before God and man, and as it is by an increasing Christian experience, they conceive of God as the Infinite Will and Intelligence that animates while it transcends the whole creation, visible and invisible, a Divine Presence ever seeking self-realization and self-revelation in His creation, in some true measure expressing Himself in all the works of His hands, even in the non-human creation; but most really of all in human life with its manifold sympathies and powers, actual and potential, conscious and sub-conscious (or super-conscious). The conception is of a Living God present and active in all life, but supremely in the nobler impulses and humanities that glorify mankind. In the life of men as they are, in their poor actual, the Divine Mind finds a real though feeble and fragmentary expression, and as that nature is developed and its latent powers are evoked and made part of the conscious life, is destined to find a fuller channel for its living action. And the nature which was fitted to be a complete channel, and more than channel—an active co-operator with Himself—the Divine Being, revealing Himself as Father, finds in Him who was perfectly one with man and at the same time morally, spiritually, and essentially one with God.

In this fact, that the Divine Power dwelt in its fulness in the personality of Jesus, we find the unifying principle for all the miracles of the Gospels. The master-principle of them all is contained in our Lord's own declaration, 'If I by the finger of God cast out devils, then is the kingdom of God come upon you' (Lk 11²⁰). This declaration is in complete harmony with His repeated affirmations that the ultimate power by which He wrought His beneficent and mighty works was the same as that by which He knew and taught the truth—the Divine power dwelling in Him (Jn 5^{19, 30} 14¹⁰).

The great deeds of healing and of revelation were due to the direct action of the Infinite Life and active Power by which all things consist (1) on the nature of Jesus, and (2) through Him, so empowered, upon the life of man and upon the world. Our Lord makes it perfectly plain that the miraculous deeds were morally conditioned, were therefore a moral achievement, and depended upon His living faith in and union with God. Of Himself He could do nothing (Jn 5¹⁹). But He also has the feeling and knowledge that in His own nature there was a potentiality of superhuman working. And the chief point to emphasize is that the Personality of Jesus cannot be conceived of even momentarily as apart from the Divine Life. He perfectly lived in God. The purpose of all was to accomplish the Divine will by the establishment of His Kingdom among men. Here and elsewhere the miracles are represented, not as an arbitrary putting forth of a supernatural power altogether out of relation to any human capacity or possibility, but as arising spontaneously out of the unique relation He sustained to the Infinite Life; not as something given, while it could have been withheld, for the sake of commending the moral and spiritual and personal claims of Jesus, but as vital and essential parts of the Divine Revelation. The evidential value of the work was secondary, the need of man and the Divine impulse primary.

In order to get an intelligent faith in the Gospel miracles, it is of great consequence at what point we approach the problem. The important matter is to begin with the less obscure, with those works which are most closely and obviously related to what may be called the innate forces of human nature. This gives us as our starting-point the healing works of Jesus. Careful study must be given to the principles and methods employed in these cases of restoration from sickness, infirmity, and distress. A growing disposition is evident to receive these as genuinely historical, on the ground that they are not in themselves inconceivable, related as they are to the forces perceived to be at work in the complex nature of man. Psychological research has brought, and is more fully bringing, to light a vast wealth of resource in the depths and heights of human personality. And a close study of the method of Jesus convinces us that He worked upon this complex nature (see art. CURES). His miracles were not simply the output of an alien force, but the living exercise of a Divine force, deeply akin to all human powers, already working in the capacities, sympathies, and lifeties of humanity, utilizing the known in all their unknown ramifications, and also the unknown and unsuspected. These works are no less Divine because they are not emphasized as supernatural, the Divine energy being more truly conceived of as the normal and natural. If these deepest principles which our Lord followed are duly recognized in our faith and conception, then the remaining miracles, most of which are rejected by many who receive the healings, become not only not incredible, but inevitable as the completion of a revelation otherwise essentially incomplete. One who has gained a rational and imaginative faith in the healing of body and mind, by the incarnate pity and power of God in Christ Jesus, will be prepared to believe that it is extremely unlikely that Christ should so freely reveal the power of God in this sphere, and not go beyond to give visible expression to the power that resides in and animates and at the same time controls all Nature. And those miracles which are associated with the life and career of Jesus, being wrought not so much by the power of our Lord, as by the Divine Power acting upon Him, have a strong presumption in their favour, congruous as they are with the whole method of His mighty works and with the one revelation given in Him.

A. MIRACLES OF JESUS.—1. Our Lord's own description of them.—A distinction must be made between what Jesus Himself said of the miracles and the description given by the people of the time, who were under the influence of low and vulgar ideas of a Divine revelation, and by the Evangelists, who were not altogether emancipated from current conceptions. (1) It must be borne in mind that the Synoptics give very few specific terms which our Lord applied to His own supernatural action. They are the record of His deeds, not of His speech concerning them. But the Evangelists' description may be taken without much deduction as a faithful reflexion of the Master's usage. Jesus does refer to His works, as in Mt 16⁹⁻¹⁰; He speaks of casting out demons by the Spirit of God (Mt 12²⁸) or by the finger of God (Lk 11²⁰), and declares that 'this kind' (ταῦτα δὲ τὸ γένος) goeth not out except by prayer (Mt 17²¹ TR). He refers to the deed itself and its blessed result, without characterizing it by any specific term. (2) His favourite term for them, according to the Fourth Gospel, was ἔργα, 'works' (Jn 5³⁶ 10^{25, 32, 37, 38}). He uses the same word also of the good and beautiful acts of others (καλὸν ἔργον, Mk 14⁶). He makes no great distinction between His ordinary works of mercy and the extraordinary, regarding them all alike as wrought simply and naturally in the way of His life and vocation. The miracles were not the highest works; they belong to a lower level of manifestation as compared with His moral and spiritual revelation of God (Jn 14¹¹). But He also qualifies ἔργα: 'the works that none other man did' (Jn 15²⁴), probably including under that category the healing and other mighty deeds. Utility was the chief element in His view of all His deeds and actions. (3) He also calls them δυνάμεις ('powers' or 'mighty works'), emphasizing the striking manifestation of Divine Power overpassing all human capacity (Mt 11²¹). The Evangelists also commonly employ this term (Mt 13⁵⁸, Mk 6⁵). (4) He also speaks of His works as σημεῖα, 'signs' (Jn 6²⁶), carefully separating Himself from the popular estimate of what constituted a Divinely significant act (see art. SIGN). The Fourth Gospel consistently applies this word to the works of Jesus. Probably we must see in the fact a feature due to prolonged reflexion on the events in the light of after-history. But the term is singularly fitting to describe the Divinely significant works of our Lord as signs of another and higher order of things, leading on the thought and imagination to higher spheres of being, fuller powers of soul, Diviner possibilities for humanity. (5) The word τέρατα ('prodigies') is never applied by Jesus to His own working. Only once He uses the word, and then to disavow the idea involved in it and to sever His action from it (Jn 4⁴⁸). In the Apocalyptic discourse these τέρατα are associated with false Christs and false prophets (Mt 24²⁴, Mk 13²²). (6) The popular use of σημεῖον was most akin to the τέρας. With this the English word 'miracle' has most affinity. It is not the equivalent of any word used by Jesus. The AV uses it to translate σημεῖον and δύναμις. The RV practically abandons it. The idea of the word 'supernatural' also is not found in the NT or in the whole Bible, and the term should be relegated to the region of the obsolete. The word 'spiritual' is an excellent substitute, conserving the idea expressed by it without committing the mind to any untenable and indefensible philosophy.

2. Characteristics of our Lord's miracles.—Briefly, the features of the miracles which commend them to our judgment and affection may be stated as—(1) Spontaneity. They arise out of the occasion—are never deliberated, unless the raising of Lazarus be an exception (Jn 11⁴), but spring from the present practical impulse of compassion and desire to help man, and the prompting of the Divine Spirit (Jn 2⁴⁵, Lk 18⁴⁰⁻⁴² etc.). (2) High moral purpose. The miracles of Jesus ever sought the highest and Divinest ends, and were never ends in themselves. In all His works there were no signs of any ostentatious exercise of power. Sternly He forbade any public advertisement of His healings, etc., which might rouse the popular excitement. (3) Strong restraint in use of supernatural power. The Temptation of the wilderness witnesses to what was characteristic of all His life, His constant refusal to use His power for personal ease, gratification, or convenience. Nothing was done by extraordinary which could be done by ordinary means. (4) Moral dignity and congruity with the whole spirit and life of Jesus. His miracles spring out of His innermost nature, and reveal the moral harmony and winsomeness of His Person. Herein lies a most fruitful comparison with other alleged miracles, ecclesiastical and mediæval and modern. The vast majority of these latter fail to commend themselves to us as worthy exercises of a Divine power. The criterion must not, however, be unduly pressed, for natures differ widely in what they regard as morally fitting and suitable for Divine action. But, employed broadly, it may help us to discriminate between alleged miraculous events as to how far they are worthy of credence. (5) Helpfulness to mankind was the abiding characteristic of our Lord's miracles. In most cases they were wrought for the immediate succour of suffering humanity, and for the revelation, in and through this, of the Divine love and pity. In His works on the non-human world also the need of man was continually served, more especially his need for vision of the higher facts of existence. His action never issued in meaningless marvels or needless wonders and in those that seem farthest removed from the requirements of mankind a revelation was given of the kind of power which animated and sustained all nature, and ordered its course.

3. The whole texture of the Gospel narratives is complicated with the supernatural. They presuppose a unique relation to God in Jesus, and His possession of a miracle-working power. 'In most of the reports the action of Jesus is so interwoven with unmistakably authentic words, that the two elements cannot be separated' (A. B. Bruce, art. 'Jesus' in Encyc. Bibl.). If excision be made from the Evangelic records (1) of all that directly narates His unique action as a healer and wonder-worker, (2) of all that presupposes the possibility and actuality of such unique action, (3) of all that testifies to His authority and power due to a unique relation to God—the Gospels are left bald and bare and mutilated beyond description. The very warp and woof of the fabric is destroyed.

As an example, apply the process to Mk 1-3. As a residue we have—

1. The account of the Baptist's preaching (without the reference to the prophetic witness).
2. The Baptism of John (robbed of the spiritual endowment of Jesus and its accompaniments).
3. The bare mention of a temptation in the wilderness (with angels excluded. The story cannot be filled up by reference to the other Evangelists, for their account presupposes a miracle-working power in Jesus).
4. John's imprisonment, and announcement of the Kingdom by Jesus.
5. Call of Peter, Andrew, James, and John.
6. Teaching of Jesus in the synagogue, and spread of His fame (the latter left like a pyramid on its apex without the restoration of the demoniac).
7. Entrance to house of Peter (healing of wife's mother excluded).
8. Account of solitary prayer (with no action of Jesus to account for such prolonged prayer).
9. Preaching in synagogue (mere repetition apart from healing of leper and casting out devil).
10. Account of sudden popularity (with no adequate reason given for it).
11. Another repetition of the statement that He taught the people (23-12 all being excised as entirely complicated with miracle).
12. Call of Matthew.
13. Conflict with scribes and Pharisees in regard to eating and drinking with publicans and sinners, and fasting, and His teaching consequent thereon.
14. Pharisees and Herodians take counsel to kill Him (but no reason given—the healing of withered hand being removed).
15. Withdrawal of Jesus (following by multitude being omitted because of motive given in v. 8).
16. Call of disciples (commission reduced to preaching and teaching. Teaching in 320-30 cut out as entirely dependent on His exorcism of demons).
17. Teaching of true relationship to Himself (strongly savouring of presumption, apart from reasons which have disappeared in process of excision).

The whole narrative is rendered colourless and dislocated, the only section which is left fairly un mutilated being 213-23. 'That the healing ministry was not only a fact, but a great outstanding fact, is attested by the popularity of Jesus and by the various theories which were invented to account for the remarkable phenomena' (A. B. Bruce, l.c.). The above analysis forcibly illustrates this assertion.

39. Cleansing of Temple	Mt.	Mk.	Lk.
40. Healing of Malchus	Mt.	Mk.	Lk.
41. Falling to ground of soldiers	Mt.	Mk.	Lk.

Examining the above list, we may remark—

(1) The same event is probably referred to in 2 and 39. Possibly also, but on the whole not probably, 3 and 14 refer to same healing.

(2) Instances which seem to come so near to familiar human experience as to need no assumption of miracle are 2, 4, 41.

(3) In 31 no indication is given that the command of Jesus was meant to be obeyed. It may readily have been understood by the disciple as a parabolic expression of the surety of providential care.

(4) Cases where the reporting of the healing is so casual that nothing as to the method of Jesus can be securely built upon the narrative are 10, 12, 33, 34, 40. The chief interest of the Evangelist lies in the other part of the story. In the case of Malchus, St. John, who reports the injury, makes no mention of any healing, and the interest of St. Luke is evangelical rather than medical, emphasizing the generosity and compassion of Jesus.

(5) 'Nature miracles' are found (a) in each period; (b) in the Fourth Gospel; (c) in the Synoptic tradition, both in the Double and Triple Synopsis. They are therefore as well attested as the works of healing. The walking on the sea is found in the Double Synopsis; the stilling of the storm and the withering of the fig-tree in the Triple Synopsis; the feeding of the multitude in all four Gospels.

(6) The healings of nervous diseases, which many are more willing to accept on the ground of their likeness to well-known medical facts of to-day, are not better attested than those involving physical disorder and disease. The healings of fever, leprosy, issue of blood, and blindness are all recorded in the Triple Synopsis. The raising of the dead is found in all four Gospels; one case, the daughter of Jairus, is attested by the three Synoptics. The NT makes no distinction between these classes of miracles, but the evidence for all the classes is equally strong (see art. CURES, § 11).

5. Classification of miracles of Jesus. — As a typical example of the customary classification of miracles, may be given that of Westcott (Introd. to the Gospels)—

I. Miracles on Nature. 1. Miracles of creative power: (α) water made wine, (β) bread multiplied, (γ) walking on the water. 2. Miracles of Providence: (α) miracles of blessing: (1) first draught of fishes, (2) storm stilled, (3) stater in fish's mouth, (4) second draught of fishes; (β) Miracle of judgment: withering of fig-tree.

II. Miracles on Man. (α) Miracles of personal faith: (1) organic defects (blind): (a) faith special (Mt 9²⁹⁻³¹), (b) faith absolute—Bartimeus restored; (2) chronic impurity: (a) open (leprosy)—faith special, the one leper—faith special and absolute contrasted, the ten lepers; (b) secret—woman with issue. (β) Miracles of intercession: (1) organic defects (simple intercession): (a) the blind (Mk 8²²⁻²⁶), (b) the deaf and dumb (Mk 7³¹⁻³⁷); (2) mortal sicknesses—intercession based on natural ties: (a) fever (Jn 4⁴⁶⁻⁵⁴), (b) paralysis—centurion's servant and man borne of four. (γ) Miracles of love: (1) organic defect—blindness (Jn 9); (2) disease—(a) fever, (b) dropsy, (c) withered hand, (d) impotent man, (e) woman with spirit of infirmity; (3) death—(a) death chamber, (b) the bier, (c) the tomb.

III. Miracles on Spirit World. (α) Miracles of intercession: (1) simple intercession—(a) dumb man with devil, (b) blind and dumb man; (2) intercession based on natural ties—(a) Syro-Phoenician's daughter, (b) lunatic boy. (β) Miracles of antagonism: (1) in synagogue—unclean spirit cast out, (2) in tombs—the lepers cast out.

The chief defect in the above is its endorsement of the term 'Nature miracles' as applied to the first class. If 'Nature' be rightly measured, the term may legitimately be used to cover the whole ground of our Lord's working, for the complex nature of man cannot be severed from the universal order. Moreover, the distinction is, apart from that consideration, an arbitrary one, for several of these so-called 'Nature miracles' are wrought in the sphere of our Lord's human nature, and are conceivably extensions of human, mental, and psychical faculty; and some of them are wrought in and upon the bodily form of Jesus Himself. The walking upon the water is an example of the latter. The draught of fishes is a miracle of vision, an extension of human perception, as well as an example of Divine control of the animal creation. A similar element must be traced in the instance of the coin in the fish's mouth, if we are to understand a miracle here.* Other defects are: 'Miracles of Providence,' 'Miracles of Blessing' and of 'Love,' are terms that may be applied to other than the classes given.

A truer classification may be suggested as follows:

I. Healings of bodily ailments—as blindness, leprosy, lameness, dropsy, deafness and dumbness, fevers, and manifold ailments and infirmities.

II. Healings of nervous diseases—as paralysis or palsy, simple epilepsy, possibly the woman with the spirit of infirmity (unless her ailment be physical).

III. Healings of nervous and psychical disorders—epilepsy associated with idioey or insanity, and varieties of mania.

In the above, noteworthy facts are—
 (1) Only one Evangelist in each case records 3, 4, 5, 10, 13. Number 10 stands by itself, and is not found in other Gospels, although these speak of the rending of the veil of the Temple. The latter event (11) is also possibly an accompaniment of the remarkable physical phenomena 12 and 13, which were associated with the time of our Lord's death. 1, 2, 12 are recorded by two Evangelists only.

(2) While the historicity, as objective events, of 1, 3, 4, 6, 7 cannot be reasonably denied with any dogmatism, especially if the principles enunciated above be intelligently accepted, yet we are free to admit that they are such as were not unlikely to be added to the Gospel tradition by disciples and by the first Christian community, who were not entirely freed from Jewish prepossessions (see art. SIGN). It would be grossly disproportionate to give the same weight of authority to the details of the Birth, Baptism, and Death of Jesus as to the personal experience which He underwent, and to the significance of the Incarnation, Spiritual Endowment, and Atonement for human salvation.

(3) The Voice at the Baptism is well attested, but it is not clear if we are taught to regard it as more than subjective to Jesus Himself. Mt. and Mark seem to attribute the whole experience—the vision of the opening heaven, the seeing of the dove, the hearing of the voice—to Jesus; and the Baptist's vision of the Descent (Jn 1³²) may express his special insight into the whole event as it affected our Lord at that critical time and experience. It is noteworthy that Luke simply records the facts.

(4) The chief events that demand consideration are the Virgin-birth, the Transfiguration, the Resurrection, and the Ascension, for which we must refer to the separate articles on these subjects.

C. MIRACLES WROUGHT IN THE NAME OF JESUS BY HIS FOLLOWERS.—The Evangelists make it plain that the disciples and other followers of Jesus were commissioned by the Master to go forth in His name to combine healing and exorcism with the teaching and preaching of the gospel (Mt 10¹⁻⁷⁻⁸, Mk 3¹⁴⁻¹⁶ 6⁷, Lk 10⁹). They also declare that a signal success was achieved by the Seventy, for they return to Jesus rejoicing greatly in the power of His name, extending even to the control of the evil spirits (Lk 10¹⁷). Of this great success our Lord was aware, and it became to Him the occasion of a spiritual exultation, in which He saw, as already accomplished, the downfall of the Satanic power with all its accompanying ills and afflictions of mankind (Lk 10¹⁸).

The evidence favours the idea that Jewish exorcists had a certain measure of success in their arts, even although much charlatanism may be believed to have mingled with their practices. The names they invoked, including the Ineffable Name, together, no doubt, with the drastic physical remedies they applied, were possibly efficacious in some cases (Mt 12²⁷, Lk 9⁴⁹). And we may be confident that the Name of Jesus, which was of vast import and of awful and mysterious significance (especially after the Resurrection), would make for healing and for liberating disordered minds and evil-controlled natures. There is reason, also, to make a distinction between these healings and exorcisms and the other works of Jesus, for nothing is said of these latter supernatural powers being possessed by the disciples and first Christians. It must also be remembered that St. Paul's Epistles are clear witness to somewhat kindred phenomena having been experienced in the Charismata of Apostolic circles (1 Co 12, etc.). The closing section of Mark's Gospel, too, is a reflexion of 2nd century belief in the continuance of these miraculous endowments among the Apostles. Coming down to sub-Apostolic times, the evidence is too strong to be discredited that the same powers together with prophecy were familiar to those generations; and the question cannot be entirely avoided, as to whether we have any sufficient reason to draw the line at the close of this age, or, with other apologists, at the time of Constantine, and declare that, beyond it, all assertions of a manifest and direct Divine action through any servant of Christ are due to chicanery, or illusion, ignorance, or superstition.

If this question be left sub judice, and the story of the Christian Church of the following centuries be read without prepossession, an impression may well be produced that some of the alleged supernatural phenomena are far too well attested to be scornfully and summarily dismissed. In all generations of the Christian era, certain natures, specially God-sensitive, conspicuously consecrated to God and sympathetic with man and with all living things, appear to have wielded a real though imperfect control over the physical processes of life. Both through them and in them remarkable forces have been at work which we cannot but believe are God-sustained and God-energized, producing supernatural phenomena. In regard to all these, as well as to kindred manifestations of modern times, the right attitude is that of a watchful but unprejudiced and patient examination. Forces that make for healing undoubtedly lie in human nature, in certain gifted souls, and in others not conspicuously gifted spiritually, but 'sensitives'; and in times of great spiritual awakening, when the sense of the reality of the Unseen and Divine is quickened and God's presence is freshly and acutely realized, startling manifestations of these sub-conscious or super-conscious forces may occur, and need not surprise any who understand how closely the Divine power has access to all forces of human life. Such phenomena, and indeed all things that belong to the human race, must not be met with a non possumus, but with careful, scientific, and withal reverent, investigation. The miracles of Jesus are available as a criterion, and basing our judgment upon them we may demand: (1) an adequate and worthy moral purpose to be served [this must be clearly distinguished from personal or ecclesiastical convenience, advantage, or ambition, traces of which, together with offerings at the shrine of the saint, discredit so many mediæval miracles]; and (2) a proper moral dignity—in which many alleged workings of the thaumaturgist are conspicuously wanting. It is by no means easy to say how far healings and other powers kindred to those wrought by Jesus are meant to be expected in our human life on earth. It seems natural to make a distinction between the healings and other restorations from human infirmity on the one hand, and works of revelation in the non-human sphere. The latter may not be expected in this earthly scene, although they point to large powers of soul in the evolution of our psychical capacities in some further stages of being. But the healings and exorcisms we have good reason to expect among men on earth; for in all investigation and experiment and self-devoted labour, in all spiritual prayer and aspiration for the physical, mental, and eternal welfare of the race, His presence is ever active who said, 'Lo, I am with you always.'

MIRACULOUS CONCEPTION.—See VIRGIN-BIRTH.

MISSION.—The following article deals with the mission of the Lord Jesus Christ only as presented in the Gospel narratives. The Lord Jesus frequently manifested consciousness of being commissioned by God. Now the general (πέμπω) and now the specific term (ἀποστέλλω) for sending is used in reference to His work, the latter word signifying an intimate connexion between sender and sent (Cremer, p. 529). As God's trusted messenger He felt that there was a decree (δεί) for Him to execute (Lk 2⁴⁹ 4⁴³ 9²² etc.), that He had His Father's authority (Jn 5⁴³ 8⁴²), and that as the Father had sanctified Him and sent Him into the world (Jn 10³⁶), it was not for Him to do His own pleasure (6³⁸). The Fourth Evangelist, deeply impressed with the idea of the commission received by his Lord, mentions the fact repeatedly, and in one place stops to brood over the mere name of a place because it suggests a mission (9⁷). Instead of considering Himself as being merely one among a number of Divine messengers, Jesus knew Himself to be the Messenger-Son (Mk 12⁶ 7). The Lord's consciousness refers to (1) the objects of His mission, (2) the means to be adopted to gain His wondrous ends, (3) the extent, and (4) the credentials of His mission.

1. The objects of the mission.—These are exhibited in various forms. Prophecy has to be fulfilled (Mk 12¹⁰ 11 14²¹ 27. 49, Lk 4²¹ 10²⁴ 24²⁷, Jn 5⁴⁶ 13¹⁸). It is the function of Jesus to be the King (Ps 2), the Son of Man (Ps 8, Dn 7¹³ 14), the Servant of Jehovah (Is 42. 53), the founder of a New Covenant (Jer 31³¹⁻³⁴); and thus to glorify God (Jn 12²⁸ 17⁴) and save men (Mt 1²¹, Lk 2¹¹ 10¹⁹, Jn 3¹⁷ 10¹⁰ 12⁴⁷ 17² 20³¹) by attracting men to Himself (Mt 11²⁸, Jn 5⁴⁰ 12³²) and by giving Himself as a sacrifice (Mk 10⁴⁵, Jn 1²⁹ 6⁵¹ 10¹⁵ 12³⁴).

2. Means to the ends of the mission.—The nature of these aims required that the Heavenly Apostle (He 3¹) should manifest the Kingdom and the character of God, together with the greatness of man's calling. The sacrificial death at Calvary sums up all the revelations. The speech, the life, the death of the Lord Jesus are the means whereby He discharges His unique mission to mankind.

(a) To succeed, it was imperative that Jesus should ensure the recognition of the sovereignty of God. The Kingdom of God must be established upon the earth (Mt 4⁷, Lk 19¹¹). Where there are minds that gladly defer to God's will, there the Kingdom is. Submission may be incomplete (Mt 13²⁴⁻³⁰, 47, 48) and transient (vv. 20-22). In Jesus alone were the claims of God fully and constantly heeded: therefore the leadership of men is His prerogative (Mt 23¹⁰). He called men to Himself in order to make them loyal to the heavenly throne. God's subjects renounce evil habits (Mt 4¹⁷), enjoy pardon (Lk 24⁴⁷), possess sincerity (Mt 7²¹⁻²⁷), are plastic and trustful as children (Mt 18²⁻⁴, Lk 18^{16, 17}, Jn 3³), are willing to render costly service in meekness (Mt 20²⁵⁻²⁸); they transcend national distinctions (Mt 8¹¹) and set all interests below those of the Kingdom (Mt 6³³, 13^{45, 46}, Lk 9⁵⁷⁻⁶², 18²⁹⁻³⁰). The presence of the Kingdom is known by its conquering power (Lk 11²⁰). Its growth cannot be accounted for unless the activities of God are adduced; albeit man's co-operation is required (Mk 4²⁶⁻²⁹). A river (as the Nile) may not originate in the land that it waters, and yet may be indispensable thereto; similarly Christ's Kingdom is the blessing the world needs most, and its coming must be uppermost in prayerful minds (Mt 6^{9, 10}), yet it takes its rise in the unseen heaven (Jn 18³⁶). Diseases, defects, excrescences of all kinds—physical, mental, spiritual—are foreign elements (Mt 13^{27, 28}, Lk 13¹⁶). It was the function of the Lord Jesus to reveal verbally and in His life the nature of God's reign. His loving and unswerving devotion to the Father's will is the central orb of the moral world, and all human wills should be planets ruled and lighted by His filial homage. Union with Him, harmony with Him, would bring about union and harmony among the races of mankind, and earth according to the great prayers (Mt 6^{9, 10}, Jn 17^{20, 21}), would be a province of heaven. In all its particulars—its purity, might, obedience, joyful loyalty, friendliness, prayerfulness, catholicity—the Kingdom of God is the life of Christ expanded. It was His task to give mankind, on the scale of His earthly experience, a clear and distinct conception of subjection to the authority of God. The Kingdom is where He is; it is He working through the wills, intellects, affections of His people. The laws of the Kingdom are those to which Christ conformed His purposes and deeds. The Beatitudes (Mt 5¹⁻¹²) are songs that first were sung in His own heart. Hence a description of the Kingdom is a description of the character of Jesus from the point of view belonging to duty and common service. If the precepts of the gospel—which were indeed citations from His own book of life as child, friend, artizan, preacher, sacrifice—were heeded in home and Church and State, we should see the Kingdom of God an organism with Christ as its soul, devout, righteous, beneficent.

(b) He to whom the human will ought to be surrendered must be known to be supremely worthy of reverence, trust, and love. Inasmuch, then, as knowledge of God is essential to eternal life, it was one of the aims of Christ to impart this knowledge (Jn 17³). God had often been represented as the Father of the Chosen People, and here and there individuals had thought themselves to be sons of God; but in the teachings of Jesus the Divine Fatherhood is asserted and illustrated so copiously, that some chapters of the Gospels consist almost solely of variations to the music of these good tidings (Mt 5. 6. 7). Jesus made men think of God trustfully as well as reverently, with love as well as with awe. The revelation could be made only by the Son of God (Mt 11²⁷, Lk 10²²), and it was contained in Himself (Jn 1¹⁸, 14⁷⁻¹⁰). The love and obedience of the Son have as their counterparts the Father's love and instructions; and so the paternal and the filial dispositions are mutually illuminating. The purposes of the Father are executed by the Son, and therefore to come to Jesus, to receive and honour Him, are acts that reach to God (Lk 9⁴⁸, Jn 5^{22, 23}, 13²⁰). The message is the Messenger. Not merely does a veil fall from before the Divine character; for Jesus, standing where the veil had stood, manifests the eternal righteousness and pitying love that cannot be content unless men are rescued from unrighteousness and wrath. Salvation is man's progressive advance (Jn 17³ γινώσκω) to God, his growing communion with the Father, his increasing faith, love, and reverence. The Saviour invites men to come by penitence and trust to Himself, that they may become one with Him and, through Him, with the Father (Mt 11²⁸, Jn 17²¹), whose holiness He discloses.

(c) The fulfilment of Christ's mission required the revelation of man. What is the moral condition of men? What is man in God's idea? What can make man's sin to be seen and hated? What can make God's thought and purpose concerning man attractive to sinners? Inasmuch as penitence, faith, hope, love are essential elements of a true life, to create them was included in Christ's gracious task. To produce the consciousness of guilt was an indispensable preliminary. His speech made sin exceeding sinful, and in His conduct there were presented such contrasts to man's misdoings that the evils were exposed. A sense of sin actually was produced (Lk 5⁸, 7^{37ff.}, 19⁷⁻⁸), and men learned to trust God's Son and to desire to be taught His life (Lk 11¹). He encouraged men to hope that His experience of pleasing the Father (Jn 8²⁹) might become theirs, seeing that they could become as intimately related to Him as the branches are related to the vine (15¹⁻⁸). The appearance of the Son of Man was a gospel, because, while it condemned sin, it affirmed moral evil to be an intrusion into man's nature, and it invited the sinful to receive forgiveness and enter into union with that victorious life which from the first had overcome the world (Mt 4¹⁻¹¹, Jn 8²⁹, 16³³, 17⁴). Corrupted man rejected and killed the Holy One, thereby disclosing human guilt and need; man, as God intended him to be, and as he may become by 'believing in him' (Jn 2¹¹, 3¹⁶), is revealed in Christ's meekness, devoutness, filial obedience and fraternal service. 'The Son of God' gives men authority to become God's sons (1^{12, 13}), thereby causing men fully to unfold their manhood.

(d) The mission of the Saviour involved His death.—His death was a chief part of His work. The Evangelists record sayings which prove that the great sacrifice was present to our Lord's mind at an early stage of His ministry, so that there is no need to regard the explicit references to the death by violence made near Caesarea Philippi (Mk 8^{31ff.}) as indicating a new outlook to the Lord's own mind. The tragic note that is heard early in the Fourth Gospel (2¹⁹⁻²¹, 3^{14, 15}, 6⁵¹) is not left to the last in the Synoptic accounts (Mt 9¹⁵, Mk 2^{19, 20}, Lk 5^{34, 35}). Moreover, the saving purpose of the sacrifice (Mt 26²⁸, Mk 10⁴⁵, 14²⁴, Jn 10¹¹, 12^{28, 24, 32, 33}), its necessity (δεῖ Mk 8³¹, Lk 24²⁶), and its voluntary character (Mt 26⁵³, Jn 10¹⁸), are affirmed. 'Through death to life' is illustrated in His experience. The enjoyment by Him of a fuller life in countless redeemed ones is conditional upon His uttermost self-renunciation (Jn 12²⁴). The life of the Saviour passes to men through His surrender, and it enters into them so far as they adopt its principle. The way of sacrifice is thus the way whereby the Saviour gives and the saved receive (Mt 16^{24, 25}). The New Covenant (Jer 31³¹⁻³⁴) is connected with the shedding of the Lord's blood (Lk 22²⁰), and it is necessary that the saved should participate in this fundamental law of Christ's being (Jn 6⁵³⁻⁵⁷). It was the Son's gracious will to come to earth on an errand which meant exposure to temptation (and therefore exposure to the possibility that He might not return to heaven) in order to destroy sin and to allure mankind to the paths of rectitude and peace. It was not the purpose of the Lord to ascend to God unless He could do so as the head of a new race,—a race healed (Jn 3^{14, 15}), vivified and nourished by His sacrificial offering (6⁵¹⁻⁵⁸). This death, with its victory over death, and its sequel—the return to the Father—were intended to provide, through the gift of the Holy Spirit, those saving resources whereby the true life is initiated (16⁷⁻¹¹) and sustained (14^{16, 26} 15²⁶ 16¹³⁻¹⁵).

3. The extent of Christ's mission.—While the regeneration of men was His first concern, His numerous miracles evince His care for man's physical needs. As all departments of life were to be purified and enriched by His example and teaching, so all men were to feel that they could be saved by His grace. It has been supposed that Jesus had no outlook beyond the Chosen People, and that the universalism of the Gospels is an interpolation; the catholicity which the Church subsequently manifested being read back into the teachings of the Lord. This conjecture is applied to the Fourth Gospel, to the world-wide commission (Mt 23¹⁸⁻²⁰, Mk 16¹⁵), and to the universalism of St. Luke. True it is that at first the area of labour was restricted (Mt 15²⁴), but this was a necessity of the situation, and is no indication that the Gentiles were to be excluded from salvation. Sin is not local or racial, and Jesus hated it; and man, as man, was loved by Him. Any devout Jew would think that somehow the Gentiles were to reap advantage from the Messianic reign (Lk 2³⁰⁻³²), and though it was deemed absurd to suppose that preference could be given by the Messiah to heathen men (Jn 7²⁵), even the Pharisees were zealous in making proselytes (Mt 23¹⁵). Why should it be thought incredible that Jesus hoped ultimately to win men of all nations? Was not exclusiveness distressing to Him? Was He not ready with a reference to mercies granted to the woman of Zarephath and to Naaman the Syrian (Lk 4²⁵⁻²⁷)? The outer court of the Temple was the only part of the sacred structure to which a Gentile had access, and all the Evangelists report that Jesus insisted that this enclosure should be kept clean and quiet 'for all the nations' (Mt 21¹²⁻¹³, Mk 11¹⁵⁻¹⁷, Lk 19^{45, 46}, Jn 21¹⁴⁻¹⁶). Jesus rejoiced in the centurion's faith—not found by Him in Israel (Lk 7⁹), and the Syrophenician woman cheered His heart by her trust and loving ingenuity (Mt 15²³). At first the disciples were forbidden to preach to Samaritans (Mt 10⁶), though, when they were fully equipped, the restriction was withdrawn (Ac 1⁸): He Himself laboured in Samaria (Lk 9⁵¹⁻⁵⁶, Jn 4), and called attention to the beneficence of one Samaritan (Lk 10³³⁻³⁵), and to the faith and gratitude of another (17¹⁵⁻¹⁹). It is quite in harmony with the Saviour's love for the outcast and despised, the publicans and sinners amongst the Jews (Mt 9¹³, Lk 7³⁷⁻⁵⁰ 15^{1, 27}, 18⁹⁻¹⁴ 19¹⁻¹⁰), that He should foresee the approach of all men to Himself (Jn 12³²), and anticipate a time when He should be the Shepherd of one flock consisting of sheep gathered from far and near (10¹⁶). The interest manifested by the Magi (Mt 2) and by the Greeks (Jn 12^{20, 21}) is not alien to Christ's mission. Moreover it is clearly declared that strangers will become workers in the vineyard (Mt 21⁴¹), and that before His throne all nations are to be assembled for judgment (Mt 25³¹⁻³²). 'The Saviour of the world' (Jn 4⁴²) has grace and power wherewith to meet the needs which belong to every man in every age and country; for He is the Light (1⁹ 8¹² 9⁵ 12⁴⁶), the Water (4¹⁰ 7³⁷), the Bread (6^{35, 45-51}), the Life (11²⁵ 14⁶).

4. Credentials of the mission.—Jesus entered upon His task with the confidence that He was anointed with the Holy Spirit (Lk 4¹⁸). John the Baptist declared that he saw the Spirit descending upon Jesus, and that he had been prepared for this sign (Jn 1^{33, 34}). The testimony thus borne by the last of the Old Covenant prophets is referred to by the Saviour together with other credentials,—as the witness of His works, that of the Father and that of the Scriptures (Jn 5³²⁻⁴⁷). Messengers came from the Machærus prison, saying, 'John the Baptist hath sent us unto thee, saying, Art thou he that cometh, or look we for another?' In that hour Jesus wrought miracles which He adduced, together with His habit of announcing good tidings to the poor, as proofs of His Messiahship (Lk 7¹⁸⁻²³). The deeds were signs (σημεία) that the Divine messenger could quicken body and soul (Mk 5^{41, 42}, Lk 7^{14, 15}, Jn 11^{25, 33, 44}); cure physical and spiritual diseases; render efficient withered powers (Mk 3¹⁻⁵, Jn 5²⁻⁹); add faculties, contrary to what might be expected, as in the case of the man born blind (Jn 9); redress evils caused by circumstances—for instance the fever due to the Capernaum district—(Lk 4^{38, 39}); cleanse all the fountains of life, as in cures wrought for lepers (Mk 1⁴⁰⁻⁴², Lk 17¹²⁻¹⁴); bestow abilities, receptive (Mk 8²²⁻²⁵) and communicative (Mt 9^{32, 33}). While the miracles were wrought in pure kindness, they afforded evidences to the thoughtful of the validity of Christ's claims (Jn 3² 7³¹ 10^{37, 38} 14¹¹ 15²⁴), and they were intended by the Lord to give assurance to men of His redeeming grace (Mk 2^{10, 11}). The very term employed for saving processes (σώσω) will serve equally for temporal and spiritual blessings (Mt 1²¹, Mk 10²⁶, Lk 7⁵⁰, Jn 3¹⁷), even as the Worker shows Himself in reference both to the inner and the outer life to be the Great Physician (Mk 2¹⁷). Some persons were allowed to have extraordinary aid to the belief that Jesus came from God, for they were with Him when He was transfigured, and heard a voice saying, 'This is my Son, my chosen: hear ye him' (Lk 9³⁵); nevertheless there was adequate support for the faith of all men in the remarkable interest Jesus took in the neglected (Lk 7^{22, 23} 15¹⁵), in His readiness to pray (Jn 17¹) and to serve (Mk 6³⁴, cf. v. 31), and in the union of qualities of character which are rarely found together. The credentials of Christ's mission are in Himself. The grandeur and simplicity of His life, the meek and beneficent use of marvellous powers, the sinless One's friendship with sinners, the strength and gentleness, the zeal and patience, the ardour and purity of His character—prove that He came forth from the Father (Jn 6^{68, 69} 16²⁷). Believers in Him discover with more and more clearness, as they trust Him more and more fully, that His gracious promises are fulfilled. He is to their consciences the Goodness,—to their intellects the Truth,—to their hearts the supreme Beauty, the Way, the Truth, the Life.

LITERATURE.—Cremer, Lex. s. v. ἀποστολλών; Wendt, Teaching of Jesus, ii. 184 ff. W. J. HENDERSON.

MISSIONS.—1. The prophetic background.—The missionary spirit and aims of Christianity have their beginnings in the history, literature, and character of the Jewish people. The OT, especially in the portions which express the ideals and spirit of prophecy, is full of principles and promises which find their fulfilment in the world-wide mission of Christianity (Horton, The Bible as a Missionary Book). The proselytizing energy of the Jews in the last cent. B.C. and in the time of our Lord ('Ye compass sea and land to make one proselyte,' Mt 23¹⁵) is a partial outcome of ideas and instincts which were long inherent in the race. These wide and lofty prophetic aims had to struggle against particularist tendencies, which made the Jews one of the most narrow and exclusive of the racess of mankind. It is one of the paradoxes of history, that the missionary propaganda which aimed at the conversion and blessing of the world, sprang from a people whose predominant characteristics were pride in racial privileges, expectation of national greatness, and contempt for all who were not of the seed of Abraham. But the missionary activities and aims of Christianity cannot be rightly understood apart from the gradual development of missionary ideas which took place in the course of Jewish history. The words applied to John the Baptist in relation to Christ might be applied to the Jewish race, 'Behold, I send my messenger before thy face, which shall prepare thy way before thee' (Mk 1²). These germinal missionary conceptions and movements found their end and fulfilment in the Person and work of Jesus Christ, and in the work which He originated. He absorbed and enlarged them, giving them such definiteness and fulness that they appear to be derived entirely from Him; for the spirit, aims, and motives of missions are distinctively Christian, and Christianity is essentially a missionary religion.

2. The missionary character of our Lord.—He regarded Himself as a missionary. At the beginning of His work in Galilee He applied to Himself the words of Isaiah (61¹), 'The spirit of the Lord God is upon me, because he hath anointed me to preach the gospel to the poor, he hath sent me to heal the brokenhearted,' etc. (Lk 4^{18, 19}). He frequently describes Himself as one 'who was sent,' as when He says, 'he that receiveth me, receiveth him that sent me' (τὸν ἀποστείλαντά με, Mt 10⁴⁰); 'as the living Father hath sent me' (ἀπέστειλέν με, Jn 6⁵⁷); 'the Father which hath sent me' (ὁ πέμψας με, Jn 6⁴⁴). The references to His being 'sent' are most frequent in John.

It may be remarked that the verb ἀποστέλλειν is applied to Jesus 17 times in Jn, and 10 times in the Synoptics, while τίμιτιν is applied to Him 25 times in Jn., but only once in the Synoptics. The distinction between the two verbs is slight. In most cases in the Gospels τίμιτιν applies to the sender and ἀποστέλλειν to the person sent (cf. 'Neither is he that is sent (ἀποστολος) greater than he that sent (τιμιτιν) him,' Jn 13¹⁶); but the distinction is not always followed (cf. 'As thou hast sent (ἀπιστιλας) me into the world, even so have I also sent (ἀπιστιλας) them into the world' (Jn 17¹⁸). Wilke and Grimm distinguish τίμιτιν as the general term, which may imply accompaniment (as when the sender is God), while ἀποστέλλειν includes a reference to equipment, and suggests official or authoritative sending). But the frequency with which both words are applied to Jesus in the Gospels (at least 53 times in all) is an emphatic indication of the missionary character of His work. (Under this heading it is not necessary to discuss the distinctive aims and character of His mission. See artt. KINGDOM OF GOD, ETERNAL LIFE, SALVATION).

3. In the call and training of the disciples the missionary idea is also strongly emphasized. They were to be 'fishers of men' (Mk 1¹⁷ || Mt 4¹⁹). Jesus ordained them that 'they might be with him, and that he might send them forth to preach' (κηρύσσειν, Mk 3¹⁴). The training was not only educative but practical. After a period of private intercourse He sent the Twelve forth two by two, as heralds to proclaim (κηρύσσειν) that 'the kingdom of heaven (or of God) was at hand' (Mk 6⁷ || Mt 10⁵⁻⁷ || Lk 9²). There is recorded by Lk. (10¹⁻¹⁷) another mission of Seventy, also sent forth two and two, who were to go with the same message to every city and place to which He Himself was about to come. From the words 'also others' ([καὶ] ἑτέροις, Lk 10¹) it is probably to be understood that the Twelve were not included in this mission. In both missions of the disciples, the work they had to do was evangelistic in relation to the people, and educative in relation to themselves. There may have been other missions which have not been recorded, for Mk. uses the suggestive phrase, 'He began to send them forth two by two' (6⁷); but the influence of such work on the training of the disciples, especially in giving them a firm grasp of the gospel they had to preach, is incalculable. Not a little of the teaching of Jesus which we have in the Gospels may have taken its present shape from the frequent repetition of their message.

4. The limits within which the personal work of Jesus was confined were declared by Himself: 'I am not sent but unto the lost sheep of the house of Israel' (Mt 15²⁴). During the time of His personal ministry the work of the disciples was similarly limited. In sending them forth, He said, 'Go not into the way of the Gentiles, and into any city of the Samaritans enter ye not: but go rather to the lost sheep of the house of Israel' (Mt 10^{6, 8}). This restriction, given at such a time, is of great importance, for it is an indication that the idea of a mission outside the bounds of the Jewish people was in the minds of the disciples when they were sent out on their first missionary journey. The restriction would have been needless if the disciples had not thought of such a mission as a possibility. It is an entire misreading of the Gospel history to imagine that the glorious conception of a world-wide mission was an afterthought, which only occurred to the disciples, or was suggested to them, after the resurrection of our Lord. The limitations which were so carefully laid down were temporary, and were evidently regarded as temporary. Even in declaring that He was sent but to the lost sheep of the house of Israel, He had also said, 'Let the children first be filled' (Mk 7⁷). The reasons for the limitation were adequate. The disciples had to be fully trained; the Kingdom of God had to be preached to the people who had been disciplined by the providence of God to receive it; the gospel had to be completed by the full disclosure of the redemption of grace, in the death and resurrection of the Saviour.

5. Indications of a world mission in the teaching of Jesus.—Apart from the essentially universal character of the gospel, which inevitably involved a universal mission, there are indications that the world-wide view was brought before the minds of the disciples prior to the time when the great commission was given. The disciples were to be 'the salt of the earth' and 'the light of the world' (Mt 5^{13, 14}). When Jesus praised the faith of the centurion of Capernaum, He said, 'Many shall come from the east and from the west, and shall sit down with Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob in the kingdom of God' (Mt 8¹¹; cf. also the same passage in Lk. in another connexion, where He adds, as if in reference to the preference which the Jews had received, 'Behold there are last which shall be first, and there are first which shall be last,' Lk 13^{29, 30}). So also, when defending the woman who had anointed Him with the box of ointment, He said, 'Verily I say unto you, Whosoever this gospel shall be preached in the whole world, this . . . shall be told for a memorial of her' (Mt 26¹³). Then He warned the disciples, saying, 'Ye shall be brought before governors and kings for my sake, for a testimony against them and the Gentiles' (Mt 10¹⁸). Many of the parables have references to or suggestions of a future extension of work among the Gentiles. In the interpretation of the parable of the Tares (one of the earlier parables) it is said that 'the field is the world' (Mt 13³⁸). In the later series of parables, as in that of the Vineyard and the Husbandmen, it is said, 'The kingdom of God shall be taken away from you, and shall be given to a nation bringing forth the fruits thereof' (Mt 21⁴³); in the Marriage Feast the direction is found, 'Go ye . . . into the highways, and as many as ye shall find, bid to the marriage' (Mt 22⁹, Lk 14²³); in the Sheep and the Goats there is a picture of the judgment of 'all nations' (Mt 25³²). Direct intimations of a world mission are not wanting, as in the apocalyptic discourses in the Synoptics, which are prefaced with a declaration of the destruction of the Temple ('There shall not be left one stone upon another which shall not be thrown down,' Mt 24², Mk 13², Lk 21⁶), and contain the announcement that 'this gospel of the kingdom shall be preached in all the world, for a witness to all the nations' (Mt 24¹⁴ || Mk 13¹⁰). In the Fourth Gospel the evidence of a world view as part of the instruction given to the disciples is very plain. After saying that He lays down 'his life for the sheep' (Jn 10¹⁵), Jesus adds, 'Other sheep I have, which are not of this fold: them also I must bring, and they shall hear my voice' (v. 16). In connexion with the visit of the Greeks, He uttered the pregnant and impressive prophecy, 'I, if I be lifted up from the earth, will draw all men unto me' (12³²); and a little further on in the same chapter we find the words, 'I came not to judge the world, but to save the world' (12⁴⁷). In the private converse of our Lord and His disciples, in the last days of the earthly ministry, the vision of the world is repeatedly brought before the minds of the disciples as the object of the Saviour's thought and the scope of the disciples' mission, as—'That the world may know that I love the Father . . . even so I do' (Jn 14³¹); 'As thou hast sent me into the world, even so have I also sent them into the world' (17¹⁸; also 12⁴⁶⁻⁴⁸ 16⁸⁻¹¹ 17^{2, 21}). Judas (not Iscariot) is even represented as asking, 'How is it that thou wilt manifest thyself unto us and not unto the world?' (14²²), as if the limitation of His work was a source of perplexity to him. Unless we are to regard the Gospels as entirely unhistorical, and all such universal references as due to the mind of the Church (which would then be greater than its Lord) at a later time, it must be admitted that the disciples were aware of the world-wide character of the work they were to undertake. The frequency of the world references in the earthly ministry may to some extent account for the fact that the missionary commission is mentioned only once in each of the Gospels (Mt 28¹⁶⁻²⁰ || Mk 16¹⁵ || Jn 20²¹ || Lk 24⁴⁶⁻⁴⁸), and in Ac 1⁸. For it is recognized that it is only in the brief records of the risen life of Jesus that the universal mission of the disciples is explicitly expressed in the form of a command. But that is no reason for imagining that it was an afterthought of Jesus, or an addition put into His mouth by followers of a later time. The universal commission is given then, because that is the time to which it belongs. The work of redemption had been 'finished'; the gospel was completed; the limitations which had restricted its extension were no longer necessary. The intimations of a universal mission, which had been given before, were carried to their inevitable conclusion in the majestic commission: 'All authority is given unto me in heaven and in earth. Go ye into all the world, make disciples of all nations, baptizing them in the name of the Father, and of the Son, and of the Holy Ghost: teaching them to observe all things whatsoever I have commanded you: and, lo, I am with you all the days, unto the consummation of the age' (πάσας τὰς ἡμέρας ἕως τῆς συντελείας τοῦ αἰῶνος, Mt 28¹⁶⁻²⁰). The universal note predominates the whole passage. There is (i.) the claim of universal authority; (ii.) the direction to a universal field; (iii.) the universality of what is to be taught ('all things whatsoever I have commanded you'); (iv.) the promise of a universal presence, 'Lo, I am with you all the days, unto the consummation of the age.'

6. The genuineness of the missionary commission has been gravely questioned. In Mk. it appears in the closing section (16⁹⁻¹⁰), which is now generally regarded as an addition by a later hand, possibly by the presbyter Aristion, who, according to Papias, was 'a disciple of the Lord' (F. C. Conybear, Expositor, IV. viii. [1893] 241 ff.; but see ARISTION). All critics admit the antiquity of the passage, and it may be accepted as 'embodying a true Apostolic tradition' (Salmond in Hastings' DB iii. p. 253^b).

The passage in Mt. (28¹⁶⁻²⁰) is characterized as 'a later appendix' (Moffatt, Historical NT, p. 647) entirely on account of its contents. The indications (in a different order) of its lateness are said to be—(i.) its incipient Trinitarianism, (ii.) the Trinitarian formula of baptism, which is found nowhere else in the NT. To these is added, (iii.) that the first disciples could hardly have known of the universal mission, or else they lived in flagrant disobedience to their Master's solemn command, and only reluctantly recognized its fulfilment in the Pauline gospel. But it may be said, on the other hand, as to (i.), that the incipient Trinitarianism of the NT is such a daring conception, especially to men who had been trained in the strict monotheism of Judaism, that its existence can hardly be explained without some word of the Lord Jesus in relation to it, such as that which Mt. records. How are we to account for the 'incipient Trinitarianism' of the Pauline benediction—'The grace of the Lord Jesus Christ, the love of God, and the communion of the Holy Ghost' (2 Co 13¹⁴)—if there were no words of the Lord Jesus to justify it? As to (ii.), the baptismal formula, as it has been called, may not have been a formula. It may have been the mistake of a later time to regard it as such. If it was not a formula, there was nothing to hinder the Apostles and others from baptizing in the name of the Lord Jesus ('The Baptismal Formula,' by J. H. Bernard in Expositor, VI. v. [1902] 43 ff.). (iii.) The apparent inaction of the disciples may not have been due to ignorance or disobedience. The command as given in Lk. and Acts indicates a gradually widening sphere of operations, in Jerusalem and Judæa, in Samaria, and unto the uttermost parts of the earth. The difficulties and persecution which the Apostles encountered at the beginning of their work may have been to them a proof that the time had not yet come when they could leave the nearer and narrower fields and go forth to the Gentiles. If any reliance is to be placed on Acts as an historical document, it is abundantly evident that the first disciples did know of the world mission, and that they were moving in the line of their instructions. For in his first recorded utterance St. Peter strikes the universal note repeatedly. He quotes the words of Joel in explanation of what had happened at Pentecost, saying, 'It shall come to pass in the last days, saith God, that I will pour out of my Spirit upon all flesh' (Ac 2¹⁷), 'And it shall come to pass, that whosoever shall call on the name of the Lord shall be saved' (v. 21). He closes his appeal to the people with the assurance that 'the promise is unto you, and to your children, and to all that are afar off, even as many as the Lord our God shall call' (v. 39). Then in 3²⁵ there is the recognition of the coming of Christ as a fulfilment of prophecy, as a carrying out of the covenant made with Abraham ('And in thy seed shall all the families of the earth be blessed'); further, in the words, 'Unto you first God, having raised up his Servant (παῖς), sent him to bless you,' there is the recognition of a wider field to be entered in due time. The great declaration, 'Neither is there salvation in any other: for there is no other name under heaven given among men, whereby we must be saved' (4¹²), is meaningless, if there was not behind it a consciousness of the universal character of Christianity, and, as a consequence, the consciousness of a universal mission.

The disciples are also seen to be moving in the line of their instructions. They certainly preached the gospel in Jerusalem and in all Judæa. It is also seen that they preached it among the Samaritans, towards whom Jews had as strong an antipathy as they had towards Gentiles ('Philip went down to the city of Samaria and preached Christ unto them. . . . (Peter and John) preached the gospel in many villages of the Samaritans,' Ac 8⁵⁻²⁵). In a few years after the Crucifixion (Harnack says 1, Ramsay 3, Lightfoot 4, Turner 6 or 7 [in fixing the date of St. Paul's conversion, see Hastings' DB, art. 'Chronology of the NT']) the faith of Christ had spread to Damascus, and had gained such hold there, that Saul was sent thither by the Sanhedrin to bring 'any of the Way,' whom he might find, bound to Jerusalem (Ac 9²). Lastly, some of those who were scattered abroad upon the persecution which arose about Stephen went as far as to Antioch, and preached the word to the Greeks ('Ελληνες, the reading adopted by Tischendorf, Nestle, etc.); and when tidings of these things came to the Church at Jerusalem, they sent forth Barnabas to visit and help them (which he did by finding Saul of Tarsus, Ac 11¹⁹⁻²⁶).

Taking Turner's estimate as above (though we prefer Ramsay's), the gospel was firmly established in Damascus (and in Antioch) 6 or 7 years after the Crucifixion. The trouble which arose about Stephen marked the close of the comparatively peaceful progress of the Church. The hidden cleavage between Judaism and Christianity then became apparent, and an entirely new situation resulted, which affected those within and without the Church. The sympathy of the Jews (Ac 2⁴⁷) towards the Christians had become antipathy (12²⁻³). The persecution created anxieties which naturally absorbed the attention of the leaders. Coming as it did when the Church had been extended throughout Palestine, the persecution may have arrested the forward movement which, in accordance with the line of progress sketched out in Ac 1⁸, had then become due. A little consideration of the difficulties which affect the progress of modern missions in different countries might lead to a better understanding of the situation in the Apostolic age, and to a higher appreciation of the results which the first missionaries achieved.

The dispute in the early Church in relation to the Gentiles, regarding which so much has been made, was not about preaching the gospel to them, but about the conditions on which they were to receive salvation and be admitted into the Church. No instructions on these matters had been given by the Lord Jesus, and difference of opinion was inevitable until the truth was made plain. St. Peter's reluctance to go to Cornelius did not arise from any unwillingness to preach to him, but from the natural shrinking of a strict Jew from entering the house of a Gentile. The accusation which was brought against him at Jerusalem by those who were of the circumcision was, not that he had preached the gospel to a Gentile, but that he had gone in to 'men uncircumcised and had eaten with them' (Ac 11³). It was 'they of the circumcision,' and not the first disciples, who glorified God, saying, 'Then hath God also to the Gentiles granted repentance unto life' (Ac 11¹⁸). These considerations are sufficient to establish the knowledge of the missionary command by the first disciples, and to account for the apparent delay (if any) in carrying it out.

7. The progress of mission work within the NT record.—The order is admirably given by Turner in his art. 'Chronology of the NT' in Hastings' DB. He says that 'the picture in Acts is cut up, as it were, into six panels, each labelled with a general summary of progress'; and his arrangement is adopted here. First stage, the beginning at Jerusalem (Ac 1¹⁻⁶⁷); second stage, the extension of the Church throughout Palestine (Ac 6⁸⁻⁹⁸); third stage, the extension of the Church to Antioch (Ac 9³²⁻¹²²); fourth stage, the extension of the Church to Asia Minor, as a result of St. Paul's first missionary journey (Ac 12²⁵⁻¹⁶⁵); fifth stage, the extension of the Church to Europe, resulting from St. Paul's second missionary journey (Ac 16⁹⁻¹⁹²⁰); sixth stage, the extension of the Church to Rome (Ac 19²¹⁻²⁸³). While that is the view of progress which is presented in Acts, it is not to be taken as complete. It exhibits for the most part the movement as connected with the great missionaries, St. Peter and St. Paul. The labours of the majority of the company of the Apostles are not recorded, and their activity might to some extent modify the above order of progression. Missionary enthusiasm also was not confined to the Apostles. Unnamed disciples, as in the case of Antioch (Ac 11²⁰), and certainly also in the case of Rome, may have carried the gospel into many places of which no mention is made. But for general purposes the sketch as given above represents the line of advance up to the year A.D. 70. Progress after that belongs to the general history of missions.

MOCKERY.—The Evangelists relate in the Passion history a series of narratives describing the brutal mockery of Jesus by the authorities and by their soldiers and servants. The passages are the following: (a) Mk 14⁶⁵ = Mt 26⁶⁷⁻⁶⁸ = Lk 22⁶³⁻⁶⁴; (b) Lk 23¹¹; (c) Mk 15¹⁸⁻²⁰ = Mt 27²⁷⁻³¹ = Jn 19²⁻³.

There is no necessity to regard these stories as duplicates. A person who was condemned for the claims that Jesus was supposed to put forward was likely to meet with derision and brutality at every turn. Of course, if the story that Jesus was sent to Herod, which is peculiar to Lk., is unhistorical, the second of the stories would have to be struck out. If, however, that narrative is historical, and there is no cogent reason for doubting it, it was perfectly natural that Herod and his guards should mock one who claimed to be king. It is possible, indeed, that the narratives may have exerted an influence upon each other, but nothing compels us to affirm that any of them is unhistorical.

The first narrative records the mockery and ill-treatment inflicted on Jesus immediately after His condemnation by the Sanhedrin. Two stages are mentioned in Mark. The first consisted of spitting, blindfolding, buffeting, and the request that He should prophesy. Then, following this, we have a statement as to the attendants, the meaning of which is not perfectly clear. The better reading in Mk 14⁶⁵ is ελαβον. Several MSS, however, read εβαλλον or εβαλον (see Field). It is not quite clear how we should translate or explain the better reading. Swete renders 'they caught Him with blows,' others 'they took Him in charge with blows.' ραπισμασιν means blows with the open hand, not blows with the rod. Another question touches the authors of this outrage. According to Mt., it is the members of the Sanhedrin. This seems to be Mk.'s meaning also, except that he limits it to 'some.' He mentions the servants at the close. Lk. represents the attendants who had charge of Jesus as alone concerned. Difficulties are also raised by the command to prophesy. Mt. and Lk. both explain it as a challenge to Jesus to prophesy who it was that smote Him. This in itself is perfectly natural, but it implies that Jesus was blindfolded, though there is no reference to this in Mt., and it is omitted by D and Syr^{sin} in Mark. Even if original in Mk., it may imply that Jesus was condemned to death (cf. 'they covered Haman's face,' Est 7⁸), rather than that He was blindfolded so that He might be asked to prophesy who struck Him. Accordingly, the meaning may be 'foretell the future,' either generally or with a specific reference to His own fate, or to the destruction of the Temple, which He had been accused of predicting.

The second mockery, that before Herod, is free from the element of physical ill-treatment. Jesus is simply arrayed in royal garments, and a mocking homage is paid to Him; then He is sent back to Pilate. Lk 23¹⁰⁻¹² is omitted, it is true, in Syr^{sin}, and is regarded by Wellhausen as a later addition (see his note on the passage and on 23¹⁵).

The third mockery is that by the Roman soldiers after the condemnation by Pilate. This narrative is omitted by Lk. but recorded by John. The soldiers take Jesus into the Praetorium and summon the whole of their company. Then they clothe Him in purple and put a crown of thorns upon His head; then they do homage to Him, saluting Him as king of the Jews. They keep on striking Him on the head with a reed, spitting upon Him, and bending the knee to Him in mock homage. To this account (of Mk.) Mt. adds, first, that before clothing Him in the robes they divested Him of His garments, and that they put a reed in His right hand, and subsequently took it from Him and struck Him on the head with it. Here Mt.'s account deserves preference, for it is intrinsically probable that the reed should have been given Him as a sceptre before it was used to smite Him. Jn.'s account is brief; he does not mention the reed, but says that they gave Him blows with the hand. It is a mark of historicity in the Gospel narratives that the Sanhedrists are represented as mocking the claims of Jesus to be a prophet, whereas the Roman soldiers, quite uninterested in His prophetic character, mock His claims to be a king, which would not be so ready a subject of jesting with the Jews, though they mocked Him for His pretensions to be a king of Israel as He hung upon the cross.

In recent years quite new significance has been attached to the mockery. Wendland in his art. 'Jesus als Saturnalien-König' (Hermes, xxxiii. 175-179) put forward the view that the Roman soldiers ridiculed Christ's royal and Divine claims by attiring Him in the dress of king Saturn. J. G. Frazer urges as an objection to this that, while it is possible that the Saturnalia may have been celebrated in Jerusalem at what seems to have been its original date in March, it is much more likely that it was really held in December, which, of course, does not harmonize with the time of year at which the Crucifixion took place. Frazer himself thinks that it resembled much more closely the treatment of the mock king of the Sacaea. He translates Dio Chrysostom's description as follows: 'They take one of the prisoners condemned to death and seat him upon the king's throne, and give him the king's raiment, and let him lord it and drink and run riot and use the king's concubines during these days, and no man prevents him from doing just what he likes. But afterwards they strip and scourge and crucify him' (Frazer, *Golden Bough*², iii. 187).

Frazer argues that the Jewish Feast of Purim was a continuation of the Sacaea, and he conjectures that the Jews regularly compelled a condemned criminal to play a tragic part in that festival, and that Jesus perished in the character of Haman. He admits the difficulty caused by the fact that Purim fell a month before Passover, but he puts forward various suggestions to mitigate this difficulty. He thinks that possibly the Christian tradition may have shifted the date of the Crucifixion to coincide with the Passover, though he admits that this is perhaps not possible. He points out that the Bab. festival seems to have fallen near the time of the Passover, and that the date of Purim was altered to a month earlier so as not to clash with it. He conjectures that the Jews may have sometimes, for a special reason, celebrated the Feast of Purim, or at least the death of Haman, at or near Passover. A further suggestion is, however, that possibly the licence of thirty days allowed to the mock king of the Saturnalia was allowed to the human representative of Haman. Yet as the mockery in question was not by Jews but by Roman soldiers, the question arises whether they would have been likely to take part in a Jewish celebration. To this Frazer replies that they may have fallen in with the local customs, but, quite apart from this, it was natural that without sharing Jewish beliefs they would be quite ready to join in the sport. He points out, however, that according to Lk.'s account, it was Herod's soldiers who mocked Jesus, and they were presumably Jews. Thus the Crucifixion on this view was not a punishment specially designed for Christ, but merely the fate which annually befell the malefactor who played Haman. It is argued that certain difficulties in the narrative thus gain relief. Pilate was reluctant to give up Jesus and yet acquiesced, though he had the power to release Him. This is due to the fact that someone had to be given up to play the part of Haman. Again, would Pilate have ventured to put over the cross the inscription declaring that Jesus was king of the Jews with a tyrant so gloomy and suspicious as Tiberius, unless it had been a formula of long standing and regarded as quite innocuous? Since Jesus represented Haman, it is suggested that Barabbas represented Mordecai; and if so, he was probably released in order to play the part of a buffoon king (cf. the story of the mockery of Carabas in Philo, adv. Flaccum, ii. 520-523, and the 'Ride of the Beardless One' in Persia, referred to by Lagarde in his Purim). The name Barabbas, Frazer suggests, was an official title mistakenly regarded as a personal name. Originally Haman and Mordecai were the same, but one personated the dead and the other the risen deity. The same person probably played both parts, he who was Mordecai one year was Haman the next.

This ingenious theory is open to the most serious objections. Some of these have been stated by Mr. Andrew Lang in the very elaborate investigation he gives in Magie and Religion. It is very difficult to make good the identification of Purim with the Sacaea even if Frazer's interpretation of the Sacaea could hold good, which is very doubtful. It is also very improbable that a victim was actually crucified in the character of Haman by the Jews. There is not a shred of evidence to make such a suggestion plausible. And when we come to apply it to the Gospel history, the theory becomes more improbable than ever. The licence allowed to 'the Beardless One' was such that he was permitted, if the shopkeepers did not give him what he wished during his ride through the city, to appropriate everything they had in their shops. It is not easy to see any real parallel between this and the overturning of the money-changers' tables and driving out of their sheep and oxen from the Temple by Jesus. There is all the difference between a raid on the shopkeepers for personal plunder and the cleansing of the Temple from an intolerable abuse. Jesus would not have been asked by the authorities by what right He did these things, if it had been a perfectly legitimate exercise of a power He possessed as the representative of Haman. Moreover, Frazer's theory involves our rejection of the Johannine date for the cleansing of the Temple, although that date has much that can be said in its favour. Apart from this, however, one insuperable difficulty remains. It is quite possible that Jesus should have suffered in any character chosen for Him by those who compassed His death. In that respect He was a passive victim. But it is quite incredible that He should have participated in these ceremonies of His own free will, or have given any colour whatever to superstitions of that kind. It is accordingly out of the question to interpret the cleansing of the Temple as Frazer does, since that would imply that Jesus lent Himself to this festival. Moreover, unless the Gospel narratives are altogether misleading, Jesus was not in the hands of His enemies till the night before His death, and therefore His triumphal entry and His attack on the desecration of the Temple could have been no part of the programme of a Purim festival. There would have been no need for secrecy through the fear of the people, or for the services of the traitor, if the mockery and death were but the last acts in a longer drama. Nor are the difficulties in the Gospel narratives really mitigated by this hypothesis. The ordinary explanation of Pilate's vacillation and surrender is perfectly adequate. The procurator was so unpopular that he dared not risk the charge of treason that might have been launched against him before Tiberius if he had let a claimant to Messianic dignity go free. However convinced Pilate may have been that Jesus was harmless to Rome, nothing would have been easier than to bring a very damaging charge against him before the emperor. Nor is the title over the cross to be interpreted along Frazer's lines. To have let Jesus go would have constituted a much more valid basis of accusation than to write the title 'This is the king of the Jews' over His cross, for that meant 'This is the king of the Jews, and thus I serve pretenders to the throne.' It mocked Jesus and exasperated the Jews. To imagine that by one course Pilate would have escaped the charge of treason which he would have incurred by the other, is indeed to strain out the gnat and swallow the camel. If, as Frazer says, Pilate was obliged to give up a prisoner, and all he could do was to choose him, he had others whom he might have chosen besides Jesus and Barabbas. It was a choice that was dictated by his position. He was in the grip of his past and of his dread of Tiberius. Another point that deserves mention is that the mockery of Christ's prophetic claims is precisely parallel to the mockery of His royal claims. In the one case they bid Him prophesy, in the other they dress Him up as a mock king and pay Him a ribald homage. The parallelism shows us how unnecessary it is for us to seek for far-fetched reasons to explain the conduct of the Roman soldiers. Nothing was more natural than that the supporters of an alien empire should mock royal claims put forward by one who belonged to the subject people, and no derision was more effective than the dressing up of their victim as king. The sceptre served to beat Him, and the jest of the coronation was all the more piquant that the crown was studded with thorns. As Mr. Lang reminds us, 'Wallace was crowned at his trial with laurel'; and Atholl, who was a pretender to the crown, 'was tortured to death with a red-hot iron crown' (Magic and Religion, p. 203).

Lastly, it should be observed that the passage from Dio Chrysostom will not bear too much weight. There is a resemblance in the clothing with royal robes, in the stripping, the scourging, and the death, but there is no resemblance to the royal privileges accorded to the condemned prisoner, and it is also not clear that the victim was crucified. The Greek word used (ἐκρέμασαν) may mean simply that he was hanged, though the other view is more probable. No stress can be laid on the scourging in the case of Jesus, for it was the usual preliminary to crucifixion, and crucifixion was unhappily among the Romans no exceptional form of execution.

MONEY.—We propose to treat first of money in general as referred to in the Gospels, and afterwards of the definite sums or coins which are there named.

I. MONEY IN GENERAL.—In the AV six Greek words are rendered 'money,' 'tribute money,' or 'piece of money.' In two cases this is a mistranslation, and is rectified by the RV. The words are as follows: 1. ἀργύριον (Mt 25^{18, 27} 28^{12, 15}, Mk 14¹¹, Lk 9^{19, 23} 22⁵). (In three of the above passages it occurs in the plural without the sense being altered; thus, cf. Mt 25¹⁸ with 25²⁷). This word originally means silver, hence silver money (also tr. 'pieces of silver,' Mt 27^{3, 5, 6, 9}; see below, under 'Stater'); finally, as silver was the chief medium of exchange in the ancient world, money in general (cf. Fr. argent). 2. χαλκός (Mk 6⁸ 12⁴¹). This word originally means brass, hence coins of brass (or copper), and, as copper money circulated largely among the common people, money in general. 3. κέρμα (Jn 2¹⁵) comes from a verb meaning to cut, and means originally change or small coins. It is appropriately used in this passage for the stock-in-trade of the money-changers, a part of whose business it was to supply change for larger sums. 4. νόμισμα (Mt 22¹⁹) comes from a verb meaning to acknowledge as customary or lawful. It means, accordingly, money in the sense of lawful coin. The νόμισμα τοῦ κήνσου, or tribute money, was the currency in which the Roman tribute had to be paid, that is, the denarius. 5. τὰ διδραχμα (Mt 17²⁴ AV 'tribute money,' RV 'the half-shekel'). As is rightly indicated by the RV, this word is the name of a definite sum of money which was levied for the maintenance of the Temple (see below, under 'Didrachm'). 6. στατήρ (Mt 17²⁷ AV 'piece of money,' RV 'shekel'). Here, too, the AV is at fault, the word meaning a definite coin (see below, under 'Stater').

To the above words used for money in general (though under slightly different aspects) may be added the comprehensive description of money in Mt 10⁹ in terms of the three metals used as specie—gold, silver, and brass (or copper). This verse may be taken as evidence that gold as well as silver and copper coins circulated in Palestine in the time of our Lord, although no gold coin is mentioned in the Gospels. The current gold coin was doubtless the Roman aureus, frequently referred to in the Mishna as a golden denarius. In silver there was more variety. The Roman denarius was, of course, largely in evidence, and was probably the silver coin in most common use. But there were also coins of larger size, bearing Greek names. When Pompey made Syria a Roman province (B.C. 65), he found in circulation tetradrachms of two different kinds. There were those issued chiefly from Antioch by the Seleucid kings on the Attic standard, weighing 262 grains troy. There were also those issued by the semi-autonomous cities of Phoenicia on the Phoenician standard of 224 grains to the tetradrachm. Tetradrachms of both standards were recognized by Pompey as equivalent to four denarii (Mommsen, Gesch. des Röm. Münzwesens, 36, 715). Both would still be lawful coin in the time of our Lord, though, as Mommsen surmises (ib. 72), the heavier royal tetradrachms would tend to be driven out of circulation by the lighter Phoenician coins, which, besides, as corresponding exactly to the Hebrew shekel, were in special demand in Palestine for religious purposes (see below, under 'Didrachm'). The supply of silver from the mints at Tyre and Sidon, which continued to issue tetradrachms and didrachms under the Emperors,* was reinforced from the time of Augustus onwards by the tetradrachms coined in large numbers at Antioch for circulation in the province of Syria. These ranged in weight from 220 to 236 grains, and were no doubt reckoned for ordinary purposes as equal to four denarii, although, in accordance with the regular practice of the Romans of giving a preference to their own

* According to most numismatologists; e.g., Head (Hist. Num. 675) says: 'From B.C. 126 down to the reign of Vespasian, we possess a plentiful series of Syrian tetradrachms and didrachms.' On the other hand, Mommsen (op. cit. 36) holds that from the time of Pompey the Phoenician cities lost the power of issuing silver money, and points out that the extant Phoenician tetradrachms never bear the names of Emperors or any other indication of Roman sway.

A vexed question, which cannot be held to be yet decided, is whether prior to the time of the first Jewish revolt any silver coins had been produced in Palestine itself. Until lately it has been usual for numismatologists to assign to Simon Maccabaeus certain silver shekels and half-shekels struck on the Phœnician standard, and bearing the inscription in Hebrew, 'Jerusalem the Holy' (Madden, Coins of the Jews, 65-71; Head, Hist. Num. 681, 682). Strong historical reasons, however, have been brought by Schürer (HJP i. ii. 379-383) and others for dating these coins rather in the time of the revolt under Nero; and the opinion seems to be making headway that at the time of our Lord, and previously, the Jews were dependent for their silver money upon foreign sources. (For an able statement of the case, see Kennedy in Hastings' DB, vol. iii. s.v. 'Money,' § 5).

On the other hand, the supply of copper money must have been almost, if not quite, exclusively of native production. There were the copper coins of the Hasmonæan princes, those of the various Herods, and those which had been struck since A.D. 6 by successive procurators of Judæa. Unlike the foreign silver money, they have, in deference to Jewish feeling, no Imperial effigy or the likeness of any living thing; even those of the procurators have only the name of the reigning Emperor, and innocent ears of corn, palm-trees, lilies, and the like. As to their denomination we have no sure evidence. Schürer holds that the Romans imposed their monetary standard more rigorously in Palestine than elsewhere, and that even the Herodian coins followed the Roman system (HJP ii. i. 38). Other writers consider it to be more probable that the copper coinage of Palestine followed the subdivisions of the drachm common in Greek-speaking countries. The extant coins contain no indication of value, nor can any safe inference be drawn from their weight, seeing that, where a silver standard prevails, the copper coinage must always be very much of the nature of token money. (See, further, under 'Assarion,' 'Kodrantēs,' and 'Lepton,' below).

Before proceeding to speak in detail of the coins named in the Gospels, it will be well to give in tabular form the main elements of the two systems, the Greek and the Roman, which obtained concurrently in Palestine at the time of our Lord. For convenience of reference the average value in sterling money is put opposite the larger sums.

Greek system.

1 Talent (£240)	=	60 Minas.
1 Mina (£4)	=	100 Drachms.
1 Drachm (9½d.)	=	6 Obols.
1 Obol	=	8 Chalki.

(To this system belong also the stater of four, and the drachm of two, drachms; and the lepton, whose relation to the chalkus is uncertain. See below, under 'Lepton').

Roman system.

1 Aureus (£1)	=	25 Denarii.
1 Denarius (9½d.)	=	16 Asses.
1 As	=	4 Quadrantes.

The point of connexion between the two systems is found in the identification of the Roman denarius with the Attic drachm. This identification was rendered easy by the fact that at the time when Rome began her career of conquest in the East the drachm of the Attic standard had fallen to a weight which only slightly exceeded that of the denarius; but there can be little doubt that it was made deliberately by the Romans as a matter of policy. Alexander the Great had made the Attic drachm the unit of his Imperial coinage, which he imposed upon all the lands he had conquered; and in adopting the Alexandrine drachm as equal to their own denarius, the Romans wished to indicate that they served themselves heirs to his kingdom in the East (Mommson, op. cit. 691). In Imperial times the identification was so completely established that Hellenistic writers regularly refer to the denarius as 'the Attic drachm.' This identification enables us to assign values to those coins which follow the Greek system. The weight of the gold aureus is known, and its value admits of easy calculation (see Hastings' DB iii. 427), and the other values, as given above, follow at once. This method of ascertaining the value of the silver coins of the Gospels does justice to the fact that, in the Roman Empire then, as in Britain now, the value of silver coins was legally defined in terms of the gold standard.

II. DEFINITE SUMS OF MONEY AND COINS MENTIONED IN THE GOSPELS.—These may most conveniently be treated of under three heads: money of account, silver coins, and copper coins.

(i.) Money of account.—Two sums of money, to which no actual coin corresponded, receive a special name in the Gospels. These are the talent and the mina.

1. Talent (τάλαντον, Mt 18²⁴ 25¹⁵. 16. 20. 22. 24. 25. 28) is originally the name of the highest weight in the various systems of antiquity, hence the sum of money represented by that weight in gold or silver. The talent of the Gospels, which is, of course, a talent of silver, might conceivably be the Phœnician talent, but is far more probably to be identified with the talent on the reduced Attic scale which had been formally recognized by the Romans (see above). It contained 6000 aurei or drachms or denarii, and was thus worth 240 aurei or £240.

The talent is mentioned twice by our Lord. In the parable of the Unmerciful Servant (Mt 18²³⁻³⁵) the one servant owes the king 10,000 talents, or nearly two-and-a-half millions of our money—an enormous sum, of which the 100 denarii (= £4) owed him by his fellow-servant represents but an insignificant fraction (σάβη). (It may be remarked that the juxtaposition in this parable of the talent and the denarius is a confirmation of the view that it is the Attic talent that is meant). In the parable of the Talents (Mt 25¹⁴⁻³⁰) the master intrusts his capital of eight talents or £1920 to his three servants in sums of £1200, £480, and £240 respectively. It will be seen that even he who received but one talent had yet quite a respectable capital to trade with, so that the excuse which is sometimes made by commentators on his behalf, viz. that he was discouraged by the smallness of the sum committed to him, is as little valid as that which he offered for himself. The real reason for his conduct was, of course, just his slothfulness.

2. Mina (μνᾶ, Lk 19¹³. 16. 18. 20. 24. 25 AV and RV pound) is the sixtieth part of the talent. Like the latter, it is to be calculated on the Roman-Attic scale. It contains 100 denarii, and is thus equal to £4.

The only mention of this sum in the Gospels is in the parable of the Pounds (Lk 19¹²⁻²⁷), where a nobleman, going to a far country to get a kingdom, gives one mina to each of his ten servants, bidding them trade with it till his return. The smallness of the sum in such a connexion is remarkable, especially when compared with the companion parable of the Talents. The explanation (as far as the story is concerned) seems to be that the master is not in this case a trader making provision for the suitable employment of his capital in his absence, but one who, having in prospect the acquisition of a kingdom, desires to test the capacity of his servants for high office in that kingdom. Ingenuity and diligence would be more thoroughly tested in multiplying a small sum than a large one.

(ii.) Silver coins.—Of these there are mentioned by name, the denarius, the drachm, the didrachm, and the stater. The 'piece of money' of the AV in Mt 17²⁷ is the stater, the 'pieces of silver' in Lk 15⁸ are drachms, while the 'pieces of silver' in Mt 26¹⁵ are probably staters, and are discussed under that heading.

1. Denarius (δηνάριον, AV and RV penny; American Revisers, more happily, shilling).—This is the most frequently mentioned coin in the Gospels (Mt 18²⁸ 20². 9. 10. 13²⁹, Mk 6³⁷ 12¹⁵ 14⁵, Lk 7⁴¹ 10³⁵ 20²⁴, Jn 6⁷ 12⁵). It is the name of the most important Roman coin, which circulated throughout the Empire, and in terms of which all public accounts were made up. It received its name from being originally the equivalent of ten copper asses, but from B.C. 217 onwards it was equivalent to sixteen asses, and weighed ¼ of the Roman pound, or 60 grains troy. Under Nero (c. A.D. 60) it was reduced to ⅓ of the pound, or 52½ grains. At the time of our Lord its value was fixed at ⅓ of the aureus, which may be taken under the early emperors as equal on the average to our sovereign; thus the denarius was worth 9½ pence, or roughly 9½d.

We find the denarius used in the Gospels for the reckoning of even fairly large sums. Thus in the parable of the Unmerciful Servant (Mt 18²⁸, see above under 'Talent') a sum of 100 denarii is mentioned, while in the parable of the Two Debtors (Lk 7⁴¹) the two debts are stated at 500 and 50 denarii respectively (£20 and £2). In Mk 6³⁷—Jn 6⁷ the disciples estimate that it would need bread to the value of at least 200 denarii (£8) to provide for the five thousand. (There is no probability in the suggestion that this figure was named as the amount of money then in 'the bag.' It is intended to indicate a sum far beyond the means of the little company). In Mk 14⁵=Jn 12⁵ the vase of ointment with which Mary anointed our Lord is valued at 300 denarii (£12). The 'exciting costliness' of this loving tribute is realized when we remember that the sum named represents at least the annual income of a labourer of those days. This appears from the parable of the Labourers in the Vineyard (Mt 20:15), where a denarius is evidently looked upon as liberal pay for a day's work; for we may be quite sure that the employer who dealt so generously with the labourers engaged late in the day had struck no niggardly bargain with those hired in the morning. (A passage which may be quoted in confirmation is To 5:4, where the disguised angel is promised by Tobit a drachm a day—at that time a little less than a denarius—for acting as companion to his son. It is true that this was to be exclusive of his necessary expenses; but, on the other hand, the position was one of trust, and would naturally be more highly remunerated than field labour). In the parable of the Good Samaritan (Lk 10:30-37) two denarii are given to the innkeeper as a reasonable payment in advance for the keep of the wounded traveller for a day or two, to be supplemented if necessary on the return of the Samaritan. (This is the most natural way to explain the reference; see Jülicher, Gleichnisreden, ii. 591. On the other hand, Ramsay in Hastings' DB, Ext. Vol. 394, holds that the two denarii were simply payment for the one night that the two had spent in the inn).

Of special interest is the reference to the denarius in Mt 22¹⁹=Mk 12¹⁵=Lk 20²⁴ in connexion with the Pharisees' question as to the lawfulness of paying tribute to Caesar. The denarius was 'the money of the tribute' (Mt 22¹⁹), all Imperial taxes being payable in terms of it in accordance with a rescript of Germanicus (c. A.D. 18). It bore upon it the name and title of the reigning Emperor, along with the effigy either of himself or of some member of the Imperial family—the 'image and superscription' to which our Lord alluded. It was issued by the Imperial authority, even the Roman Senate having only the right to mint copper coins, and could thus most appropriately be spoken of as 'that which is Caesar's.'

2. Drachm (δραχμή, Lk 15^{8,9} AV and RV piece of silver).—This is the name of the unit of the Greek system of silver coinage, and, as such, might be applied to a great variety of coins from different mints and of different standards. In the Gospels it occurs only in the parable of the Lost Coin, where, of course, it must be understood of some coin current in Palestine. Few coins of this denomination were issued from the Phœnician cities or from Antioch, and the city of Cæsarea in Cappadocia had only recently begun to coin drachms on the Phœnician standard (of 55 grains) for use in the provinces of Syria and Cappadocia (Mommsen, op. cit. 734, 897; Head, op. cit. 634). Thus, while it is not impossible that the coins in question may have been drachms of the Phœnician standard, they are with greater probability to be identified with the 'Attic drachms'* of the Hellenistic writers, that is, with Roman denarii. In any case, the value for ordinary purposes was the same—about 9d. of our money. The 'ten pieces of silver' possessed by the woman thus amounted to eight shillings.

3. Didrachm (διδραχμων, Mt 17²⁴ AV 'tribute money,' RV 'half-shekel').—As the name implies, this is a coin of the value of two drachms. τὰ δίδραχμα in the passage quoted refers to the tax of half a shekel (Ex 30¹³) levied each year in the month of Adar from all Jews above the age of twenty for the maintenance of the Temple. The only coins then current in Palestine which answered exactly to the 'shekel of the sanctuary'—leaving out of account the shekels commonly but probably erroneously assigned to Simon Maccabæus (see above)—were those which had for long been coined in the Phœnician cities; and the Temple tax, along with other sacred dues, was paid in this currency.

* It may not be out of place to remind the reader that the word 'Attic' in this connexion implies only a remote association with the coinage of Athens. In his Notes on the Parables, Trench assumes that this drachm was Athenian, stamped with 'an owl, a tortoise, or a head of Minerva,' and reluctantly surrenders 'the resemblance to the human soul, originally stamped with the image and superscription of the great King,' which earlier expositors had delighted to trace. A sound method of parable exposition will indeed dispense with this fanciful suggestion, but not for Trench's reasons (see Bruce, Parabolic Teaching, 279).

The well-established correspondence of the didrachm to the half-shekel has been obscured for some writers by the fact that the LXX regularly translate ἥρα by δίδραχμων. From the narrative in Mt. it is evident that the tax was a voluntary one, although the Mishna declares that the goods of those who had not paid it by the 25th Adar might be distrained (Edersheim, Life and Times, ii. 112). After the destruction of Jerusalem, Vespasian made compulsory a poll-tax of the same amount to defray the cost of rebuilding the temple of Jupiter Capitolinus.

4. Stater (στατήρ, Mt 17²⁷ AV piece of money, RV shekel).—The word στατήρ is derived from the verb ίστημι in the sense of to weigh. It hence means, in the first place, a standard weight, and then derivatively a standard coin. In Athens it was at first applied to the didrachm, which was looked upon as the standard coin of the monetary system, but afterwards to the tetradrachm or piece of four drachms. It is evidently so used in the passage before us, for the stater to be found in the fish's mouth was to pay the Temple tax of a didrachm for two persons, our Lord and Peter. The tetradrachm of the Phœnician standard corresponded to the Hebrew shekel, and is no doubt the coin here indicated. Josephus refers in one passage (BJ ii. xxi. 2) to 'the Tyrian coin which is of the value of four Attic drachms,' and in another (Ant. iii. viii. 2) he gives the value of the Hebrew shekel as four Attic drachms. The stater would thus be worth 4s. 2d. of our money.

In Mt 26¹⁵ Cod. D reads τριάκοντα στατήρας; and though this reading is rejected by critical editors, it probably embodies a correct paraphrase of the ἀργύρια (AV and RV 'pieces of silver') of the TR. That is, the thirty pieces of silver paid to the traitor as the price of blood were staters of the Phœnician standard. This appears from a comparison of the passages in Mt. where they are spoken of with Zec 11^{12,13}, in which shekels are plainly intended. It has been pointed out (O. Holtzmann, NT Zeitgesch. 110) that just as in Zec 11¹² the word ἥρα does not occur but is suggested by the word ἡραία, so also the word στατήρ is latent in the verb ίστησαν in Mt 26¹⁵. Reckoning the stater at 4 denarii, the sum paid to Judas amounted to £4, 16s. Thirty shekels of silver was the price that had to be paid (Ex 21³²) as blood-money for a male or female slave; and this coincidence has frequently been used as a striking illustration of the truth expressed in Ph 27 that our Lord took upon Himself the form of a servant.

(iii.) Copper coins.—There are three copper coins mentioned in the Gospels: the assarion, the kodrantēs, and the lepton. The last is tr. 'mite' in the EV, while the two others are called, without distinction, by the name 'farthing.'

1. Assarion (ἀσάριον Mt 10²⁹, Lk 12⁶, AV and RV farthing, Amer. RV penny).—The name is derived from the Latin assarius, a variant of as. It may either be the name given in Greek-speaking countries to the Roman as, or else the name of some local copper coin which in some way corresponded to it. Both views have been taken, by different scholars, of the significance of the word in the above passages. On the one hand, Schürer (HJP ii. i. 39) and others hold that it is the Roman as that is here mentioned, in value the sixteenth part of the denarius. In support of this view, it may be urged that copper coins were issued, by authority of the Senate, from the Imperial mint at Antioch for circulation in the province of Syria, that these coins bear Latin inscriptions, and that of the two sizes in which they are found one has been identified (e.g. by Mommsen, op. cit. 718, and Madden, op. cit. 301) with the sestertius or quarter-denarius, and the other with the as. Moreover, the Vulgate not only renders ἀσάριον back into as in the passage in Mt., but in the corresponding passage in Lk. has dipondio, thus identifying the 'two farthings' which are named as the price of two sparrows with the Roman dupondius or piece of two asses. Schürer points out, besides, that the name אִשָּׁר ('issar, evidently the Heb. form of δραχμῶν) occurs frequently in the Mishna, and is sometimes expressly called $\text{אִשָּׁר אִיטָלְיָא}$ or Italian assarion. If this view is correct, the assarion of the Gospels will represent '6d.—roughly a halfpenny—in English money, or exactly 5 German pfennigs. On the other hand, this simple solution of the problem is challenged, and chiefly on account of those very references in the Mishna to which Schürer appeals. The qualification of certain assaría as 'Italian'—which is also found in Greek on certain Cretan coins of the time of Claudius (Head, 384) and in a quotation from the Rescript of Germanicus in the Palmyra tariff—seems to imply that there were other coins of the same name, but of different value. And, as a matter of fact, the Mishna speaks of the dinar or denarius as containing 24 'issārīm, which cannot therefore be Roman asses of 16 to the denarius. If this distinction existed already in the time of our Lord, it is to be presumed that He used the word in the more popular sense.* In this case the price of the two sparrows (Mt 10²⁹) would be '4d., or rather less than a halfpenny—almost exactly 4 centimes.

2. Kodrantes (κοδράντης, Mt 5²⁶, Mk 12⁴², AV, RV, and Amer. RV farthing).—There can be no question as to the identity of the coin that is intended in these two passages. It is the quadrans or quarter-as, the smallest coin in the Roman system, equal in value to $\frac{1}{4}$ of a farthing, or a little more than the pfennig. It may, however, reasonably be doubted whether any coin known by this name was in circulation in Palestine in the time of our Lord. The word does not occur in the Mishna, and it has not been found in any of the inscriptions in Greek-speaking provinces (see ExpT x. [1899] 232, 336, where Sir W. M. Ramsay takes Prof. Blass roundly to task for assuming that the name κοδράντης was familiar in the East, and that the provincial cities coined copper money with Roman designations). Nor are the allusions in the Gospels conclusive. Mk.'s explanatory note (λεπτά δύο, ὅ ἐστιν κοδράντης) is obviously intended for non-Palestinian (possibly Roman) readers. As for the use of the word in Mt., the fact that the parallel passage in Lk. has τὸ ἑσχατὸν λεπτὸν instead of $\text{τὸν ἑσχατὸν κοδράντην}$, suggests that it may have been inserted by the First Evangelist as the name of the smallest coin in the Roman system in place of the lepton, the smallest coin in the Palestinian system. It is, however, open to us to suppose that there was a local coin which for some purposes was identified with the quadrans, though rarely so named. A coin of Agrippa II. has been found bearing the name $\chi\alpha\lambda\kappa\omicron\upsilon\varsigma$ (Madden, 146). In the ordinary Greek system the chalkus is equal to $\frac{1}{8}$ of the drachm; but if we suppose that for purposes of taxation local copper was only accepted subject to a discount of 25 per cent., the chalkus would be tarified as equal to the quadrans, which is $\frac{1}{4}$ of the denarius. (Cf. note to last paragraph, and see the already quoted art. by Prof. Kennedy, who works out in detail the relations of the 'tariff' and 'current' values of the various coins).

3. Lepton (λεπτόν, Mk 12⁴², Lk 12⁵⁹ 21², AV and RV mite).—This name is originally an adjective meaning 'thin' or 'small.' It hence denotes a very small coin, but is otherwise indeterminate.

'In the Oriental provinces of the Roman Empire,' says Babelon (Monnaies Grecques et Romaines, I. i. 466), 'the word λεπτόν regularly denoted local copper money as distinguished from coppers of the Roman mint.' At different times and in various places it was used of coins of very different value. As used in the Gospels, however, there is no ambiguity. It is agreed on all hands that it denotes the smallest coin current among the Jews, known to the Mishna as the פְּרֻטָּה (péruṭāh), of which we are expressly told that it was an eighth of the Roman as (see ref. in Lightfoot, ii. 453, and Schürer, II. i. 40),—a statement which exactly agrees with that of Mk. about the value of the lepton. If, therefore, the quadrans is to be identified with the chalkus, the lepton is a coin of half the value.

Nevertheless, the statement of Mk. (λεπτά δύο, ὅ ἐστιν κοδράντης) has given much trouble to numismatologists, who, to quote the words of one of them, 'have serious difficulty in finding among the small coins of Judæa separate denominations for chalkus and lepton' (G. F. Hill in EBI, s.v. 'Penny'). Accordingly, many attempts have been made to identify the lepton with the chalkus-quadrans. Thus Madden, following Cavedoni, cuts the knot by supposing Mk. to have meant the ὅ ἐστιν to apply to the λεπτά and not to the λεπτά δύο (Coins of the Jews, 304), and appeals for corroboration to the correspondence of the kodrantes to the lepton in Mt 5²⁶ = Lk 12⁵⁹. Hill, on the other hand, following up the suggestion of Prof. Kennedy referred to in the preceding paragraphs, contends that the difference between the lepton and the chalkus-quadrans was only a matter of accounting. The difficulty, as stated by Mr. Hill, depends upon the assumption that the chalkus-quadrans was a current Palestinian coin. This, however, has not been proved. Agrippa's chalkus need not have been considered as equal to a quadrans.* As stated by Mr. Madden, 'it is impossible to get over the fact that at this period the quadrans of the Empire, which still retained the name of $\chi\alpha\lambda\kappa\omicron\upsilon\varsigma$, had the same weight as the lepton of the time of the Seleucidae' (Coins of the Jews, 304). The difficulty depends, further, upon an inference from weight,—an inference which, in the case of coins which were little more than tokens, is unusually precarious. In any case, the arguments advanced would need to be much stronger in order to upset the positive statement of St. Mark.

The value, then, as men reckon values, of the widow's gift was little more than a farthing. But the fact that it consisted of two tiny coins,—a fact which we constantly obscure by talking, in our careless way, of 'the widow's mite,'—is full of significance. She might have kept back one.† But of her penny she cast in all that she had; and so of her, too, as of another woman who from her larger resources made an equally lavish gift, it is true that, wherever the gospel is preached throughout the whole world (Mt 26¹³), this that she did is told as a memorial of her.

LITERATURE.—Madden's Coins of the Jews (vol. ii. of Numismata Orientalia) contains an exhaustive account of all the extant Jewish coins, and an appendix (289-310) on the money of the NT. The subject is treated briefly, but clearly, in Schürer, HJP II. i. 38-40, and O. Holtzmann, NT Zeitgesch. 110-116. Mommsen's Gesch. des Röm. Münzwesens is a mine of information on all that concerns the money of the Empire. Articles on 'Money' in the various Bible Dictionaries can be read with advantage, esp. the admirably comprehensive and lucid art. by Prof. Kennedy in Hastings' DB.

MONOTHEISM.—At whatever period in their early history the people of Israel may be supposed to have passed through the obscure and uncertain stages of belief that precede a clear and reasoned theism, that period had been left behind long before the days of Christ and the NT writers. The bitter experiences of exile and suffering on the one hand, and on the other the lofty teachings of prophets and men of God, had eradicated all tendencies to polytheism, and had fixed immovably in the conscience and conviction of the entire nation the faith that Jehovah was the one God of the whole earth. If Israel's early beliefs, as some contend, were henotheistic, and conceded a place and right to other national gods, as Chemosh, Molech, or Rimmon, as equal and paramount lords of their own peoples, such recognition of external divinities had long since ceased to be permissible. There were not really gods many and lords many; there is one God the Father, and one Lord Jesus Christ (1 Co 8⁶).

* Prof. Kennedy in Hastings' DB, s.v. 'Money,' § 8, draws an interesting and instructive distinction between the 'tariff' and the 'current' value of the local copper money. Just as the tetradrachmon of Antioch was tarified as only equal to three denarii for purposes of taxation, so he supposes that the local assarion ($\frac{1}{4}$ of the drachm) was rated as equivalent to half of the Italian assarion or as. But this does not affect the calculation made above, for of course the purchase of sparrows would be one of those 'ordinary purposes' for which the coin would retain its current value.

* Babelon (606) identifies the quadrans with the $\delta\iota\chi\alpha\lambda\kappa\omicron\upsilon\varsigma$ and the $\chi\alpha\lambda\kappa\omicron\upsilon\varsigma$ with the lepton of the Gospels.

This monotheistic belief, however, is assumed rather than formulated or defined in the Gospels. The doctrine that God is one, universally supreme and without rival, does not need to be explained or defended, for it runs no risk of being assailed. Like the belief in the existence of God, it is an article of faith accepted on all sides, by Jesus and by His opponents, and is rather implicit in the thought than explicit in the teaching of Christ and of His disciples.

While, however, this is true, and all the more so because His controversy with the Jews turned largely upon the question of His claim to equality with God, and the blasphemy which this claim appeared to them to imply, epithets and phrases may readily be quoted from the Gospels which have no meaning except as presupposing an absolute and pure monotheism. Such phrases, as would naturally be anticipated, are more generally employed by St. John than by the Synoptists. Thus the Prologue of the Fourth Gospel, tracing all things back to God with whom the Word is one (Jn 1¹), asserts nothing less than the uniqueness as well as the eternity and sovereignty of Him from whom they proceed; and the true Light entering into the world enlighteneth not this or that nation only, but every man (v.⁹). To the same effect and with the same background of accepted and common belief are the repeated declarations of His oneness with the Father (Jn 10^{30, 38} 14¹⁰, cf. 17^{21, 23}). The area and claims of the Divine Kingdom, the Kingdom of God, are explicitly enlarged beyond any mere national limits, and made to embrace the whole world (Lk 16¹⁶, Jn 4^{21ff.}), and so the disciples are taught to pray that it may come upon earth, as it is in heaven (Mt 6¹⁰). It is indeed not bodily or material (Lk 17²¹), but transcends the world (Jn 18³⁶). In the Last Judgment, again, all nations are gathered before the throne, and all receive sentence. 'The field' in which the seed is sown is 'the world' (Mt 13³⁸); and the final injunction to Christ's followers is that they are to go into all the world to make disciples of all the nations (Mt 28¹⁹).

The same teaching is conveyed with more or less directness in the assertion of the subordination and judgment of the prince of this world (Jn 16¹¹); in the stress laid upon the unique obligation and importance of love to God as constituting the first and greatest commandment (Mt 22³⁷ || Mk 12³⁰ Lk 10²⁷); in the appeal made by Christ Himself to a similar unique obligation of worship and service to the one only God (Mt 4¹⁰ || Lk 4⁵); in the emphatic affirmation of a common Fatherhood and Godhead (Jn 20¹⁷, cf. 8⁴¹); and in the solemn declaration of the permanence and inviolability of the words of the Son (Mt 24³⁵ || Mk 13³¹, Lk 21³²), while elsewhere there is ascribed to Him that omniscience which is an attribute of God Himself (Jn 16³⁰).

There are also passages in which the epithet 'one' or 'only' is directly applied to the Divine Ruler, thus claiming for Him with more or less emphasis the sole dominion and the exclusive right to homage. 'The Lord our God is one Lord' (Mk 12²⁹ from Dt 6⁴, cf. v.³²). The God who forgives sins is εἰς (Mk 2⁷), or μόνος (Lk 5²¹); He is unique in goodness (Mt 19¹⁷ || Mk 10¹⁸, Lk 18¹⁹); the sole Father (Mt 23⁹); and the only God (Jn 5⁴⁴).

Some of these expressions might, it is true, be satisfied by a wide conception, such as the ancient prophets had formed, of a God of Israel to whom the sons of Israel were a first interest and charge, or even of a Sovereign the limits of whose sway left room for other sovereigns beside Him. Not all of them, evidently, if read apart and by themselves, will bear the weight of a full monotheistic inference. Taken together, however, and in their context, their joint and several significance is unmistakable. They assume on the part of speaker and hearer alike a belief in the sole supremacy of one God. Nor is this inference as to their meaning seriously contested.

Moreover, in one passage (Jn 17³) there is found a perfectly distinct and unequivocal assertion of monotheistic doctrine; eternal life is to gain a knowledge of the only true God (τὸν μόνον ἀληθινὸν θεόν). Other phrases, in themselves less definite or comprehensive, must clearly be received and interpreted in the light of this, if an adequate conception of Christ's teaching concerning the Father is to be reached. The principle is applicable to other elements of His instruction than that under consideration. The whole is to be construed and expounded by means of the loftiest and most comprehensive statements of doctrine, not to be attenuated to those which may be more particular or obscure.

The conclusion, therefore, is that a monotheistic belief is everywhere assumed in the Gospels; and if it is rarely formulated, the reason is to be sought in the universal assent with which it was received. Christ did not need to teach with definiteness and reiteration, as though it were a new truth, that there is one only Lord of heaven and of earth; for this belief was common to Himself and to His hearers, and formed the solid and accepted foundation of their religious faith.

LITERATURE.—Treatises on the Theology of the NT discuss the conception of God, and the general doctrine is treated in works on Theism; cf. Ed. Caird, Evolution of Religion, 2 vols., Glasgow, 1894; Orr, Christian View of God and the World, pp. 91-96. A. S. GEDEN.

MONTH.—See TIME.

MOON.—In the NT the moon (σελήνη) is part of the established natural order. So when Christ prophesies the end of the world, 'The moon shall not give her light' (Mt 24²⁹, Mk 13²⁴). Twice in the Gospel of Matthew (4²⁴ 17¹⁵) σεληνιαῖσθαι (literally to be moonstruck) is used to describe mental derangement, as in our 'lunacy,' 'lunatic,' from Lat. luna, 'the moon.' See above, pp. 91^b, 96^b.

The Passover always took place at full moon, for it was held on the 14th of the month Nisan, and it was the lunar month that was used, as it is still used by the Jews (Jos. Ant. III. x. 5; cf. Col 2¹⁶). Thus there was moonlight in Gethsemane when Christ went there with His disciples, and when He was betrayed. Also, the darkness which lasted for three hours during the crucifixion could not be due to an ordinary eclipse of the sun by the moon. See also art. TIME. T. GREGORY.

MORALITY, MORAL LAW.—See ETHICS, and LAW.

MORNING.—Mt 16³ 20¹ 27¹, Mk 11²⁰ 13³⁵ 16²; cf. Mt 28¹, Lk 24¹, Jn 20¹. There was no exact division of the day into parts among the Jews until after the Exile. The broad divisions current were: 'evening,' 'morning,' and 'mid-day,' which followed this order usually, after the Jewish method of reckoning the day prevailed 'with the triumph of the Law.' The Roman division of the night into four 'watches,' extending from six o'clock to six o'clock, is brought into striking view in Mk 13³⁵, where ὄψέ (in the evening), μεσονύκτιον (at midnight), and ἀλεκτοροφωνίας (at cock-crowing), are given in connexion and contrast with πρωῖ (in the morning). The passages in the Gospels in which πρωῖ (morning) plays the most interesting and puzzling part are those connected with the visit of the women to the sepulchre after the resurrection of Jesus (Mt 28¹, Mk 16², Lk 24¹, and Jn 20¹). Here Mt. has 'late on the sabbath' (RV), while Mk. says 'very early on the first day of the week,' and Jn. 'while it was yet dark.' No explanation will prove satisfactory to all. But Mt.'s 'late on the sabbath' may be taken as reckoning the following night as a part of the Sabbath—a departure from Jewish usage (Meyer). In short, we may suppose that the Babylonian method of adding diurnally the night to the day, rather than the day to the night (Israelitish), had come at this time, more or less, into common use among the Jews, so that there were two ways of reckoning complete astronomical days: namely, first, by 'night-days,' and, secondly, by 'day-nights.' Then we need only to suppose Mt. to be thinking of the 'day-night,' and the difficulty vanishes; for 'late' in that 'day-night' would mean about the end of the night which followed the end of the Sabbath. This would accord perfectly with Mk.'s note of time, 'very early on the first day of the week.' Another solution of the difficulty is suggested by J. H. Moulton (Prolegomena, p. 72), that, according to the usage represented in the papyri, Mt.'s words rendered in RV 'late on the sabbath,' should be rendered 'late from the sabbath,' which is equivalent to saying 'after the sabbath.' This, too, would bring the words into harmony with those of Mark and John.

MOSES (Heb. מֹשֶׁה in accordance with the derivation from מָשַׁח 'to draw,' given in Ex 2¹⁰; LXX and NT usually Μωϋσῆς [Vulg. Moyseus], following the derivation adopted by Philo and Josephus from the Coptic mo 'water' and ushe 'saved, occasionally, however, Μωϋς; in conformity to the Hebrew. On its declension see Blass, Grammar of NT, § 10).—For an estimate of the position occupied by Moses in the Gospels, and his relation to the Person and work of Christ, a good starting-point is afforded by the words of He 3²⁻⁶, which may be paraphrased thus: Moses was intrusted by God with an influence which was to affect and permeate not only his own generation but the whole of the Old Dispensation; and he proved himself worthy of the trust. Christ was similarly faithful, but in two ways He far transcended Moses.—(a) Moses, for all the influence which he exercised, was yet a member, a portion, of the 'house' throughout which that influence extended; but Christ is God, the Builder and Maker of the 'house.' (b) Moses had a delegated authority in the house; he acted under orders as a trusted servant in the early stages of man's spiritual evolution; but his authority vanished when the Son came into possession. Moses may thus be considered under two aspects, which, however, are not entirely distinct, but blend into one another. (1) He is not so much a person as an instrument. He represented the Old Dispensation because he was the instrument through which the Law was given. (2) He is an historical personality. But, because he represented the Old Dispensation, many of his acts, and of the events of his career, and of the characteristics of his person, prove to be types—inferior and prophetic counterparts—of various factors in the Kingdom and the Person of Christ.

1. (a) It was the opinion universally held among Jews and Christians in Apostolic times, that Moses was the author of the Pentateuch. (On our Lord's acceptance of this opinion, see below).

Mk 12²⁶. The passage in Exodus relating God's appearance in the bush is said to occur 'in the book of Moses.' And in Lk 20³⁷ Moses 'pointed out' (δεικνύων) the truth of a resurrection of the dead in the passage about the bush, 'when he calleth the Lord the God of Abraham . . .' It was God Himself who used these words (Ex 3⁶), but Moses is spoken of as the author of the passage.

Mk 12¹⁹ || Lk 20²⁸. The Sadducees, in referring to the Levirate law, claim that 'Moses wrote unto us.' On || Mt 22²⁴ see below.

Jn 1⁴⁵. Philip speaks of 'him of whom Moses in the law, and the prophets, wrote.'

Lk 16^{29, 31} 24²⁷. Moses being the author of the Pentateuch, his name stands as synonymous with that which he wrote.

To these must be added the passages which speak of 'the law of Moses': Lk 2²² (the offering after childbirth), 24⁴⁴ ('the law of Moses, and the prophets, and the psalms'), Jn 7²³ (circumcision; cf. Ac 15¹⁻⁵). See also Ac 13³⁹ 26²² 28²³, Ro 5¹⁴ 10⁵, 1 Co 9⁹, 2 Co 3¹⁵, He 10²⁸.

(b) Besides this somewhat impersonal use of the name of Moses, there are passages which invest him with a more conscious responsibility and authority in connexion with the Law.

Mt 8⁴ || Mk 14⁴, Lk 5¹⁴. The healed leper is told to offer the gift which 'Moses enjoined.'

Mt 19⁷ || Mk 10³⁶. The Pharisees, 'tempting' Jesus, argue on the assumption that 'Moses commanded' a man to give his wife a writ of divorce. And our Lord answers them—'Moses allowed you to put away your wives (Mt.), he wrote you this commandment (Mk.), with a view to (εἰς) your hardness of heart.' Moses is here conceived of as looking out with a prophetic eye over the ages, and seeing that all future generations of Israel would alike harden their hearts against God; and that it would therefore be advisable to permit divorce as a necessary evil under certain circumstances, in order to limit and check man's sinful disposition. The words 'recognize the validity of the husband's act, but do not create the situation' (Swete). In Mk. our Lord anticipates the appeal to Moses by saying, 'What did Moses command you?' Mt. misses this, putting the τι ἰσχυλάτω into the mouth of the Pharisees (see Swete on the whole passage, Mk 10¹⁻⁶).

Mt 22²⁴. In citing the Levirate law, the Sadducees claim that 'Moses said'—for which the other Synoptists have the less personal 'Moses wrote.'

Mk 7¹⁰. Our Lord quotes the Fifth Commandment of the Decalogue, together with Ex 21¹⁷, with the words 'Moses said.' || Mt 15⁴ has 'God said.'

Mt 23². Moses, as the great teacher of the Law, used to sit (cf. Ex 18¹⁵), and deliver ex cathedra decisions. And the recognized teachers of the nation, the scribes and Pharisees, took up the same authoritative position (ὡς ἦν M. καθήδρας ἰσχυλάτω) when they became the exponents of the traditional rules by which the old Law was 'hedged.' Jesus does not find fault with the position; He says, in effect, 'as interpreters of the Law of God, show them all due reverence; as keepers of the Law of God, beware of following their example' (see Hastings' DB iii. 74^a).

In the Fourth Gospel this view of Moses' authority appears no less prominently.—

Jn 1¹⁷. 'The Law was given through Moses.' But this very fact places him and it on a lower plane than Christ and the Gospel. Moses was merely a channel, through whom the Law—which was something separate from himself—was given; whereas 'grace and truth came into being (ἐγένετο) through Jesus Christ,' because He Himself was, and is, grace and truth; so that we received the fulness of grace and truth 'because we all received of his fulness' (see Hort, The Way, the Truth, and the Life, p. 43 f.).

Jn 5⁴⁵. The national adherence to the Law is the resting of the national hopes upon Moses ('Moses on whom ye have placed your hope'). But (v. 46 f.) this adherence on your part ought to mean a loyal acceptance of his words, even though their true meaning is at variance with national expectations. Moses' words accuse you, for belief in his writings really involves belief in My words. 'He wrote of me.'

There are two senses in which it may be said that Moses wrote of Christ. Christ said (Mt 22³⁶⁻⁴⁰, cf. Dt 6⁵, Lv 19¹⁸) that on the two commandments—love to God, and love to man—all the Law is hung, and the prophets.' So that the true underlying meaning and motive of the whole Law was reflected in the spirit of Christ (see 'Christ the Interpreter of Prophecy,' by Kennett, Interpreter, Jan. 1906). But the Pentateuch contains more than the laws. A further sense in which Moses wrote of Christ is indicated in the whole of § 2 of the present article. Moses was quite unconscious that he wrote of Christ when he 'hung' the Law upon love; and he was similarly unconscious of it when he related events which were afterwards to receive a spiritual fulfilment in the religion of Christ.

Jn 7^{19, 22}. Our Lord shows the Jews that a strict observance of the letter of the whole Law is, in practice, impossible; and that He is therefore, from their own standpoint, entitled to heal on the Sabbath. 'Did not Moses give you the law? and yet not one of you carries it out in actual practice (κατὰ τὸν νόμον). For instance—Moses has given you circumcision; but in keeping that ordinance, you do not hesitate to break the letter of another, for you circumcise on the Sabbath. There is irony in the ἡνα μὴ λυθῆ ('that the law of Moses be not broken') of v. 23. But a further thought seems to be implied in the διὰ τοῦτο ('for this cause') with which v. 22 opens. Not only did Moses give you a law which it is impossible to keep with rigid exactness, but he gave it to you on this very account, i.e. that you might discover by experience its weakness and unprofitableness. A parenthesis, however, is thrown in to modify the δίδακειν. Moses 'has given' you circumcision in the sense that he has authoritatively endorsed it as a binding ordinance; but it did not originate from him; it was handed down 'from the fathers,' i.e. from the days when Abraham circumcised himself and his sons. (Our Lord uses a similar argument with regard to the Sabbath in Mt 12⁵).

Jn 9^{28f}. The Pharisees taunted the man who had been healed of his blindness with being a disciple of Jesus, while they were 'Moses' disciples.' In their eyes Moses held a position analogous to that of Mohammed or Buddha, or any great founder of a religion. They were Moses' disciples because they revered his writings and obeyed his commands. But Christ's true followers, while they are His disciples, are at the same time far more, because they are partakers in His Divine life.

See also Ro 10¹⁹ (the expression 'Moses saith' introducing the words of God, Dt 32²¹), He 7¹⁴.

The thought of this section finds concrete illustration in the narrative of Mt 17¹⁻⁸ || Mk 9²⁻⁸, Lk 9²⁸⁻³⁶. Moses and Elijah, the two grandest figures of the OT, who both fasted forty days and nights, who were both privileged to behold a theophany on Mt. Horeb, and who were both taken from the earth in a supernatural manner, represented 'the Law and the Prophets.' And they appeared to Him who was the fulfilment to which both pointed, and conversed with Him (Lk.) concerning His impending departure (ἔξοδος). Among other factors in the vision which taught a lesson to the watching disciples was the vanishing of Moses and Elijah when 'Jesus alone' remained. 'It helped them to see that the OT being fulfilled by Christ is done away in Christ' (Plummer in Hastings' DB iv. 808^a).

In all the above passages, both in (a) and (b), Moses does not appear strictly as a personality. He is not a man, possessed of individual character—of moral or spiritual attainments. He is the instrument through whom the Law was given to Israel (Ac 7³⁸)—the hand which wrote and the voice which spoke. And Jesus, together with the Jews of His day, thought of him as such. This fact is held by some to cut away the ground from the critical arguments which go to prove that Moses was not the author of the Pentateuch as it stands, and, indeed, that the greater part of the Pentateuchal law is in its present form later than the age of Moses. The question has been very fully discussed by many writers, so that only a brief notice is needed here. If, as Hebrew scholars contend, the evidence is overwhelming that the Pentateuch and the Laws contained in it are the result of a long growth, which was not completed until a period after the return of the Jews from exile, it is impossible for us to shut our eyes to this evidence on the assumption (for it is only an assumption) that our Lord's use of the name of Moses precludes further argument. An explanation sometimes given is that Jesus must have known the exact truth about the authorship of the Pentateuch, but that He made a concession to the ignorance of the Jews of His day. But a growing body of students rejects this as untenable, because it detracts from the complete humanity of our Lord. If, as man, He had a full knowledge of the results which modern study has reached with regard to the literary problems of the OT, He must also, as man, have known all future results which will be reached by the study of generations to come. In other words, as man He was omniscient. But this conflicts alike with our conception of complete manhood and with the explicit declaration that He 'advanced in wisdom' (Lk 2⁵²). We know that He could feel hungry and thirsty and weary, that He could be overcome with sleep, that He could manifest surprise; and on one occasion at least He spoke of something which 'no one knoweth, not the angels of heaven, nor the Son, but the Father only' (Mt 24³⁶, Mk 13³²). He was subject, therefore, to the ordinary limitations of manhood, and, as man, He acquired His knowledge by the methods which other men follow. The problem is a part of a larger one—the problem of determining to what extent, or in what sense, His Divine powers and prerogatives were in abeyance during His earthly life. Although fully and completely man, He did not cease to be God, and He did not cease to be conscious of His Divinity. 'It is this continuous self-consciousness of the Son of God that gives the true measure of His transcendent humility' (Gifford, The Incarnation, p. 90). We can venture the statement with respect to His knowledge, that though, as God, He never ceased to be omniscient, yet He refused to know, as man, anything which could not be learnt by human means. But when we have said that, we have only enunciated and not solved the problem. This is not the place to enter into it further. But there can be no doubt that it is along this line of thought that we must move, to justify modern criticism in denying to Moses the authorship of the Pentateuch which our Lord and His Apostles ascribed to him. See also artt. HUMANITY OF CHRIST and KENOSIS.

2. But because Moses was the representative of the Old Dispensation, Jesus and the NT writers thought of him as something more. He was an historical personage of such unique prominence in Israel's history, that his whole career affords parallels to spiritual factors in the New Covenant. The history of the old Israel repeats itself in that of the new. To say this is not to affirm that the OT writers had the slightest idea that the events which they described were one day to receive a spiritual fulfilment. The mind of God alone knew it, when He guided the events and inspired the writings.

The series of Mosaic events which NT writers cite as affording points of comparison with things spiritual, form an extremely interesting study, since they cover so many of the distinctive features of the New Dispensation, and illustrate in a striking manner the essential unity of the 'Divine Library.'

(a) 2 Co 37¹⁸. The centre of Christianity is the Incarnation—the dwelling of God's glory among men in the Person of Jesus Christ (Jn 1¹⁴). And St. Paul argues that the 'glory' upon Moses' face,* which accompanied his reception of the Law, was so great that the Israelites could not bear to gaze upon it, although that law was merely a ministration of death, and of condemnation: much more will the ministration of the spirit, and of righteousness, be of surpassing glory. Again, Moses realized that the 'glory' on his face was transitory, and so he could not boldly leave his face uncovered. And the veil which he wore still lies, spiritually speaking, on the hearts of the Jewish nation, and will not be removed till they 'turn to the Lord,' as Moses used to remove it when he returned to the Divine presence. But we Christians can speak boldly, and with unveiled face can reflect the glory of the Lord. If we are told that our gospel is obscure and hidden by a veil, it is only so in the case of those who are spiritually perishing. It is they who have been blinded by the 'god of this age,' to prevent the 'glory of God,' which is, in fact, the Incarnate Christ, from dawning upon them.

(b) Jn 3¹⁴. The Incarnation had its issue in the Passion. The connexion of this verse with v. 13 by the opening 'and,' and the repetition of the title 'Son of Man,' express this thought (see Westcott, in loc.). The difficulties in arriving at the ideas attached to the brazen serpent in the original story (Nu 21⁷⁻⁹), and of our Lord's application of it, are great. Patristic writers deal with it in a variety of ways—some of them deeply suggestive (see Westcott, p. 63 ff.). Two points stand out clearly—the lifting up of the Son of Man upon the Cross, and the spiritual healing of those who look up with faith to Him. But two others suggest themselves, though we cannot estimate the exact part which they played in our Lord's thought. (1) The serpent on the pole symbolized the evil from which the people had suffered; and Christ identified Himself with sinful humanity so completely, that when He was crucified He took sin 'out of the way, nailing it to his cross' (Col 2¹⁴, cf. Gal 3¹³, 1 P 2²⁴, with RVm). (2) The word 'be lifted up' (ὑψωθῆναι, exaltari) is applied elsewhere, not only to the Passion (Jn 8²⁸ 12³²⁻³⁴), but also to the Ascension (Ac 2³³ 5³¹, cf. Ph 2⁹ ὑπερ-ὑψώθη). Christ 'reigned from the Tree' in the supreme moment of victory, but that was only the first stage in a triumphal progress upwards.

* His use of the narrative is rendered easier by the LXX, which renders ἦν ('shone') by δεδόξαται and δεδοξασμένη (Ex 34^{29c}).

(c) Jn 19³⁶. Christ's death and the shedding of His blood procured atonement. This, in the minds of all Christians, has its counterpart in the Passover (He 11²⁸). St. John traces a fulfilment of a particular detail in the fact that no bone of our Lord's body was broken. And see 1 Co 5⁷.

(d) Christ's sacrifice is more clearly connected with the covenant sacrifice at Horeb (Ex 24⁴⁻⁸). Our Lord explicitly refers to it in the words of the institution of the Eucharist (Mt 26²⁸, Mk 14²⁴, Lk 22²⁰, 1 Co 11²⁵; see also He 9¹⁸⁻²⁰, 1 P 1², with Hort's note).

(e) He 12¹⁸⁻²⁴. Though pleading in heaven, Christ is still present among men; He is still incarnate; hence the existence of the Church which is His Body. In these verses the position and condition of the Church under the New Covenant is contrasted with that of the Israelites at Sinai, the characteristics of the two covenants being summed up in the words 'terror' and 'grace' (cf. Keble's Christian Year, 'Whitsunday').

(f) 1 Co 10². Sacramental incorporation into Christ's Divine life had its counterpart in the old Jewish Church; all the Israelites were 'baptized into Moses in the cloud and in the sea.'

Jn 6³⁰⁻³⁵ 41-58. By the other great sacrament, the Divine life is fed and nourished in the members of the Church. Our Lord teaches that 'it was not Moses, but God revealing Himself through Moses, who gave the manna; and again the manna—the perishable bread—was not in the highest sense "bread from heaven," but rather the symbol of spiritual food.' It is not here asserted that our Lord's discourse had reference exclusively to the Sacrament of the Holy Communion, which He was afterwards to institute. But it must have been impossible for St. John—and it is impossible for us—having heard the words spoken at the Last Supper, not to see in the present passage their fullest and deepest application.

1 Co 10³⁻⁴. As Christ is the Bread of Life, so He is the Water of Life. The Israelites, in the mind of St. Paul, did not eat and drink mere physical food and water, but spiritual. The two accounts of the striking of the rock by Moses for the production of water (Ex 17⁶, Nu 20¹¹) gave rise to the Rabbinic explanation that the rock which was struck followed them through the desert, affording a continual supply. That rock, says St. Paul, is typical of Christ.

(g) Ac 3² 7³⁷. Besides the spiritual nourishment, which fosters the Divine life in the soul, Christians need a Teacher, who will at all times reveal the will of God. Both St. Peter and St. Stephen see in Christ the fulfilment of the declaration in Dt 18¹⁵⁻¹⁸ that God would raise up a prophet like unto Moses. And John the Baptist, in his truthfulness and self-effacement, declares that he himself is not 'the Prophet,' but only a voice heralding His coming (Jn 1²¹ff.). And see Jn 6¹⁴ 7⁴⁰ [Lk 7³⁹].

(h) While the Israelites are the counterpart of the Christian Church, their enemies who opposed Moses (cf. 2 Ti 3⁹) afford a parallel to those who obey not the gospel. In Rev 8⁵ 7. 8 9²⁻⁴ 15^{6ff}. 16²⁻⁴ 10. 13. 18. 21 the symbolism of punishment is clearly based on the plagues of Egypt. On the other hand, those who have been redeemed from the slavery of sin can, like the Israelites rescued from Egypt, 'sing the song of Moses the servant of God' (Rev 15³).

MOTE.—See BEAM AND MOTE.

MOTH (σῆς).—The Bible frequently makes reference to the destructive action of the moth as a fit symbol of the perishableness of man and his earthly possessions. In Oriental countries, where so large a part of 'treasure' consisted of costly silken and woollen fabrics, the figure was peculiarly appropriate and impressive. Specially referred to is the 'clothes' moth,' one or more (not readily identified as to its particular member of the family) of the genus Tinea, which may be said to have an almost cosmopolitan distribution. The larva of this moth feeds on wool, silk, hair, fur, feathers, etc. Out of the material on which it feeds it forms a portable case or house, supposed to be alluded to as an image of instability (though Cheyne [EB], 'Moth'] denies this) in Job 27^{18a}. The moth first finishes its case, which is often motley-coloured on account of the variety of material from which it draws supplies, and afterwards feeds voraciously on the substance from which the tent or house has been produced. For building purposes it selects the long straight fibres, but for food the shortest and thickest, and in order to get the latter it eats down below the surface pile to the fabric itself. The feeding process is therefore the most destructive to the fabric. The yellowish-brown pupa is either formed in this structure which the larva constructs, or in a slight cocoon. Before the perfect insect appears the mischief is accomplished, for large patches are eaten in the clothes, carpets, or tapestry where the parent moth has laid its eggs. If the action of the insect is undiscovered, or by carelessness allowed to be completed, it makes the fabric into a mere flimsy shell which falls into nothingness on the least touch or breath. 'Crushed before the moth' (Job 4¹⁹) is a faithful description of this most effective destruction—an apt figure of the insidious, deadly work of evil in the human character.

Our Lord refers to this well-known phenomenon in the Sermon on the Mount (Mt 6¹⁹⁻²⁰, Lk 12³³). Along with the corroding work of the rust—due to chemical action on metals left unused and exposed—He classes the ravages of the moth, as illustrations of the inevitable corruption and decay which overtake all earthly things apart from the heavenly and Divine. Men are not to set their affections on things that belong to the earth (things which contain no higher and heavenly element), are not to make these their treasures, for in that case their heart, the centre of their life, set upon these decaying, perishing things, is itself subject to similar destructive forces—'Where your treasure is, there will your heart be also.' All earthly things are to be valued, not in themselves as ends, but as means to the higher spiritual life. The affection is to be positively fixed on the enduring things of human virtue, knowledge, and character, formed and obtained by fellowship with the Divine—elements which all lower things are adapted to subserve, and which themselves 'neither moth nor rust can corrupt.' T. H. WRIGHT.

MOTHER.—Concerning the relations of Jesus with His mother, and her influence upon His training, we can but infer that the mother of such a son must herself have been an exceptional personality. See art. MARY (VIRGIN). Professor W. M. Ramsay, in his Education of Christ, shows how thorough was the instruction given to the Jewish youth. With this the mother had much to do. Granted that religious genius is not to be accounted for by environment, there still remains the overwhelming probability that the feminine qualities in the character of Jesus—His graciousness, gentleness, and sympathy—found a congenial setting in the home at Nazareth. Had it been otherwise, some hint of the fact must have been given in the records of His public ministry. It has been contended that such a hint is given in Mk 3^{31ff}, an incident which also finds a place in the other Evangelists. Another is Mt 10³⁵⁻³⁷ || Mk 10²⁹, Lk 12⁵³ 14²⁶. But it should not be overlooked that these hyperbolic expressions by no means involve the repudiation of the filial tie. They are rather designed to mark the thoroughness with which the religious life should be embraced, the higher love absorbing and transforming the lower. The emphasis with which, in other connexions, Jesus denounces contemporary sins against the filial relationship is a proof that with Him the ideal life did not consist with holding it in contempt (Mk 7¹⁰⁻¹³, Mt 15⁴⁻⁹). The filial relationship is to be superseded only by the greater sacredness of the conjugal (Mt 19⁵, Mk 10⁷). In His response to the question of the rich young ruler Jesus emphasizes the command to honour father and mother (Mt 19¹⁹ etc.), but (Mt 19²⁹ etc.) loyalty to the truth as expressed in Himself is made to take precedence of all other ties. The reason for this insistence is obvious, and has been abundantly illustrated in the history of the world's benefactors.

Concerning our Lord's dealings with other mothers than His own, few details are given in the Gospels. It is noteworthy that the mother of Zebedee's children (Mt 20²⁰) goes unbuked, as does the action of the mothers who brought their children to Him (Mk 10¹³). His sympathy with motherhood may be inferred from these incidents, as also from the healing of the daughter of the Canaanitish woman (Mt 15²², Mk 7²⁶). The same is implied in the pathetic phrase (Lk 23²⁸) uttered on the way to Calvary. In nothing is the uniqueness of Jesus more clearly seen than in this kind of reverence for womanhood, so unexpected in a religious teacher of His time (Jn 4²⁷). See WOMAN.

MOUNT, MOUNTAIN (ōros).—Mountains figure often in the narratives of Christ's life. This is natural, considering the highly mountainous character of the country in which He lived. At no point in His journeyings were the mountains out of sight; and if He was not actually on or among them, they were never a great way off.

The Mount of Olives (wh. see) is named in the Gospels—the mountain that rises beyond the Kidron Valley, east of Jerusalem, from the S.E. slope of which Bethany looks out over the wilderness. In two passages we see from the context which mountains are referred to. In Mt 21²¹ 'to this mountain' points clearly to Olivet, on which Jesus and His disciples stood, viewing the cursed and withered fig-tree. In Jn 4²⁰ 'this mountain' can be no other than Gerizim, on whose rocky summit, amid the ruins of ancient splendour, the remnant of Samaritans still annually eliant their weird service at the feast of the Passover. In other places, such as Mt 24¹⁶, 'mountain' must be taken generally as meaning the wilder and more inaccessible parts, forming natural places of refuge, Judæa itself being almost entirely mountainous (cf. Rev 6¹⁵). So also with the haunts of the demoniac (Mk 5²). The 'mountain' on (Lk 8²²) or near (Mk 5¹¹) which the swine were feeding must have been the western edge of the great plateau which stretches from the desert to the lip of the Ghôr, and drops a distance of some 2000 feet to the eastern shore of the Sea of Galilee. The place intended is probably a little north of the old fortress of Gamala, where the foot of the swift slope runs almost to the water.

Perhaps only men familiar with the steep cliffs and beetling crags of Palestinian mountains would think of calling in their terror upon the mountains to fall and cover them (Lk 23³⁰).

Regarding the position of three mountains there has been much discussion—the mountain of the Temptation (Mt 4⁸, Lk 4⁸), the Mount of Beatitudes (Mt 5¹), and the Mount of Transfiguration (Mt 17¹ etc.).

The evidence we possess is mainly negative, tending to show that traditional identifications are impossible. As to the first, if any actual height is intended, Jebel Kuruntal, with its cave-fretted brows frowning over Jericho, and the district to the south, are bleak and inhospitable enough, and there certainly the sojourner by night would be 'with the wild beasts' (Mk 1¹³). But there is no height at all suggesting the description 'an exceeding high mountain.'

The tradition identifying Kara Hattin with the scene of the Sermon on the Mount dates only from Crusading times. To the traveller journeying towards Tiberias from Nazareth or Tabor, the double-peaked hill seems easy of approach. But from any part of the seashore the ascent is steep, and from Gennesaret, where our Lord was at work, the way, as the present writer knows from much experience, is both long and toilsome. With so many heights near the plain, quite suitable for the Master's purpose, the necessity for this difficult journey is not apparent. Further, certain traces of ancient buildings lend colour to the idea that, in our Lord's time, the hill may have been occupied.

The Roman and Greek Churches still maintain the traditional identification of Mount Tabor with the scene of the Transfiguration, and, in accordance with their separate calendars, that august event is annually commemorated there. It must be remembered, however, that they have much valuable property on the mountain—the great monasteries—which an admission of error would render worthless, while the contributions received from streams of pilgrims would be diverted. Most modern students of the question locate the Transfiguration on Mount Hermon; if not on the summit itself, on one of the lower spurs. This would satisfy the requirements of the narrative; whereas the journey south to Tabor, through Galilee, and back again to Capernaum, within the time specified, while possible, is highly improbable. The present writer spent some weeks in the summer of 1891 on the top of Tabor, and was led to emphatic agreement with the opinion that the presence of a town or fortress on the mountain in the days of Christ makes the traditional identification utterly impossible. See art. TRANSFIGURATION.

On a mountain in Galilee the risen Jesus gave His disciples their great commission (Mt 28¹⁶). The circumstances suggest some height familiar to all, not far from the scenes of the Galilean ministry, commanding a wide prospect. Certain identification is, of course, impossible, but these conditions are well fulfilled by Jebel Kan'an, a bold headland projecting southward from the great bulk of Naphtali. The spacious view ranges from Carmel and the Mediterranean to the eastern ridges of Bashan, and from snowy Hermon to the dim mountains guarding the Dead Sea. In the great hollow below sleep the blue waters of Galilee, the white-sailed fishing boats recalling imperishable memories.

In hours of devotion Jesus seemed to long for the solitude and stillness to be found only on lonely heights by night (Mt 14²³, Mk 6⁴⁶, Lk 6¹² 9²⁸, Jn 6¹⁵). From a mountain at last He passed into the invisible (Lk 24³⁰, Ac 1⁹, 12). See also art. HILL.

MOUNT OF OLIVES (τὸ ὄρος τῶν ἐλαιῶν, Mt 21¹ 24³ 26³⁰, Mk 13³ 14²⁶, Lk 19³⁷ 22³⁹, Jn 8¹; and τὸ ὄρος τὸ καλούμενον ἐλαιῶν, Lk 19²⁹ 21³⁷).—One of the universally accepted holy sites around Jerusalem. It is to-day known as Jebel et-Târ (the mountain of the elevation or tower) by the Moslems, and as Jebel ez-Zeitûn (the mount of olives) by native Christians and, indeed, also by Moslems. By the Jews, besides the above mentioned, the name 'mountain of light' has also been given, from the fact that here used to be kindled the first beacon-fire to signalize through the land the appearance of each new moon.

The mount due east of Jerusalem forms the culminating height of a range which, separating itself from the central plateau near the village of Sha'phat, runs for two miles, first S. and then S.W., and terminates beyond the village of Silwân at the Wady en-Nâr. The beginning of the range has very generally been accepted as the Scopus (prospect) of Josephus, and the part running S.W.—Batn el-Hawa—considerably lower than the part east of the city and not higher than the Temple area itself, has by many been identified as the Mount of Offence. Although these have been described by some authorities as parts of the Mount of Olives, there seems no real reason for including them in the description, and to do so is confusing.

The natural boundaries of Olivet are to-day well defined by two ancient roads. To the N. a very ancient highway to Jericho, after traversing a deep bay* in the range, which from the city side seems to separate the range into two, crosses a low neck cutting off the northern part, now crowned by the house of Sir John Grey Hill, from the southern loftier mass—the true Mount of Olives. To the S. the road which runs to Bethany forms a convenient if somewhat arbitrary division, cutting off Olivet from the so-called 'Mount of Offence' and from other spurs to the south. To the W. the boundary is sufficiently plainly marked off by the deep valley of the Kidron, while to the E. there are indications (see Lk 19²⁹ 24⁵⁰; cf. Ac 1¹²) for including within the limits the projecting spur on which Bethany stands. Probably the limits were never defined geographically, but the whole area was distinguished, as it is to some extent to-day, by its thick plantations of olives, figs, and palms,—hence the names Bethphage (house of figs) and Bethany (house of dates). This fertility, though no doubt most constantly observed by the city dwellers, to whom the beautiful slopes, then as they do to-day, would appeal most refreshingly as viewed from the dirty, squalid streets, must also have held out to the tired and thirsty travellers, ascending the dry and dusty wilderness from the Jordan to the city, an enchanting prospect of coolness and refreshment. For this alone it would appear only reasonable to include the sites of the villages on the eastern side, with their abundant gardens, as an essential part of the Mount. There can be little doubt that in the days of Christ the hill was thickly spread with verdure over parts which to-day are given up to churches, hovels, and extensive cemeteries.

* This open valley, in which to-day are many olives and also at least one ancient olive press, is an attractive site for Gethsemane (which see), though it must be admitted that tradition is all against it.

Viewing the mountain thus, two principal summits and two subsidiary spurs may be described. The N. summit is that known as Karem es-Sayyād (the vineyard of the hunter), and also as the Viri Galilæi; it reaches a height of 2723 feet above the Mediterranean, and is separated from the S. mass by a narrow neck of land traversed to-day by the new carriage road. As far back as 530 this hill is spoken of as Galilee, and in the Acts of Pilate (about 350) a mountain near Jerusalem called 'Galilee' is mentioned. It is said to have first received its name Γαλιλαία because the Galilæans attending the feasts used to encamp there, or as Sæwulf (1102) says, it 'was called Galilee because the Apostles, who were called Galilæans, frequently visited there.*' The S. summit, of practically equal height, is the traditional Mount of the Ascension, and has for some years been distinguished by a lofty tower erected by the Russians. Here, too, Constantine erected his Church of the Ascension in 316 on the site where now stands its successor (erected 1834-5) of the same name. Here also is the Church of the Creed and the Paternoster Church, the latter a modern building on the site of one of that name destroyed long ago. Scattered over the summit is a modern Moslem village—Kefr et-Târ—which combines with the noisy conduct of its rapacious inhabitants in spoiling the quiet beauty and holy associations of this sacred spot.

A small spur running S. is sometimes known as the Hill of the Prophets, on account of the interesting old 'Tomb of the Prophets'—a sepulchre generally believed, until recently,† to have been originally Jewish—which is situated there; and the other somewhat isolated spur to the S.E., on which stands the wretched, half-ruined village of el-Azarîyeh, on the site of Bethany, should, for reasons given, be included in the Mount.

Along the W. slopes facing the city lies the reputed Garden of Gethsemane (part, too, of the

* Attempts have been made to harmonize the accounts of the appearances of Jesus after His resurrection by supposing that this was the place where He appointed His disciples to meet Him. A recent discussion of the subject by Lepsius will be found in Das Reich Christi, Nos. 7 and 8 (1902).

† According to Father Vincent and M. Clermont-Ganneau, it is not Jewish, but belongs to the 4th or 5th cent. A.D. (see PEFS, 1901, pp. 309-317).

Mount, cf. Lk 22³⁹; see GETHSEMANE) of the Latins and its Greek rival; and a little higher up the hill to the S. the great Russian Church of St. Magdalene. The greater part of the slopes of the S.W. part of the hill is filled with a vast number of graves, those from the valley bottom till a little above the Bethany road being Jewish, while higher up are some Christian cemeteries. The Jews have a strong sentiment about being buried on this spot, the slopes of the 'Valley of Jehoshaphat' being traditionally, with them and with the Moslems, the scene of the resurrection and final judgment.

Traversing this side of the Mount are three steep paths, all probably ancient. The most evident and important is the N. one, which continues the line of the path from the St. Stephen's Gate and the Tomb of the Virgin. It runs along the depression between the two summits, and is the direct route for travellers crossing the Mount from or to Bethany. Too steep for riding, it is essentially the short cut for the pedestrian. The second path, still steeper, branches off from this just above the Garden of Gethsemane, and after passing the traditional scene of the lamentation of Jesus over the city, leads to-day to the Russian tower and buildings. It is the path of the modern pilgrim. The third, more gradual in ascent, starts from the Garden of Gethsemane and ascends the hill through Russian property in a S. direction, passing near the 'Tomb of the Prophets.' Whether the first or second of these lies most in the direction of our Lord's frequent passages from the city to the Mount of Olives and to Bethany, it is difficult to say, but it can hardly be supposed that He came by such a path on the morning of His triumphal entry into the city. The only likely course for the highroad of Roman times must have been in the general direction of the present Bethany and Jericho road; and, as Dean Stanley has suggested, the most natural site for the scene of the lamentation over the city is the point where this highroad crosses the S.W. shoulder of the Mount and the first full view of the city is obtained. A viaduct appears to have connected the Mount with the Temple hill, probably on the site of one of the two bridges which to-day span the dry torrent bed of the Kidron.

The Mount of Olives in the days of Christ must have presented rural fertility, verdure, and quiet very grateful to country visitors to the great metropolis; fresh mountain breeziness in contrast to the closeness and foulness of the city atmosphere, and a view of the beloved and sacred city in which all that was sordid was lost, and only the beauty and grandeur remained. This view is, when the historical associations are taken into consideration, probably the most fascinating in the Holy Land. It is seen at its best about the hour of sunset. In its essential details it is one on which the eyes of Christ must frequently have rested.

To the immediate W. is the Holy City, separated from the onlooker by the deep Valley of Jehoshaphat; just within the wall lies the 'Dome of the Rock' and the al-Aksa mosque, and in the open space of the great Temple area figures of people may be discerned moving about. Beyond this enclosure lie, pile above pile, the domed houses of the modern city, interspersed with the minarets, the synagogue domes, and the church towers of the followers of the three great Semitic religions: most prominent of all are the two domes and the massive tower which go to make up the Church of the Holy Sepulchre. Far to the W. lie the battlements of the so-called Tower of David, and behind that, on the horizon, the W. mountains of Judæa shut off the distant sea. The roar of the city is deadened, but the fresh breeze carries the chiming of many bells, the blast of a military bugle or the roar of a salute from the barracks, reminding the onlooker that it is no dead city of the far past he is looking at. Somewhat to the N. the eye passes from the close-packed streets of the Moslem and Christian quarters, past the long line of the N. wall, to the many buildings of the newer Jerusalem, chiefly mean Jewish houses, but among them many handsome buildings like the great French Hospice, the Russian Cathedral, or the Abyssinian Church. Here lies all that is progressive and of promise for the days to be. Beyond again, against the sky line to the N., rises the outline of Nebi Samu'el crowning the height of Mizpeh.

Turning S. the spectator sees the bare slopes south of the city walls, once thickly covered with the houses of the poor, terminating in the two deep valleys of Kidron and Hinnom, while on the opposite slope some of the houses of Silwân may be distinguished. Far to the S. in a gap in the hills lies the convent of Mar Elias on the road to Bethlehem; and to its left a crater-shaped hill—the Herodium—the burial-place of Herod the Great.

As the eye passes gradually E. over the wilderness of Judaea, it is caught by the still beauty of the Dead Sea lying nearly 4000 feet below, but in the clear atmosphere looking very near, while behind lies the long level line of the beautiful hills of Moab. More in the foreground a few houses of Bethany appear, and behind them the village of Abu Dis—inhabited by the hereditary robbers of the Jericho road. Northward of the great lake, beyond a vista of tumbled hills and parched valleys, lies the Jordan Valley, through the centre of which may be traced, by a serpentine line of green, the course of the famous river itself. Eastward of this the line of Moab is continued N. as the mountains of Gilead, with their one distinct summit—Jebel Ôshâ—almost directly E. of the onlooker.

Gospel incidents connected with the Mount of Olives.—Although, with the single exception of Jn 8¹, all the incidents expressly connected with the Mount of Olives belong to the Passion week, there can be no doubt (Lk 21³⁷) that this quiet spot was one beloved and frequented by the Master. Here He withdrew from the city for rest and meditation (Jn 8¹) and for prayer (Mt 26³⁰ etc.). Once we read of His approach to the Mount from the Eastern side 'unto Bethphage and Bethany, at the Mount of Olives' (Mk 11¹ || Mt 21¹ || Lk 19²⁹). Over a part of the Mount He must have made His triumphal progress to the city (Mt 21, Mk 11, Lk 19), and on this road He wept over Jerusalem (Lk 19⁴⁰⁻⁴⁴). During the whole of that week 'in the daytime he was teaching in the temple; and at night he went out and abode in the Mount that is called of Olives' (Lk 21³⁷)—the special locality on the Mount being Bethany (Mt 21¹⁷, Mk 11¹¹). Crossing over from Bethany, Jesus illustrated His teaching by the sign of the withering of the barren fig-tree (Mt 21^{18, 19} || Mk 11^{12-14, 20-22}), and on the slopes of this hill, with the doomed city spread out before them, Christ delivered to His disciples His wonderful eschatological discourse (Mt 24³⁶ || Mk 13³⁷). Then here, in the Garden of Gethsemane, occurred the Agony, the Betrayal, and the Arrest (Mt 26³⁶⁻⁵⁶, Mk 14²⁶⁻⁵², Lk 22³⁹⁻⁵³, Jn 18¹⁻¹²). Lastly, on the Mount, not on the summit where tradition places it, but near Bethany, occurred the Ascension (Lk 24⁵⁰⁻⁵², Ac 1¹²).

To these incidents where the Mount of Olives is expressly mentioned may be added the scene in the house of Martha and Mary (Lk 10³⁸⁻⁴²), the raising of Lazarus (Jn 11), and the feast at the house of Simon (Mt 26⁶⁻¹³, Mk 14⁵⁻⁹, Jn 12¹⁻¹⁹); for, as has

MOURNING.—An expression of grief for death or disaster. See also artt. LAMENTATION and RENDING OF GARMENTS. Mourning is associated in the Gospels (1) with 'the appearance of the sign of the Son of Man,' Mt 24³⁰; (2) with the removal of the visible presence of the Saviour, Mt 9¹⁵; (3) with the death of friends. It is also one of the conditions mentioned in the Beatitudes as bearing a special blessing (Mt 5⁴, but cf. Lk 6²¹). The laws of mourning were very minute. The general time of mourning was seven days, during which the mourner was forbidden to work, wash, anoint himself, or wear his shoes. This last provision might, however, be evaded by putting earth or ashes into his boots. For seven days the mourner might not read in the Law, the Prophets, or the Talmud, because it was a 'joy' to do so; but a teacher could teach others through an interpreter. The mourner was allowed during this period to read only the books of Job, Jeremiah, Lamentations, and the הלכות אבילות (Laws of Mourning). He had to sit away from his dead, with his head tied up, and on the first day he might not wear his phylacteries. He was forbidden to shave his head or his neck, or do anything which might be considered to be for his comfort. He could take no part in rejoicings, and the rent in his garments was to be seen for thirty days. Even a poor man, or one who lived on charity, was forbidden to work for three days; but after that time he might do work secretly, for his maintenance, or his wife might spin in his house. Travelling with goods was forbidden, and no business even at the risk of loss could be transacted by himself or his family or his servants. It was allowable, however, to have a business carried on, if he assigned it to another before the departure of the soul. The mourner was allowed to eat only in his own house; he might eat no flesh and drink no wine; nor could he ask blessing before or after food. Extra-Talmudical regulations enjoined that the mourner should sit on the floor and take his food from a chair instead of a table, and, as is still the custom, that he should eat eggs dipped in ashes with salt. He might not leave town for thirty days; and in the case of mourning for a parent he might not go out of town for the first year, till his friends told him to do so. After the death of a wife, a widower might not marry for a year (i.e. till after three feasts had passed); but if his wife had died childless, or if she had left young children, he might marry after seven days. A mourner being 'free' must attend the synagogue; when he appeared, the congregation faced him as he entered, and said: 'Blessed is He that comforteth the mourner.' Immediately on a death, all water in the house and in three houses on either side was emptied out, because of the belief that the Angel of Death procured death by means of a knife which he washed in water close at hand. Between death and burial the mourner was free from all the Law, because he was supposed to be beside himself with grief. The following is the prescribed prayer before meat to be used in the house of the mourner after burial:—

'Blessed art thou, O God our Lord, King of the universe, God of our Fathers, our Creator, our Redeemer, our Sanctifier, the Holy One of Jacob, the King of Life, who art good and doest good; the God of truth, the righteous Judge who judgeth in righteousness, who takes the soul in judgment, and rulest alone in the universe, who doest in it according to His will, and all His ways are in Judgment, and we are His people and His servants, and in everything we are bound to praise Him and to bless Him, who shields all the calamities of Israel and will shield us in this calamity, and from this mourning will bring us to life and peace. Comfort, O God our Lord, all the mourners of Jerusalem, and all the mourners that mourn in our sorrow. Comfort them in their mourning, and make them rejoice in their agony as a man is comforted by his mother. Blessed art Thou, O God, the Comforter of Zion, and that buildest again Jerusalem' (Jewish prayer-books from יִרְמֵה יִרְמֵה).

The practice of hiring mourners was common with such as could afford it, and, as in the story of Jairus' daughter, these hired mourners used flutes to increase the sounds of woe. The apostasy of a member of the family was the occasion of mourning as for the dead, and a blasphemy spoken in the presence of the high priest was also a reason for a demonstration of mourning. MOUTH (Mt 4¹ 12³⁴ 15¹¹ 18¹⁶ 21¹⁶, and Lk 1⁷⁰).—In conformity with Oriental usage, 'mouth,' considered as the organ of speech, is used in the NT, as in the OT, in the sense of 'language,' 'utterance,' etc.—a notable instance of the primitive employment of the concrete for the abstract. Indeed, among the ancient Hebrews 'mouth' was even personified, e.g. in such expressions as 'The mouth of the Lord has spoken it,' etc.—a usage that helped not a little to prepare the Jewish mind at last to apprehend the meaning of the Word made flesh. Most passages of the Gospels where 'mouth' is found are quotations from the OT (LXX), e.g. 'Every word that proceedeth out of the mouth of God' (διὰ στόματος θεοῦ, Dt 8³); 'in the mouth of two or three witnesses' (ἐπὶ στόματος, Dt 17⁶ 19¹⁵); 'out of the mouth of babes and sucklings' (ἐκ στόμα, Ps 8² etc.); cf. Zacharias' words, Lk 1⁷⁰ 'as he spake by the mouth of his holy prophets' (διὰ στόματος); and Jesus' words to His disciples, 'I will give you a mouth (στόμα) and wisdom' (21¹⁵).

MULTITUDE.—This word is used in EV to translate ὄχλος and πλῆθος.

(1) ὄχλος is defined by Grimm-Thayer as 'a casual collection of people, a multitude of men who have flocked together in some place, a throng.' The plural of ὄχλος, which often occurs in Mt. and Lk., is found twice in Mk., viz. 6³³ (TR; all the best MSS omit) and 10⁴ without the article; once only in Jn. (7¹² where κD Vulg. give sing.), meaning probably the various groups or companies (cf. Lk 24⁴) which had come up to the feast. In AV it is rendered 'multitude' and frequently 'people,' also 'press' (Mk 24 527.30, Lk 8¹⁹ 19³) and 'company' (Lk 5²⁹ 6¹⁷ 9³⁸ [but 'people' in v.37] 12¹³, Jn 6⁵). RV usually gives 'multitude,' but in some passages prefers 'crowd,' from A.S. crūdan, 'to push,' 'throng,' apparently in cases where the ὄχλος would cause inconvenient pressure, cf. Mk 3⁹ (διὰ τὸν ὄχλον ἵνα μὴ θλιβῶσιν αὐτὰς), also Mt 9²³, Mk 24 527.30, Lk 8¹⁰ 19³; yet in Mk 5²¹ where συνθλιβόντα is used of ὄχλος (tr. 'crowd' in the previous verse), and in Lk 5¹ where the ὄχλος is described as pressing upon Him (πιπιεῖσθαι), RV rather inconsistently uses 'multitude.' The following phrases may be noted—(a) ὄχλος ἰκανός, which RV in Mk 10⁴⁶ translates 'great multitude' (AV a 'great number of people'), yet in Lk 7¹² renders, as AV, 'much people,' probably because in the preceding verse 'great multitude' is used for a different collection of persons; (b) ὁ πᾶσις ὄχλος or ὁ ὄχλος πᾶσις forming almost a composite term 'the common people' (Mk 12³⁷, Jn 12⁹ and 12¹² RVm); (c) ὁ πλείστος ὄχλος, Mt 21⁸ RV, 'the most part of the multitude,' AV 'a very great multitude,' Vulg. plurima turba; in Mk 4¹ ὄχλος πλείστος is read by κB, al.; (d) τὸν ἑκατὸν τῶν ὄχλων, Lk 12¹ 'the many thousands of the multitude' (RV), 'an innumerable multitude of people' (AV), multitudo (Vulg.); this ὄχλος appears to be the largest mentioned in the Gospels, and the words 'in the mean time' (iv. αἰ) at the beginning of the verse suggest that it was drawn together by the conflict between Christ and His adversaries which is narrated in the previous chapter.

(2) πλῆθος occurs 12 times in the Gospels, of which 8 are in Lk. (1⁹ 2¹³ 5⁶ 6¹⁷ 8³⁷ 19³⁷ 23¹ 27), 2 in Mk. (3⁷ 9), and 2 in Jn. (5² 21⁶); in only two cases is it used otherwise than of a collection of persons (Lk 5⁶, Jn 21⁶ a 'multitude of fishes'). AV renders the word by 'multitude' in all passages except Lk 23²⁷ where it gives 'company.' There is more variety in RV, which employs 'multitude' in 9 places, but also 'company' (Lk 23¹), 'number of the people' (6¹⁷), and 'people' in 8³⁷, where Humphry (Commentary on the Revised Version) says it would not be in accordance with English idiom to say 'the whole multitude of the country'; yet the latter is the tr. of AV, which does not usually err in this respect. 'People' is elsewhere almost invariably reserved by RV to tr. λαός. All three Gr. words occur in Lk 6¹⁷ ὄχλος πᾶσις μαθητῶν αὐτοῦ καὶ πλῆθος πᾶσι τοῦ λαοῦ (AV 'the company of his disciples and a great multitude of people,' RV 'a great multitude of his disciples and a great number of the people').

The multitude occupies a distinct position in the Gospels; those of whom it was composed are marked off from the disciples (cf. Mk 8³⁴, Lk 9¹⁶. 18, and Mt 23¹, where the disciples appear round Jesus in the foreground, the multitude farther off, and the Pharisees in the background). They are also distinguished from the ruling classes who despised them and held them in contempt, regarding them as accursed through their ignorance of the Law (Jn 7⁴⁹), and a prey to any designing teacher (7¹². 47f.). Thus the 'multitude' answers to ἀμὴν ἡῶν ἄρα, 'people of the land,' 'common persons,' which was the name given to those who were not ἡδβέρτοι, i.e. not strict observers of the Law (see Hastings' DB iii. 743^a, 826). Hillel used to say, 'No brutish man is sin-fearing, nor is one of the people of the land pious,' and Rabbinical writers used such contemptuous expressions as 'the ignorant is impious; only the learned shall have part in the resurrection' (Godet on Jn 7⁴⁹). Yet it was felt that the multitude would be formidable from its very numbers if it were only united under a leader in one common purpose. Accordingly we read that Herod was restrained from putting John the Baptist to death since he feared the multitude, because they counted him as a prophet (Mt 14⁵). For the same reason the chief priests and elders dared not say that John's baptism was of men (21²⁶). This same fear prevented the chief priests and the Pharisees from laying hold on Jesus (21⁴⁶); they decided not to arrest Him on the feast day (Mk 14²), 'lest haply there shall be a tumult of the people' (λαοῦ, note the future εἶσται, which shows their positive expectation of trouble); and they arranged with Judas for His betrayal 'in the absence of the multitude' (RVm 'without tumult,' ἀπερ ὄχλου, Lk 22⁶, cf. 19⁴⁷f.). The multitude, however, at ordinary times was greatly under the influence of their rulers, looking up to them as guides in religious matters, cf. Jn 7¹². 13 'there was much murmuring among the multitudes concerning him: some said, He is a good man; others said, Not so, but he leadeth the multitude astray. Howbeit no man spake openly of him for fear of the Jews.' This whole chapter is important as showing the relations between the ruling classes and the multitude, and also the discussions between different sections of the latter as to the claims of Jesus, and the gradual development into belief or disbelief (see especially vv. 25-27. 31. 40-44 and art. MURMURING). Here also perhaps may be noted Lk 12¹. The violent scene of ch. 11 'had found its echo outside; a considerable crowd had flocked together. Excited by the animosity of their chiefs, the multitude showed a disposition hostile to Jesus and His disciples. Jesus feels the need of turning to His own, and giving them, in presence of all, those encouragements which their situation demands' (Godet). The power of the same influence is seen in the account of the Trial, cf. Mt 27²⁰ 'the chief priests and the elders persuaded the multitudes that they should ask for Barabbas and destroy Jesus'—words which suggest that if left to themselves they might have listened to Pilate's proposal, but their leaders turned the scale against Jesus. It must be remembered that this multitude which cried for His blood was mainly, if not entirely, composed of Jews of Jerusalem. It was therefore quite distinct from the multitude which had accompanied Jesus at His triumphal entry, and which largely consisted of pilgrims from Galilee coming to the feast. For the meeting of the two multitudes see Mt 21^{10, 11}, and note how the answer of v. 11 is already greatly modified from the Hosanna cries of v. 9. Accordingly the favourite use of these incidents as illustrations of the proverbial fickleness of a crowd—shouting Hosanna and waving palm branches one day, and crying 'Crucify him' the next—though attractive, is without justification.

Jesus regarded with deep pity the multitudes who came to Him. We read that on one occasion He had compassion on them because they were εσκαυμένοι και ερριμμένοι, as sheep not having a shepherd. (Mt 9³⁶).

If these words primarily describe the physical aspect of those who came to Him on this occasion, then εσκαυμένοι, which properly means 'flayed,' 'mangled,' will signify here 'distressed and wearied by long travelling'; and ερριμμένοι, 'prostrated by fatigue, lying down like tired sheep' (cf. Vulg. jacentes). Thus they will express mute misery, and a half unconscious appeal to the Divine compassion, and they are so taken by Meyer, and Bruce in Exposit. Gr. Testament. But if, as seems more likely, the expressions are mainly figurative, εσκαυμένοι will mean 'hunted and distressed by spiritual foes,' harassed by the tyranny of the scribes and Pharisees with their 'heavy burdens' (cf. Mt 23⁴); and ερριμμένοι, 'scattered,' without true spiritual shepherds, John the Baptist being imprisoned and their regular teachers shamefully neglecting their duties. This agrees better with the Lord's remark in v. 37 that 'the labourers are few,' and with the commission of the Twelve immediately following in ch. 10, as the result of His compassion; so RV 'distressed and scattered'; AV 'they fainted,' following TR, which reads εκλελυμένοι for εσκαυμένοι, with very little MS support.

On other occasions His compassion for the multitude led Him to heal their sick (Mt 14¹⁴), and to feed the 4000 (Mt 15³², Mk 8²).

The astonishment and wonder with which the multitude regarded Jesus is a very marked feature in the Gospels, especially in Mk. and Lk. (see art. ATTRIBUTES OF CHRIST, ii. 9). These feelings were excited by the manner and substance of His teaching (Mt 7²⁸ 22³³, Mk 1²², Lk 4³²), by His words of grace (Lk 4²²), and also by His mighty works (Mt 9^{8, 33} 15³¹, Mk 2¹² 5²⁰ 7³⁷, Lk 4³⁶ 5²⁶ 7¹⁶ 9⁴³ 11¹⁴). The people never became so familiar with His miracles as to take them as a matter of course. It is noted that they received His words and acts with gladness (cf. Mk 12²⁷ and Lk 13¹⁷, where there is a contrast to the feeling of His adversaries who 'were ashamed'). They greatly enjoyed the discomfiture of His enemies when He easily replied to their subtle questions and escaped their cleverly-laid snares. Jesus was very popular with the ordinary people; it is frequently recorded that great multitudes followed Him (cf. Mt 4²⁵ 8¹ 12¹⁵ 19²). At other times we read that, attracted by His teaching and His miracles, 'all the city was gathered together at the door' (Mk 1³³); 'they came from every quarter' (1⁴⁵); their attendance was so persistent that Jesus and the disciples 'could not so much as eat bread' (3²⁰); it was necessary to address them from the boat (Mt 13²); they brought their sick and maimed to Him (Mt 15³¹, Mk 1³²); they pressed upon Him and heard the word of God (Lk 5¹); and their rapt attention to His preaching, even during the last days at Jerusalem, is described by St. Luke (19⁴⁸) in emphatic language, 'the people all hung upon him, listening' (ἐξεκρέματο αὐτοῦ ἀκούων). The feeding of the 5000 produced such an effect that they were 'about to come and take him by force to make him king' (Jn 6¹⁵), proclaiming Him the Son of David (cf. Mt 12²³ 21^{9, 15}); and His enemies bore striking testimony to His popularity when they said, 'Lo, the world is gone after him' (Jn 12¹⁹). Even in the region of Cæsarea Philippi, whither He had gone for retirement, we are surprised to find mention of a multitude, which may indeed have consisted mainly of Gentiles (Mk 8³⁴). Edersheim (LT ii. 45 f.) thinks there is a previous mention of a non-Israelite multitude in Mt 15³¹ 'the multitude wondered . . . and they glorified the God of Israel' (but see Alford's note). 'By the reiteration of this word we are constantly reminded that our Lord, wherever He went, drew about Him eager crowds of the common people, who sometimes thronged and pressed upon Him too closely, sometimes followed Him far from their own homes, and always heard Him gladly' (Humphry, Commentary on the Revised Version, on Mt 7²⁸).

Christ, however, was not deceived as to the depth of these impressions; He did not court their applause or seek their favour. On the contrary, it is recorded that on several occasions He withdrew Himself from the multitude (cf. Mt 8¹⁸, Jn 6¹⁵), and the expression ἀφεις τοῦς ὄχλους, used in Mt 13³⁶, Mk 4³⁶, means 'leaving the multitude' (RV), not 'sending them away' (AV). Knowing that such popularity would not further the Kingdom of God, and would lead afterwards to serious disappointment, He sought at times to repress it, and showed the danger and loss and self-sacrifice involved in being His disciples; cf. His teaching as to the necessity of being willing to forsake everything (Lk 14^{25f.}). The parables of Mt 13 give a very sober estimate of the value of the professions of the multitude. Yet His popularity with the simple-hearted people of Galilee continued until the end, as was shown at His triumphal entry into Jerusalem.

Certain sections of Christ's teaching were specially addressed to the multitude, viz. the discourse about defilement (Mt 15^{10f.}, Mk 7^{14f.}, where, turning from the Pharisees and the scribes, 'he called to him the multitude, and said unto them, Hear and understand'; ἐκείνους μὲν ἐπιστομίσας και κατασχύνας ἀφήκεν ὡς ἀνιάτους, τρέπει δὲ τὸν λόγον πρὸς τὸν ὄχλον ὡς ἀξιολογώτερον, Euthym.); the first three parables of the Kingdom (Mt 13); the passage showing the need of renunciation and of counting the cost (Lk 14^{25f.}); the section dealing with the Bread of Life (Jn 6^{24f.}); the questions concerning John the Baptist, and the statement as to his character and mission (Mt 11^{7f.}); and the passage dealing with the scribes and Pharisees (Mt 23^{1f.}), which was spoken to the multitudes and to His disciples; cf. also CROWD.

LITERATURE.—In addition to the notes on the various passages in Commentaries, two suggestive sermons may be mentioned: Vaughan, Earnest Words for Earnest Men: 'The Christian aspect of a multitude'; A. K. H. B., The Graver Thoughts of a Country Parson: 'A great multitude a sad sight.'

MURDER.—The observance of the Sixth Commandment, as of the rest, is taken for granted in the Christian system (Mt 19¹⁸, Mk 10¹⁹, Lk 18²⁰). It concerns those who are outside of the society founded by Jesus. Thus the guilt of murder is predicated of Barabbas (Mk 15⁷, Lk 23^{19, 25}, Jn 18⁴⁰ 'robber'), and of the unwilling guests (Mt 22⁷), and Satan is designated the original ἀνθρωποκτόνος (Jn 8⁴⁴). In the doctrine of Jesus, the crimes of the Mosaic codes are traced to their source in the heart (Mt 15¹⁹, Mk 7²¹), and murder to the passion of anger. He who is angry with his brother, or who says to him 'Raca,' or 'Thou fool,' is accounted guilty of murder (Mt 5²²). With this saying of Jesus may be compared one of Mohammed, 'Whosoever shall say to his brother, Thou unbeliever, one of the two shall suffer as an unbeliever.' It is also interesting to note that the Arabic verb katala means both to kill and to curse (Koran, lxxx. 16). In the Koran murder is atoned for by retaliation (cf. Mt 5³⁸), a free man dying for a free, a slave for a slave; or the relatives of the slain may accept a money payment, which in practice does not exceed £500 (Koran, ii. 173; Lane's Arabic Nights, vi. 8). The Jewish Rabbis distinguished between manslaughter and murder (Ex 21^{18, 14}): only in the latter case did capital punishment follow (Edersheim, History of the Jewish Nation, p. 375 f.; W. R. Smith, *RS*² p. 420). Self-murder is rare among Semitic peoples, though cases do occur (Mt 27⁵, Ac 1¹⁸; Jos. BJ III. viii. 5).

MURMUR, MURMURING (Lat. murmur, a reduplication of an imitative syllable mur; cf. Gr. μορμύρω).—A low continuous sound, as of a stream or of bees, hence a whispering, something said in a low muttering voice. The verb represents:—

(1) γογγύζω, to murmur, say in a low tone; according to Pollux and Phavorinus, it was used of the cooing of doves, like τονθρίζω and τονθουρίζω of the more elegant Greek writers. It is found in the Gospels with the accusative of the thing said (Jn 7³²), with πρὸς τινος (Jn 6^{41, 61, 732}), κατὰ τινος (Mt 20¹¹), πρὸς τινα (Lk 5³⁰), and μετ' ἀλλήλων (Jn 6⁴³). (2) διαγογγύζω only in Lk. (15^{2, 19}), where διὰ seems to give the idea of a general pervasive murmuring through the whole assembly, or perhaps it means alternative murmuring 'among one another,' 'certandi significacionem addit' (Hermann). (3) ἠεθριμάσθαι is used in one passage (Mk 14⁵) of the disciples murmuring against Mary; it implies that they were moved with indignation. The noun γογγυσμός occurs only once in the Gospels (Jn 7¹²); it as well as γογγύζω and διαγογγύζω are frequently used in LXX of Israel in the wilderness.

The word 'murmur' appears in itself to have a neutral meaning, the context deciding whether it expresses favour, doubt, or hostility; hence in several cases 'muttering' or 'whispering' might be a better rendering. For its use in a friendly sense see Jn 7^{31, 32}, where the murmuring was that of persons who believed on Jesus, and who said, 'When the Christ shall come, will he do more signs than those which this man hath done?'—a dangerous omen to the Pharisees. The noun γογγυσμός, as used in 7¹², includes both favour and hostility: 'There was much murmuring among the multitudes concerning him; some said, He is a good man; others said, Not so, but he leadeth the multitude astray.' It implies a discussion low and whispered, not free and open; it was hardly safe to speak out plainly, for they feared the Jews (cf. 7^{40, 41}). The development of such differences of opinion is recorded in Jn 6⁵² 'they strove (ἐμάχοντο) one with another'; 7⁴³ 'there arose a division (σχίσμα) in the multitude because of him'; cf. also 9^{16, 10^{19, 11}45, 46}. The sense of doubt and dissatisfaction predominates in Jn 6^{41, 43}, as also in 6⁶¹ 'his disciples murmured at this,' namely, at the 'hard saying.' There is some uncertainty as to what precisely is here meant: whether the new teaching of life through death (Westcott); the paradoxical nature of the words just spoken by Jesus, the need of eating His flesh and drinking His blood (Godet); His claim to have come down from heaven (Lampe and others); the apparent pride with which He connected the salvation of the world with His own Person (Tholuck, Hengstenberg); or the bloody death of the Messiah (de Wette, Meyer). Dissatisfaction is seen highly intensified in Lk 5^{30, 15}, where the Pharisees and the scribes murmured because He ate with publicans and sinners. Compare also 19⁷, where all, apparently even the Twelve, shared in it with a sense of outrage done to propriety; Edersheim calls it a murmur of disappointment and anger; but perhaps Bengel is more correct, 'ex hesitatione potius quod ad majorem partem attinet quam cum indignatione.' Hostile murmuring is found in the parable of the Labourers in the Vineyard (Mt 20¹¹), and in the story of the Anointing in the house of Simon the leper (Mk 14⁵).

MUSIC.—The Jews cultivated music from the earliest times, perhaps the more because sculpture and painting were practically forbidden (Ex 20⁴). It gave expression to all their emotions, and found a place in all the chief events of public and private life (cf. OT, passim).

1. References in the Gospels are few and indirect. (a) Song: Mt 26³⁰ ||, Lk 15²⁵ (?) seem to be the only instances. (b) Instruments: Mt 9^{23, 11¹⁷} || pipe (wh. see) or flute (see FLUTE-PLAYERS); 24³¹ trumpet (wh. see), probably the curved trumpet as in Ex 19¹⁶. In Dn 3^{5, 15} (LXX) συμφωνία is usually taken to mean a bagpipe; but such a meaning in Lk 15²⁵ is unlikely. It is in the OT that the various national instruments appear, of which the following are the principal types:—(1) Stringed: lyre (EV 'harp'), harp (EV variously 'psaltery,' 'viol,' 'lute'); (2) wind: pipe, of wood; curved trumpet, of horn or (in later times) of metal; straight trumpet, of silver; (3) percussion: hand-drum (EV 'tabret,' 'timbrel') of skin; cymbals (EV once [Zec 14²⁰] 'bells') of brass, used, especially the precentor as it appears from 1 Ch 16⁵, no doubt for rhythmical purposes. Several others are mentioned, but some are foreign, and the nature of the rest is unknown.

2. The general character of Jewish music in the time of Christ is wholly a matter of inference. There were no theoretical writers, as among the Greeks; of their instruments sculpture portrays the silver trumpet alone; and, notation not having been invented, specimens of their music contemporaneously committed to writing do not exist. Yet within definable limits inference amounts to certainty. (a) As to rhythmical structure, all ancient music was of the free form, in contrast to the measured form of modern music: 'time,' in our sense, was then unknown. (b) The variety and combination of instruments employed, together with the musical arrangements generally (e.g. 1 Ch 15¹⁶⁻²²), imply at least some definite system whereby the intervals of melodic progression were regulated. The existence of scales or modes, of some sort, cannot therefore be questioned. (c) They seem to have been in accord with those in use at Babylon (Ps 137¹⁻³). Moreover, habitual contact with Greek influences in Alexandria and elsewhere probably produced (or at least goes to prove) an affinity with the Greek modes. (d) The 'traditional melodies' now used in Jewish synagogues are, in some cases, similar in kind to the music that we may infer to have existed in the time of Christ. Tradition might preserve melodies down to the invention of notation, much as it preserved the vowel-system down to the invention of 'points.' But the Jews themselves seem to have discontinued the Temple melodies after its destruction; so that the synagogue melodies, whatever their origin, would not be those of the Temple. It may be supposed that Jewish Christians imported some of their Temple melodies into the Christian Church. Perhaps it was they who introduced antiphonal singing: and even Greek liturgies are held to have been largely 'affected by Mosaic rites' (Swainson, Gr. Liturgies). It is therefore not impossible that a Jewish element still survives in some of the ancient ecclesiastical plainsong. But no one can say for certain that this is so, or identify any particular instance.

LITERATURE.—Chappell, History of Music; Stainer, The Music of the Bible; Edersheim, The Temple, etc.; art. 'Music' in Hastings' DB; Helmore, Plainsong, etc. The traditional Jewish melodies can be seen in E. Pauer's Hebrew Melodies (Augener), and in the collection of music for the synagogue edited by Cohen and Davis. F. S. RANKEN.

MUSTARD.—In a simile the word (σινάπι) occurs in Mt 13³¹, Mk 4³¹, Lk 13¹⁹; as a bold metaphor, in Mt 17²⁰, Lk 17⁶. It used to be strongly contended that the mustard referred to is not any of the familiar wild species of the Holy Land (such as the Sinapis nigra), but an arboreal plant (Salvadora persica) found in the extreme south or sub-tropical part of Palestine, and said to be called among the Arabs by the same name (Khardal) as mustard.

This theory, however, may now be said to be exploded (cf. Hastings' DB, art. 'Mustard'). The passages concerned clearly suggest, not a perennial shrub, but an annual sown among and comparable with other garden herbs; and if the expression 'tree' be a difficulty ('great' in Lk 13¹⁹ is of weak authority, cf. RV), it is to be remembered that, when Jesus spoke to the multitude, it was in popular language. He meant that the tiny seed became to all intents a tree. An accurate botanist (Dr. Hooker) found the black mustard on the banks of the Jordan 'ten feet high, drawn up amongst bushes, etc., and not thicker than whipcord.' And Dr. Thomson says that he has seen it 'on the rich plain of Akkâr as tall as the horse and his rider' (LB, p. 414).

Equally prosaic is the criticism that the mustard is not 'the least of all seeds' (Mt.), or 'less than all the seeds that be in the earth,' i.e. annuals (Mk.). Enough, as before, that the language is not absolute and scientific. The mustard was probably the smallest a gardener ordinarily sowed. But the fact is, the saying is proverbial (found as such in the Talmud and in the Koran), and in good proverbs there is often the suppressed note of poetic licence (cf. the Semitic form of poetry in the introductory verse of the passage Mk 4³⁰, Lk 13¹⁸). The broad effect of the image is plain, that out of a speck of seed there was to come in due course marvellously great growth—a plant towering among the pulse and pot-herbs like a Titan, and with branching sprays on which the birds of the air find shelter and rest.

The Arabs are given to special cultivation of mustard as a condiment (Hooker), and there is clearly emphasis on the statement that it was 'a grain' (not a handful) which was taken 'by a man' (Mt. and Lk.) and cast 'into his own garden' (Lk 13¹⁹ RV)—the garden ('field' in Mt 13³¹) being a place where, as observation attests, wild plants attain more than the normal size. Elsewhere this is the thought of Jesus—that God's Kingdom is taken from the world and developed on lines of its own (cf. the fig-tree favoured by being put in the choice and carefully protected place usually devoted to vines, Lk 13⁶).

The essential point in the application is not any seeming rapidity of growth; rather it is the striking contrast between the initial insignificance and the amply beneficent result. Jesus, the spokesman of the coming Kingdom, was derided in His teaching, persecuted in His Person, doomed to violence and degradation; but He felt, and knew, and here affirms that the cause was supremely great, and that its greatness should be manifested to the world.

The remaining passages (Mt 17²⁰ and Lk 17⁶) describe the wonder-working power of faith, which, within its own sphere, produces miraculous results (cf. art. FAITH in vol. i. p. 569).

GEORGE MURRAY.
MYRRH (σμίρνα, Mt 2¹¹, Jn 19³⁹).—A gum-resin, the exudation of a shrub (Balsamodendron myrrha) and some other allied species of shrubs growing in the dry regions of Arabia, in Somaliland, and in certain districts bordering on the Red Sea. The myrrh shrubs are of a low stature, unattractive, rigid, spiny, with scanty foliage and minute flowers and small oval berries. Myrrh exudes from the bark, or is obtained by incisions made in the bark, and appears in resinous, yellow drops, which gradually thicken and become harder. The smell is balsamic, and the taste bitter and slightly pungent. Myrrh has been known to mankind from the remotest times, and was among the most precious articles of ancient commerce. It is used in medicine as a tonic and stimulant, and was much employed by the ancient Egyptians in embalming. It is collected in great quantities to-day by the Somali tribes and sold to traders. There has been considerable controversy as to the real nature of the ancient myrrh, and particularly as to the regions from which it came; but the σμίρνα of NT appears, on the whole, to have been the substance described above.

Myrrh was one of the gifts brought by the Magi to the Infant Christ (Mt 2¹¹), and it was used, along with aloes, by Nicodemus to anoint the body of Christ before burial (Jn 19³⁹). All the ancient commentators affirm that each of the three gifts—gold, frankincense, and myrrh—offered by the Magi is replete with spiritual significance. Thus it was widely accepted in early times that the myrrh was emblematic of the death of Christ, inasmuch as myrrh was used for embalming. It was 'offered to Christ as to one who is about to die for all' (Aug. ad loc.). Others regarded it as setting forth His true human nature, and therefore as teaching the mortification of the flesh by abstinence. The well-known ancient hymn, part of which refers to this, says:

'Gold, a monarch to declare;
 Frankincense, that God is there;
 Of His tomb and funeral.'

Though we may admit that in the gifts presented there was an unconscious fulfilment of prophecy (Is 60⁶), no symbolism of the nature referred to can have been designed by the Magi. So far as their intention was concerned, they simply offered to the new-born King, whom they came to worship, the choicest and most precious products of their country, and thus expressed their homage.

In Mk 15²³ we are told that there was offered to Christ, probably just before He was nailed to the cross, έσμυρισμένον οίνον, 'wine mingled with myrrh.' It was offered, of course, as an anodyne; but as myrrh was often infused into wine to give it a more agreeable flavour and fragrance, it has been held by some that Mt.'s expression οίνον μετά χολής, 'wine mingled with gall,' is the more correct, because the mingling of gall with wine to render it anæsthetic was a well-known practice. It is, however, possible that the gall of Mt. was the same as the myrrh of Mk., the corresponding Hebrew words being from the same root, and both signifying 'bitter.' The mingling of myrrh with the wine would certainly render it more potent as an anodyne, and we must therefore accept the word given by Mk. as conveying the purpose for which the draught was offered. Such a draught, called by the Romans sopor, was regularly offered to criminals just before their crucifixion. It was provided by an association of wealthy women in Jerusalem, who prepared it for the purpose. But, having tasted it and ascertained its object, He would not drink. This action is in contrast with what He did at a later period of the day; for when, in response to His cry 'I thirst,' one of the soldiers soaked a sponge in 'vinegar' and, holding it up to Him on a reed, gave Him to drink, He received it. This was not to soothe His agony, but only to moisten His parched tongue and lips, perhaps that He might be able to utter 'with a loud voice' His triumphant τετέλευται, perhaps also to sanction and sanctify the friendly office which is often the only one that can be rendered to the dying, and possibly in fulfilment of the prophecy of thirst (Jn 19²⁸, cf. Ps 69³¹). However this may be, His purpose in refusing the draught offered as an anodyne is clear. He would 'look death in the face,' and meet the King of Terrors in full possession of all His faculties. He was dying of His own accord, fulfilling His words, 'No man taketh my life from me' (Jn 10¹⁸). His death was an act of voluntary self-surrender, and He would 'taste death for every man' (He 29). He 'endured the cross, despising shame' (12²).

J. CROMARTY SMITH.

MYSTERY (μυστήριον from μύσσειν 'one initiated'; stem μύω 'to close,' 'shut' (cf. Lat. mutus, Eng. 'mum').)—1. In classical Greek μυστήριον means a hidden thing, a secret; in Biblical writers primarily a hidden or secret thing; in the plural (usually) individual matters of revelation or superhuman knowledge (Mt 13³⁵, Lk 8¹⁰, Ro 11²⁵, 1 Co 4¹ 15⁵¹). In the singular with the article τὸ μυστήριον is used, principally by St. Paul, of the hidden counsel of God, especially His redemptive plan culminating in the final judgment (Ro 16²⁵, 1 Co 2⁷, Eph 3³⁻⁹, Col 1^{26f.}). This counsel of God is further characterized as the 'mystery of his will' (Eph 1⁹) 'which he formed' (Col 2² [1 Co 2], text of WH) 'respecting Christ' (Col 4³), and constitutes the contents of the gospel (Eph 6¹⁹). It is consummated in the parousia (Rev 10⁷). In antithesis to 'the mystery of the faith' or 'of godliness' (1 Ti 3⁹⁻¹⁶) stands that of 'lawlessness' (2 Th 2⁷), the purposed impulse of an antagonistic power operative in the world.

Besides this primary sense, the word μυστήριον is also used like μῦθος and ἔπος in Rabbinic writers to designate the hidden or mystic sense of a Scripture (Eph 5³²), a name (Rev 17⁵), or the image or form seen in a vision (Rev 1²⁰ 17⁵).

It is important to observe that the connotation of intrinsic difficulty of comprehension, obscurity, which has become inseparable from the word in modern use, is misleading. In Biblical and in ancient use generally the 'mystery' is simply that which is made known only to the initiated, be its content easy or hard to understand, hence revealed as against reasoned knowledge.

2. In a looser sense the term 'mysteries' was transferred from the teaching symbolized to (a) the rites enacted in certain cults or rituals known to classic authors as τελεταί (Wis 14²³), and (b), still more loosely, to the τελεταί themselves. From the former sense (a) the designation of the sacraments, or even the Church service generally, as 'the mysteries' becomes common from the 2nd cent. onward. From the latter is doubtless derived the designation of mediæval religious dramas or pantomimes as 'mysteries' (cf., from the same stem, 'mummary').

3. The τελεταί, loosely called 'mysteries,' are of importance to our consideration as affecting the application of the term 'mystery' to the gospel as a whole in Mk 4¹¹. They consisted of secret rites in honour of certain divinities especially representative of the drama of life, vegetable and animal, annually failing and renewed. These divinities are always ethnonic, as against the Olympian (national) divinities of the upper air; and their worship, maintained by guilds, was commonly associated with the rites of ancestor- and hero-worship. Mystery-religion transcended all lines of mere nationality, substituting its own brotherhoods of initiates, and offered the idea of personal deliverance and immortality as the goal; as the means, it offered sacramental (instead of sacrificial) union with a Redeemer-god (θεὸς σωτήρ), who, in contrast with the Olympian divinities, participated in the suffering and death of humanity, and won for men victory over their spiritual foes. Its strong monotheistic tendency, added to these other traits, gave it an obvious resemblance to the gospel as preached to the Gentile world, and made it a much more formidable rival than the various religionized forms of Greek and Oriental philosophy, in bidding for the adherence of popular faith in the Empire, after the dissolution of the national religions. Christianity itself, in the transition from a national to a universal religion, necessarily passed through some of the same phases as the mystery-cults; for these had already connected themselves in a syncretizing spirit with the mythology of every people. Their influence is most apparent, as we should expect, in the development of the Pauline Church, supremely in the ultra-Pauline or Gnostic. The resemblances were in fact so striking alike in dogma, terminology, and ritual, as to lead early apologists to account for them by the theory of diabolic travesty (Justin M. Apol. i. 66, Dial. lxx.). Some modern students of the history of religion find it impossible to deny a relation of dependence on the side of the Church, especially in the Pauline and post-Pauline period. [For an able presentation of the view that it is impossible to establish any direct relation during the Pauline or early post-Pauline period, see Anrich, Das antike Mysterienwesen]. This appears not only from terminology, but even from the Pauline doctrine and ritual, in particular as regards the theory of the sacraments. In the Gospels this influence is scarcely traceable outside the Fourth, wherein the type of the δράμα μυστικόν and the sacramental interest are very apparent (Harnack, Mission und Ausbreitung, pp. 169-173—John and Origen the profoundest mysteriosophists of the Church); but in the single passage Mk 4¹¹=Mt 13³⁵=Lk 8¹⁰ even the Synoptic writers must be admitted to have been affected through St. Paul both as to phraseology and as to thought.

4. Mk 4¹¹ seems to be earlier in form than its parallels; for the context shows that the thing given or withheld is not certain elements of the gospel, conceived as μυστήρια and therefore uttered only in parables (understood as enigmas; cf. Mt 13³⁵, Jn 16²⁹)—the sense conveyed by the use of the plural in the parallels (τὰ μυστήρια, Mt 13³⁵=Lk 8¹⁰)—but is the gospel as a whole conceived as a 'mystery' in the Pauline sense, i.e. a Divine revelation (cf. Mt 13¹⁶⁻¹⁷). The teaching in parables is regarded by Mk. (and still more by Mt.) as a fulfilment of Is 6⁹ conceived as a sentence of judicial blindness. In answer to the question (Mt 13¹⁰), 'Why speakest thou to them (the motley Galilean multitude) in parables?' (i.e. enigmas), Jesus answers that it is a fulfilment of the prophetic curse of Isaiah upon a disobedient and gainsaying people, of whom such fruitless hearing had been foretold. The inner circle (Mk 4¹⁰, cf. 3¹³⁻³⁴⁻³⁵) are alone intended to receive more than the husk. The parallels, in altering to τὰ μυστήρια, give a dilution of this sense (cf. the secondary sense above under 1).

5. Not the word alone, but the entire context of Mk 4 and parallels are Pauline in aim. Ro 9-11 attempts a theodicy of the rejection of Israel the covenant people in favour of the Gentiles, based upon the same idea of judicial hardening, and employing the same passage from Isaiah. In Ro 11⁶ Paul writes after 30 years of disappointing experience in preaching to the Jews: 'It is written, God gave them a spirit of stupor, eyes that they should not see, and ears that they should not hear, unto this very day.' To St. Paul, accordingly, must be attributed the first utilization of Is 6⁹, which henceforth becomes the locus classicus to account for the rejection of the Messiah by His own people (with Mk 4¹¹ and parallels, cf. Jn 12³⁹⁻⁴¹, Ac 28²⁴⁻²⁸). Manifestly an interpretation of parabolic utterance which supposes it adopted in order to fulfil the prophetic sentence of judicial blindness on Israel cannot be attributed to Jesus, since the end sought in the parables themselves is the reverse of intentional obscurity. Mk 4¹¹, accordingly, which does not stand alone in this Gospel as regards its Pauline phraseology (cf. Mk 1¹⁵ with Mt 4¹⁷), is equally Pauline in the employment of this theory of the intention of the parabolic teaching.

6. Linguistically the results are at least equally conclusive. The word μυστήριον occurs 21 times in the Pauline Epp., elsewhere in the NT only here, and 4 times in the Apocalypse. The conception of the gospel itself as a 'mystery' is found nowhere else save in the Pauline Epistles. With St. Paul it is fundamental (1 Co 2¹⁻¹⁶, Eph 1⁹ 3³⁻¹¹, Col 1²⁷, Ro 16²⁵⁻²⁷), usually involving the contrast of philosophy versus revelation, the 'wisdom of this world' versus the spirit of prophecy. It is noteworthy that the removal of vv. 11, 12 from the context of Mk 4¹⁰⁻²⁰ produces a simpler and more intelligible connexion (cf. v. 10 'asked of him the parables').

7. The agraphon quoted by Clement of Alexandria (Strom. v. x. 69) from 'a certain Gospel': 'My mystery belongs to me and to the sons of my household' (μυστήριον ἐμὸν καὶ τοῖς υἱοῖς τοῦ οἴκου μου), and also found in Clem. Hom. XIX. xx. in the form, 'Keep the mysteries for me and the sons of my house,' is manifestly connected with Mk 4¹¹, but probably not dependent upon it, nor upon St. Paul. This, however, does not counteract the above conclusions. It is quite probable that Mk 4¹¹ rests upon a traditional logion of some such form as this, rather than directly or exclusively on Ro 11⁸. The utterance in this form is not indeed attributable to Jesus, to whose doctrine its suggestion of esoteric teaching is abhorrent (cf. Philo, de Vict. Off. i. f., on the superiority of the Mosaic to heathen 'mysteries' as concealed from none; also Wis 6²²); but proper appreciation of the Pauline use of the word μυστήριον will show a common basis in the real teaching of Jesus. Mt 11²⁵⁻²⁷=Lk 10²¹⁻²² is the canonical equivalent of the agraphon, and affords the real point of connexion between the teaching of Jesus and the Pauline and post-Pauline application of the term μυστήριον to the gospel. In respect to the superhuman, Divinely revealed character of the one message, Jesus and St. Paul are both emphatic. The expressions of 1 Co 2¹⁻¹⁶ from this point of view are not only in agreement with Jesus' whole teaching as 'with authority and not as the scribes,' but form a striking parallel to Mt 11²⁵⁻³⁰. However open to suspicion the logion of Mk 4¹¹ may be in its present canonical or post-canonical form, the words are at bottom nothing more than the translation into Greek equivalents of a claim of Jesus that is unquestionably historical, namely the claim for His teaching to be by revelation, a wisdom of God accessible to His 'little ones' though 'hid from the wise and prudent.'

MYTH.—Neither the word μῦθος nor the conception of a myth occurs in any of the Gospels. Outside of the Gospels the word appears in the NT several times (in plur. μῦθοι) in the Pastoral Epistles (1 Ti 1⁴ 4⁷, 2 Ti 4¹, Tit 1¹⁴), and once in 2 Pet. (1¹⁶). In all these cases a myth is a story unworthy of credence, a foolish tale without sufficient foundation in fact or significance in principle to make it worth while to give heed to it. This is not, however, the ordinary meaning of the word in the Classic period or in modern usage. A myth in the Classic writers is either (1) akin to parable or legend; i.e. a story constructed with a specific design or conveying a moral or philosophical truth—Æsop's Fables; Plato's Phædo, 61 B, Prot. 320 C, 324 D; or (2) a story in which, through a process of growth, has come to be embodied a truth of nature or of conscience. Of this class of myths, illustrations are such as those in Plato, Legg. 636 D, Rep. 330 D (cf. Grote, Hist. Gr. i. 480). Modern historical terminology would make myth a story whose basis is past verifying. An account is said to be mythical when external evidences for its being a true narration of facts are not forthcoming, and when its internal characteristics render it incredible.

In the Platonic sense of the word no myths can be said to exist in the Gospels unless, contrary to all usage, the parables of Jesus be called myths (against this cf. Trench, Parables). In the modern sense it has been alleged that the Gospels are a tissue of mythological material (Strauss, Leben Jesu). This was the mythical theory of Gospel history, which for a time disputed the ground with the Tübingen hypothesis of 'tendency' literature, on the one side, and the earlier traditional view that the Gospels should be taken as precise and accurate history, on the other.

With the rise of the critical method all these theories have been compelled to yield the field to the view that the Gospels are the sources of history rather than history strictly so called; and that they are to be used as sources precisely upon the same principles as all other first-hand documentary testimony. But this view does not exclude the possibility of some mythical elements in these sources. The question, then, is whether there actually exist mythical accounts in the Gospels, and, if so, whence and how they came there. Whereas, therefore, the mythical theory propounded by Strauss has been entirely set aside, a new one has arisen to take its place.

The grounds on which the Straussian theory had been set aside were that the age of Jesus was not a mythopœic age in the sense assumed by its proponent. No matter what the truth may be about a mythology in the OT, where a prehistoric period certainly comes into view, the age of Jesus falls within a clearly lighted historic period, and the conditions for mythological growth of the nature assumed do not exist.

Accordingly the new mythical theory does not posit that these Gospel myths are the creation of the period and country in which Jesus lived. It rather undertakes to affiliate the narratives with the mythology of the environing heathen world. They are not creations of, but importations into, the Christian tradition. The age of Jesus was not a myth-making age, but a large stock of myths was already in existence among the peoples to whom the gospel came. These myths were diffused in the atmosphere, and could not but be absorbed into the very texture of the history. The search for the origin of Gospel myths is therefore not to be made in the Gospel story itself, but in the field of Comparative Religion.

The special passages of the Gospel history where, according to the new mythical theory, these myths were drawn in and found ready lodgment, are the account of the birth of Jesus, the accounts of His miracles, and the accounts of His death and resurrection. The accounts of the birth (Mt 1¹⁸⁻²⁵, Lk 1^{34c}) are to be regarded not as parts of the original story of Jesus, but as 2nd cent. additions to it. They owe their origin to Gentile-Christian imagination. Like all true myths, they embody an idea, that of the Divine sonship of the founder of a great religion. The conception and phrase of Divine sonship are not foreign to the more direct Hebrew and Jewish antecedents of the gospel (Ps 2nd, Enoch 45-51, 2 Es 13). Yet it is among the heathen that the idea was more commonly ascribed to great personages, especially rulers and sages. In Egypt, even to the latest days, the Pharaohs were regarded as incarnations of the deity (Wiedemann, Egypt. Rel. p. 92 ff.). Alexander the Great deemed it wise, upon conquering Egypt, to permit himself to be called the son of the god Ammon-Ra. In Babylon, from the time of Sargon I. onwards, the kings were considered emanations of the godhead (Radau, Early Hist. of Babylon, p. 308 ff.). These incarnations are, moreover, often associated with a virgin birth. Pythagoras and Plato were both regarded as born of virgin mothers and the god Apollo (Olympiodorus, Vit. Plat. p. 1). The mother of Alexander the Great was believed to have been visited by Zeus in the form of a serpent before king Philip had consummated his marriage with her. In the narratives of the birth of Buddha (which are of pre-Christian origin) there are some marked similarities to the Gospel accounts of the birth of Jesus.

The myths alleged to have grown about the career of Jesus as a wonder-worker are prefaced by parallel accounts of a temptation and a conquest of the power of evil. The prince Siddhartha was tempted by the spirit of evil, who urged him to abandon his foolish and futile purpose of living a simple and abstemious life, and to return to the comfort, glory, and power of the royal palace; but he resisted. The prophet Zarathustra had been urged by the evil spirit Ahriman to 'renounce the good law of the worshippers of Mazda,' and thereby to win dominion over the nations of the earth. But he had declined to do so. All the subsequent miracles recorded of Jesus are said to be abundantly paralleled in the legendary lore of the Orientals. The miraculous element did, in fact, persist through the Patristic age and down into the mediæval period.

The last portion of the Gospel story is said to be specially overlaid with myths of this genus. All that is apparently distinctive and remarkable here is represented as the reflexion and counterpart of the myths current among pagans. The idea of the death of Christ as the propitiation for sin is paralleled by the numerous instances of vicarious human sacrifices. The burial and resurrection are the Christian equivalents of the Egyptian myth of Osiris, who was slain by his brother Set, 'the demon of the withering heat of summer,' and who lives again in the person of his son Horus. Likewise the fabled death, resurrection, and translation into heaven of Adonis, the rape of Persephone, and her rescue upon the compromise that she thereafter spend part of the year with her mother upon earth and part in Hades, are expressions of the same thought.

These cases are associated with mystic rites. In fact, it seems to be a peculiarity of mysteries that death and restoration to life again should be symbolically represented in them. In their best form these rites occur in the Dionysio-Orphic festivals. Here the death of the god was enacted in the sacrifice of a bull, whose flesh was then torn and devoured by the worshippers without being drained of its blood. Thus, it was supposed, the immortal life of the god passed into and conferred immortality upon the worshippers (Clem. Alex. Protrept. i. 12, 17; Frazer, *Golden Bough*², ii. 165).

If the death of Jesus is pictured as a voluntary descent into the realm of shades that He might there conquer death, the same thought is seen to run through the Babylonian myth of Ishtar (Schrader, Höllenfahrt d. Istar), the Mandæan myth of Hibil Ziwa (Brandt, Mandäische Religion, p. 213 ff.), and the myths of Orpheus and Herakles, both of whom accomplished descents into Hades, and, according to the Greek classical mythology, achieved conquests there.

The Gospel account of the ascension is paralleled first of all in the OT by the ascensions of Enoch and Elijah, then in the Græco-Roman legendary lore by the ascensions of Romulus and Herakles. Legends of ascensions were, in fact, common even in the later periods. Some of the Roman emperors were said to have been raised at their death into equality with the gods (Rhode, Psyche, p. 663). The case of Peregrinus Proteus, recited by Lucian, is quite noteworthy. Peregrinus took Herakles as his ensample. As Herakles had made his exit from the world by consigning himself to a funeral pyre, so Peregrinus built a pyre and cast himself into it; but at the moment of his doing so a trustworthy old man reports that he saw an eagle issuing from the flames and flying up into the heavens. Further, the same old man testifies that he beheld Peregrinus clothed in a white garment, and with a garland of victory on his head. Apollonius of Tyana is also reported to have disappeared quite mysteriously, either in the temple of Athene at Lindus or in that of Dictynna at Crete. Philostratus, his biographer, appeals to the fact that nowhere on earth could a grave of him be found, in proof of his ascension and deification.

To the question how these myths filtered into the Gospel story there is no clear answer given. It is simply assumed that they were in the air, and that a new religion must somehow adopt them, and embellish the life and personality of its founder with them. This is a serious difficulty with the new mythical theory. For it is precisely the manner of their infiltration into the Christian tradition that is the crucial point in it. The existence of the myths themselves among the pagans has always been known, and is no new discovery. It is not by simply re-telling these stories that the theory can gain support to itself, but by substantiating the claim that they actually passed from the world of heathen thought into the Christian tradition. This difficulty is enhanced and made practically insuperable when it is further borne in mind that the Hebrew antecedents of the Gospel had resolutely and effectively resisted the incorporation of such myths for a thousand years. Moreover, there is no room in the time interval between the life of Jesus and the writing down of the Gospel accounts of Him for such a process as is assumed, unless we except the birth-narratives of St. Matthew and St. Luke upon purely textual grounds. Criticism has been busy with the origin of the Gospel story as found in the extant narratives, and the more light it throws on the subject the more clearly it appears that the main data come from eye- and ear-witnesses. The old Strauss theory, assuming that the myths were constructed by the disciples of Jesus under the power of an excited and vivid imagination, was at this point stronger than the new one.

Furthermore, when these parallels are closely scrutinized, the first aspect of plausibility given to the mythical theory by them vanishes. The parallels are in most cases far-fetched. In some instances the resemblances are striking indeed. But a relation of derivation of one from the other or from a common source seems to be out of the question. In other instances where a genetic connexion might be possibly established, the parallels are forced.

In the case of the birth-narratives (Mt 1st-2nd, Lk 1st), the question is one of evidence. The effort to reduce these to mythology is based upon the a priori conception that they are mythical. If it could be proved, apart from the theory itself, upon purely critical grounds, that these accounts are of later origin, a basis for the theory might be found; but, as a matter of fact, the assumption that they are mythical furnishes the strongest consideration for their critical rejection—a process which can scarcely be called scientific.

NAAMAN (Lk 4²⁷ Ναεμάν, TR; Ναιμάν, Tisch., WH; Heb. נַעֲמָן = 'pleasantness').—The famous captain of Benhadad II., whose cure by the instrumentality of Elisha is related in 2 K 5, and who was referred to by our Lord as 'Naaman the Syrian' in His discourse in the synagogue at Nazareth.

Whether our Lord's visit to Nazareth took place early in His ministry as here related by St. Luke, or later on as some think (cf. Mt 13^{54–58}, Mk 6^{1–6}), or whether there were two distinct visits, does not concern this article, since the purpose of our Lord's reference to Naaman is the same at whatever period of His ministry He may have made it. He suggested to His audience that they were ready to quote the proverb 'Physician, heal thyself,' and to say, 'Whatsoever we have heard done in Capernaum, do also here in thy country.' 'And (better 'But') he said, Verily I say unto you, No prophet is accepted in his own country.' His hearers apparently inferred from these words that He had determined to work no miracle among them, and were irritated accordingly, although perhaps our Lord intended to imply no more than that He had little hope of being able to do so (cf. Mt 13⁵⁸, Mk 6⁵). Then, to justify and to illustrate His action in working miracles outside the limits of His own city, He referred to the cases of the widow of Sarepta and of Naaman, which were instances of blessings bestowed through the instrumentality of two of Israel's greatest prophets on persons who were not of the house of Israel at all. This afforded a complete justification of His own action, and was, further, a very pointed rebuke to them if, as seems the case, they were annoyed that He had neglected them for Capernaum, which, situated in that region known as 'Galilee of the Gentiles,' might be considered as less a Jewish town than their own. And, further, our Lord in these words rebuked Jewish exclusiveness in general, and quite clearly indicated the great truth that the benefits of His gospel, whether bodily or spiritual, were not only for the Jew, but also for the Gentile. It is probable that it was this underlying suggestion, coupled with His application to Himself of the great passage from Is 61, which caused the final outbreak of His hearers' wrath (cf. Ac 22²² 28^{28, 29}).

NAIN (Ναῖν NBCD Ti WH, etc.; Ναεῖν EΓΔ, etc., Ναεῖμ 1 and 209, al pauc) is named only once in Scripture. St. Luke mentions it (7¹¹) as the 'city' to which the widow, whose dead son Jesus raised to life, belonged. The miracle was wrought near to the 'gate,' and in the presence of 'much people.' This Nain cannot be the same as the village on the E. side of the Jordan mentioned by Josephus (BJ IV. ix. 4). Robinson (*BRP*² ii. 361) identified Nain with the modern Nein, a collection of squalid huts on the N. slope of Jebel ed-Duhj (Little Hermon), 2 miles W. of Endor and about a day's journey from Capernaum (cf. Lk 7¹¹ (margin)). Robinson's view has been generally accepted. It agrees roughly with the statements of Eusebius and Jerome, both of whom place it S. of Tabor and not far from Endor. Eusebius reckons it 12 miles to the south (Onom. s.v. Naev), Jerome (ib. s.v. 'Naim') says 2 miles. The situation of the present village is bleak and uninviting, though it commands a wide and interesting view. A few hundred paces above the huts, to the S.E., are rock-tombs in the hillside. Ramsay (Education of Jesus, Preface, p. ix) says he has 'little doubt that the ancient city was on the top' of the hill, somewhere above the modern village. He expresses his belief that this site has more claim to be the 'city set on a hill' (Mt 5¹⁴) than Safed. It should be noted that Cheyne doubts the correctness of the reading Ναῖν here (Encyc. Bibl. iii. 3263), and claims Nestle (Philol. Sacra, 20) as also recognizing 'the doubtfulness of the locality assigned in Luke.'

NAKEDNESS (γυμνότης).—Oriental dress is generally a draping of the figure in one or more continuous gowns or cloaks. The clothing may be drawn to the body by the waist-band or sash, but the tendency is to avoid as far as possible any exact shaping and rigid fastening of the costume, as such close adaptation to the figure is considered both immodest and undecorative, and in a warm climate would cause friction and perspiration (Ezk 44²⁸). With Orientals, to a greater extent than in the West, out-door dress carries a meaning of investiture and embellishment, with a consciousness of self-appreciation and an expectation of comment. This is partly because in the daytime, in the retirement of the family, they undress more than is customary in the West. In the OT, the garments that were continually put on and off, as one went out and returned to the house, were called suits of apparel or exchange (Jg 17¹⁰, Is 3²²). The cotton or linen gown worn beneath these is the permanent under-garment, and any one wearing only this is conventionally said to be naked or unclothed. In this loose costume—a long robe reaching to the feet—members of the family, both male and female, attend to their active household duties, or enjoy the passive luxury of the unoccupied hour. It is, however, unbecoming to receive visitors in such undress, and hence the impropriety of entering without due announcement and permission received, or of looking down from the flat roof of the house into a neighbour's enclosure. The linen cloth mentioned in Mk 14⁵¹⁻⁵² was a substitute for the ordinary under-garment. The solitary fisherman when diving from the side of the Lake of Galilee after his cast-net usually divests himself of all clothing. The same is frequently done in summer weather when fishermen haul the drag-net into the boat (Jn 21⁷), or a loin-cloth is worn, as in the case of the tanner and potter at their work.

Nakedness thus means: (1) the state of undress permitted in Oriental family life, and preferred as an adaptation to the climate; (2) insufficiency, amounting sometimes to complete want, of clothing, involving discomfort and suffering in the case of the poor and destitute (Mt 23³⁶, Ro 8³⁵, 2 Co 11²⁷); (3) the nudity connected with immodest behaviour (Ex 20²⁶), or inflicted as a humiliation on prisoners of war (Is 20⁴); and (4) in a metaphorical sense, unnatural and shameless disloyalty to God (Ezk 23²⁹, Rev 3¹⁸).

G. M. MACKIE.

NAME (ὄνομα).—1. In the Gospels the word is frequently used in the ordinary sense of a distinctive appellation or title, and especially to denote personal proper names (e.g. Mt 10², Mk 5²², Lk 1⁵⁻²⁷, Jn 1⁶). See following article.

2. Rarely it is found in the sense of 'reputation,' 'fame,' 'glory'—the result of a person's name being on every tongue. So it is said of Jesus, 'His name was spread abroad' (Mk 6¹⁴; cf. 'a name which is above every name,' Ph 2⁹).

3. But especially ὄνομα is used, like Heb. שם, not as a mere external designation, or distinguishing label attached to an individual, but with the suggestion of its significance as characteristic of personality. Hence the importance attached, just as in the OT, to the choosing of a name (Mt 1²¹, Lk 1^{13, 31, 63}); hence also (cf. Gn 17^{5, 15}, 32²³) the alteration of a name, or the addition of another name, when some vital fact of experience has made the character different from what it was before (e.g. Mt 16^{17, 18}, Ac 13⁹). It is when we remember that 'name' stands for character that we see the force of such an expression as 'to receive a prophet in the name of a prophet' (Mt 10⁴¹). This does not mean to receive him in the name or for the sake of someone else, but to receive him in his character as a prophet—for his work's sake, and on the ground of what he himself is.

4. This use of ὄνομα as significant of character is of very frequent occurrence with reference to God—corresponding here again to the employment of שם in the OT. When Mary sings in the Magnificat, 'Holy is his name' (Lk 1⁴⁹), it is the revealed character of God that is meant. When Jesus teaches His disciples in the Lord's Prayer to say, 'Hallowed be thy name' (Mt 6⁹=Lk 11²), it is that Divine quality of Fatherhood which He has just set in the very forefront of the prayer that He desires them to hallow. When He did works in His Father's name (Jn 10²⁵), He did them by appealing to His Father's self-revelation, and hence by His Father's authority. When He exclaims, 'Father, glorify thy name' (Jn 12²⁸), He is asking the Father to complete in the eyes not only of the Jewish people, but of the great Gentile world represented by those Greek seekers who now stood before Him, the manifestation of His holiness and love given in the Person and ministry of His Son. And when He says in the Intercessory Prayer, 'I have manifested thy name' (17⁶, cf. v. 28), He is speaking once more of that Fatherhood of God of which His own earthly life had been the revelation and the pledge.

5. Corresponding to the foregoing use of ὄνομα as expressive of the revealed character of God, is the constant employment of the word, not only in the Gospels, but throughout the whole of the NT, to denote the character, dignity, authority, and even the very Personality of Jesus Christ. This is the use made of it by the First Evangelist (Mt 12²¹) when he applies to Jesus the words of Deutero-Isaiah according to the LXX reading, 'And in his name shall the Gentiles hope' (Is 42⁷). The meaning of the author of Acts is similar when he writes, 'The name of the Lord Jesus was magnified' (19¹⁷). When our Lord speaks of those who 'receive a little child in my name' (Mt 18⁵ ||), or gives a gracious promise to the two or three who in His name are gathered together (v. 20), or assures us that whatsoever we shall ask in His name the Father will bestow (Jn 16^{23c}), He is certainly not speaking of the use of His name as a species of magical formula—nothing could be further from the mind of Christ (cf. Mt 7²²)—but of a service and worship and prayer undertaken for His sake or inspired by faith in His Person. And when in the Johannine writings the very same blessings are assured to those who 'believe on his name' (Jn 1¹² 2³ 3¹⁸, 1 Jn 3²³ 5¹³) and to those who believe on Himself (Jn 3¹⁶ 6⁴⁰, 1 Jn 5¹⁰; cf. esp., as occurring in close juxtaposition, Jn 3¹⁶ with v. 18, and 1 Jn 5¹⁰ with v. 13), it seems plain that by 'the name of Jesus' is meant the Personality of Jesus as that has been summed up in 'the name'—the name, above all, of 'only-begotten Son of God' (Jn 3¹⁸, cf. 1 Jn 5¹³).

6. There are certain phrases in which 'the name of Christ' occurs that call for more particular consideration. (1) Persecution for the name.—When our Lord said to His disciples that they should be hated and persecuted 'for his name's sake' (Mt 10²² 24⁹, Mk 13¹³, Lk 6²² 21^{12, 17}); when 'for his name's sake' shame and suffering actually fell upon the Apostles and the early Church (Ac 5⁴¹ 9¹⁶ 15²⁶); and when St. Paul expresses his readiness not to be bound only, but also to die 'for the name of the Lord Jesus' (21¹³)—what are we to understand by these expressions? No doubt in several of these cases 'name' is practically synonymous with Person; and so to suffer for Christ's name is equivalent to suffering for His sake—an alternative phrase which is also employed (Jn 13^{37, 38}, 2 Co 12¹⁰, Ph 1²⁹). But sometimes it seems more natural to think of the primary meaning of 'name' as an external designation. The expression ὑπὲρ τοῦ ὀνόματος used in Ac 5⁴¹ (RV 'for the Name') and 3 Jn⁷ (RV 'for the sake of the Name') suggests that 'the Name,' like 'the Way' (Ac 9² 19⁹), was a technical term, and that to suffer for 'the Name' meant to 'suffer as a Christian' (1 P 4¹⁶), i.e. as one who bore the name of being a disciple of Christ. It is true that the name 'Christian' (wh. see) does not appear to have been originally used by Christ's followers themselves. But at all events it was employed by outsiders (Ac 11²⁶ 26²⁸), and came to be employed especially by enemies (1 P 4¹⁶). And if the name Χριστιανοί was not current within the Church, there was a party in Corinth that claimed to be distinctively 'of Christ' (Χριστοῦ, 1 Co 1¹²), while St. Paul not only protests, with reference to this claim, 'Is Christ divided?'

(v.¹³), but says a little further on in the Ep., with regard to the whole Christian body, 'Ye are of Christ' (ὁμείς δὲ Χριστοῦ, 3²³). When, again, St. Peter writes, 'If ye are reproached for the name of Christ, blessed are ye' (1 P 4¹⁴), it is evident that the reproach is brought not so much against the name of Christ itself as against those who bear it (cf. v.¹⁶). And this view is confirmed when we find St. James speaking of 'the honourable name which was called upon you' (Ja 2⁷ RVm), the reference being apparently to Christ's name as a designation that came to be applied to His people—probably from the fact that His name had been invoked over them at the time of their baptism.

(2) Working of miracles in the name.—In the Gospels references to the working of miracles (esp. the casting out of evil spirits) with the use of the name are found in Mt 7²², Mk 9^{38f.} = Lk 9^{40f.}, Lk 10¹⁷, and in the Appendix to Mk.'s Gospel, where, before His Ascension, Jesus is represented as assuring His disciples that those who believe shall have the power of casting out demons in His name (16¹⁷). In Ac 3^{6f.} (cf. v.¹⁶ 4^{10, 30}) St. Peter cures the lame beggar at the gate of the Temple by commanding him in the name of Jesus Christ of Nazareth to walk. In 16¹⁸ St. Paul, with the invocation of the same name, casts the spirit of divination out of the slave-girl at Philippi. In 19^{38f.} certain vagabond Jews, exorcists, take upon themselves to call over those possessed by evil spirits the name of the Lord Jesus, and the sons of Sceva in particular do this to their own confusion; but the implication of the narrative evidently is that the 'special miracles' which had just been wrought by St. Paul himself were accomplished with a like invocation (cf. vv.^{11, 12} with v.¹³). In Ja 5¹⁴ the elders of the Church are told to pray over the sick man, 'anointing him with oil in the name of the Lord.'

The view has been taken that this use of the name of Christ for the working of miracles was nothing more than the employment of a theurgic formula, which finds its analogue in the invocations and incantations of ancient magic (so esp. Conybeare, JQR viii, ix). We may be sure that in so far as such a use of His name was commanded or approved by our Lord Himself, this view is quite impossible (cf. Mt 7²²). And as for the Apostolic Church, while it is clear that the name of Jesus was invoked by both Peter and Paul before the performance of a miracle, Peter's prayer, after the miracle at the Temple gate, that God would accompany the use of the name by stretching forth His hand to heal (Ac 4^{20, 30}), points to the conclusion that the name of Jesus was invoked by the Apostles in these cases simply because every appeal to God was made through the Person of the Mediator. The influence of Greek and Oriental superstition soon brought into the Church a magical and theurgic element, which gathered specially round the use of Christ's name in formulas of exorcism. But within the Apostolic sphere, at all events, it was not a formula, however sacred, that was believed to cast out demons or work cures. St. James, after enjoining the use of the Lord's name at a sick-bed, adds that 'the prayer of faith shall heal the sick' (Ja 5¹⁵). And in the case of the impotent man, St. Peter, when the people came crowding into Solomon's Porch, greatly wondering (Ac 3¹¹), said, 'By faith in his name hath his name made this man strong . . . yea, the faith which is through him hath given him this perfect soundness in the presence of you all' (v.¹⁶).

(3) Baptizing in (or into) the name.—Christian baptism, as we meet with it in the Apostolic Church, is performed in (or into) the name of Christ (Ac 2³⁸ 8¹⁶ 10⁴⁸ 19⁵, Ro 6³, Gal 3²⁷). On the other hand, in our Lord's parting instructions to the Eleven, as given at the end of Mt., He directs them to baptize 'into (or in; but εἰς is the preposition used) the name of the Father, and of the Son, and of the Holy Ghost' (28¹⁹)—a formula that is found nowhere else in the NT. This is not the place to discuss the genuineness of the logion (in support of it see Resch, TU x, 2, summarized by Marshall in ExpT vi. [1895] p. 395 ff.; Bruce, Kingdom of God, p. 258 ff.; against it, Holtzmann, NT Theol. i. 378 ff.; Harnack, Hist. of Dog. i. 79; Moffatt, Hist. NT, p. 647 ff. See, further, art. BAPTISM, § 5). But if we accept the triple formula as coming from the lips of Jesus, the fact that we have no direct evidence of its use in the Apostolic Church certainly creates a difficulty. The suggestion that the shorter form is simply a designation of the fact that baptism was administered on confession of Jesus as Christ and Lord, and that the Trinitarian formula would invariably be employed in the actual administration of the sacrament, does not meet the case, for we know that in the 3rd cent. a baptism in the name of Christ was still common, and that in the time of Cyprian the controversy about re-baptism gathered round this very point.

The solution of the problem may lie in the fact that at first the efficacy of baptism was not attached to any set form of words. The Trinitarian formula itself occurs in different versions. Justin gives it after a paraphrastic fashion (Apol. i. 61); Tertullian associates the name of the Church with the names of the Three Persons of the Trinity (de Bapt. vi.), and a like usage is found in the Syrian Church (see Scholten, Taufformel, p. 39). Corresponding to this lack of fixity in the longer form is the absence of anything like uniformity in the shorter one. The name used is 'Jesus Christ,' or 'the Lord Jesus,' or perhaps even simply 'Christ' (1 Co 1¹³ suggests the last); while the relation to the name is variously expressed by εἰς, ἐν, ἐπί (ἐπί [or ἐν] τῷ ὀνόματι Ἰησοῦ Χριστοῦ, Ac 2³⁸; εἰς τὸ ὄνομα τοῦ Κυρίου Ἰησοῦ, Ac 8¹⁶ 19⁵; ἐν τῷ ὀνόματι τοῦ Κυρίου, Ac 10⁴⁸; εἰς Χριστὸν Ἰησοῦν, Ro 6³; εἰς Χριστόν, Gal 3²⁷). It is hardly legitimate to simplify this diversity by assuming, with Dean Armitage Robinson, that εἰς and ἐν are really synonymous in every case, and that 'in the name,' not 'into the name,' is always the proper English rendering (EBI i. 473). No doubt it is true, as he says, that 'the interchangeability of the two prepositions in late Greek may be plentifully illustrated from the NT' (cf. J. H. Moulton, Gram. of NT Gr. i. 62, 66, 234 f.). But this is far from deciding the question whether in the case of baptism they are used indifferently, and passages like Ro 6³, 1 Co 12¹³, Gal 3²⁷ strongly suggest that they are not.

All this diversity of usage seems to show that slight importance was attached at first to the question of a formula, provided that it was clearly understood what Christian baptism meant, and what it implied. Relation to Christ was the essential matter. And as Christian baptism in the NT is invariably conditional upon confession of Christ, so it was administered with an appeal to Christ's authority (ἐν τῷ ὀνόματι); it depended for its reality upon a faith that rested on His name (ἐπί τῷ ὀνόματι); and it was the outward symbol of an actual union with His Person (εἰς τὸ ὄνομα).

NAMES.—Jewish children usually received their names very soon after their birth; in the case of male children, at the time of their circumcision on the eighth day (Lk 1³⁹ 2²¹). The name was selected in honour of a parent or relative (1³⁹), or because of some circumstance connected with the birth of the child, as in the case of Thomas (Aram. תאומא, Gr. Θῶμας), meaning 'twin'; in the case of our Lord and of John the Baptist the name had been selected beforehand by special Divine communication (Mt 1²¹, Lk 1³³). Indeed, Jewish names generally were significant, referring to some trait in the child, actual or prophetic; some feeling or hope of the parent at the time of the birth, though this was perhaps not so generally true as in the early OT period. Such old-fashioned names still survived in names like Nathanael (Ναθαναήλ, Heb. נחנח: 'God gave'); Zachariah (Ζαχαρίας, Heb. יחזקיהו: 'Jehovah remembered').

Surnames were quite common in NT times. Frequently one person was distinguished from another of the same name by the adding of the father's name, joined by the Aramaic word bar (בן), 'son of,' as in Simon bar-Jona (Mt 16¹⁷), and also in such names as Bartholomew, 'son of Tolmai,' and Barabbas, 'son of a father.' The Greek idiom is frequently followed, however, as in Jn 21¹⁷ 'Simon of Jonas'; or, written more fully with vós, 'son,' 'Simon son of Jonas' (1⁴²).

The presence of two names for the same person in the Gospels is sometimes to be accounted for by the fact that many of the people of Palestine in Christ's day were bilingual. Hence persons would have an Aramaic and a Greek name, the second translating the first, or being quite similar in sound. The Greek for Thomas ('twin') was Didymus (Jn 11¹⁶); for Cephas (כפיא 'stone') it was Peter (Πέτρος, 1⁴²). Many of the Jews mentioned in the Gospels are known to us only by Greek names, so widespread had the influence of that language become; cf. Φίλιππος, Philip (1⁴⁵), and Ἀνδρέας, Andrew (Mt 4¹⁸).

A noteworthy feature of personal names in Christ's day—though the custom existed much earlier and was widespread (cf. Gn 32²⁸, Dn 1⁷)—was that of changing the name or adding a new name at some important crisis in the life, or because of some manifest characteristic of the person so named (Mt 16¹⁸, Mk 3^{16, 18}).

Surnames were sometimes given from the place where one lived or from which one came, as in the case of Judas Iscariot (wh. see), Mk 3¹⁹; or from the party to which one belonged: Simon the Zealot (Ζηλωτής), Lk 6¹⁵.

NAMES AND TITLES OF CHRIST.—That special significance is attached in the Gospels to the names which are applied to our Lord, is clearly suggested by the reason assigned by the angel of the Lord for the name which he directed Joseph and Mary to bestow upon the Babe whose birth he foretold. 'Thou shalt call his name Jesus: for he shall save his people from their sins' (Mt 1²¹). This explanation of the name Jesus suggests that the other titles that are used to distinguish our Saviour have each its own didactic purpose, and are intended to shed light on some special aspect of Christ's mission and nature.

1. Jesus.—The name Divinely bestowed upon our Lord, 'Jesus' (Ἰησοῦς, the Gr. equivalent of the Heb. Joshua or Jeshua יְהוֹשֻׁעַ, יֵשׁוּעַ), 'Jehovah is salvation,' was one of the commonest of male names among the Jews. Its bestowal upon Christ had, as is expressly stated in Mt 1²¹, peculiar and special significance. It meant that the bearer of the name should in this unique instance of its application be in the fullest sense all that the word meant, the Divinely sent Saviour of His people, and in particular that the salvation which He should work out should be a moral and spiritual, not a temporal deliverance. The name Jesus, as being that by which He was commonly known among His countrymen, is used by the Evangelists as a proper name, with or without the addition of other names or titles employed by way of distinction. See separate article and also SALVATION.

2. Immanuel.—In connexion with the miraculous birth of Jesus and with the assurance that in Him should be fulfilled the promise of the Messiah, St. Matthew applies the prophecy (Is 7¹⁴), 'Behold, a virgin shall be with child, and shall bring forth a son, and they shall call his name Immanuel, which is, being interpreted, God with us' (Mt 1²³). The thought present to the Evangelist, in his use of this prophecy of Isaiah, is that which was embodied in the OT types of the Tabernacle and the Temple, and may be compared with the use in the Fourth Gospel of the expression, 'The Word was made flesh and dwelt (ἐσκήνωσεν, lit. 'tabernacled') among us' (Jn 1¹⁴). The name Immanuel, as applied to Christ in respect of His Incarnation, thus denotes the union of the Divine and the human natures in the person of the God-man. See also separate article.

3. Christ.—This name (Χριστός, 'anointed,' the exact equivalent in Greek of the word 'Messiah' מָשִׁיחַ) holds a very important place among the titles of our Lord.

The word is variously applied in the OT. It is used of the high priest, who is called 'the anointed priest' (ὁ ἱερεύς ὁ χριστός [ἡ ψῆξη [ἡ] ἁγιασμένη]), or more fully, ὁ ἱερεύς ὁ χριστός ὁ τετελειωμένος, 'the anointed priest who has been consecrated,' the participle τετελειωμένος, 'consecrated,' being added to the translation apparently in order to call attention to the meaning of the anointing (Lv 4⁵, cf. 6²²). Its use as a designation of kings is familiar, as in the title 'the Lord's anointed' (ὁ χριστός τοῦ Κυρίου יהוה; ἡ ψῆξη) applied to Saul (2 S 1¹⁴ etc.), to David (2 S 19²¹, Ps 89³⁸, 51 132^{10, 17}), to Cyrus, in connexion with his mission as the deliverer of God's people (Is 45¹). It is applied even to the people of Israel as a nation consecrated to God (Ps 106¹⁵ || 1 Ch 16²², Hab 3¹³). It occurs as a title of the expected Messiah in Ps 2² and Dn 9²⁵. In the latter book it occurs with special reference to royal authority, as a result of which it came to be regularly used as the recognized title of Israel's promised deliverer; cf. its use in the Book of Enoch (45¹⁰ 52⁴), an apocalyptic work which strongly influenced the theology of the Hebrews.

The word is used in the Gospels, but very rarely, as a proper name, in the first chapters of St. Matthew and St. Mark, where the subject of the narrative is mentioned in such expressions as 'Jesus Christ, son of David, son of Abraham' (Mt 1¹), 'Jesus Christ' (Mk 1¹, where υἱοῦ τοῦ θεοῦ is omitted by the best authorities), or where Jesus of Nazareth is distinguished from others who bore the same name, as in the phrase 'Jesus who is called Christ' (Mt 27^{17, 22}, cf. Mt 1¹⁶). It appears as a proper name in the passage in which St. Matthew, commenting upon the genealogy of the family of Abraham, notes that 'from the carrying away to Babylon unto the Christ' there were fourteen generations (Mt 1¹⁷); and probably also in the one passage in which the word occurs without the article (Mk 9¹¹), where Jesus uses the words 'because ye belong to Christ.' With these exceptions the name has in the Gospels some special reference to our Lord's offices and claims, or to the Messianic expectations of the Jews. Thus it is said of Simeon (Lk 2²⁶) that it was revealed to him that he should not see death till he had seen 'the Lord's Christ' (τὸν χριστὸν Κυρίου—the familiar LXX translation of יהוה; ἡ ψῆξη 'the Lord's anointed,' the title of all Hebrew kings), and the angel announced to the shepherds the birth of a Saviour 'who is Christ the Lord' (Lk 2¹¹). We learn from St. Matthew (2²) that the Magi inquired in Jerusalem, 'Where is he that is born King of the Jews?' Herod, who took this as referring to the current form of the Messianic hope, and regarded the Messiah concerning whom the inquiry was made as a possible rival to himself, called the chief priests and scribes, and put the question of the Magi in another form, demanding 'where the Christ should be born.' Herod and the Jewish rulers evidently considered the title 'Christ' as synonymous with that of 'King of the Jews,' in accordance with the general expectation current at the time. To them the Messiah was a king who should derive his royal authority from his Davidic descent and reign as a temporal prince. The Jews, in fact, influenced largely by their apocalyptic literature, had so narrowed their conceptions of the meaning of the title 'Messiah' as to make it signify little more than a king by Divine right, and, leaving out of account all other elements of the Messianic promise, to associate it with thoughts of a kingdom which was of this world. Our Lord, probably for this reason, refrained from claiming the title for Himself, and discouraged its use by others. He forbade the demons whom He cast out of those possessed to confess that He was Christ (Lk 4⁴¹, cf. Mk 1²⁵⁻³⁴ etc.). When Peter, in reply to the direct question, 'Who say ye that I am?' confessed His Messiahship, Jesus strictly commanded the disciples to tell no man that He was the Christ (Mt 16²⁰). On the other hand, He revealed Himself as the Christ to the woman of Samaria (Jn 4²⁵⁻²⁶). He answered the doubting message of John, 'Art thou he that should come, or do we look for another?' by pointing in proof of His Messianic claims to His teaching and His works of beneficence (Mt 11²⁻⁶ || Lk 7¹⁹⁻²³). Even at the beginning of His ministry He accepted the confession of the first disciples when they acknowledged Him to be the Messiah (Jn 1⁴¹), as He afterwards accepted the confession of Peter (Mt 16¹⁸); and when the high priest adjured Him to declare whether He was the Christ, He answered in the affirmative (Mt 26⁶³ || Mk 14⁶¹ || Lk 22⁶⁷); and before His final rejection, when the Jews challenged Him, 'How long dost thou make us to doubt? If thou be the Christ, tell us plainly,' He replied that He had already told them, and that His claim was confirmed by the works which He did in the Father's name (Jn 10²⁴⁻²⁵). The murmuring of the people when He spoke of the lifting up of the Son of Man, showed that by that time the impression produced by His ministry was that He did claim to be the Christ. Jesus had just said, 'I, if I be lifted up from the earth, will draw all men unto me,' to which the people replied, 'We have heard out of the law that Christ abideth for ever: and how sayest thou, The Son of Man shall be lifted up?' (Jn 12^{32ff.}); and again St. John tells us, in connexion with the incident of the cure of the man who had been born blind, that the Jews had agreed that if any man should confess that Jesus was the Christ, he should be put out of the synagogue (Jn 9²²).

From these various instances the conclusion appears to be, that Jesus discouraged the application to Himself of the title 'Christ' in every case in which it was likely to be misunderstood or to lead the people, with their narrow views as to what the Messiah should be, to form inadequate conceptions of the nature and scope of His actual claims and His actual mission.

His aim throughout His ministry was to correct the current conceptions of the expected Messiah by calling attention to the spiritual significance of the national hope, and to the true meaning of that word which was so often upon their lips, thus gradually preparing them to accept Himself as the Deliverer who had been promised and whom they required. This explains, on the one hand, His reticence on most occasions as to His personal claim to be the Christ; and, on the other hand, His frankness at other times, as when He revealed Himself as the Christ to the woman of Samaria, who had learned to look upon the promised Messiah as One who should reveal the Father and the Father's will.

Jesus sought to effect His purpose in various ways. To adduce one conspicuous example, He called the attention of the Pharisees to a well-known Messianic prophecy, evidently in order to correct that popular belief which they shared. He asked them, 'What think ye of Christ? Whose son is he?' (Mt 22⁴², cf. Mk 12³⁵ || Lk 20⁴¹), clearly treating the matter as a question in Biblical theology or Scripture interpretation: They answered His question in terms of the belief then current, 'The son of David.' Then Jesus, by quoting from the Psalms a passage which they understood to be not only distinctly Messianic, but an utterance of David himself (Ps 110¹), showed some of the practical difficulties involved in the belief that the Messiah of prophecy owed his authority to his Davidic descent. 'How is David's son David's Lord?' Thus our Lord suggested the need there was of carefully revising the whole question of Messianic prophecy, that the people should ask themselves whether they had taken into account not one element or aspect of the problem only, but all that the prophets had spoken concerning the Christ. Until they had done this and were in a position to judge the Person, mission, work, and claims of Jesus by the light shed upon the subject by such a careful study of the whole question, they must necessarily find not merely the teaching and work of Jesus, but the OT revelation itself, a dark problem full of insoluble enigmas.

Thus Jesus sought gradually to lead His countrymen to rise above their narrow views, and, instead of making an unintelligent use of words and names, mere signs of spiritual truths, to apprehend the thing signified by them. Thus He taught them that 'the Christ,' 'the Messiah,' 'the Lord's Anointed,' simply meant 'him whom the Father sanctified and sent into the world' (Jn 10³⁶) that He might 'do the Father's will and finish his work' (Jn 4³⁴, cf. 17⁴). The anointing which the name denoted, and of which under the old economy priests and kings, as types of the coming Deliverer, were the subjects, was only a symbol of the Holy Spirit by whose effectual working God's will was done. The Christ of God, the Anointed One by way of eminence, the Antitype to which those types more or less clearly pointed, was He upon whom the Spirit of God rested and abode according to the prophecy (Is 11²⁻³), and who was thus equipped for the fulfilment of the Father's will. We may compare with this what we learn from the Fourth Gospel of the manner in which the Baptist knew that Jesus was the Christ. The appointed sign was the descent upon Him of the Spirit in the form of a dove. 'Upon whom thou shalt see the Spirit descending, and remaining on him, the same is he which baptizeth with the Holy Ghost' (Jn 1³³). That was the anointing which constituted Him the Christ, and by which He was publicly set apart for the perfect accomplishment of the Father's purpose of redemption. This truth was not fully learned, and therefore the name in which the truth was enshrined could not be used, with a correct understanding of its meaning, even by the most intimate disciples of Jesus, until after the Resurrection, when they knew that the doing of the Father's will, for which He had been anointed with the Spirit, involved the sufferings, death, and resurrection of the Christ (Lk 24⁴⁶), after which, and as a result of which, Christ should impart to His followers the gift of the Holy Ghost, and so communicate to them all the benefits of His redemptive work. See also art. MESSIAH.

4. Son of David; King of Israel; King of the Jews.—These titles, closely connected with that of 'Christ,' and, like it, associated in the minds of the people with inadequate conceptions of Messianic prophecy, were little favoured by our Lord. They had, however, their own significance for the Evangelists in respect of their bearing upon the fulfilment of prophecy. Thus St. Matthew in the beginning of his Gospel calls Jesus 'son of David,' and prefaces his narrative with a genealogical table in which he notes Christ's place in history as a descendant of the royal house of David (Mt 1^{1st}), while in ch. 2 he calls attention to the general expectation prevalent among the nations that the Messiah should appear as a Prince of the house of Judah (Mt 2^{2d}). St. Luke also traces the genealogy of Jesus, and calls attention to His descent from David, in connexion with which he explains how it happened that He was born in Bethlehem, though the home of Mary and Joseph was in Nazareth in Galilee (Lk 2^{1st}, 3²³⁻³⁸). The Evangelist further emphasizes the point of our Lord's Davidic descent by recording the words of Gabriel at the Annunciation: 'The Lord God shall give unto him the throne of his father David' (Lk 1^{32d}). The aim of these Evangelists in noting these points is to show that in Jesus of Nazareth, OT prophecy, and, in particular, the promise that the Christ should come of the house of David, find their fulfilment. The connexion between the Old Covenant and the New having been thus established, and Jesus proved to be the subject of OT prophecies of the coming Deliverer, the title 'Son of David' ceases to be used or referred to until the Gospel narrative reaches the closing scenes of the life of Christ. Then we learn that Jesus was addressed as 'Son of David' by the two blind men (Mt 9²⁷), by the Syrophenician woman (Mt 15²²), by the blind men at Jericho (Mt 20³⁰ || Mk 10⁴⁷, 48 || Lk 18³⁸, 39); and that He was saluted as such by the multitude at His triumphal entry into Jerusalem (Mt 21⁹ || Mk 11⁹). That the popular belief made the Davidic descent of the Messiah an essential element, is illustrated by the exclamation of the multitude on the occasion on which He healed one 'possessed with a devil, blind and dumb,' 'Is not this the son of David?' (Mt 12²³); by the objection raised at another time by those who maintained that Christ should come not from Galilee, but 'of the seed of David, and out of the town of Bethlehem, where David was' (Jn 7⁴²); and by the answer of the Pharisees to our Lord's question, 'What think ye of Christ?' (Mt 22⁴², cf. Mk 12³⁵ || Lk 20⁴¹).

Closely connected with the title 'Son of David' are those of 'King of Israel' and 'King of the Jews.' Jesus is spoken of as 'King of the Jews' by the Magi (Mt 2², cf. Lk 1³², 33), and the first recorded instance of His being addressed as 'King of Israel' is the confession of Nathanael, 'Thou art the Son of God, thou art the King of Israel' (Jn 1⁴⁹). All other instances of the use of these titles belong to the narrative of the last week of Christ's ministry. He was hailed as 'King of Israel' (Jn 12¹³, cf. Lk 19³⁸) at His triumphal entry, when He seemed to be on the point of acceding to the popular desire, and when He so far countenanced it by literally and in the most public manner fulfilling the prophecy of Zechariah (9⁹), riding into Jerusalem upon a young ass, the use of which He had claimed on the ground that 'the Lord hath need of him' (Mt 21³ || Mk 11³ || Lk 19³¹). The title appears after this in direct connexion with the sufferings and death of Jesus, whose claim to be 'Christ, a King,' was the pretext used by the chief priests for delivering Him over to Pilate (Lk 23²). Pilate, hearing this charge brought against his prisoner, asked Jesus, 'Art thou the King of the Jews?' (Mk 15² || Lk 23³). Jesus replied in the affirmative, but explained that the Kingdom which He claimed was spiritual, not temporal (Jn 18³³⁻³⁷). After this the titles 'King of Israel' and 'King of the Jews' are 'applied to Jesus by Pilate, the Roman soldiers, and the Jews, with associations of mockery and abuse (Mt 27²⁹, 42 || Mk 15¹⁸, 32 || Lk 23³⁷ || Jn 19³, 14, 15); and with the same associations the title 'King of the Jews' was affixed to the cross (Mt 27³⁷ || Mk 15²⁶ || Lk 23³⁸ || Jn 19¹⁹). The explanation already suggested of our Lord's avoidance of the name Christ has special force here. Misunderstood as those titles were, Jesus systematically discouraged their use as being calculated to create a false impression of His actual claims. The trial before Pilate and Herod and the scene at the Crucifixion themselves illustrate the reason for Christ's refusal to accept the royal honours which the people would have pressed upon Him. In the opinion of Jew and Gentile the royalty of Jesus and His crucifixion as an impostor and malefactor involved a grotesque contradiction. The cry of derision, 'He is the King of Israel, let him come down from the cross' (Mt 27⁴² || Mk 15³⁰), was but another form of the popular belief that a suffering Saviour was a contradiction in terms, that the Christ could not be subject to death (Jn 12³⁴). See also art. KING.

5. Son of God.—This title, as it was known among the Jews, had in it a very considerable element of ambiguity. We can understand why this was so when we reflect upon the fact that in OT Scripture the expression is more than once used of others besides a Divine Being. It is used of angels (Gn 6², 4, Job 1⁵, 2¹, 38⁷), of kings, and even of the nation of Israel (2 S 7¹⁴, Ps 82⁶, Ex 4²²). In the New Test., again, it is applied to Adam (Lk 3³⁸), where the reference is to the relationship in which by his creation he stands to God; and Jesus Himself uses the expression 'sons of God' with reference to believers, where He says that in heaven 'they are equal unto the angels; and are the 'children' (Gr. υιοι, "sons") of God' (Lk 20³⁶).

The use of the name as a title of the Messiah is traceable to OT prophecies like that of Ps 2⁷ 'Thou art my Son; this day have I begotten thee.' Thus 'Son of God' came to be synonymous with 'Christ.' It is possible that it was so used even by Peter in his confession at Caesarea Philippi (Mt 16¹⁶, cf. Mk 8²⁹ 'Thou art the Christ,' and Lk 9²⁰ 'the Christ of God,' with Jn 6⁶⁹ 'the Holy One of God,' ὁ ἅγιος τοῦ θεοῦ), and it was certainly understood in that sense, i.e. as strictly Messianic, by the Jews generally in the time of our Lord. To them the Messiah as such was Son of God. Thus in Nathanael's confession the latter name occurs in conjunction with the Messianic title 'King of Israel'; and John the Baptist, after relating the incident by which the Spirit of God showed him that Jesus was the Christ, concludes with the words, 'I saw and bare record that this is the Son of God' (Jn 1⁴⁹, cf. v. 34). It is of rare occurrence in the Synoptic Gospels. We find it in the Annunciation: 'That holy thing which shall be born of thee shall be called the Son of God' (Lk 1³⁵). In the Synoptic accounts of the Baptism and the Transfiguration we learn that on both occasions Jesus was hailed as God's Son by a voice from heaven (Mt 3¹⁷ || Mk 1¹¹ || Lk 3²², cf. Mt 17⁵ || Mk 9⁷ || Lk 9³⁵). Again, the Synoptists give various instances in which Jesus was called 'Son of God' by others, as by Satan (Mt 4³, 6 || Lk 4³, 9), by the demons whom He cast out of those who were possessed (Mk 3¹¹, Lk 4⁴¹), and by the occupants of Peter's boat after the second stilling of the storm on the lake (Mt 14³³). Again, as already noted, Peter confessed 'Thou art the Christ, the Son of the living God.' To these may be added the testimony at the cross by the centurion and others (Mt 27⁵⁴), 'Truly this was the (a) son of God.' Of its use by Jesus Himself the Synoptists record no direct instance, though they record allusions in His parabolic teaching which clearly point to Himself as the Son of the King (Mt 22^{26f.}) or of the Lord of the vineyard. (Mt 21³⁷⁻³⁹ || Mk 12⁶⁻⁸ || Lk 20¹³⁻¹⁵), and take note of His acceptance of the title as involved in His answer to the direct questions of the chief priests and scribes, 'Art thou the Christ, the Son of the Blessed?' (Mk 14⁶¹); 'Art thou then the Son of God?' (Mt 26⁶³, cf. Lk 22^{67, 70}). Further, in the baptismal formula Jesus instructs the disciples to baptize in the name of the Father, the Son, and the Holy Ghost (Mt 28¹⁹).

In addition to the instances already cited in which He was called 'Son of God' by others, there are those in which Jesus was challenged to prove Himself Son of God by coming down from the cross, though in the latter case the title is used in its purely Messianic sense as that was currently understood among the Jews (Mt 27⁴⁰).

In the Fourth Gospel, on the other hand, considerable prominence is given to our Lord's claim to be the Son of God. In the discourses of our Lord as recorded by St. John, Jesus clearly conveys the impression that the Divine Sonship there spoken of means very much more than was involved in the popular Messianic use of the name. But even in that Gospel the actual use of the title is confined to a very few passages. Jesus applies it to Himself in the narrative of the man who was born blind (9³⁵⁻³⁷); again (10³⁶) where He says, 'I said, I am the Son of God'; justifying His claim to the title in that passage in which He says 'The Father loveth the Son,' etc. (Jn 5²⁰); in His remarks on the illness of Lazarus: 'This sickness is . . . for the glory of God, that the Son of God may be glorified thereby' (11⁴); and in the Intercessory Prayer (17). Elsewhere He is acknowledged as the Son of God by Nathanael (14⁹) and by Martha (11²⁷). Among the charges brought against Him by His enemies this is specially emphasized, that 'He made himself the Son of God' (19⁷).

The conclusion to which we are led by a careful consideration of such instances as we find in the Gospels of the use of the name 'Son of God' is, that, as it had come to be employed by the Jews, it was at best a vague and indefinite term. It did not necessarily involve the conception of essential Deity, eternal participation in the attributes of Godhead. The object of the Gospels was to show how Jesus appeared as the Revealer of the Father, and that salvation could come only through One who was Himself equal with God assuming the nature of humanity, dwelling among men, and suffering in their place. Such a revelation so far transcended the current expectations of the people as to the nature and work of the promised Messiah, that the full realization of the significance of Christ's mission could not be attained until His work was completely accomplished and Jesus was revealed as the Son of God with power. This view of the history of the title 'Son of God' is well illustrated by Wendt (The Teaching of Jesus, ii. p. 133): 'According to the Jewish idea, the Messianic King was also Son of God; according to Jesus' idea, the Son of God as such was the Messianic King.' Here as elsewhere Jesus sought to enlarge and elevate the current conception of the Messianic hope, and to show that the Redeemer of Israel and the world was none else than the Son of God, by nature and essence equal with God, and not in that secondary sense in which that name had hitherto been understood. Such a revelation could be made only gradually, hence the sparing use by Christ of the title 'Son of God.'

The Fourth Gospel gives special prominence to the doctrine of the essential Divine Sonship of Jesus. That indications of it are found in the Synoptists themselves is evident not only from the cases already cited, the testimony of the voice from heaven at the Baptism and at the Transfiguration, and our Lord's argument from Ps 110¹ that Christ must be more than Son of David since David himself calls Him Lord, but from such an utterance as this of our Lord Himself recorded by St. Matthew and St. Luke: 'All things are delivered unto me of my Father; and no man knoweth the Son, but the Father; neither knoweth any man the Father, save the Son, and he to whomsoever the Son will reveal him' (Mt 11²⁷ || Lk 10²²). But our Lord's claim to be Son of God κατ' ἐξοχήν is one of the central features of the Johannine discourses no less than of the teaching of St. John himself. St. John identifies Christ with the Eternal Logos, and calls Him 'the only-begotten of the Father' (Jn 1¹⁴); and Jesus applies to Himself the same expression (3^{16, 18}) in terms which distinctly assert His essential Sonship and His pre-existence, and declares that the unbelieving are 'condemned already' because they have 'not believed in the name of the only-begotten Son of God' (3¹⁸). Jesus associates His work with that of the Father (5¹⁷), and that in such a way as at once to expose Himself to the charge of blasphemy. So the Evangelist tells us that the Jews sought the more to kill Him, because 'He said also that God was his Father, making himself equal with God' (5¹⁸), their interpretation of His words being justified by His language on other occasions, as when He said, 'Before Abraham was, I am' (8⁵⁸), an expression at once suggestive of the Tetragrammaton, the sacred name Jehovah itself. And notwithstanding the fact that the Jews put such a construction upon His words, Jesus enlarged upon the theme, and claimed for Himself power and authority to give life to the dead and to execute judgment (5¹⁹⁻³⁰). In the same connexion He declares it to be the Father's will 'that all men should honour the Son, even as they honour the Father' (5²³); and in other places asserts His essential oneness with the Father (10³⁰), and claims to have shared His glory 'before the world was' (17⁵). He claims, moreover, to have received from the Father 'power over all flesh,' to 'give eternal life to as many as' the Father has 'given him' (17²); while in more than one passage emphasis is laid upon the fact that He came from God and should return to Him (13³ 6^{38, 46, 62} 7^{28, 33, 36} 8^{14, 16, 18, 26, 42} 16^{28, 30}). Again, while He teaches His disciples to regard God as their Father (so 20¹⁷, where He says 'My Father and your Father'), and to pray to Him as such (as He does also in the Synoptic Gospels), 'He never places His filial relationship on a level with theirs' (Weiss). On the contrary, He speaks at times of the Fatherhood of God with exclusive reference to Himself, as, e.g., where He says (6⁴⁶), 'Not that any man hath seen the Father, save he which is of God, he hath seen the Father,' a passage which, as Holtzmann points out; 'shows clearly that there the historical appearance of the Son is connected with the supra-historical being of the pre-existent Logos.'

From all this it is evident that while the title 'Son of God,' which had come to be associated with essentially theocratic ideas, as of the election of Israel by the adoption of grace as sons of God, and of the Messiah as King of Israel, and was therefore open to misunderstanding and misconstruction, was seldom used by Jesus or His disciples as a title of our Lord; the testimony of all the Gospels, and especially of the Fourth, distinctly shows that Jesus claimed to be the Son of God in the strictest sense of the term, as essentially and eternally One with God the Father (cf. St. John's summary of the aim of his Gospel in 20³¹ 'These are written, that ye might believe that Jesus is the Christ, the Son of God; and that believing ye might have life through his name'). See also sep. article.

6. The Word or The Logos. This name is peculiar to the Fourth Gospel, and there it occurs only in the Prologue (Jn 1¹⁻¹⁴). Much controversy has arisen as to the probable sources from which the Apostle derived his conception of Christ as the Logos—a controversy the more natural that the term 'the Word' as used by St. John represents the meeting point of Hebrew theology, Hellenic philosophy, and the religion of Jesus Christ. To that controversy little reference need here be made. See art. LOGOS.

The Logos doctrine of St. John may be summarized thus. God's revelation of Himself in the history of mankind is a complete unity. Creation, Providence, and Redemption are parts of the same grand purpose, whose object is the highest well-being of God's creatures, and especially of man, the head and crown of the creation. In each we have God revealing Himself, and that through a Mediator. This Mediator, more or less darkly imagined by mankind from the beginning until these last times, and more or less clearly revealed to God's chosen people in the days of the fathers as the Angel of the Covenant or the Angel of the Presence, is the same in whom He has now manifested Himself, the Christ by whom God has now spoken to those to whom the promise was given, and who had long been expecting their Messiah, and to all the sons of men, as many as will receive Him. Thus is the Christ, the Redeemer of Israel, the very Word of God, the last, the perfect revelation of the Most High, and the Redeemer of the world.

The Prologue of the Gospel is St. John's appeal to the nations, and speaks thus: 'In Christ Jesus, whom we knew, who as a man among men accompanied with us, God has spoken, has manifested Himself to us who beheld His glory, and to all that have welcomed that Word of the Father. In Christ the Word was made flesh and dwelt among us. In Him was life, and the life was the light of men.' This conception of Christ as the Logos, the same that was in the beginning with God, necessarily involves the doctrine of the essential Deity and eternal pre-existence of Christ. But the point which St. John specially brings out by his use of the term is that in Christ God perfectly reveals Himself to man, and gives to all that receive Christ that adoption by which they may become 'children of God' (τέκνα θεοῦ, not υἱοί, Jn 1¹²; cf. 1 Jn 3¹). Having in the Prologue established this point, St. John makes no further use of the term Logos in his Gospel, where 'Son' or 'Son of God' takes its place.

7. Son of Man.—This title seems to have been most favoured by our Lord, and occurs with great frequency, especially in the Synoptic Gospels. Two typical instances may be given of our Lord's preference for this name. One is found in the Gospel of St. John, where the title least frequently occurs—that of Christ's answer to Nathanael, who had just acknowledged Him as Son of God. Jesus, accepting Nathanael's confession, replied thus: 'Because I said unto thee, I saw thee under the fig-tree, believest thou? thou shalt see greater things than these. And he saith unto him, Verily, verily, I say unto you, Hereafter ye shall see heaven open, and the angels of God ascending and descending upon the Son of Man' (Jn 1⁵⁰⁻⁵¹). The other is His reply to the adjuration of the high priest, who asked Him whether He was the Christ the Son of God, in which again, immediately after acknowledging that such was His claim, He spoke of Himself as Son of Man, and that in connexion with a prophecy of His appearing on the right hand of power, and coming in the clouds of heaven (Mt 26^{63, 64} || Mk 14⁶¹⁻⁶² || Lk 22⁶⁷⁻⁷⁰). For the origin and history of the title 'Son of Man,' see separate article.

With regard to the question as to the sense in which Jesus used the title 'Son of Man,' the answer is suggested by the connexion in which at various times He so described Himself. It may be briefly stated in this way: God manifesting Himself to man in a form which man as man can understand. Comparing the passages in which the title is used by Christ, the first thing that strikes us is that He uses it in connexion both with His humiliation and with His exaltation. We find it associated with thoughts of the privations and sufferings of Jesus,—as where He says: 'Foxes have holes, and the birds of the air have nests; but the Son of Man hath not where to lay his head' (Mt 8²⁰ || Lk 9⁵⁸). It occurs repeatedly in connexion with His sufferings and death, as where He tells His disciples that as John was slain by Herod, so shall it be done to the Son of Man (Mt 17¹² || Mk 9¹²). Again, that the Son of Man must 'be delivered into the hands of men' (Lk 9⁴⁴ || Mt 17²², cf. Mt 20¹⁸ || Mk 10³³ || Lk 18³¹⁻³³, Mt 26⁴⁵ || Mk 14⁴¹), 'and suffer many things' (Mk 8³¹ || Lk 9²²). Thus also Jesus states this as the mission of the Son of Man, that He 'came not to be ministered unto, but to minister, and to give his life a ransom for many' (Mt 20²⁸ || Mk 10⁴⁵). Again, the title is used where the thought expressed is that of the sympathy of Jesus with human joys as with human sorrows, in the contrast drawn between the asceticism of John and the sociable disposition of our Lord (Mt 11^{18, 19} || Lk 7^{33, 34}); while the same thought appears in another form, where Jesus, justifying His acceptance of the hospitality of Zacchæus, says: 'The Son of Man is come to seek and to save that which was lost' (Lk 19¹⁰). In other passages the use of the name suggests the coexistence of Messianic authority with the lowliness of Christ's human nature, as in the narrative of the healing of the paralytic, in connexion with which Jesus says that 'the Son of Man has power on earth to forgive sins' (Mt 9⁶ || Mk 2¹⁰ || Lk 5²⁴); and St. Matthew notes the impression produced upon the multitude, as that 'they marvelled, and glorified God which had given such power unto men.' To this class of passages may be referred also our Lord's saying concerning blasphemy against the Son of Man and that against the Holy Ghost (Mt 12²²). The Son of Man, in His humiliation, veiling His Divine nature, appearing to men like one of themselves, may not be recognized for what He is. Blasphemy against Him, therefore, as resulting only from ignorance and unbelief, admits of forgiveness; whereas blasphemy against the Spirit of God, a presumptuous offence against the Deity, cannot be forgiven. Again, the title is used of Jesus in respect of His representative character, where He asserts His right as Son of Man to interpret the Sabbath law (Mt 12⁸ || Mk 2^{27, 28}). 'Jesus regarded the institution from a philanthropic point of view, and He claimed lordship over it for the Son of Man on the ground of His sympathy with mankind, which He deemed a far more reliable interpreter of the Divine purpose and guide in observance, than the merciless rigour of the Rabbis' (Bruce, Kingdom of God, p. 174). A connecting link between these uses of the title and those which specially refer to Christ's Exaltation is found in those passages in which Jesus so calls Himself with reference to His mission as Founder of the Kingdom of God. So in the parable of the Tares, 'He that soweth the good seed is the Son of Man' (Mt 13³⁷). 'The Son of Man shall send forth his angels' (v.⁴¹). Here Jesus identifies the Founder of the Kingdom of God in the world with the Judge of the world, using the same title in both connexions. He who as Son of Man seeks with all patience and forbearance to establish His Kingdom by manifestation of the grace of God, is He who must judge mankind according as they have accepted or rejected His message of salvation.

But undoubtedly the most remarkable use of the name Son of Man is that which is directly and specially connected with the thought of Jesus in His Exaltation. We see this in all His predictions of His Second Coming. Thus, speaking of the suddenness and unexpectedness of His appearing, He says: 'At an hour when ye think not the Son of Man cometh' (Mt 24⁴⁴ || Lk 12⁴⁰). The Son of Man is to appear with the suddenness of lightning (Mt 24²⁷ || Lk 17²⁴), and the circumstances of His appearing are compared to those of the world in the days of Noah and of Lot (Mt 24³⁷ || Lk 17²⁶⁻³²). He is to come after the great tribulation (Mt 24²⁹ || Mk 13²⁶ || Lk 21²⁷). His advent is to be announced by 'the sign of the Son of Man appearing in the heavens' (Mt 24³⁰). He is to sit as a King upon the throne of His glory (Mt 25³¹), when His Apostles shall be associated with Him, judging the tribes of Israel (Mt 19²⁸, cf. Lk 22^{29, 30}).

In the Fourth Gospel the name 'Son of Man' is used in connexion with the pre-existence of Christ: 'No man hath ascended up to heaven but he that came down from heaven, even the Son of Man which is in heaven' (3¹³, cf. 6⁶²). As Son of Man He is Mediator between Heaven and Earth (Jn 1⁵¹). Judgment is committed to the Son of Man as such (Jn 5²⁷). Special emphasis is laid upon associations of this title with the coming judgment (cf. besides the passages just noted, Mt 26⁶⁴ || Mk 14⁶² || Lk 22⁶⁹). Again, Jesus concludes one of His discourses on 'The Last Things' with an emphatic warning to His own disciples to watch and pray that they 'may be accounted worthy . . . to stand before the Son of Man' (Lk 21³⁶). The meaning of all this is plain. The Son of Man as such is the Judge of man. Man is, as it were, to be 'tried by his peers.' The Son of Man, as bearing the nature of man, capable of understanding and sympathizing with him, is to appear at last as the Judge of the human race.

It is clear that the meaning of the title cannot be limited to any of those conceptions which have been suggested of Christ as the ideal of humanity, still less to the thought of the humanity as distinguished from the Divinity of our Lord. It was rather used, as Wendt puts it, very much 'to raise problems and to incite,' among Christ's hearers, 'reflexion and the use of their own judgment.' 'It contained, in nuce, through reference to the testimony of OT Scripture,' 'a solution of the paradox of the coexistence' in Jesus 'of lowly humanity with lofty Messianic dignity' (Wendt, Teaching of Jesus, ii. p. 148).

8. To these characteristic titles of our Lord may be added those of Lord, Master (κύριος, ἐπιστάτης, διδάσκαλος), Rabbi, which are variously used. The title 'Lord' appears most frequently as the equivalent of 'Master' (ἐπιστάτης), 'Teacher' (διδάσκαλος) simply. So Martha addressed Jesus as 'Lord' (Κύριε) when complaining of Mary's conduct in the household of Bethany (Lk 10⁴⁰). The same word is used by the disciples in peril on the Sea of Galilee (Mt 8²⁵), in which case the parallels 'Teacher' in St. Mark's account (διδάσκαλε) and 'Master' (ἐπιστάτα) in St. Luke's, illustrate the sense in which it occurs (Mk 4³⁸, cf. Lk 8²⁴). So again, in the narrative of the Transfiguration, where Peter says, 'Lord, it is good for us to be here,' the word κύριε in St. Matthew corresponds to 'Master' (ἐπιστάτα) in St. Luke and 'Rabbi' (Ραββέι) in St. Mark. Peter addressed Jesus as 'Lord' (Κύριε) when he remonstrated with Him at Caesarea Philippi (Mt 16²²); and the same title is used by the disciples when they ask Jesus to teach them to pray 'as John also taught his disciples' (Lk 11¹); again, when they say of Lazarus, 'Lord, if he sleep, he shall do well' (Jn 11¹²), and by Martha and Mary in the same narrative (Jn 11^{3-21, 27}); and Jesus Himself uses the title 'Lord' in connexion with that of 'Teacher' (Jn 13¹³): 'Ye call me Master (teacher) and Lord.'

The title 'Lord' (κύριος) is also applied to Christ, especially by St. Luke, as an alternative for Jesus or Christ, apparently by anticipation, speaking of Jesus in the manner which became current after the Crucifixion. Thus we read that 'the Lord said' to the widow of Nain: 'Weep not' (Lk 7¹³); that 'the Lord said, Who then is that faithful and wise steward?' etc. (12⁴²); 'the Lord said, Hear what the unjust judge saith' (18⁶); and again, that 'the Lord appointed' the seventy disciples (10¹). Again, in St. John we read, 'When therefore the Lord knew that the Pharisees had heard,' etc. (Jn 4¹); that 'the Lord gave thanks' (6²³); and that Mary of Bethany was she 'who anointed the Lord with ointment' (11²). Occasionally also the title 'Lord' (κύριος) is applied to Christ where text and context plainly demand that it should be interpreted in the highest sense of the word, as where Elisabeth calls Mary 'the mother of my Lord' (Lk 1⁴³); where the angel says, 'a Saviour which is Christ the Lord' (Lk 2¹¹); where Thomas addresses Christ, 'my Lord, and my God' (Jn 20²⁸); and by Jesus speaking of Himself in connexion with the Last Judgment (Mt 7^{21, 22}, cf. 25¹¹ etc.). See also separate articles.

9. The various figurative or parabolic names of Christ do not call for any special remark, as their use by Christ in the passages where they occur sufficiently explains their meaning. Such is that of the Good Shepherd (Jn 10^{2, 11} etc., cf. Lk 15^{3ff.}), where He shows how, like the Shepherd of Messianic prophecy, He tends and protects the sheep entrusted to His care, and how He must lay down His life for them; and again, that of the Door of the Sheep, an expression which means simply that acceptance of Christ by faith is the first condition of entrance into the Kingdom of God (Jn 10⁷⁻⁹, cf. 14⁶). Again, impressing upon His hearers the dependence of His disciples upon Himself as the source of their spiritual life, He described Himself as the Bread of Life (Jn 6^{35ff.}). The same truth is taught in the parable in which He calls Himself the True Vine, with the added thought of fruit-bearing as the legitimate test of life in all that are joined to Him by faith (Jn 15). Again, in justification of His work among the outcasts of society, He compares Himself to the Physician, of whose aid only the sick stand in need (Mt 9¹² || Mk 2¹⁷ || Lk 5³¹). Speaking of the conflict of good and evil in the heart of man when first he looks to Christ for help, our Lord uses the similitude of a strong man armed, successfully defending his house against all assailants until there comes one stronger than he who overpowers and binds him, where the meaning of the passage is that Christ is that Stronger One, who breaks the power of the strong man—Satan (Lk 11²¹, Mt 12²⁹ || Mk 3²⁷). Lastly, Christ's mission to save sinners by His vicarious sufferings and death is shadowed forth by the words of John the Baptist (Jn 1²⁹), 'Behold the Lamb of God [see SHEEP, § 4] which taketh away the sin of the world.' See also artt. OFFICES OF CHRIST and PRINCE.

NAPHTALI (Νεφθαλείμ).—1. Description.—With the Captivities all practical use of the tribal divisions came to an end, and, but for such a reference as that given in Mt 4¹⁵ to the OT prophecy of Is 9¹, the lands of Zebulun and Naphtali could scarcely appear as geographical names in the NT. The boundaries of these divisions we can know at best only approximately. Many of the towns named in Joshua's description of the tribal territories are unknown to us, and, besides, the tribes are not likely ever to have had the unbroken compactness the maps would lead us to believe. Villages among the mountains of Naphtali have to this day their arable lands near the shores of the Sea of Galilee, and similarly in Zebulun the inhabitants of Nazareth cultivate portions of the plain of Esdraelon. Thus the tribes might in many cases possess detached portions, and difficulties connected with their extent and boundaries may sometimes be explained from this fact. This uncertainty as regards the boundaries of these tribes is of no consequence to our present purpose, as the indefinite statement in Mt 4¹⁵ cannot be used in any argument regarding the site of Capernaum; nor can we fix the boundaries from any supposed relationship to that city, as Reland has sought to do (Pal. p. 161). The lands of Naphtali then, generally speaking, occupied the N.E. portion of Galilee, together with the west and south of the Lake. Josephus (Ant. v. i. 22) defines its northern boundary as Mount Lebanon and the Fountains of Jordan. The Rabbis tell us that 'Naphtali rejoiced in his portion, having seas and fish.' They assign the Sea of Galilee to the portion of Naphtali, and give him also 'a full measure' to the south of the Lake (Bab. Baba Kama, 81b; Sifri on Dt 33²³). In Naphtali were represented the three divisions of Galilee—of varying elevation (Mishn. Shebi'ith ix. 2); (1) Upper Galilee, from Kefr Hananyah (Kefr Anān) northwards, which is described as the portion 'where the sycamores do not grow'; (2) Lower Galilee, extending downwards till we reach (3) the third division, which is designated מְרִיבָה הַדְּפִיָּה—or הַדְּפִיָּה—'the depression of Tiberias' or 'the valley.' For description of the last of these districts, see artt. SEA OF GALILEE, and GENNESARET (LAND OF).

From the north end of the Plain of Gennesaret and the Sea of Galilee (-682.5 ft.) the land rises through a series of steep ascents and small plateaux to Şafed (+2750 ft.) and Jebel Jermuk (4000 ft.), the highest peak in Western Palestine. To the north of these points, and until the valley of the Litani is reached, we have an undulating tableland, with vast stretches that are arable and everywhere filled, with swelling hills in view all round, covered with prickly shrubs and trees and forests of small oak. This district is broken into by two deep valleys, somewhat like but narrower than Wady Ḥamam. From the N.W. of the Plain of Gennesaret the Wady Leimon, otherwise called Wady Amūd, and in ancient times מְעֵלַת מְרִיבָה, the 'ascent of Meiron,' extends to the neighbourhood of the village of that name. It is a narrow gorge, for the most part enclosed by steep rocky walls and natural pillars. It is now impassable, but in ancient times it was accessible to passengers in single file (Erubbin, 22b; Kosh-hash., 16a). About half-way up this ravine a smaller wady branches off eastward, to beyond the great rock of Akbara—a cliff as grand and impressive as anything met with in Wady Ḥamam. In later days there grew up under its shadow a famous Rabbinical school, and the district was renowned for its coverts of pheasants. Farther north, Upper Galilee is divided by another valley (Wady Farā), almost equally deep, but less rocky. It extends eastward from the neighbourhood of el-Jish, and opens out into the plain beside Lake Huleh and the Jordan.

In the neighbourhood of el-Jish and Taitabeh (said to be the Tishbe of 1 K 17¹) we meet with three extinct craters and quantities of black volcanic rock, and by it the slopes to the Huleh valley and the Jordan as far as the Sea of Galilee are also fringed. Between Kerazeh and Tell Ḥum great quantities of basaltic boulders cumber the ground, and the stones of Tiberias again are black. Volcanic forces have been active in the past. They have created for us these wild gorges and gigantic cliffs, and their continued existence is proved by the hot springs, as also by the frequent earthquakes in ancient (Ant. xv. v. 2; Joma v. 2; Şofa viii. 7) and in modern times. Of these latter the most terrible known is that which occurred on 1st Jan. 1837. Elsewhere the rocks of Naphtali are generally a species of limestone, known in Palestine by the name of nāri. On the hills above the Lake there are great stretches of these white rocks, hard as flint, bare, desolate, and painful to the eye, especially under the summer sun. But though the surface is hard and glossy, we have only to get below it to find that the rock is really soft. It may be cut with a saw with even greater facility than wood. All sorts of trees—olives, figs, and vines—can send their roots through it and draw nourishment thence, while the hard exposed surface is there to conserve the moisture below. With little trouble these rocky desolations may be turned into vineyards, olive groves, and orchards, and we have every reason to believe that they were such in the early Christian centuries (Bab. Megilla, 6a).

Naphtali will thus be seen to have, in virtue of its lands of varying altitude and deep depression, a greater variety of climate, scenery, and possible variety of production than any other tribe of Israel. To it more than to any other could be applied the words of promise uttered ere the Land was yet entered—'a land of brooks of water, of fountains and depths that spring out of valleys and hills; a land of wheat and barley and vines and fig-trees and pomegranates, a land of oil olives and honey' (Dt 8⁷⁻⁸). Apart from the barren stretches mentioned, these words describe most naturally the state of Naphtali to-day. Different parts are renowned for their varied products—Ramch for the excellence of its olives and its oranges, el-Jish for its vineyards, the north and the Huleh valley for their fine crops of wheat and barley. Elsewhere we meet with the lemon, fig, mulberry, apricot, and even tobacco and tomatoes, in great abundance. As the Targum (on Gn 49²¹) has it, 'Naphtali's lot was cast in a pleasant land.' From shortly after the commencement of the rainy season it is brilliant with flowers—anemones of many varied tints, cyclamens, and lilies, while all its water-courses may be traced by the red bloom of the oleander. The hills are greener than those of any other tribe, and the grass and the spring flowers continue among its uplands long after the rest of Palestine is burned black and bare. This arises from the fact that Naphtali enjoys first and most of all the much praised 'dews of Hermon that descend upon the mountains of Zion' (Ps 133³). When the N.E. wind has come gently blowing over the great mountain, we have seen the dew-clouds rolling down in great volumes over its fields, supplying all nature with fresh vigour and sensations of pleasantness. Modern products, such as oranges, tobacco, and tomatoes, were absent in our Lord's time, as was also another feature that attracts the eye in these days, viz., the great hedges of prickly pear or cactus, by which many of the villages are practically fortified. This plant is of modern importation, though, unfortunately, it has often found its way into pictures of Bible scenes. Compared with the present day, the hills of Naphtali were much more wooded in NT times. Just after such another period of unrest and unsettlement as Galilee had passed through before the Advent, Arculphus, a pilgrim (A.D. 670), found that the hills in his time were wooded down to the shores of the Lake. The woods of Naphtali are mentioned in the Palestinian Talmud (Baba Bathra v. 1).

Of the productiveness of the soil there is ample testimony. We are told that Gush Halab (Gischala; el-Jish) was famous for the quantity of its oil (Erakkin ix. 6; Menakhoth, 85^b), and as this was considered to be a border town adjoining the tribe of Asher, the Rabbis saw here a fulfilment of Gn 49²⁰, Dt 33²⁴. Josephus, speaking of the same place, tells us that its people were generally husbandmen, and applied themselves to the cultivation of the fruits of the earth (BJ iv. ii. 1). The quality of the wheat of Chorazin and Capernaum is well spoken of (Men. 85^a). It is elsewhere stated that Naphtali possessed vines and fruitful fields (Bab. Meg. 6^a), and we meet with incidental reference to the honey of Safed, the indigo of Magdala, and the raw silk of Gush Halab. And, in so far as productiveness is concerned, it must be remembered that whatever may be said of the hills of Naphtali applies with tenfold more force to the Plain of Gennesaret and the southern shore of the Lake (Jos. BJ iii. x. 8). If the evidence of Josephus and the Talmuds does not all refer to the time of our Lord's ministry, at least it shows us clearly what the district was becoming during that period.

2. The people.—Zebulun and Naphtali were in the year B.C. 135 practically Gentile (1 Mac 5²³), but from that time onward they became gradually reoccupied by a population of Jewish blood, and from the time of this resettlement its people were pre-eminently patriotic (Ant. xiv. ix. 2, xv. 10). It was a district of great memories and inspiring scenes, and the new settlers acted up to them. The kind of immigrants—those who sought a freedom unknown at the court of Herod—would guarantee their quality, and, besides, there is something in the free air of the mountains—especially mountains that have a past heroic history—that goes a long way to make heroes and warriors. In B.C. 4, Judas the son of Hezekiah had made an unsuccessful attempt to revolt, and again in A.D. 6, Judas of Galilee and his Zealots (cf. Lk 6¹⁵), declaring 'There is no king but God' (Ant. xviii. i. 6). [With this saying we may compare that in the Jewish Morning Prayer, אֵלֵינוּ אֵלֵינוּ אֵלֵינוּ, and its repudiation in the cry of the Jews to Pilate (Jn 19⁶), as well as the Galilaean Arabic proverb met with in el-Jish to-day, 'Mā fish sultān ghēr alla,' 'There is no king but God']. The milder government of Antipas, and his presence, as a 'half-Jew,' between them and their conquerors, kept the Zealots at peace during a long period in the 1st cent. (A.D. 6—A.D. 66), and allowed the population to grow, so that probably all the villages of to-day represent cities of that time (BJ iii. iii. 2). The population did not in peaceful days sink into sloth and indulgence. They were essentially sturdy sons of hardy toil; and where commerce, agriculture, and fishing did not afford employment, they engaged in trades, as in dyeing at Magdala, weaving at Arbela, and pottery manufacture at Kefr Hananyah. Though despised by the people of Jerusalem, Naphtali was itself becoming a centre of learning, and, even before the Christian era, had given birth to one in the direct line of succession as transmitters of the oral law or traditions of the elders (Mt 15²)—Nitai or Mattai of Arbela—who has left us this saying, which is almost characteristic of the people: 'Remove from a bad neighbour, have no partnership in evil, and despair not of reward' (Pirḳe Aboth i. 7).

3. Christ's sojourn.—Our Lord's settlement in the lands of Naphtali began probably about January of the year A.D. 27 (Mt 4¹³), a short visit of 'not many days' having been made before the previous Passover (Jn 2¹²). The time of sojourn would then extend till Sept. A.D. 28—a period of about 20 months; but this was broken in upon by circuits in Galilee (Mk 1³⁴, Lk 8¹⁻³, Mt 9³⁵, Mk 6⁶), to Tyre and Sidon (Mt 15²¹), to Decapolis (Mk 7³¹), to Caesarea Philippi (Mt 16¹³), and a visit to Jerusalem to the Passover (Jn 5¹). In virtue of Christ's being asked for and paying tribute in Capernaum (Mt 17²⁴), we may conclude that He was recognized as a citizen there; and the light thrown on this transaction by the Talmud enables us to infer that He had been domiciled in Naphtali one year before the 15th Adar preceding the request for payment (cf. M. Sheḳalim i. 3; Baba Bathra i. 6; Sanhedrin 112^a). As the circuits through Galilee took place for the most part during the hot season, when the inhabitants are in the mountains, we can see, when we consider the smaller Galilee of those days, that the greater part of one year at least would be spent among the people of Naphtali. It was from among them that the Lord chose most of His friends and disciples. It was in Naphtali, too, that He made the selection. It was there that He did most of His mighty works (Mt 11²⁰). Its towns were the best known in Gospel history—Capernaum, Bethsaida, Chorazin, Magdala, and Tiberias—and it was over three of these that He uttered the sentence of woe because they believed not (Mt 11²¹⁻²⁴). It was in Naphtali that most of His teaching, as recorded in the Synoptics, was given. Its flowers, its fruits, its crops, its birds and beasts, its mountain torrents, its manners and customs, were all used to illumine the Gospel message, and to bring light first to its people, and then, through them, along the world's highways to all that sit in darkness. In this, Matthew (4¹⁵), and with him the whole Christian world, sees the fulfilment of Isaiah's old prophecy, and, apart from individual opinions that it might be understood of the glory to which Rabbinism attained here in the 2nd and 3rd cents., the older Synagogue teaching is so far at one with them that all the midrāshim declare that the Messiah ben Joseph should appear in Galilee. So also writes Sa'adiah ha-Gaon in his work on Faith and Knowledge, § v.; while the Book of Zohar on Ex 1⁸ clearly states that the 'Messiah shall arise and be revealed in the land of Galilee.'

NAPKIN.—The Gr. σουδάριον, tr. 'napkin' in the Gospels (cf. Ac 19¹² 'handkerchief'), is Lat. sudarium, and became current in the East through the extension of the Roman Empire. The piece of cloth, a yard or so square, of which the σουδάριον consisted, was turned to various purposes. It usually served as a head-dress to protect the head of the living from the sun, and to give a finish to their costume, but it served other purposes as well. Two of these are mentioned in the Gospels. In Lk 19²⁰ the unfaithful servant confesses that he had wrapped up his master's pound in a napkin. In Jn 11⁴⁴ and 20⁷ we are told that the head of the dead had been bound about with a napkin.

With regard to Lk 19²⁰ the words put into the lips of the unfaithful servant are an example of Christ's irony, and help to show us the true character of the servant. The fact that he admits having put the pound in a sweat-cloth is significant. It stamps him not only as a man who was discontented with his pound, but also as a man of indolent character, unwilling to use the opportunities of service which were given him. The misuse of the napkin, revealing as it does the lazy habit of the man, is of importance for the right understanding of the parable.

The reference to the napkin in Jn 20⁷ is worthy of special attention in connexion with the Resurrection of Christ. Unfortunately neither the AV nor the RV gives the exact translation of the Greek text. The literal rendering of the passage makes it clear that the napkin which had been placed about Christ's head before burial was discovered by the two disciples lying where His head had been, in the undisturbed form of a coiled or twisted head-wrapper. The verb ἐντετυλιγμένον should be rendered 'coiled' or 'twisted up,' and not 'wrapped together' as in AV, or 'rolled up' as in RV, and implies that the napkin was found coiled or twisted together in turban-like fashion, just as if His head had somehow slipped out of it, while the words χωρίς . . . εἰς ἓνα τόπον, translated in both AV and RV 'in a place by itself,' would be better translated 'separately (not touching the linen clothes which had been swathing the body) into one place,' εἰς ἓνα τόπον being the equivalent of εἰς ταῦτό in classical Greek. This rendering of the passage is confirmed by the impression made upon the two disciples by what they witnessed on entering the tomb. It is said that they 'saw and believed'—saw something, that is, which persuaded them so completely that their Master was risen from the dead that their doubts were immediately resolved, and they proceeded at once to their own home (Jn 20¹⁰) to await the development of events. For a full discussion of the passage and its bearing on the Resurrection, see H. Latham, The Risen Master, p. 40 ff.

NARD (Heb. נָרְדָּ, from Skr. naladurtha, probably through Persian; Gr. νάρδος, Arab. sumbul-i-hindi [=Indian spike]).—The chief ingredient in the costly unguents used in the East, and from thence imported to Rome. The word is found in the OT (Ca 1¹² 4¹³⁻¹⁴), and twice in the Gospels (Mk 14³⁻⁵, Jn 12³⁻⁵), occurring in both cases in the account of the anointing of our Lord, in a house at Bethany, by a woman whom St. John identifies as Mary the sister of Lazarus.* In classical literature there are frequent references to nard. Theophrastus speaks of it as a root (de Odor. 28), and says it came from India (Hist. Plant. ix. 7. 2). Dioscorides, a physician who flourished about A.D. 100, also tells us that it came from India, being found in the Ganges district, and that it had many shaggy (πολύκομος) spikes growing from one root (i. 6. 77). Athenæus (xv. 691 B), Horace (Od. ii. xi. 16, iv. xii. 16), Ovid (Ars. Am. iii. 443), and Tibullus (ii. 2. 7) make references to it. But our chief authority is Pliny the Elder (Nat. Hist. xii. 26, 27, xiii. 2). He speaks of its great value,† its adulteration, and the means by which genuine nard may be distinguished from spurious. Genuine (sincerum) nard is known by its lightness, its red colour, its sweet smell, and its peculiar taste (gustu maxime siccante os, sapore iucundo). He also speaks of the use of alabaster boxes to preserve it. (See ALABASTER.)

It was formerly supposed by Linnæus and other botanists that nard was an Indian grass; but Sir W. Jones and Dr. Royle, director of the Government Botanical Gardens at Saharunpore from 1823 to 1831, have conclusively proved that it is to be identified with Nardostachys Jatamansi, a plant of the order Valerianaceæ, found at great altitudes in North India. This plant bears small spikes of purple flowers, each with four stamens. The part used for making the perfume was the root and lower portion of the stems, which are shaggy 'like tufts of ermine,' and to which the skeletons of former leaves adhere, giving them a bristly appearance. It is probably these stems, rather than the flower heads, which Pliny calls spicæ. The epithet πιστική applied in Mk. and Jn. to νάρδος may possibly be an attempt to reproduce spicata, which, in vulgar Latin, may have become spicita (see Swete's St. Mark, ad loc., and art. SPIKENARD in present work).

NATHAN.—A son of king David, named in our Lord's genealogy, Lk 3³¹.

NATHANAEL (=Θεόδωρος, 'Gift of God' [Heb. נָחֻמָּאֵל Nu 1⁸, 1 Ch 2¹⁴ etc.]; cf. Adcodatus, Deodatus, Decusedit).—We know nothing about him except what is told us in Jn 1⁴⁵⁻⁵¹ 2¹². On the question of his identity with Bartholomew, see art. BARTHOLOMEW, i. p. 173^a. The place at which Nathanael was found by Philip and brought to Jesus is not mentioned; but it is not improbable that Nathanael was returning from listening to the preaching of the Baptist. He may have been baptized by him. The very detailed account of the calling of Nathanael leads one to suppose that it was an important event, such as the calling of one who was afterwards to be an Apostle. In any case, the local knowledge shown in v. 44^f is very real, and, so far as it goes, it tells in favour of Johannine authorship; for St. John would possess this knowledge, and a later writer would not, and would not care to invent such details. Philip, like Nathanael, was a Galilean, the one of Bethsaida, the other of Cana (21²): they were therefore neighbours, and evidently friends. Like Andrew and John, Philip no sooner finds, or is found by, Christ, than he seeks to make Him known to others. The plural, 'We have found him,' etc., seems to imply that Philip, with Andrew and Peter and John and James, was now a disciple of Jesus. These five formed the beginning of the Christian Church. The order of the words in the Greek is noteworthy: 'Him of whom wrote Moses in the law' comes first, 'and the prophets' being added as an afterthought; and the whole of this comes with emphasis before the verb, 'we have found.' It looks as if Nathanael and Philip had at times discussed the OT descriptions of the Messiah. At this time Philip would know nothing of the virgin birth at Bethlehem: he quite naturally describes Jesus as He was

* Mk. connects this incident closely with the last Passover, but Jn. makes it clear that it happened on the night before the triumphal entry into Jerusalem.

† Mk. and Jn. mention 300 denarii (about £10) as the cost per pound of the unguent. Pliny (xii. 26) says that the 'spicæ' were worth 100 denarii a pound, and in xiii. 2 mentions the price of a similar unguent as rising to 300 denarii per pound.

commonly known. The Scriptures to which he specially refers would be Gn 17⁷ 49¹⁰. Dt 18¹⁵.

Nathanael's question, 'Can any good thing?' etc., does not imply that Nazareth had a bad reputation, but that the insignificant village, so close to his own home, was not a likely birthplace for the Messiah. Was a petty place, so familiar to them both, thus honoured? What prophecy said anything of the kind? The prophecy alluded to in Mt 2²³ is not known to us, and was probably unknown to Nathanael. In any case, Nathanael's question confirms the statement that the miracle at Cana was the first of Christ's signs. If Jesus had worked miracles at Nazareth, Nathanael at Cana must have heard of them.

Philip's 'Come and see' is in harmony with the practical bent of his mind (12²¹ 14³), and is the best answer to anything like prejudice. 'He that doeth the truth cometh to the light' (3²¹, cf. 1⁹); and this is what Nathanael does, with good results. It is part of his guilelessness that he is willing to have any prejudice removed, and he at once accepts Philip's proposal; cf. 4²⁶ 30. Christ praises him as truly an Israelite, i.e. as one who has something more than the blood of the patriarch, viz. a character which corresponds to the dignity of the name (Ps 73¹). In him the guile of Jacob the supplanter has given place to the righteousness which wins a victory with God. He is one whose death a prophet may desire (Nu 23¹⁰).

Nathanael overhears the praise of himself, and the question with which he replies to it has been criticised as arguing a want of modesty on his part. But his reply does not mean, 'I know that I am all that: but how do you know it?' Rather, he exhibits surprise that a total stranger should express any opinion about him. He somewhat coldly intimates that he doubts the value of praise which can hardly be based upon experience. But, like Mary's 'How shall this be?' (Lk 1³⁴), his question does not so much ask for proof as express astonishment. In both cases the proof which was not demanded was granted. Gabriel gave Mary a sign that he could read her future, for he showed that he knew all about Elisabeth's prospects of a son; and Jesus gives Nathanael a sign that He could read his character, for He shows that He knows all about his private conduct (cf. what we read of Elisha in 2 K 5³⁶ 6¹²). Nathanael at once recognizes the significance of this knowledge, and in his reply 'the true Israelite acknowledges his King.'

It is right to allow for the possibility that in Nathanael's confession (1⁴³), and in that of the Baptist (v. 34), the Evangelist may be putting into the mouths of others language which had become natural to himself, but was not actually used by them. St. John was so full of the doctrine that Jesus as the Messiah was the Son of God, that he may have made those who accepted Him as the Messiah express their belief in a form which was not used until somewhat later. We must admit that thus to antedate the terminology of a fuller appreciation of the truth would be possible. But Ps 2⁶ 7 will suffice to explain the language which the Evangelist attributes to the Baptist and to Nathanael. This Psalm was generally recognized as Messianic, and seems to have been very familiar (Ac 4²⁵⁻²⁸ 13³³, He 1⁵ 5⁷). In the fulness of his conviction Nathanael quite naturally uses the fullest Scriptural designation of the Messiah with which he was acquainted. Experience of Christ's miraculous knowledge had convinced him, as it convinced the Samaritan woman (4²³) and Thomas (20²⁷, 28), that Jesus stood in the closest relation to God. Hence he uses this title of the Messiah (11²⁷, Mt 26⁶³, Mk 3¹¹ 5⁷ || 15³⁹ ||, Lk 4⁴¹) rather than the common 'Son of David' (Mt 9²⁷ 12²³ 15²² 20³⁰, 31 21⁹⁻¹⁵ 22⁴² etc.). Although 'Son of God' and 'King of Israel' both indicate the Messiah, the titles are not quite synonymous, as is shown by the repetition of 'Thou art.' 'Son of God' gives the relation to God—a relation which would be only vaguely understood by Nathanael; 'King of Israel' gives the relation to the Chosen People. Thus the two titles complete one another.

Nothing is gained by suggesting (Cheyne in Enc. Bibl. iii. col. 3338) that 'when thou wast under the fig-tree' ought to be 'when thou wast making supplication,' because the Hebrew for the one (נְתַתָּה תַּחַת הַתְּמָרָה wəattā mīthhannēn) would resemble the Hebrew for the other (נְתַתָּה תַּחַת הַתְּמָרָה wəattā taḥath hattēnā). What the Evangelist gives us is intrinsically more probable, as being more definite, and therefore more likely to impress Nathanael. Nathanael seems to have believed that Jesus knew what he was thinking about under the fig-tree, just as the Samaritan woman believed that He knew all about her past life. Fresh from the teaching of the Baptist, Nathanael may have been meditating on the coming of the Messiah as near at hand. It was under a fig-tree that Augustine heard the 'Tolle, lege' (Conf. VIII. xii. 1). See OT ref. to 'fig-tree.'

'Believest thou?' implies something of surprise at the rapidity of Nathanael's conviction (contrast Mk 6⁶); but 'thou believest' is perhaps right. Christ approves of his faith and of its basis; and He forthwith promises him an ampler basis, and therefore the prospect of a loftier faith. This wider basis of 'greater things' refers to the public signs which are to follow, and which seem to be alluded to in 'the angels of God ascending and descending upon the Son of man.' Angels are instruments of the Divine power in nature (Rev 14¹⁸ 16⁵). Nathanael has believed because of a miracle of knowledge which could be appreciated by himself alone: he is hereafter to witness miracles of power which can be appreciated by all. And here it is to be noted that, while the 'Israelite indeed' enters upon a new life in recognizing his King by the sign granted to him, the Messiah Himself enters upon a new career in granting the sign. This private sign to Nathanael was a prelude to those public miracles in which Christ 'manifested His glory' to the Jewish nation and through it to all the world. The angels, who are to be instruments of the manifestation, are represented as being already on earth, the 'ascending' being placed first. They are ready to carry men's prayers to heaven, and to bring down the blessings which prayer wins. But there is a reference to Jacob's dream (Gn 28¹²), suggested possibly by the place; for Bethel, Mahanaim, and the ford Jabbok all lay close to the route which Christ would take in going from Judæa to Galilee; and in the narrative in Genesis the ascending angels are mentioned first. What Jacob had dreamed was fulfilled in Jesus. Heaven was opened and remained so (perfect participle) to mankind. Heaven came down to earth in the Person of the Son of God, and, by a regular intercourse between His place of sojourn and His home, man became capable of attaining to heaven. It narrows the meaning far too much when the promise to Nathanael is interpreted of the angels who appeared after the Temptation, at the Agony, and after the Resurrection and Ascension.

The change in the designation of the Messiah is significant. Nathanael had called Him 'the Son of God': He calls Himself 'the Son of Man,' and it is the earliest occasion on which He does so. In the Synoptic Gospels the title 'Son of Man' occurs 69 times, and Christ is represented as using it (always of Himself) on about 40 different occasions. In John the title is used 11 or 12 times, 9³⁵ being doubtful; and none of these passages is parallel to anything in the Synoptics. Here the point may be that He is come, not to revive the old theocracy, nor to 'restore the kingdom to Israel' (Ac 1⁶), but to redeem the whole human race. It may also be that at this beginning of His ministry Jesus will not definitely accept the title 'Son of God.' Without rejecting it, He substitutes for it a title which seems to have been adopted by Him to veil, rather than to reveal, the fact that He was the Messiah. But here again we must allow for the possibility that the Evangelist is wording Christ's reply according to language which he had often heard from His lips, but which was not used quite so early in the ministry as this.

In Nathanael we have an instance of a good man hampered by prejudice, but quite willing to be enlightened. He comes to the Light, and is searched, approved, and illuminated. In Christ's treatment of him we have an instance of His knowledge of what was in man (2²⁵), not only in the case of mankind in general, but with regard to individual character; also of the working of the law that 'whosoever hath, to him shall be given.'

The narrative of the call of Nathanael, like the rest of Jn 1, strongly confirms the belief that the writer is a Jew of Palestine, well acquainted with the Messianic hopes, and with the traditions and phraseology current in Palestine at the time of Christ's ministry; able also to give a lifelike picture of Christ's first disciples.

A. PLUMMER.

NATION.—This word has two meanings, according as it distinguishes Israel from other peoples, or as it concerns Israel within itself. In the former sense it signifies a State more or less organized, and its keynote is independence; in the latter, a race of common speech and religion, and its keynote is unity. There are two pairs of Greek words corresponding to this distinction. 'Ιουδαῖοι is used under the former category, and most frequently by John, who wrote when the Jewish and Christian communities were decisively separated from one another; * whereas 'Ισραήλ is used always with a note of affection and pride by those who count themselves as its members, sharers in the Divine choice and covenant. There is a similar contrast between the words ἔθνος and λαός, the former and ἔθνη (in the phrase 'all nations') being used generally of political States. τὰ ἔθνη has the special meaning of 'the Gentiles,' the non-Jewish peoples (Heb. עַמִּים), and gradually became ethnically blackened, so that AV instinctively translates 'heathen' (Gal 1¹⁶ 2⁹, cf. Mt 6⁷ ἐθνικοί). But the common noun which corresponds with 'Ισραήλ is λαός. It conveys the sense of God's possession and purpose, which are creative of the national unity maintained by the sacrifices and observances of the Law. Its analogue in Heb. is עַם. As ἔθνη sank down into the meaning of heathen, so λαός is at length appropriated by the Christian consciousness. The few exceptions to the above rules should be noted. In Lk 7⁵ 23², and throughout the Fourth Gospel, ἔθνος is used in the place of λαός; for, as was just stated, in the later Apostolic circles the old prerogatives of Israel were claimed for the 'Israel of God,' i.e. the Christians. In Lk 2¹⁰ λαός is translated in AV as if it were ἔθνη; but RV corrects it from 'all people' to 'all the people.'

1. 'Ιουδαῖοι, ἔθνος, ἔθνη.—In so far as the Jews constituted a body politic, they had lost their independence since Pompey's occupation of Jerus. in B.C. 63, and the Roman hold was tightened by the rule of the Imperial protégé Herod the Great, B.C. 37-4. He obtained from Augustus the title of 'king' in B.C. 30, and large slices of territory, first Samaria, Jericho, and towns in the west, and afterwards the regions between the Lebanon and the Lake of Genesaret, and eastwards. He greatly enhanced the material glories of the Holy Land, especially by wealth expended on the Temple (Mt 23¹⁶ 24¹, Jn 2²⁰), by which he hoped to secure the loyalty of the nationalists. But, though he gave lavishly with one hand, he took away cynically with the other. He filled the high priest's office with his own creatures; and by building theatres and pagan temples showed scant respect for the national ideal. 'He founded Καῖσάρεια (i.e. temples of Cæsar) in many towns' outside Judæa (Jos. Ant. xv. ix. 5). His strength lay in his bodyguard of 3000, who were drawn from the Samaritan population, and in the fortified palaces which he built at Jerusalem and Cæsarea. By intrigue and assassination he exterminated the rival Hasmonæan house, including his favourite wife and her popular sons. The frenzied act of massacre of the babes of Bethlehem, for which Mt 2¹⁶ is the only authority, is quite in accord with his temper in the later years of his life.

On the death of this Idumæan tyrant an even sadder chapter from the standpoint of national independence began. For Herod's kingdom was divided among three sons: Philip having the newly added territories of Trachonitis, Ituræa (Lk 3¹), etc.; Antipas succeeding to Galilee and Perea; and Archelaus, after a long suit at Rome, obtaining the most important part with an allotted income of 600 talents. In A.D. 6, the last-named was finally summoned for his evil courses to Rome, and the unhappy people sank one stage lower in the scale of national independence, being placed under a procurator. This was an exchange for the worse, even from the tyranny of Herod the Great and the iniquities of his son. For although these were only half Judæans, and in subtle and sometimes pronounced antagonism to the nationalist party, they did not fail to give it some regard; whereas Pontius Pilate and his four predecessors mostly gave up even the attempt to understand so impracticable a people. No wonder 'the revolutionary current was continually increasing among the Jewish people in the time of Christ' (Schürer).

These procurators (ἡγεμόνων in NT, ἐπίτροπος more often in Josephus) were not of senatorial or praetorian, but only of equestrian rank, and not absolutely independent of the Syrian governor, though their dealings were mostly direct with Rome. Their power included (a) military and police control. The Jews were themselves free from conscription for military service. But there were plenty of Gentiles in the land to supply the small garrisons required. The centurion (Lk 7² 23⁴⁷) and his cohort would be required only in a few of the larger towns. The Temple was dominated by the tower of Antonia. The procurator had also (b) judicial authority. His confirmation was required for capital sentences (Jn 18³¹), and his executive force carried them into effect (Mt 27²⁷). Ordinary civil and criminal cases, however, affecting Jews were dealt with at the sessions of the Sanhedrin, and when they appeared to have the people behind their verdict, Pilate was loth to deny them (Mt 27¹⁸, 24). He also used his powers of release with a view to propitiating the populace (Mt 27¹⁵). But the name of procurator conveys a special reference to the duties respecting (c) the Roman treasury. Being an Imperial province, the taxes of Judæa were paid to the account not of the Senate, but of Cæsar (Mk 12¹⁴). The country was divided into some ten toparchies for fiscal purposes. Tacitus (Annals, ii. 42) speaks of Judæa in A.D. 17 as fessa oneribus. The taxes (land and poll) were collected by State officers; but the customs were farmed to publicani such as Zachæus (ἀρχιτελώνης, Lk 19²) of Jericho.

The rights of the procurator were also enjoyed by the tetrarchs, as well as the right to issue copper coinage. Herod Antipas built Tiberias, S.W. of the Lake, for his capital. Like his father, he tried to propitiate or rather seduce national sentiment by his outlay on public works; and he was at any time ready to use it for his own ends (Mk 3⁶ 12¹³). Jesus warned His fellow-countrymen against the leaven of Herod (Mk 8¹⁵); and, in response to a crafty attempt to get rid of Him, described the tetrarch as a fox (Lk 13³²). John the Baptist, whose preaching was in his territory, was his victim (Mk 6^{17ff.}). But though his partisans were hand and glove with the Pharisees in their hostility to Jesus (Mk 3⁶ 12¹³), and though we learn from Luke that he associated himself with the condemnation of Jesus, he was not ready to take that awful responsibility upon himself (Lk 23⁷⁻¹²). The advent of Jesus apparently raised no political excitement in the regions under Philip, because the bulk of the population was non-Jewish. But there was often danger in Galilee (Lk 4²⁹); and infinitely more in the furnace of fanaticism at Jerusalem (Mk 10^{22f.}, Jn 11⁸).

When Herod the Great died, his policy of getting material benefit for the nation at the cost of its religious ideals was continued by the priests, who exercised the highest civil as well as religious functions. They constituted the majority of the Sanhedrin, which, as the supreme court of appeal, professedly represented the remnant of Jewish independence. But it represented no cause so truly as the vested interests of an order dependent first on the favour of Herod, and then on the pleasure of Rome. Thus in the name of a bastard independence, which meant that they had leave to grow rich and their country leisure to grow outwardly splendid, they opposed any national movement which might provoke the Romans to take away not only the nation, but also 'our place' (Jn 11⁴⁸). It was, e.g., the high priest Joazar who checked the threatened revolt in A.D. 7 on the taking of the census by Quirinius. There were even some of the Pharisees who, whether because they were satisfied with the measure of religious liberty accorded under the Imperial administration, or because they shut their eyes to the facts (Jn 8³³), or because they saw in the foreign yoke the discipline of God, resented any movement towards national independence; and perhaps it was some of these who associated themselves with the Herodians in Mt 22¹⁶.

2. Ἰσραήλ, λαός.—But while the independence of the Jewish people was irretrievably mutilated, and the State as a geographical or governmental entity about to perish, the other note of national existence, viz. unity as focussed in the word λαός, was very completely realized. Indeed, as the outer husk decayed, the inner shell grew the harder and tougher. The succession of Pharisees and scribes proved a far surer defence than the dynasty of David. The soul of Judaism was not devoured even by the omnivorous influences of Greek culture. The first steps in this movement were taken by Ezra and Nehemiah, who put an end to mixed marriages among those who had returned from the Exile. The race was adulterated, however, even so late as B.C. 125, when the Idumæans, being defeated by Hyrcanus, submitted to circumcision. And in respect to language, the Jews of the Dispersion spoke Greek, and read the Scriptures therein; while 'the people of the land' understood Aramaic only (Ac 21⁴⁰). Religiously, however, the nation was undivided after the Exile, feeling itself to be the special property and instrument of God (Mt 2⁶ 3⁹, Lk 1⁶⁸, Jn 8⁴¹). This unity was expressed not only by the rite of circumcision (Jn 7²²), but also by the keeping of the Sabbath (Mk 3⁴), the abstinence from unclean foods, and the worship, without images, of one only God. And these distinctions were guarded by a multitude of observances, which called into requisition the school of scribes trained in the principles of the Pharisees.

But although the scribes claimed to sit in the seat of Moses (Mt 23²), their authority was not recognized in what may be called the outer circles of Judaism. The Samaritans declined to follow the national Church in its later developments. Hence they were referred to with contempt (Jn 8⁴⁸) as outsiders (Lk 17¹⁸), because of their particular objection to the religious monopoly of Jerusalem (Lk 9⁵³, cf. Jn 4³⁰). But for all that, they were counted Jews, though grudgingly, as heretics—'the foolish people who dwell in Sichem' (Sir 50^{25f.}), and were proud of the Israelite strain in their blood (Jn 4¹²). More than that, their doctrinal shortcomings received some countenance in high places; for 'the Sadducees say only what is written is to be esteemed as legal . . . the tradition of the fathers needs not to be observed' (Jos. Ant. XIII. x. 6).

Taken as a whole, however, in despite of the home-land being penetrated under Herodian and priestly influence with Hellenistic speech and culture, and although, what with Essenes on the one hand, and Samaritans on the other, they did not all keep step, the people preserved such unity that they became, if not politically independent, socially isolated. On the one hand, their exemption from military service, from Sabbath employment, and their refusal of market food, drew out the dislike of the populace and the contempt of the cultured classes, so that they were regarded as 'haters of mankind.' On the other hand, the word ἔθνη, meaning the nations outside the Law of the chosen λαός, gathered more and more of moral connotation, as it passed through the meanings of 'Gentile,' 'heathen,' and finally 'sinners' (Mt 26⁴⁵; cf. Gal 2¹⁵). The symbol of this rejuvenated Judaism was still the Temple, whither the tribes went up at the national festivals; but its rallying-point was the synagogue, where men were instructed in the Law and Hope of Israel, and where the Pharisees ruled supreme. Their rivals, the Sadducees, had no influence beyond the aristocratic circles at Jerusalem, in the Hellenized cities, and perhaps in Samaritan villages; and though they had a large place in the Sanhedrin, they had to comply with Pharisaic watchwords.

Thus the national life was knit from within, and ruling functions were exercised through officers of the synagogue, such as πρεσβύτεροι (Mt 21²³ 26⁴⁷), πρώτοι (Lk 19⁴⁷), γραμματεῖς (Mk 9¹¹), or νομικοί (Lk 10²⁹). Although Palestine was not politically the mistress of her own territories, she was religiously the mother of a people throughout the Empire. The Jews of the Dispersion could but rarely visit the Temple, and they read the Scriptures in the Greek tongue; but in their separate communities they maintained the precepts as to Sabbath rest and clean food under the protection of Roman governors and the Emperor (cf. Ac 18¹²⁻¹⁵). The Jews could say with Josephus, 'Even if we were deprived of wealth, of towns and of other possessions, the Law remains to us for ever. And no-

Jew will be so far from his native land, or so much fear a hostile ruler, as not to fear the Law more than him' (c. Apion, ii. 38).

If it was by the hands of the priests, in the name of national independence, that the Lord was betrayed to the 'nations,' so the chief antagonism which He met in His ministry, and which His spirit encountered afterwards in the Apostolic mission, came from this close-knit theory and practice of national unity. The Pharisees pursued Him from the first because they instinctively saw that the tendency of His teaching (see NATIONALITY) was to break the bonds their traditions had woven, and to act as a solvent on the rigidity of national isolation, which was the only thing left to their pride.

NATIONALITY.—This term includes the characteristics created by national ideals and facts. The national environment of Jesus and His disciples has been set forth in the preceding article under the two ideals of independence and unity. Of these ideals the former rested on the Messianic Hope, the latter on the Mosaic Law, which were the key-notes of the most ancient Scriptures of the Jews—the Prophets and the Pentateuch respectively. They provide the clue to all that was distinctive in the nationality which appeared in, around, and against Jesus.

1. The Messianic Hope, with its meaning for independence.—The expectations aroused at the birth of Jesus were by no means of a cosmopolitan character (Mt 1²¹ 2⁶, Lk 2¹⁰—'all the people,' not 'all people'), even as they appear in the perspective of St. John's transcendental point of view (Jn 1²⁹; but cf. v. 3¹). It was with the hope of keen patriots that the disciples remained with Him to the end (Ac 1⁶, Mk 10²⁵). St. Matthew especially represents Him throughout with a glow of nationalist pride, as son of Abraham and of David (Mt 1¹ 9²⁷ 21¹⁵), and the heir of the prophets (Mt 2¹⁵, 23 4¹⁴ 8¹⁷).

As to Jesus Himself, it cannot be denied that He so far shared the patriotic hopes of His fellow-countrymen as to believe they were to be fulfilled in His own person (Lk 4²¹ 7²³ 20¹³). We may even venture to say that He counted it a temptation to make His ministry succeed on popular lines (Mt 4⁵). At any rate He withdrew from advertisement (Mk 1³⁶), and from the popular desire to make Him king (Jn 6¹⁵), refused to give a 'sign' (Mk 8¹²), and seemed to repudiate any claim that rested on succession from David (Mt 22⁴³⁻⁴⁵). But He took as the very keynote of His acceptable and authoritative preaching the phrase which the nationalists used in the name of independence, 'the kingdom of God' or of 'Heaven.' He spoke of His disciples sitting on twelve thrones judging the twelve tribes (Mt 19²⁸). And though He baffled their material hopes over and over again, and left them dumb, He quickened enthusiasm to the highest pitch by His entry into Jerusalem (Mt 21⁵⁶) on lines sketched out by prophecy. And these advances were no accommodation to the popular feeling; they were the expression of His own patriotic consciousness. He declared to the Samaritan woman that salvation is of the Jews (Jn 4²²). He forbade the disciples to address themselves to others than the lost sheep of the house of Israel (Mt 10⁵⁶). He was loth to discount the value of nationality by admitting a Syrophenician woman, an alien both in race and in religion, to an equal claim on His brief ministry with the elect people (Mt 15²⁴, 28). Although He allowed the rights of Cæsar (Mt 22²¹), and authorized His disciples to pay the tribute-money that was due, He reserved the right to consider it an unrighteous infliction (Mt 17²⁶). With the love of a patriot He wept over Jerusalem because it knew not the day of its visitation, and was near its final ruin (Lk 19⁴¹⁻⁴⁴). Though rejected by those who had formulated their own material notions of the Messianic Hope (Mt 16²⁰, Jn 7⁴⁵⁻⁵² 9²²), it was after all on the ground of His patriotism that Jesus was betrayed into the hands of the Gentiles. When Caiaphas urged this policy, he was moved more by fear for 'our place' than 'our nation.' It was on the charge of having spoken against Cæsar (Lk 23²) that Pilate was induced to condemn Jesus (Jn 19¹², 16). It was in the name of the Messianic Hope that He was mocked by the soldiers, and over His cross were written as accusation the words, 'The King of the Jews' (Mk 15²⁶).

2. The Mosaic Law in its bearing upon unity.—National pride also centred in the unity which was epitomized in the Mosaic Law. Before the death of Herod the Great, two Pharisees were burnt alive for leading an assault upon the golden eagle he had fixed over the gate of the Temple court. And the passion for the Law was no less exaggerated throughout the period of direct Roman rule, as when there was a riot on the occasion of Pilate's bringing the Roman ensigns within the city walls. Jesus Himself was very conscious of the national unity through the Law. He kept the feasts, being found in Jerusalem at the Passover, the Feast of Tabernacles, and of Dedication (cf. Mt 26⁵⁵). He was a regular attendant at the synagogue at Nazareth (Lk 4¹⁶); and His interest in these nurseries of nationality was so far recognized that the liberality of Jairus in providing one was assumed to be a claim on His favour (Lk 7⁴, 5). His works of healing were kept so far as possible on the lines of the Law (Mk 1⁴⁴ 5¹², 13). He thought of Israel as the Chosen People, and spoke of them as 'the children' (Mt 8¹² 15²⁶). Indeed His reverence for the Scriptures (Lk 4⁴, 8, 12 16³¹ 24²⁵⁻²⁷), for the Law (Mt 5¹⁹, Lk 10²⁶⁻²⁸, Jn 5⁴⁵), and for the Temple (Mt 23¹⁷, 21, Jn 2¹⁶, 17), went far deeper than was appreciated by worldly-minded ecclesiastics (Jn 2¹⁸ 7⁴⁶⁻⁴⁹).

But with all this tenderness for the obligations of Jewish religion as ties, He resented them as bonds. His perfect allegiance to the truth and grace of God (Jn 1⁷) made every lesser loyalty stand in subordination. He withdrew Himself more and more from the passion of nationality as embodied in the religious pedantry and exclusiveness of the Pharisees, until at last it was almost wholly arrayed against Him and He against it (Mt 23¹⁵ etc.). The disparagement of Gentiles with which He began (Mt 6³², cf. 20²⁵), turned to denunciation of the false children and unfaithful servants (Mt 21²⁸⁻⁴⁴, cf. 8¹² 11²¹). And Luke especially records His kindly attitude towards Samaritans (Lk 9⁵² 10³³ 17¹⁶). In regard to the terms of the Mosaic Law, He did not hesitate to act as Lord of the Sabbath in the interests of humanity (Mk 3⁴). And, further, He taught that a man could not be defiled by the eating of meats (Mk 7¹⁵), or cleansed by the washing of pans (Mk 7⁸). He distressed His disciples by sending away sorrowful a young devotee of the Law (Mk 10¹⁷⁻²²), and offended religious sentiment when He kept company with publicans and sinners (Mt 9¹¹, Lk 15² 19⁷).

Thus at length the devoted Student of the Scriptures and whole-hearted Champion of the Law was ejected from the national party as a deceiver (Jn 7¹² 9²²⁻²⁸, Mt 27⁶³), and delivered up to the priests and the Romans. While He was finally accused to the Romans as a pretender in the cause of independence, He was attacked from the beginning by the legalists as an enemy to the cause of unity. Though He embodied the Hope of Israel and fulfilled the Law of Moses, it was in the name both of the Hope which the priests mistook and of the Law which the scribes misinterpreted, that Jesus was brought to the cross.

But the essential attitude of Jesus in respect to nationality can be better read in the varied witness of His disciples even than in His own. Within the limits of His short career He conformed to the Law, for He was born under it (Gal 4³); and He spoke out of a Messianic consciousness (Lk 4²¹), because He came unto His own (Jn 1¹¹). But when He was departed, His disciples 'saw greater things than these.' They perceived that the use of current speech and even contemporary ideals was compatible with a more perfect independence of their limitations than the most antagonistic and revolutionary attitude could express. The ideals of Christ moved with such ease in a plane of thought which is as universal as it is inward, that they could be embodied in the contemporary forms as well as in any other. Whereas the most ardent of reformers, ready to deny standing room to everything established, may be quite exclusively the product of his age, and governed by the most pedantic ideas. Thus the gospel of Jesus was released at once and instinctively from its nationalist setting, with this unique result that it lost nothing but gained everything by its liberation. It is true the company of original Apostles remained Christian Jews; but the leaders came to recognize that they enjoyed no distinctive privilege of the Kingdom which was withheld from the Gentiles. And St. Paul, son of Benjamin and pupil of Gamaliel as he was, drew out to the full logical issue the universal implication of the gospel:

The influence of Jesus upon nationality has been of a composite nature. On the one hand, He has loosened its bonds by enlarging the conception of God and emphasizing the fact of human brotherhood. Nationality was at first constituted under the ægis of the national deity, and provided the practice-ground and range for social ethics. Thus nationality and religion were virtually the same thing, where either meant anything, and where Rome had not obliterated them both by the triumph of material force and the deification of the reigning Emperor. It was to the sacred union of these two ideas of nationality and religion that Jesus was sacrificed. But the sacrifice enabled religion to pass into the higher stage of association with humanity (cf. Jn 12^{24, 32}), for which, through the providential advance of Rome, the world was craving, and towards which in the region of philosophy the Stoics had already felt their way (Ac 17²⁶). What nationality had hitherto done for religion, in providing the scope for its practice of social ethics, humanity was to do henceforth. The barriers had been broken down between Jew and Gentile, Greek and barbarian, bond and free; they being brought by the blood of the Cross near to God, and so to one another, in order that henceforth the bonds of brotherhood might be of a purely human character, and that the parables of the Good Samaritan and of the Shepherd-judgment might be the pattern and sanction for next-door philanthropies and world-wide missions.

NATURALNESS.—Few terms are more fruitful of fallacious thought than the group including 'nature,' 'natural,' 'naturalness.' In modern usage they are very frequent, and the range of varied meanings which they cover is wide. Thus we speak of natural instinct, natural conduct, natural religion, natural science, and the natural creation, though the single epithet has a different sense in every case. Two phrases like 'the law of nature' and 'natural law' are verbally equivalent, yet they are very different in significance, the one drawing its connotation from Roman jurisprudence, the other from modern science; the one being concerned entirely with human thought and conduct, the other mainly with inanimate phenomena or those regions of Biology which include creatures of lower organization than man. It is always needful to be on one's guard against the fallacies which so easily arise through such changes in the meaning of a term; for they are apt to be unnoticed when the term itself is constant. But the danger becomes greater when these terms are carried back to a period in which they were in far less frequent use, and when they covered a smaller range of meaning. This was the case in the age of the NT. We have now generalized our ideas, and we speak of 'Nature' in the sense of the Cosmos. It is commonly with a reference more or less definite to the observed order of the Cosmos as a whole that we employ the words 'natural,' 'naturalness'; although there are many instances also in which they have a narrower reference. But in antiquity it was either a particular person or thing, or else a particular class of persons or things—a kind—which was in view; and the nature of this group of instances was the standard of naturalness. So 'life according to nature' meant, not what was in harmony with the universe, nor even what corresponded with environment, but what fulfilled the nature of the man himself. What was 'contrary to nature,' on the other hand, was not what put a man into antagonism with his surroundings, but what amounted to violence done to his better self. The later Stoics, indeed, made approach to the modern use in some directions, and in turn influenced legal principles, and later movements of thought which sought a 'return to nature,' such as that with which the name of Rousseau is connected; but they afford no more than an exception to the general truth that in ancient times the use of the terms under consideration was particularist, while to-day it is commonly generalized or even cosmical.

An examination of the passages in the NT in which naturalness is spoken of bears out this difference fully. In Ja 3⁷, e.g., the 'nature of beasts' (φύσις θηρίων) is contrasted with human nature (ἡ φύσις ἢ ἀνθρώπων); and St. Paul opposes the teaching of nature in the case of the Gentiles to the teaching of law in the case of Jews (Ro 24-27); while in 2 P 1⁴ we read of 'a Divine nature' (θεία φύσις). But all such instances which develop the idea of naturalness lie outside the Gospels, and most of them occur in the writings of St. Paul. It is not necessary, therefore, to discuss them fully here; it may suffice to refer to an instructive note by Dr. Armitage Robinson in his Com. on the Epistle to the Ephesians (on 2³), pp. 49-51.

The words which are rendered by 'nature' or the like in the EV are φύσις, φυσικός, ὁμοιοπαθής, and ψυχικός, but the last is only translated 'natural' where it stands opposed to πνευματικός, and there the rendering is not satisfactory though none better is easily found. None of these words, however, occurs in the Gospels at all: and the entire absence from the Gospels of terms directly expressive of naturalness is in itself a warning against attempting to bring the facts of Jesus Christ's life under this category without care and caution.

There is, however, profound truth in Tertullian's saying, 'Anima naturaliter Christiana,' and it is no false extension of this if one speak of the naturalness of Jesus Christ as perfect, since in Him the best and highest nature of man is shown complete and unalloyed for once. Such a mode of expression would only serve to heighten the supplementary aspect of the truth which comes out in the contrast that St. Paul emphasizes between the first Adam as the 'natural man' (ψυχικός), and the last Adam as the 'life-giving spirit' (1 Co 15⁴⁵). It is along this line that the explanation must be sought of what some have felt as a serious difficulty, namely, that few principles in Christ's teaching can be instanced to which parallels of earlier date may not be adduced. Not only the writings of the OT Prophets and Psalmists, but also the religious teachers of other races, such as Gautama, Epictetus, or those collected in the Tao of China, afford numerous anticipations of the Lord's words. It could not be otherwise if the true nature of man be realized in Him; if God purposed 'to sum up all things in Christ' (Eph 1¹⁰); if He was 'the true light which lighteth every man' (Jn 1⁹). A similar consideration enables one to understand the remarkable fact that Christ's appeal is to men of all races. 'One touch of nature makes the whole world kin': apart from this, the fact, to which ever-widening experience bears witness, that in all races 'his sheep hear his voice,' would be most wonderful, not to say inexplicable.

It is quite in keeping with this view of the facts, that the Lord Jesus never hesitated to appeal to the natural instinct of men on questions of conscience. E.g. 'Doth not each one of you on the Sabbath loose his ox or his ass . . . ? And ought not this woman to have been loosed from this bond . . . ?' (Lk 13¹⁵, cf. 14⁵). He also employed expressions in reference to Himself which may be said implicitly to make naturalness the criterion of conduct. E.g. 'Thus it becometh us to fulfil all righteousness' (πρέπον ἐστὶν ἡμῖν, Mt 3¹⁵); 'Beloved it not the Christ to suffer?' (οὐχὶ ταῦτα εἶδει παθεῖν τὸν Χριστὸν, Lk 24²⁶). This last usage is very characteristic of the Ep. to Heb. (cf. 2¹⁷ ᾠφείλεν . . . ὁμοιωθῆναι; v. 10 ἔπρεπεν αὐτῷ; and the similar expression in 7²⁸ ἡμῖν καὶ ἔπρεπεν ἀρχιερεῦς, which bases on the nature God has given us the natural expectation which must be formed of Christ). See Newman Smyth, Old Faiths in New Light, 105.

NATURE AND NATURAL PHENOMENA.—1.

The inquiry as to the attitude taken up by Jesus towards the natural, visible, tangible world which is the physical environment of the soul, is affected and limited by the fact that our Lord was not a philosopher or a scientist, but a spiritual teacher. His only mission was to preach the doctrine of the Kingdom of God, and to this He rigidly restricted Himself. Thus He nowhere enunciates a cosmology; He gives us no explicit theory of the providential order; He leaves the scientific conceptions of His day where they were, correcting no current mistakes as to the meaning of natural phenomena, and giving no intellectual synthesis of His own of the facts of the physical universe (see Wendt's Teaching of Jesus, i, pp. 151–153). This at once both hampers us and frees us in dealing with our special subject. It hampers us because we have to glean such hints as are possible for our purpose from scattered references to natural phenomena and to the order of nature as a whole, which occur incidentally in His teaching. But it also assists us by enabling us to understand that no sinister or misleading suggestions lurk behind the silence of Jesus on the innumerable problems that try the modern mind in its outlook on the natural order. The revelation of Jesus does not contain a complete conspectus of the facts of the world in all their aspects: it is a spiritual revelation, which aims at the enlightenment of the soul as to the vital truths of conduct, and as to the ideal relations between it and its Heavenly Father. Every element in the teaching is subordinate to this central consideration. In seeking for such light as is possible on the attitude of our Lord to the physical world, we must, therefore, bear this limitation constantly in mind.

2. We also find here the key to the kind of references which are made by our Lord to the facts of nature. These references are, fortunately for our purpose, very numerous in proportion to the bulk of His teaching as it has come down to us, and this for a reason we shall presently deal with. But they all belong (1) to the class of facts that were quite familiar to His hearers. His aim was always entirely practical, and His illustrations and references to nature are thus extremely simple and obvious. We seek in vain for any recondite, or technical, or unusual allusions; they all lie consistently in the path of common observation; so much so that hardly any of them need interpretation to the simplest modern minds. And (2) they are of that class which lend themselves obviously to the uses of illustration, being vivid, pictorial, and frequently recurrent in the lives of ordinary men and women, so that anyone familiar with His teaching could not fail afterwards to be reminded of the spiritual truths He had taught, because no one could go through a single day of average experience without coming across one or more of the natural facts used in His matchless collection of illustrations. By this means He turned nature into a whispering gallery of spiritual truths, and filled each common day with perpetual reminders of His central teaching, thus enlisting both the understanding and the memory of His followers in His permanent service as a revealer of religious truth. Any devout and careful student of the Gospels will readily find the justification of these remarks in the pages of the Evangelists.

3. Incidental, however, as are the references to nature and natural phenomena in the words of Jesus, they are full of suggestiveness as to His attitude to the material world. Through the rigid self-limitation which He imposed on Himself we catch the glow of His spirit; through the narrow windows of His imagery rays of light pour out in many directions on the mysteries of life and providence. It is not, perhaps, possible to construct a complete Christian Weltanschauung, or 'View of the World,' out of the scattered references of Jesus to nature; but in the light of His teaching it is certainly possible to suggest the lines along which such a theory must run. His doctrine of the Fatherhood necessitated an attitude towards nature as well as man, and this attitude is consistently maintained by Him in all His words and habits of thought as recorded in the Gospels.

4. Christ's theory of Providence in the natural order.—(1) The first characteristic in the attitude of Jesus towards the facts and arrangements of the organic world is a certain beautiful calmness and serenity. The facts which so deeply disturb us in our view of nature—suffering, the preying of one animal on another, death—were just as familiar to Him, who was an accurate and careful observer, as to ourselves; moreover, He who was so sympathetic with men in their sorrows, must have been equally accessible to the sorrows of dumb creatures. Yet there is no trace of any disturbance of mind in Him as He met these familiar facts. His profound trust in God's goodness to His creatures enabled Him to view their sufferings with an equanimity in which there could have been no trace of hardness or indifference. It is the calmness of a mind so firmly centred in the idea of the Divine love and care that it suffers no shock at the most disturbing and harrowing of natural events. His references to the Providence that looks after the interests of flowers and birds, which are 'clothed' and 'fed' by God Himself, are full of a sense of the Divine benignity and goodwill towards His meanest creatures, and He uses this fact as an argument to quell the needless anxiety of men, who belong to a far higher order of being (Mt 12¹²), as to the sources and sureness of the natural provision for their own life and well-being. If God so 'clothes the grass of the field,' and 'feeds the fowls of the air,' He will surely much more attend to the temporal wants of His children so that they may consider themselves free to attend to their proper spiritual interests (6²⁵⁻³⁴). That the optimism of Jesus is not the result of careless observation or lack of sympathy is seen also in His acknowledgment of the evanescence and perishableness of vegetable and animal life (v. 30). Jesus teaches us that 'God feeds the sparrow and also attends his obsequies' (Lk 12²⁴, cf. Mt 10²⁹). The sufferings peculiar to animal life and the incidence of natural death are clearly normal facts in our Lord's view of nature, and need contain no problem for faith.

(2) Another feature of our Lord's view of the providential order is His recognition of the orderliness and faithfulness of natural law. There is every indication that in realizing this He found a deep and constant pleasure. The world to Him was the home of order, and, as such, an indication of the will and character of the Creator and Sustainer of all things. He loved to notice and draw attention to this characteristic of the natural world (cf. Mt 5¹³ 7¹⁶⁻¹⁸, 24-27, Mk 4⁴⁻⁸, 26-28 9⁵⁰, Lk 10¹⁸ 12²⁴ 13⁸ 19³⁴, Jn 3⁸ 10³⁻⁵ 15¹⁻⁴ etc.). Specially interesting to Him were all the phenomena of growth, which He so often uses as a symbol of the laws of the spirit (Mk 4⁴⁻⁸, 26-28, 81⁶, 13²⁸, Lk 13⁸, 21, Jn 15²⁻⁴), and of the habits of animals (Mt 6²⁶ 7¹⁵ 10¹⁶, Lk 13³⁴ 17³⁷, Jn 10³⁻⁵, 12 etc.).

(3) This leads us to the most important of all the characteristics exhibited in our Lord's treatment of natural phenomena—His profound sense of the function they fulfil as suggesting spiritual facts and laws. His purpose in using natural imagery is not summed up in the fact of its picturesqueness and mnemonic aptness. However handy it may have been as a mould into which to throw His teaching, He evidently believed that there was in addition to this a real correspondence between the laws of organic and of spiritual life. He lived in two worlds, with an intensity of interest that has seldom been approached—the world of sense and the world of spirit. These two worlds to most men are divided by a deep chasm; but to Him there were innumerable bridges of connexion between them, and His thoughts traversed these in a perpetual play of happy insight, finding in both unending correspondences that were real and true, each shedding light into the heart of the other. Or, to vary the simile, we may say that to Him nature was the mirror of the spirit, in which He ever caught glimpses of the profoundest laws and operations of the higher life of the soul and of the character of God as the Lord of both. When He said, 'The kingdom of God is like —,' He was exercising no mere ingenuity of fancy, neither was He inventing fictitious similarities between disconnected spheres of existence; rather He was holding up the gold and silver sides of the same bright shield of Truth.

(4) In entire consistence with this view of our Lord's imagery, we notice the complete absence, in His view of the world, of any such distinction as has been drawn by modern thinkers between the natural and the supernatural. Living, as He did, in the perpetual sense of His Father's presence and power and love, such a distinction would be to Him utterly unreal. In His cosmology there was no third term, such as 'force,' or 'energy,' or 'law,' coming in immediately between the Divine will and its result. There was only God—the Creator and Sustainer—and nature was the material expression of His loving care and energy. What we would attribute to a secondary or efficient cause He always attributed to the direct activity of the Father. 'Your heavenly Father feedeth them. . . . Shall he not much more clothe you . . .?' 'Not one of them falleth to the ground without your Father . . .' 'My Father worketh hitherto.' In this sense of the immediacy of the Divine activity we find one of the most characteristic traits of the religious attitude of Jesus towards the natural world. The same consideration throws a suggestive light on the way in which He exercised His 'miraculous' gifts. To Him there was nothing 'supernatural' or inexplicable in the wonderful deeds He wrought. They were rather perfectly natural signs of the activity of God in and through Him: 'My Father that dwelleth in me, he doeth the works' (Jn 14¹⁰). Even in the case of an act of healing which was performed without any overt reference to the Divine power, as when He said, 'I will, be thou clean' (Lk 5¹³), the same attitude of dependence on the Father's favour and power must be presupposed (cf. Jn 5¹⁹). To Jesus, therefore, the wonderful works which He wrought were but the expression of the will of God through Him, and were as natural as the forces that eventuate in the 'blowing clover and the falling rain.' If this were borne in mind, perhaps the difficulty of the miraculous would not be what it is to many nowadays. The key would be seen to lie in the region of personality rather than of a 'supernatural' law over-riding a natural law. Jesus being who and what He was, it was as natural for Him to work 'miracles' and to exercise an exceptional control over the 'forces' of nature, as it was for Napoleon to do extraordinary things through his gift of control over men, or for a great scientist to initiate fresh changes in the forms and conditions of matter. The differentia of the soul of Jesus was an unbroken fellowship with God as His Father, which manifested itself in all He did, and, among other ways, in the power to use natural forces in a unique way in order to fulfil His filial mission.

5. There is another aspect of the attitude of Jesus to nature and natural phenomena which must not be overlooked, and which, however incidental it may be to His mission as such, is replete with suggestion and helpfulness. We have pointed out that His scientific and philosophic interest in nature was merged into the religious interest which always controlled His soul. What of the artistic interest which is so strong in the highest type of mind? Here again we must speak of the subordination of all to the spiritual outlook and temper. None the less is it clear that Jesus was profoundly sensitive to the beauty of the world. He loved Nature for her own sake, and because she ministered to His love of what was fair and good to look at. And if it is true that the 'function of art is (1) to teach us to see, (2) to teach us what to see, and (3) to teach us to see more than we see,' then the discourses of Jesus reveal the artistic temperament in all His references to the facts of the natural order. See art. POET.

(1) His faculty of observation was extraordinary. His eye took in the smallest detail of the outward world with loving appreciation. We have references to the march of the seasons (Mt 24³², Mk 13²⁶); to the orderly stages of growth (Mk 4²⁸); to the varying response of various kinds of soil (4⁴⁻⁸); to the mystery of development (vv. 27, 31); to the habits and dispositions of animals (Mt 10¹⁶, Lk 9³⁸ 13³⁴ 17³⁷, Jn 10³⁻⁵, 12, cf. M 7¹⁵); to the customs of the household (Lk 13²¹, cf. the many references to the law of hospitality, and to human intercourse and social life). He was never at a loss, indeed, in drawing upon the resources of His observation for the purpose of illustrating His own teaching, but was like a householder, 'bringing forth from his treasure things new and old' (Mt 13⁵²).

(2) In the same way He teaches us what to see. A wise selection must be made in storing the mind with facts and impressions, so that the multiplicity of Nature may not overwhelm the mind, or cause us to lose our way in the confusion of her wealth. And while, as we have seen, there was nothing too great or too small to arrest His eye or interest His mind, there is one interest which evidently dominated His mind in His watchful observation of natural phenomena. That was the ordinary human interest. And this is always true of the highest art. The painter, the poet, the sculptor, are eminently and broadly human in their approach to Nature; what has no reference to human experience and action and passion lies outside the scope of her appeal to them. A glance at our Lord's parables and illustrations at once reveals this dominant human interest. He refers only to those aspects of nature that in some more or less definite way intermingle with the daily or occasional experience of human beings. There was a practical as well as artistic purpose in this; for He was thus able to interest His hearers more readily in the higher truths which He was anxious to impress upon their minds and to commend to their sympathies.

(3) He teaches us to see more than we see, for the natural became in His hands a translucent veil through which the spiritual poured its light and inspiration into the hearts of men. Here art once more became handmaid to religion; and the beauty of nature became a vehicle for the higher beauty of holiness and truth. The same artistic gift is seen in the beautiful, vivid, and balanced form in which He clothed His imagery and parabolic teaching. His language is wonderfully clear and pictorial and apt: the mould into which He runs His illustrations is in keeping with the simplicity and beauty of its content. There is the happiest marriage of word and fact, type and antitype, in His teaching. This reveals the Master both of material and of expression. The earthly forms in which the Incarnate Word enshrined His message have caught something of His own Eternal quality and beauty, and will stand for ever as unique and unforgettable as the truth they embody. 'The words that I speak unto you, they are spirit, and they are life' (Jn 6⁶³).

NATURES, TWO.—See DIVINITY OF CHRIST, and INCARNATION, vol. i. pp. 481, 812f.

NAZARENE.—1. Introductory.—'Nazarene' is a descriptive term applied in the Gospels and Acts to Jesus and His followers. The epithet is also regularly applied in the Talmud to Jesus (צ'ר נצ'ר Sanh. 43a, 107b; Sota, 47a) and His disciples (צ'ר נצ'ר Taan. 27b). As usually understood, 'Nazarene' in the first place meant 'of [the town of] Nazareth,' and indeed this explicitly appears in some passages in the Gospels (e.g. Mk 1⁹ 'Jesus came from Nazareth of Galilee,' Lk 2⁴ etc.); but, according to Cheyne, the name Nazareth in its original significance was the designation not of a town but of a district, and 'Nazarene' is primarily equivalent to 'Galilean' (see, further, below, and art. NAZARETH).

Sometimes a descriptive clause with ἀπό followed by the place-name appears: e.g. Mt 21¹¹ 'This is Jesus the prophet from Nazareth of Galilee' (ἀπὸ Ναζαρεθ τῆς Γαλιλαιας); cf. Ac 10²² (Ἰησοῦν τὸν ἀπὸ Ναζαρεθ).

2. The two Gr. equivalents of 'Nazarene.'—In the Greek Test. two words correspond to 'Nazarene,' viz. Ναζαρηνός and Ναζωραῖος. In WH's text the former occurs in Mk 1²⁴ 10⁴⁷ 14⁶⁷ 16⁶, also in Lk 4³⁴ (where it may be dependent on the Markan source).* In Mt., Jn., Acts (and perhaps originally in Lk.), Ναζωραῖος is exclusively used. Probably Ναζαρηνός was employed in the earliest source, and this was given up later for Ναζωραῖος.

Ναζαρηνός is derived from Ναζαρά, like Μαργδαληνή from Μαργδαλά. The forms Ναζαρά, Ναζαρίτ, Ναζαρίθ imply Heb. forms נצ'ר, נצ'ר, נצ'ר.† The Talmudic form נצ'ר may be derived from נצ'ר (or its masc.) with change of ā to ō (ō). See Dalman, Gram. d. Jüd.-Pal. Aram. 2 p. 152 n. The same scholar thinks Ναζωραῖος implies a Heb. form נצ'ר (connected with a by-form of the place-name נצ'ר); cf. op. cit. p. 178, n. 2. Does Ναζωραῖος (= נצ'ר) represent the dialectical form current in Judaea (cf. esp. Jn 19¹⁹, Ac 24⁵)? This is possible. For a different view, see below.

The exact relation borne by these two forms to one another, as well as the significance to be attached to this relationship, raise a difficult problem. The points involved come to a head in Mt 2²³, where it is stated that the child Jesus was brought to Nazareth that 'it might be fulfilled which was spoken by the prophets, that he should be called a Nazarene' (Ναζωραῖος). Of the various explanations of this passage that have been proposed the most important are: (1) those that connect it with the Hebrew word nēzer ('branch,' 'sprout') in the Messianic passage, Is 11¹. (2) The interesting view of Hitzig that Ναζωραῖος (Ac 24⁵) was suggested by נצ'ר in the (unpointed) text of Is 49⁶ regarded as = σωζόμενοι ('those who are being saved') in contradistinction to ἀπολλόμενοι (1 Co 1¹⁸, 21 'them that are perishing'). Later the word נצ'ר was taken to be a singular to correspond with the parallel עבד ('servant'), and applied to Jesus (with a play upon the place-name Nazareth). This is very ingenious, but hardly convincing. It would be better to suppose that the (unpointed) נצ'ר of the passage was read נצ'ר, the Heb. form implied, as Dalman thinks, by Ναζωραῖος, and applied by Jewish-Christian exegesis to Jesus.‡ (3) Cheyne§ doubts whether Nazareth was 'originally the name of a town (or village) at all.' The earlier and more correct form of the word is Nazara, implying a Heb. form נצ'ר (or נצ'ר, also desiderated by the Talmudic נצ'ר); and this again is a by-form of the same word which enters into the second element of the name Gennesar (Gennesaret). This Nazara is really a name of Galilee, and Ναζωραῖος = Galilean. The word of the 'prophets' referred to in Mt 2²³ becomes, on this view, Is 9¹⁴ ('the land of Zebulun, and the land of Naphtali . . . Galilee of the Gentiles') rather than Is 11¹.

It seems clear from the NT data that the term 'Nazarene' was an early designation applied to Jesus and His disciples generally. It thus was the Jewish (Oriental) equivalent of the specifically Gentile term 'Christian.' 'Nazarene' was not the title given by the Christians of Palestine to themselves, but by others outside the Christian fellowship. The names for, and used by, themselves were much more probably such as 'believers,'||

* It occurs again only in Lk 24¹⁹, where, however, the reading is doubtful (AD read Ναζωραῖος).

† Cf. such forms as צ'רפ (1 K 17⁹) in Bibl. Hebrew.

‡ The verse so interpreted would run: 'It is too light a thing that thou shouldst be my servant to raise up the tribes of Jacob, and (shouldst be) the Nazarene (נצ'ר) to restore Israel; I will also give thee for a light of the Gentiles,' etc. This is one of the Servant-passages which was undoubtedly applied to Jesus in early Jewish-Christian circles. Cf. Lk 2³².

§ Developing a theory suggested by Neubauer and Grätz. See EBI, col. 3360, s.v. 'Nazareth.'

|| See FAITH. It is always important to distinguish the names used by a body of itself from those given by outsiders. Another case is probably 'Pharisees,' Heb. פ'רז'ים (= פ') 'separatists.' Their own name for themselves in the earlier period may have been hāsīdīm, 'pious': later, such terms as חכ'ם, חב'ר, חכ'ם, חב'ר 'colleague,' were used. Cf. also remark on Ebionites at end of article.

'brethren' (e.g. Ac 9³⁰), 'saints' (v. 13, etc.), 'elect.' In time 'Nazarene' seems to have acquired a somewhat contemptuous or, at any rate, hostile nuance (cf. Jn 1⁴⁶). The followers of 'the Nazarene' had evidently been made to feel the reproach of the alleged Galilean origin of their Messiah.* Moved by these influences, the Jewish-Christians seem to have transformed the title Ναζαρηνός—which had now become in the mouths of their opponents an opprobrious one—into the honorific one Ναζωπαίος, and to have substituted the latter for the former. In this way, at any rate, Mt. seems to turn the edge of the reproach levelled at the Christian Messiah in the characteristically Jewish-Palestinian designation of Jesus as 'the Nazarene' (נָזָרִי). Assuming, then, that the term Ναζωπαίος is an honorific title educed in this way by the Jewish-Christians themselves, it remains to elucidate the process by which the form was arrived at, and its exact significance.

Ναζωπαίος may be a Greek form of nāzārā (נָזָרָא),† the Aram. equivalent of the Heb. Messianic term נָזַר 'Branch' or 'Shoot.' The selection of this particular Messianic term was dictated by the necessity of finding a counter-term to Ναζαρηνός. Ναζωπαίος is thus an honorific title given by the disciples themselves to Jesus, and expresses the conviction that He was the nozer of Is 11¹—the 'Branch' of Messianic Prophecy. Its application to members of the Christian community naturally followed. See also following article.

3. 'Nazarene' as a community-designation.—It is clear not only from Ac 24⁵ but also from Mt 2²³ that the Christian communities of Palestine, and even outsiders, at first bore the name of 'Nazarenes.' The writer of Mt 2²³ evidently belonged to a community so designated. The name is, of course, specifically Jewish, and it remained the characteristic Oriental-Jewish term for Christians generally (e.g. in the Talmud), though primarily it was the Jewish Christians of Palestine who were thought of. An interesting piece of early evidence of this usage has in recent years come to light in the Palestinian recension‡ of the Shemoneh Esreh. As is well known, the 12th of these 'Benedictions' contains the famous imprecation on 'slanderers' or 'heretics.' In the Palestinian version an explicit reference is made to 'Nazarenes and Sectaries' (minim).§ Though the clause containing these words may not belong to the earliest form of the prayer (early 2nd cent. A.D.), it is, at any rate, not very much later. Jerome (Ep. 112) makes allusion to the use of this 'cursing' prayer in the Jewish synagogues throughout the East.

A Jewish-Christian sect of 'Nazarenes' is referred to both by Jerome and Epiphanius. They are apparently to be distinguished from the Ebionites, though very little exact information is extant concerning them.||

* The Galilean population seems to have been by no means strict in carrying out certain legal enactments regarded as important by the Rabbis. A feeling of distrust, if not of contempt, of the Galilean population seems to have prevailed in Rabbinical circles. For a full and minute investigation of the relevant data, see the valuable monograph of A. Büchler (Der galiläische Am-ha-areẓ des zweiten Jahrhunderts, Vienna, 1906).

NAZARETH (Ναζαρά, Ναζαράρ, Ναζαρέθ, Ναζαρέτ).—The town of Nazareth, the modern en-Nāṣīra, was situated in Lower Galilee, 5½ miles almost due west of Mount Tabor, and nearly as far in a south-westerly direction from Kefr Kennā, the site that is usually identified with Cana of Galilee. The road that ascends from the latter place winds through the high valley in which Nazareth lies, and divides a short distance south of the town, the south-eastern branch finding its way to Jezreel, and thence down the valley to Beth-shean and the Jordan, the western crossing the low pass of the Samaritan hills, by ancient Megiddo, to join eventually the great trunk road north and south, on the plain by the sea. The town itself, however, lay retired from the great highways of commerce, though within easy reach, almost within sight of them; and its secluded position explains the absence of any mention of Nazareth in the OT or Josephus. The modern village, with a population of seven or eight thousand, clings to the foot of the hill. But the ancient town seems to have spread considerably higher up the slope, and from 'the brow of the hill on which the city was built' (Lk 4²⁹), 1600 ft. above the level of the sea, one of the finest views in Palestine is said to be obtained, embracing on the one side the valley of the Jordan and the mountains of Gilead, and on the other the blue waters of the Mediterranean.*

That in our Lord's time Nazareth was a place of considerable importance is indicated by the fact that it is always referred to in the NT as a city (πόλις, Mt 2²³, Lk 1²⁶ 2³⁹) not a village (κώμη). It was in touch with, but not harassed by the currents of popular, commercial, or political life. And there appears to be no real justification for the belief that Nazareth or its people were in any sense insignificant or despised.† The words of Nathanael (Jn 1⁴⁶), which have given currency to this view, are perhaps misunderstood. He must himself have shared the universally accepted belief that the Christ could come only from Bethlehem (cf. Mt 2⁵, Jn 7⁴²); and if his language is intended to express disdain, it is no more than that of the polished town-dweller for the uncultivated rural population who know nothing of his artificial rules of propriety and manners. As to the Athenian every native of Bœotia was a dullard, so to the refined habitué of Jerusalem the rustic of Galilee may well have appeared uncouth and contemptible. These characteristics might not improbably have become accentuated in the case of Nazareth, owing to its withdrawn position in a self-contained upland valley. Under any circumstances Nathanael's words bear witness only to a personal opinion, and are no evidence of a widespread or general belief.

With the exception of the events of the early ministry recorded in Lk 4¹⁶, the direct references to Nazareth in the Gospels are all associated with the birth and boyhood of Jesus. It was to Nazareth that the angel Gabriel was sent, to Mary

His mother (Lk 1²⁶); and thither His parents came to find a home after the flight into Egypt (Mt 2²³). From Nazareth they journeyed into Judaea for the purpose of the Roman enrolment (Lk 2⁴), returning to the same city when the requirements of the Jewish law for the purification of Mary had been satisfied (2³⁹). Twelve years later a similar visit to Jerusalem, in accordance with His parents' annual practice (2⁴¹), and return to Nazareth (v. 51), make it evident that the home during this period had been at the latter town. On the occasion of His baptism, it is from Nazareth that, according to St. Mark (1⁹), Christ came to the Jordan; the other Synoptists merely state that the journey was made from Galilee (Mt 3¹³), or name no place (Lk 3²¹). His early life, therefore, was spent at Nazareth, and only in consequence of the opposition aroused by His preaching in the synagogue and the murderous attempt upon His life (Lk 4²⁸) did He abandon Nazareth and take up His abode at Capernaum (Mt 4¹³). Thenceforward He does not appear to have visited, or to have had any direct relations with, His former home. Its name, however, continued to cling to Him, and by that designation He is known to the 'multitudes' at Jerusalem at the Passover, the stranger-pilgrims from Galilee His native province (Mt 21¹¹). Philip uses the name when he calls Nathanael to Jesus (Jn 1⁴⁵); and later in the history it is employed by Peter at Caesarea (Ac 10³⁸) as a well-known title with which Gentiles also would be familiar.

The precise form of the word and its signification are alike uncertain. In two passages (Mt 4¹³, Lk 4¹⁶) the oldest MSS read Ναζαρέθ, and are followed by all recent editors. Elsewhere in the Synoptic Gospels WH print Ναζαρίτ, with the exception of Mt 21¹¹ (Ναζαρίθ). Tischendorf reads Ναζαρίθ consistently in all passages of Matthew and Luke (except Ναζαρέθ, as above), adding with reference to the usage of the latter a note (on Lk 1²⁶) that on a comparison of all the instances in which the name occurs in St. Luke, including Ac 10³⁸, the decision must be that the Evangelist wrote Ναζαρίθ not Ναζαρίτ, a variable usage between the two forms being inconceivable.* In Mark and John the form Ναζαρίτ and in Acts Ναζαρίθ is accepted by all with the more ancient MSS; and in Mk 1⁹ the form Ναζαρέθ is found in AP. Dr. Hort also states that in eight out of the eleven passages in the Gospels the Codex Sangallensis has Ναζαρέθ, but that the form 'has little other attestation.'† It would seem probable that the variations in spelling, where they are not merely accidental, are due to local or dialectic peculiarities,‡ and are to be ascribed to the transmitters of the tradition or the copyists of the documents rather than to the original authors.‡

The adjective also appears in two different forms. The Second Gospel uses only Ναζαριτης (Mk 124 1047 1467 169); Matthew and John have always Ναζαραιος (Mt 223 2671, Jn 153. 7 1919). St. Luke has both in his Gospel (-πινος, 434 2419; -ποιος, 1537), but in the Acts only Ναζαριαιος (222 36 410 614 228 245 269). In no instance is there any important difference of reading. Neither the noun nor the adjective is found in the Epistles or the Book of Revelation.

There is no agreement, again, with regard to the meaning or derivation of the name. St. Matthew sees in the return to Nazareth a fulfilment of the prophecy of Is 11¹ ('a branch (nēzer) out of his roots shall bear fruit'), thus connecting Nazareth with the Hebrew נצר 'shoot,' 'sprout'; and some have therefore supposed that the name was given to the town in reminiscence of Isaiah's language, and on account of the circumstances of our Lord's early life there. Such an origin of the term is perhaps not impossible, although it hardly commends itself as probable; and of course no such thought was in the mind of the writer, or is intended to be suggested by his words. Others have sought a connexion with the root נצר in the sense of keeping watch or guard; e.g. Dr. Swete would follow Delitzsch and Dalman in explaining Nazareth to mean 'watch-tower.' § This would imply either that the town itself was on the top of the hill, or that it took its name from the hill on the slopes or at the foot of which it stood; the former would seem to be contrary to fact, and the latter improbable. It would be preferable to understand the word in a passive sense from נצר, to preserve, protect (Old Aram. נצר, Assy. naḡāru),* so that Nazareth is the town secluded, protected, and the name describes its position in a valley surrounded by hills. The word might also be explained as a Niphal participle of נצר, נצר, with the same meaning of 'confined,' 'shut in'; compare the adjectival form Ναζαραιος. Heb. or Aram. נ, however, usually becomes ס in Greek, e.g. Ἰσραήλ = Σαδδάν, Σιδών, Ἰουδαία = Σαββαδών, Κεφθαίμα = Μασσσηθά, etc.; or a dental, e.g. Ἰσραήλ = Τύρος. But נצר is represented by Zōyōra in Gn 13¹⁰. A derivation from נור, denom. of ניר, has also been suggested; Nazareth would then be 'the town of the Nazirites.' ניר becomes in the Greek of the Septuagint ναζίρ, ναζιραίος. Compare the modern name of the town en-Nāsira. The latter, however, is more likely to be a conscious or unconscious assimilation of the sound and perhaps the spelling to a well-known descriptive title. See also preceding article.

NAZIRITE (Heb. nāzīr), in AV spelled 'Nazirite,' means etymologically 'one separated,' a religious devotee. The historical references are in Judges (13^{2f}, the case of Samson) and Am 2^{11, 12}; the 'law of the Nazirite' is found in Nu 6. A comparison of these passages reveals the fact that there was considerable difference between the earlier and the later type of Nazirite. Samson had been 'a Nazirite unto God from his mother's womb' (Jg 16¹⁷); his Nazirite was lifelong, and due not to any vow, but to the appointment of God (13^{1, 4, 5, 7}). In his case the abstinence from wine, which is emphasized in the 'law of the Nazirite,' is not specified, and the avoidance of contact with the dead is apparently excluded. On the other hand, great stress is laid on the hair being left unshorn even from childhood (vv. 4, 7, 14). This, which may be taken to be the most marked feature of a Nazirite in early times, rests upon the belief that the hair is part of a man's vital being, and a symbol of his vitality. Thus to let it grow unpolluted or to offer it in sacrifice was an expression of the devotion of the entire manhood to God. From the reference in Amos it may be inferred that the Nazirites formed a numerous class in the 8th cent., and that abstinence from wine was then a marked feature in their outward life. According to W. R. Smith (Prophets of Isr. 84), this prohibition 'was undoubtedly a religious protest against Canaanite civilization in favour of the simple life of ancient times. This appears most clearly in the case of the Rechabites, who had received from their father Jonadab the double precept never to drink wine and never to give up their wandering pastoral life for a residence in cities (Jer 31).'

The 'law of the Nazirite' describes the obligations of the Nazirite, the ceremonies to be observed on the accidental interruption of his vow, and the sacrifices to be offered at its termination. It is clear that the vow is now contemplated as one which might be taken for a specified time only. A passage in Josephus (BJ II. xv. 1) suggests that in his time thirty days was regarded as the minimum duration of the vow. It included three points: abstinence from intoxicating drink of every kind, and from the fruit of the vine in any form, avoidance of all contact with the dead, and the letting the hair grow with a view to offering it on the sacred fire (Nu 6¹⁸). Accidental defilement was followed by seven days of uncleanness, after which the period recommenced, and the vow was renewed with elaborate and costly rites. In like manner the termination of the vow is marked by offerings and libations, and specially by the shaving of the hair 'at the door of the tent of meeting,' followed by its being 'put on the fire which is under the sacrifice of peace-offerings' (vv. 13-20). 'After that the Nazirite may drink wine.' 'It appears most probable that the combination of observances in the law is not ancient, that in the regulations for the Nazirite of later times we see a fusion of several originally distinct customs, which, like many others, had lost much, and, in some cases, all of their original meaning' (G. B. Gray, ad loc.). 'Through this change, however, it lost its value; in old times it was Jehovah who raised up the Nazirites as He did the prophets. These were men of God, ensamples of the genuine Israelite God-pleasing life, and therefore of great significance for the whole people. Under the Law the Nazirate had sunk to a private practice of asceticism, through which the individual obtains favour from God' (Benzinger).

Later allusions to the practice of the Nazirite vow are found in 1 Mac 3⁴⁹, and in Jos. Ant. XIX. vi. 1, BJ II. xv. 1 (case of Berenice). John the Baptist, in some respects at least, resembled the Nazirites (Lk 1¹⁵; cf. the account of James the Just in Eus. HE II. xxiii. 3). It has been supposed by some that the vow taken by St. Paul at Cenchreae, and discharged by him at the Temple, was Nazirite in its character (Ac 18¹⁸, cf. 21²³⁻²⁶); but the information given in the Acts is not sufficient to warrant the conclusion (see Knowling, ad loc., in Expos. Gr. Test.).

NECESSITY.—We exclude from this article all problems not directly raised by the Four Gospels.

1. Necessity and the Divine nature.—Metaphysicians distinguish between (1) contingent existence, and (2) necessary existence. A thing exists contingently, of which the beginning or end or change can be conceived. A thing exists necessarily, of which neither the beginning, nor the end, nor the change can be conceived. The Universe exists contingently, for we can imagine its annihilation; the laws of Nature also exist contingently, for we can imagine them altered. On the other hand, the laws of Reason, of Mathematics, and of (fundamental) Morality exist necessarily, for we can imagine no beginning or end or change in them.

Thus there never was, or will be, or could be, a time when things which are equal to the same thing could be unequal to one another. Nor can we imagine a time, or a world, in which cruelty would be other than odious, and lying other than contemptible. If cruelty and deceit were seated on the throne of the universe, they would still be what they are, odious and contemptible; and benevolence and truth, their opposites, would still be what they are, admirable and praiseworthy. Time and the vicissitudes of things can make no difference to the laws of Reason and the Moral Law. These are eternally and immutably true,—true not only to the human mind, but to every rational mind that does or can exist; valid not only in this universe but in all possible universes.

There exists, therefore, a body of eternal and necessary truth. But this conception of necessary truth carries with it the further conception of necessary Being, or necessary Substance. A truth cannot exist as it were 'in the air,' or in an infinite void: it must be true to some mind. And since the truths in question are independent of all created minds, there must exist some Eternal Uncreated Mind, to which these truths are eternally true. Moreover, since the truths are partly moral truths, this Mind must be moral, or, to use the language of religion, holy. Now it is obvious that to this Infinite Mind the predicate of necessary existence belongs in a higher degree than it belongs to what is called necessary truth. The laws or truths which are called necessary derive their necessary character from the fact that they are the laws of His Mind; but He, the Ultimate and Absolute Mind itself, exists with a degree of necessity transcending theirs. They inhere in Him, not He in them, and consequently He, the Infinite, Absolute, Ultimate Substance, is not only necessarily existent, but also self-existent.

The self-existence, or necessary existence, of the One True, Living, Personal God is a fundamental doctrine of Scripture. It was taught, according to the traditional exegesis of Ex 3⁴, to Moses at the bush, and our Lord endorsed this view of the meaning of the Mosaic revelation (Jn 8⁵⁸). According to the Johannine theology (with which the Pauline is in essential agreement), necessary existence belongs primarily and originally to the Father, who is emphatically ὁ θεός (with the article), and the Living One (ὁ ζῶν πατήρ, Jn 6⁵⁷). To Jesus also, as consubstantial Son, belongs eternal and necessary existence (8⁵⁸). He has 'life in himself' (5²⁶), and is to creatures 'the resurrection and the life' (11²⁵). Yet He has this 'life in himself' by derivation from the Father (5²⁶ 6⁵⁷), and consequently is (in this aspect) an Effect, of which the Father is the Cause.*

2. Necessity and the Divine freedom.—The Divine freedom, though absolute in the sense that God is free to achieve all that is possible, is limited by the laws of necessary truth and necessary substance as defined in § 1. Thus, since the laws of Reason are eternally valid, He cannot achieve the essentially irrational, or (what is really the same thing) the essentially impossible. For instance, He cannot annihilate the past, or make the angles of a plane triangle unequal to two right angles. Similarly, since He is a necessary Substance, He cannot will His own annihilation; and since He is the supreme necessary Good (Mk 10¹⁸), He cannot cease to be good, or will what is evil.

The necessary character of the Divine perfections is fully recognized in Scripture † (Ps 102²⁴⁻²⁷, Mal 3⁶, Nu 23¹⁹, He 13⁸, Ja 1¹⁷), as also is the doctrine that God's freedom is limited by His character. All that is worthy of Him, He can perform, but deceit, cruelty, and injustice are to Him impossible (Gn 18²⁵, Job 5³ etc.).

3. Necessity and the laws of Nature.—It is an important corollary of the Divine freedom, that the laws of Nature do not possess immutable and necessary validity. So far from Nature being a self-contained system of blind, inexorable, materialistically determined forces, it is a realm of Providence, in which a Being friendly to man guides the course of events providentially, with the object of securing ultimately to each individual his proper good (Mt 10^{29ff.}).

In both Testaments the laws and operations of Nature are regarded as expressions of Jehovah's free will (Gn 1, Ps 104, Job 26, Mt 5⁴⁵ 6^{29ff.} etc.), and consequently as capable of being providentially or miraculously interfered with (Ex 3-15, etc.). The NT lays particular stress upon Christ's control over the forces of Nature (Jn 21^{1f.}, Mt 14^{22f.} etc.; see esp. Lk 8²⁵ 'Who then is this that commandeth even the winds and water, and they obey him?').

4. Necessity and human affairs.—The recognition of God as the sole Absolute and Ultimate Being, excludes the heathen conception of an inscrutable Fate or Necessity (ἀνάγκη) to which gods and men are subject, but it does not of it-

* Quite Scriptural, therefore, is the Greek theology which regards the Father as αἰώς, and the Son and Spirit as αἰωράτα.
† The perfections of the Son of God have the same necessary character as those of the Father (see He 13⁸).

self exclude the doctrine of Theological Determinism as taught by Calvin. The advocates of this view can appeal plausibly to a considerable number of NT passages.

Thus there are texts which teach that the general course of events is predetermined from eternity (Eph 1⁴ 3¹¹, 2 Ti 1⁹, Tit 1², 1 P 1²⁰ etc.), and others which seem to deny human freedom of choice. Most of these are in the Fourth Gospel; see, e.g., Jn 6³⁷ 'All that the Father giveth me shall come unto me' (cf. 6³⁹); 6⁴⁴ 'No man can come unto me, except the Father draw him' (ἀνάγκη αὐτοῦ); 10²⁸ 'they shall never perish, and no one shall snatch them out of my hand'; 12³⁹ 'for this cause they could not believe, for that Isaiah saith again, He hath blinded their eyes, and hardened their heart'; 17⁹ 'I pray for them, I pray not for the world'; 17¹² 'not one of them perished, but the son of perdition, that the scripture might be fulfilled' (cf. 13¹⁸ 17¹², Mt 26²⁴). Even in the Synoptics we have Mt 13^{11f.} 'unto you it is given to know the mysteries of the kingdom of heaven, but to them it is not given,' etc.; 18⁷ 'it must needs be that offences come' (ἀνάγκη γάρ ἵστιν ἰθὺς τὰ σκάνδαλα); see also 24⁶ and 26²⁴.

But these passages of deterministic tendency are balanced by others of opposite import.

Thus Christ's invitation to be saved is addressed not to selected individuals, but to all men: 'Come unto me, all ye that labour and are heavy laden' (Mt 11²⁸); 'it is not the will of your Father which is in heaven, that one of these little ones should perish' (18¹⁴); 'And I, if I be lifted up, will draw all men unto myself' (Jn 12³²); cf. 1 Ti 2⁴ 'God will have all men to be saved, and to come unto the knowledge of the truth.'

Since, however, some reject God's benevolent purpose, and refuse to be saved (Mt 25⁴¹ 26²⁴, Jn 17¹²), it follows that the human will is free, and that the apparently deterministic passages of Scripture must be so interpreted as to leave room for human freedom. We are led, therefore, to some such view as this, that only the main events of human history are absolutely determined beforehand. The persons by whom, and the times when, the Divine purposes are to be realized, are not predetermined absolutely, but only conditionally. Thus God willed conditionally that the Chosen People should play the leading part in winning the world to the gospel of Christ (Is 60-62, etc.), but, when they proved unfaithful, the Gentiles were called (Mt 21⁴³ 8¹¹⁻¹² etc.). Similarly the time of the Last Judgment is not fixed absolutely, but only conditionally (Mk 13³² compared with 2 P 3¹² RVm). Applying the same principle to the interpretation of the apparently deterministic passages quoted above, we conclude that Eph 1⁴ 3¹¹ etc. refer mainly to conditional predetermination; that 'all that the Father giveth me' (Jn 6³⁷) are simply those whom the Father foresaw would be genuine believers; that the statement that 'no one (i.e. no hostile power) shall snatch them out of my hand' (10²⁸) does not preclude the possibility that they may snatch themselves out of Christ's hand by unfaithfulness; that the 'drawing' of the Father (6⁴⁴) is the attraction of Divine Love, not the Irresistible Call of Calvinism; that the 'I pray not for the world' of Jn 17⁹ is to be read in the light of 17²³, that the 'blinding' and 'hardening' of 12⁴⁰ are a penalty for past sin; and that even the case of Judas was not one of individual predestination. The general principle bearing upon the case of Judas is laid down in Mt 18⁷ 'Woe unto the world because of occasions of stumbling! for it must needs be that the occasions come; but woe to that man through whom the occasion cometh.' That is to say, in a wicked world great crimes are morally certain to be committed, but there is no need for any individual to commit them, therefore woe to that individual by whom they are committed. To apply this to the case of Judas—the world being what it was, alienated from God and full of treachery and malice, some one was morally certain to betray Jesus to death. But that some one need not have been Judas. He freely undertook the evil business, and therefore his condemnation is just (Mt 26²⁴).

5. The predetermination of the events of Christ's life.—Much stress is laid by the Fourth Evangelist on the predetermination of the events of Christ's life, even with regard to such details as their precise dates and incidental circumstances.

See, e.g., Jn 2⁴ 'Mine hour (for changing the water into wine) is not yet come' [it came a few minutes later]; 7⁸ 'I go not [yet] up unto this feast, because my time is not yet fulfilled' [it was fulfilled a few days afterwards]; 7³⁰ 'no man laid his hand on him, because his hour was not yet come' (cf. 8²⁰); 12²³ 'the hour is come that the Son of Man should be glorified' [by death]; 12²⁷ 'for this cause came [unto this hour] [of my death]; 13¹ 'knowing that his hour was come that he should depart out of this world unto the Father'; 17¹ 'Father, glorify thy Son [by death and resurrection], that thy Son may glorify thee.' Cf. Mt 26²⁹, 53, Lk 13³³, which imply that the length of Christ's ministry and the time of His death were predetermined; also the very strong expression in Lk 22²² 'the Son of Man indeed goeth as it hath been determined' (κατὰ τὸ ὁρισμένον). In all these passages the language is strongly predestinarian, but, for the reasons given in the preceding section, the present writer holds that conditional predestination is, for the most part, meant.

6. The necessary fulfilment of prophecy.—According to the ordinary view, it is the nature of the future event that determines the nature of the prophecy. But often in the Gospels it is the nature of the prophecy that is regarded as determining the nature of the future event. This conception is specially characteristic of the First and Fourth Gospels, but it is not peculiar to them.

In St. Matthew, Christ is born of a virgin at Bethlehem, is named Jesus, sojourns in Egypt, resides at Nazareth, migrates to Capernaum, heals the sick, speaks in parables, enters Jerusalem riding an ass, is deserted by the disciples, is betrayed and put to death, 'that it might be fulfilled which was spoken by the Lord through the prophet' (ἵνα πληρωθῆ τὸ ῥηθὲν ὑπὸ τοῦ Κυρίου διὰ τοῦ προφήτου λέγοντος, κ.τ.λ.: so, with slight variations of phrase, 122 215. 23 817 1217 1345 214 2653; cf. 25 1314. 15 2631 279). Similarly, St. John regards the blindness of Israel as the result of a prophecy of Isaiah (12³⁹, referring to Is 6⁹); the betrayal of Jesus as happening 'that the scripture (i.e. Ps 41⁹) might be fulfilled' (ἵνα ἡ γραφή πληρωθῆ); the prevalent hatred of Jesus as coming 'to pass that the word may be fulfilled that is written in their law [viz. in Ps 35¹⁹ 69⁴], They hated me without a cause.' See also Jn 17¹², where 'the son of perdition' perishes 'that the scripture might be fulfilled'; 19²⁴, where the casting of lots is necessitated by the prophecy; 'They parted my garments among them' (Ps 22¹⁸); 19³⁶, where the piercing of Christ's side takes place to fulfil Ps 34²⁰, and the refraining from breaking His legs to fulfil Ex 12⁴⁶; cf. also 18⁹ and 20⁹. For Synoptic parallels see Lk 24²⁸, 44.

Without entering deeply into the philosophy of the question, we may point out that the two views in question do not necessarily exclude one another. We may suppose that God has a plurality of motives for causing or allowing events to happen, and that when events have been predicted by a duly accredited prophet, one of His motives in causing or allowing them to happen, is to maintain the credit of the prophet. This, at any rate, seems to be the view of the Evangelists, who esteem prophecy so highly that they regard a prediction once uttered by a prophet as (in a sense) placing God under a moral obligation to fulfil it. Jesus Himself, on several occasions, acknowledged the obligation of fulfilling the ancient prophecies (see Mt 26⁵³ 16²¹ 21⁴, Jn 19²⁸, etc.).

7. The necessity of means to ends.—The 'musts' of Christ, of which there are numerous examples in the Gospels, generally refer to the necessity He was under (in order to fulfil the purpose of His Incarnation) to do or to suffer certain things. His original purpose to become incarnate, and to redeem the world, was freely chosen (1 Th 2⁷, 2 Co 8⁹ etc.); but the choice once made, a whole series of experiences (many of them painful and humiliating) became necessary.

As a child of twelve, He was already conscious, according to one interpretation of Lk 24⁹ (see RVm), of the necessity of being about His Father's business, and the same idea frequently recurs during the ministry. Almost at the beginning of it He declares to Nicodemus that His purpose to give eternal life to believers can be achieved only by His death: 'As Moses lifted up the serpent in the wilderness, even so must (ἄρα) the Son of Man be lifted up' (Jn 3¹⁴)* He frequently declared the necessity He was under of working during the appointed time—'We must (δὲν) work the works of him that sent me, while it is day: the night cometh, when no man can work' (Jn 9⁴); 'Howbeit I must (δὲν) go on my way to-day, and to-morrow, and the day following, for it cannot be (ὅτι ἐν δέχεται) that a prophet perish out of Jerusalem' (Lk 13³³); 'My meat is to do the will of him that sent me, and to accomplish his work' (Jn 4³⁴, cf. 5¹⁷, 19 etc.). His visit to Zacchaeus was determined by a redemptive purpose (Lk 19⁵ 'to-day I must (δὲν) abide at thy house.' From the time of Peter's confession at Caesarea Philippi, intimations of the necessity of the Passion and Resurrection become more frequent; 'From that time began Jesus to show unto his disciples how that he must (δὲν) go unto Jerusalem, and suffer many things of the elders and chief priests and scribes, and be killed, and the third day be raised up' (Mt 16²¹); 'but first must (δὲν) he suffer many things, and be rejected of this generation' (Lk 17²⁵); 'Behoved it not (ὅτι ἰδοὺ) the Christ to suffer these things, and to enter into his glory?' (24²⁶).

Corresponding to Christ's obligation of doing and suffering all that is necessary for man's salvation, is man's obligation of appropriating (if he would be saved) the necessary means. Frequent stress is laid upon the latter obligation in the Gospels: see, e.g., Mt 4¹⁷ (the necessity of repentance), 18³ (of conversion), 22³⁷ (of love), Jn 3⁵ (of baptism), 6⁵³ (of the Holy Supper), 15⁴ (of abiding in Christ), etc.

NECK.—(1) In the embrace of family salutation the smooth part of the neck below the ear is the part that is kissed, first on one side and then on the other (Lk 15²⁰). This is implied in Hebrew by the use of the dual form (Gn 46²⁹). (2) Prisoners and those condemned to punishment had the chain attached to a metal ring around the neck (Lk 17²). (3) It was on the neck of the oxen that the yoke was placed in ploughing. The freedom from all other bondage, which is conferred and naturalized by the grace of Christ, is conditioned by the yoke of service to Him (Mt 11^{29, 30}). G. M. MACKIE.

NEEDLE.—Although the needle is of prehistoric origin, having been made out of fish bones before the discovery of bronze, it is mentioned only in one passage in the Bible: 'It is easier for a camel to go through the eye of a needle,' etc. (Mt 19²⁴ || Mk 10²⁵, Lk 18²⁵). The eye of a needle is, in Hebrew and Greek, called simply 'the hole,' but in later Arabic it is also called 'the eye.' Thus one modern Arab poet (Mej. Ad. ii. 231) asks, 'What animal has its hoof in its head, and its eye in its tail?' and another (ib. iii. 273) speaks of 'the eye which never tastes of sleep and is never filled with tears.' The needle is often used as a symbol of self-neglect, in that it clothes all the world and itself remains naked (Burekhardt, 563).

The phrase cited above from the Gospels was used in the schools, with the substitution of an elephant for a camel, to express something which does not happen. Thus in Baba Mezia, 38b, in the course of a discussion on dreams and their interpretation, R. Shesheth says to R. Amram, who had tried to convince him of something incredible: 'Perhaps you are from Pumbeditha [where there flourished a famous academy of the Babylonian Rabbis], where they can drive an elephant through the eye of a needle'—that is, can prove that black is white. Similarly, Berakhoth, 55b: 'No one ever saw a golden palm, nor an elephant entering the eye of a needle.' For other occurrences of the phrase, see Buxtorf's Lex. s.v. אֵילָן. T. H. WEIR.

* Some critics assign this saying to the Evangelist, not to Jesus. † The proposals that have been made to identify the 'needle's eye' with the small door in a large city gate, or to substitute 'cable' (καμμάρι) for 'camel' (καμήλα), have nothing in their favour. See Hastings' DB iii. 505a, and Expos. Times, ix. (1893) 388, 474; A. Wright, Some N.T. Problems, 125.

NEIGHBOUR.—To the people of Israel, God had given the commandment, 'Thou shalt love thy neighbour as thyself' (Lv 19¹⁸); but in their hardness of heart they had put a limit to it. They had deduced from the commandment, 'Thou shalt love thy neighbour'—its converse—'and hate thine enemy' (Mt 5⁴³); and they had made the latter as binding as the former. To a people who regarded themselves as the sole recipients of Jehovah's favour, the limitation was not unnatural; but with the revelation of God as the universal Father, who showers His blessings equally upon all the world, just and unjust alike (Mt 5⁴⁵), the limitation must of necessity be swept away. To make men like to God was the essential aim of the life and teaching of Jesus Christ; and as the love of God is limitless, the love of man to man must be no less. All His doctrine in reference to man's treatment of his neighbour He summed up in the words, 'Be ye therefore perfect, even as your Father which is in heaven is perfect' (Mt 5⁴⁸). 'Neighbour,' then, upon our Lord's lips becomes a term synonymous with 'humanity.' 'Who is my neighbour?' asked a scribe; and Christ made answer with the parable of the Good Samaritan (Lk 10²⁵⁻³⁷), seeking by a picture of pure compassion to shame him of his question. 'Dost thou ask,' He seems to say, 'who thy neighbour is? Set about at once to relieve the misery of every one thou meetest. Make thyself the neighbour of all who need thy help.' It is to be noted that in the application of the parable He does not ask which of the three was, but which of the three became (γενόμεναι, v.³⁶) neighbour unto him that fell among thieves. In the Sermon on the Mount He makes the same thing clear by direct statement—that 'neighbour' includes all the world of men, even those who hate and persecute us (Mt 5^{43, 44}).

To the old commandment, 'Thou shalt love thy neighbour as thyself,' Christ gives a new and striking form in the words, ' whatsoever ye would that men should do to you, do ye even so to them' (Mt 7¹²); and that the all-importance of this rule may be made plain, He adds, 'for this is the law and the prophets.' He thus makes a man's own longing for love and kindness and compassion the measure of the treatment which he should extend to others. But this love and compassion must not be the outcome of any selfish motive. To do good to others that we may receive the same again, is to miss wholly love's reward (Mt 5^{46, 47} || Lk 6³²⁻³⁴); for the joy of love is loving: it is more blessed to give than to receive (Ac 20³⁵). To ask to our feasts only those who can invite us in return is no manifestation of love—is but a bid for earthly recompense. To obtain God's blessing we must invite the poor, the maimed, the lame, the blind, who can give nought in return (Lk 14¹²⁻¹⁴). The presupposition of our Lord's teaching, then, is this, that love is its own reward, that to lose one's life for love's sake is to find it (Mt 10³⁹ || 16²⁵, Mk 8³⁵, Lk 9²⁴). The true servant of the Kingdom, therefore, must be ever ready to give unstintingly and ungrudgingly of all that he has and is; and even to those who would take from him by violence he must offer no resistance (Mt 5³⁹⁻⁴²).

It follows naturally that the Christian must be as ready to forgive as to give. When a brother seeks forgiveness, it must be granted gladly, even unto seventy times seven (Mt 18²¹ || Lk 17^{3, 4}). There can be no refusal of pardon to the penitent, for so the Heavenly Father treats His erring children (cf. the parable of the Prodigal Son, Lk 15^{11ff.}). To refuse to remit the offences of others means to remain unpardoned by God; for the Heavenly Father cannot forgive His children if they will not in turn forgive their brethren, who also are His children: for thus they cut themselves off from the family of God, exclude themselves from His love (Mt 6¹² 18³⁵). The hatred of a brother becomes a sin which cannot be pardoned except it be repented of, except the hatred be wiped out and love restored. The universal Fatherhood of God is thus once more the basis of the argument (1 Jn 4²⁰, 21 5¹). And not only towards those who are fellow-subjects of the Kingdom is love inculcated: it must extend even to those who are our enemies and the enemies of God (Lk 6²⁷⁻³⁸); for Christ came to seek and to save the lost, and the Christian must follow in his Master's steps. Yet, on the other hand, forgiveness must in no case flow from mere weak benevolence which foregoes revenge for injury, and leaves the matter there. An entrance must be won for pardon into the heart of the offender before the Christian's work is done; for pardon must be accepted as well as granted. It is not for his own but for his brother's sake that a man must forgive; and forgiveness is spiritually useless to the offender unless he repent of his offence. To win souls for God's Kingdom is the Christian's noblest work, and it is to that end that his whole treatment of his neighbour must be directed (Mt 18¹⁵). Reproof, therefore, must not be wanting. The offence must be pointed out, and the sinner urged to amendment. In Mt 18¹⁵⁻²¹ (|| Lk 17^{3ff.}) a course of treatment is prescribed for the impenitent. He is to be dealt with privately as a first step; if that fails, in the presence of witnesses; and as a last step the Church is to be called in to aid in effecting a reconciliation. Only when all has proved vain is he to be regarded as a heathen man and a publican. But even then love's offices may not cease. The publican and the heathen still remain the Christian's care, are still sharers in the love of God. Love must still strive with him, by returning good for evil, by heaping coals of fire upon his head, to win him back to God and love (Mt 5⁴⁴, Ro 12²⁰). When all else has failed, there still remains the duty of prayer to God, who in His providence may find a way to penitence.

It follows from the humble self-forgetting attitude which this implies, that all loveless judgment of the weaknesses and sins of others is wholly forbidden. To judge is to usurp the prerogative of God, and to bring upon ourselves His condemnation of our lovelessness (Mt 7¹⁻²). Yet men are not to close their eyes to the characters of those about them. They must certainly seek to find the best that is in every man, and to draw it to the light even as Christ did; but to treat the notoriously wicked man as if he were good and upright is to make him a cause of offence to others, and at the same time to tempt the man himself to greater wickedness. To act thus is to cast pearls before swine (Mt 7⁶). There is no more grievous sin against love than to disregard or to play upon the weaknesses of others. We must know others' weaknesses that we may avoid offending them and causing them to stumble. But that we may be able to do this—to help the weak brother and to save him from his defects—it is first needful that we should be conscious of our own. If our own eyes are blinded by the beam of self-righteousness and pride, we cannot see clearly to cast out the mote out of our brother's eye (Mt 7³⁻⁵ || Lk 6¹¹ || Gal 6¹). In the very strongest terms our Lord warns against the giving of offence to others, even to the least. It were better, He says, to suffer the most miserable death than so to endanger the salvation of another, and sin against God's love (Mt 18⁶, 7-10). In 1 Co 8 St. Paul treats of the matter in reference to a particular instance, pointing out that even Christian liberty must be willingly laid aside if it in any way tends to hurt the conscience of a weaker brother. Love for souls is so absolutely the law of the Christian life that it makes right wrong

To summarize the doctrine, the revelation of the new relationship between God and man, and the new law which rests thereon, make of love the highest principle in life, and make the love of God and the love of man one and the same; and since love is the divinest element in human nature, it must be love's object to beget and to increase love in others. Hence towards all who are our brethren in the Lord we must be humble and meek and forgiving, 'in honour preferring one another' (Ro 12¹⁰), seeking greatness not in dominion but in service (Mt 20²⁶, 27 || Lk 22²⁶); for it is ever the over-estimate of self that takes offence and causes hate (Mk 7²²); and to the sinner and the unbeliever who are ignorant of love, there is but the greater need to make love manifest by unwearying self-sacrifice and unceasing kindness; for so the evil in the other's heart will be overcome, and the Divine germ of love within him will be fanned into a living flame, and he also will become a true son of God (Mt 5³⁸⁻⁴⁸ || Lk 6²⁸⁻³¹ || Ro 12¹⁹⁻²¹). It is those whose whole lives make for peace—the peace that springs not from indifference but from love—who shall be called the children of God (Mt 5⁹).

NEST.—Orientals, while often indifferent to the study and explanation of natural processes, have always been attracted by the provisions of instinct for the preservation of animal life. They observed the home-like motive of rest and safety in the selection and construction of birds' nests (Job 29¹⁵, Ps 84³ 104¹⁷, Jer 48²⁸ 49¹⁶). In the Gospels the word tr. 'nest' (κατασκήνωσις) means generally the place of night shelter for birds (Mt 8²⁰), or where they alight in search of food during the day (13³¹, 32). By contrasting His own with the more fortunate condition of the birds, Christ intimates that whoever, like the scribe, would follow Him to the uttermost, may for His sake have to endure loneliness, misunderstanding, and rejection. The reference to the mustard seed, which in its wild state produces a shrub reaching to the seat of a horse's saddle, indicates that power of rapid expansion inherent in Christ's Kingdom which has often surprised both its friends and its foes.

NETS.—Nets were in ancient times used not only in fishing but in hunting beasts and in bird-catching. In the Gospels they are mentioned only in connexion with fishing, which was an important industry on the very prolific inland waters of Palestine. See FISH. Three terms occur. 1. δικτυον (perhaps from δικεῖν, 'to cast'), Vulg. rete, is the general term, including various kinds of nets. It is found in the parallel accounts of the call of the disciples (Mt 4²⁰, 21, Mk 1¹⁸, 19, Lk 5²⁻⁵) always in the plural. In St. John's narrative of the great draught of fishes (21⁶, 8-11) it is found in the sing., possibly referring to a net of larger size. See 3 below.

2. ἀμφίβληστρον (which may perhaps be an adjective, δικτυον being understood), a casting-net (deriv. ἀμφιβάλλω, which verb stands, without a noun, for the action of the fisherman in using the net, Mk 1¹⁹), bell- or pear-shaped, thrown by hand from the shore or from a boat, which was skilfully wielded so as to fall upon the water with its circular mouth fully extended. The edges, being weighted, sank immediately to the bottom, and the fish within the area of the mouth were enclosed. This net is still much used in Palestine. The individual skill required in its employment is in point if it was with this kind of net in mind that our Lord invited the fishermen to become 'fishers of men.' In the Gospels the word is found only in Mt 4¹⁸ and (in the TR) Mk 1¹⁶.

3. σαγήνη (Lat. [so Vulg.] sagena; French and English, 'seine'), from σάρτω, 'to load, fill': a drag-net (Mt 13⁴⁷ RVm) or sweep-net, often of immense size (Manilius, 'vasta sagena'). Such nets have been in use from early times down to the present day, and are extensively employed on our own coasts, as, for instance, in Cornwall. A common way of working the seine is to have one end of it attached to the shore, while the other is taken seawards by a boat in a wide circuit, and at length brought to land again. The upper side of the net is sustained by corks, while the lower, being weighted, sweeps along the sea-bottom. The ends are gradually drawn in till the whole net is brought up on the beach, carrying with it all the fish in the area through which it has passed. The seine may also be worked entirely from a boat or boats. In classical Latin this kind of net is called overriculum (verro, 'to sweep'); cf. Hom. Il. v. 487, λίον πάναγρον, a take-all net. σαγήνη is found in the Gospels only in Mt 13⁴⁷ (tr. 'net,' the word 'draw-net' is not in the Eng. text, but only in the AV chapter-heading), where the choice of this term instead of δικτυον or ἀμφιβληστρον greatly strengthens the meaning of the parable. See DRAW-NET. It occurs in LXX Is 19⁸, Ezk 26²; and ἀμφιβληστρον and σαγήνη are mentioned together in Hab 1¹⁵.

NEW BIRTH.—See REGENERATION.

NEW COMMANDMENT.—The definition of the Christian law of love as a 'new commandment' is peculiar to the Johannine writings (Jn 13³⁴ 15¹², 1 Jn 2⁷⁻⁸, 2 Jn 5). In the Fourth Gospel the Supper is regarded as the prototype of the Agape rather than of the Eucharist, and the institution of the 'new covenant' gives place to that of the 'new commandment' of brotherly love. The commandment, like the covenant, is inaugurated by a symbolic act, the washing of the disciples' feet.

In the Synoptic Gospels our Lord repeatedly insists on love for one's neighbour as the paramount ethical duty (cf. Mt 5⁴³⁻⁴⁵, Mk 12³¹, Lk 10³⁰⁻³⁷); He contrasts this new conception of the Moral Law with the rule that held good 'in old time' (Mt 5⁴³⁻⁴⁴). The words in the Fourth Gospel thus sum up with an exquisite simplicity the authentic substance of the social teaching of Jesus. At the same time there are elements in the Johannine idea which differentiate it from the apparent parallels in the Synoptics.

(1) Jesus in His teaching, as given in the Synoptics, does not impose His ethic under the form of 'commandment.' Accepting the moral code of the Decalogue as Divinely given, He contents Himself with 'fulfilling' it by a deeper and more inward interpretation. The effect of His 'fulfilment' is indeed to replace the ancient Law by a new one, but in this Christian law the idea of commandment is altogether transcended. It is a 'law of liberty,' which the enlightened conscience originates for itself. The Fourth Gospel reverts to the idea of 'commandment'—of a moral law enforced from without. Jesus as the Son of God has power to impose a new law, equally binding with that of the Decalogue; and it is henceforth valid in virtue of His authority.

(2) The divergence from the Synoptics is still more marked in regard to the scope of the 'new commandment.' The love which it requires is the φιλανθρωπία that found expression in the Agape; not love to one's neighbour in the universal sense, but love of Christians to one another. Here more signally than elsewhere the Fourth Evangelist betrays the influence of the later Church-idea which had narrowed the original intention of the teaching of Christ. A sharp distinction had grown up between the community of believers and the 'world,' and the duty of Christians was primarily, if not exclusively, to their brethren. The passage in the Fourth Gospel already contemplates a time when mutual love within the Church was the γνώρισμα τῶν Χριστιανῶν (Jn 13³⁵, cf. Tert. Apol. 39). There is no indication of a wider demand, in the spirit of the Sermon on the Mount and the parable of the Good Samaritan.

The commandment is expressly called a new one, although in its Synoptic form it appears as a direct quotation from the ancient Law (Mt 22³⁹ || Mk 12³¹ = Lv 19¹⁸). The newness has been explained in various ways. (a) According to the Greek commentators (Cyril, Theod. Mops, etc.) it consists in the higher degree of love implied in καθὼς ἡγάπησα ὑμᾶς—not 'as thyself' but 'more than thyself,' with the self-forgetting love of Christ. This, however, overstrains the meaning of καθὼς, which says nothing of the quality of Christ's love, but states the simple fact of His example. (b) Several modern commentators (e.g. Meyer, Godet, Bugge) have still sought the explanation in the words 'as I have loved you.' The love of Christ experienced by the believer is to be the motive power to a new and higher kind of love. Our love to one another is henceforth to be Christian love—not grounded in a mere natural instinct, but in an inward fellowship with Christ. This idea is certainly present in the Gospel, and in the Epistle it comes to definite expression. 'Hereby we know love, because he laid down his life for us; and we ought to lay down our lives for the brethren' (1 Jn 3¹⁶). The love required in Christians is the greater love which was revealed for the first time in the Cross of Christ. This, however, does not seem to be the idea involved in the 'new commandment.' The newness is ascribed to the commandment itself, not to the motive or the quality of the love enjoined in it. (c) An attractive explanation is that suggested by Olshausen. The commandment of love is new in the sense that it is for ever fresh, always renewing itself. Such a meaning seems to be plainly implied in the beautiful antithesis in the Epistle (1 Jn 2⁷⁻⁸), 'I write no new commandment unto you, but an old commandment. Again, a new commandment I write unto you.' This passage, however, is a kind of poetical expansion of the idea of a 'new commandment,' and cannot be construed as an exegesis. (d) The simplest and most natural explanation is that Christ has in effect established a new morality by His insistence on love as the fulfilment of the Law. In outward form the demand was an old one, and this is acknowledged in the Synoptic parallels by the quotation from Leviticus. But the place assigned to it by Jesus as the sum of the Law, the sovereign principle of the moral life, invests it with a new significance. The ancient morality is superseded by the Christian law of love. The words in the Fourth Gospel thus give expression to the truth which had emerged ever more clearly in the course of later reflexion,—that the teaching of Jesus, based as it was on the religion of the OT, was something radically new. The Law had been not only fulfilled but abrogated. In its place there was a new commandment, a new determining principle for the moral life.

As indicated above, the definition of the Christian ethic as a 'new commandment' is in one respect inadequate, and even involves a self-contradiction. The true originality of the moral demand of Jesus consisted in its breaking away from the idea of outward requirement. The Law imposed from without was replaced by the inward spirit of faith and love and obedience. In the Fourth Gospel we have probably the earliest phase of the reaction which ended in the formulation of Christianity as nova lex. The development of the Church as an institution was accompanied by a certain externalizing of moral and religious ideas, while at the same time the influence of the OT favoured the relapse into a modified legalism. Thus where St. Paul, in full accordance with the Synoptics, demanded a new spirit (cf. Ro 12³, Gal 5¹⁶), the later Church was satisfied with obedience to a 'new law.' The Fourth Gospel appears to mark the transition between these two conceptions of Christian morality. The true character of the 'commandment' is still safeguarded by the profound religious spirit of the Gospel, but the idea of outward ordinance has begun to re-establish itself. In a subsequent age, which had drifted out of sympathy with the original teaching of Jesus, the 'new commandment' became literally the nova lex.

NEW TESTAMENT.—The expression 'New Testament' (καὴν διαθήκη) has a double meaning. (1) The New Covenant itself (Lk 22²⁰, 1 Co 11²⁵, 2 Co 3⁶ etc.). See artt. COVENANT and TESTAMENT. No other meaning is possible in the Bible. (2) The books that contain the New Covenant. The latter is the subject of this article.

1. The genesis of a NT literature.—This is to be assigned, humanly speaking, to the slowly developing needs of the Christian society. The Apostles were commissioned not to write but to preach. The OT, interpreted in the light of its fulfilment in Christ, contained both for them and for their earliest converts the whole deposit of Divine truth (2 Ti 3¹⁵ etc.). (a) Epistles, as a class, were needed first, in order to settle questions that soon arose on the conversion of Gentiles (Ac 15). Many of the Epistles plainly show their 'occasional' origin (1 Co 7¹, 2 Co 9¹, Gal 1⁶, 2 Th 2¹ etc.). Formal communications were evidently no new thing in Jewish communities (Ac 9² 28²¹). (b) Narratives of Christ's words and works, such as the Gospels, were not at once so necessary. Men were looking for Christ's speedy return (2 Th 2²), and eye-witnesses of His ministry were at first plentiful (Ac 1²², 1 Co 15⁶). The demand for written and authentic narratives was forcibly realized only when Apostles and eye-witnesses began to pass away (2 P 1¹⁵, 2 Ti 4⁶), and irresponsible persons took in hand to supply the want (Lk 1¹). Yet even in the next generation there lingered a preference for traditional reminiscences, cf. Papias (c. A.D. 140) ap. Eus. HE iii. 39. On the shortest reckoning no Gospel was committed to writing in its present shape within twenty-five years after Christ's Ascension.

2. The canonical reception of NT writings.—This may be said to have passed through three stages, not wholly separable in point of time.

(1) The first stage is that of collective recognition (extending roughly to A.D. 170). Christian writers of this period exhibit—(a) Coincidences of language with NT expressions: e.g. Clem. Rom. (c. A.D. 95); Ign. (c. A.D. 110); Polyc. (c. A.D. 116); Barn. (c. A.D. 70–130); Didache (c. A.D. 90–165); Herm. (c. A.D. 140–155); Heges. [ap. Eus.] (c. A.D. 155).—(b) Anonymous references—which seem to have been the set rule for all writers of 'Apologies,' whatever their custom in other works: e.g. Just. M. (c. A.D. 150); ad Diogn. (c. A.D. 170?); also 2 Ep. Clem. (c. A.D. 140).—(c) Direct references: e.g. Clem., ad Cor. xlvii., alludes to 1 Co.; Polyc., ad Ph. iii., to Philipians; Papias (before A.D. 150), ap. Eus. HE iii. 39, mentions a record of Christ's words and deeds by Mark, and 'logia' (originally in Hebrew) by Matthew; Just. M., Dial. ciii., speaks of 'Memoirs by Apostles and those that followed them,' and refers to the Apocalypse (Dial. lxxxi.) by name.—(d) Dogmatic recensions: Tatian, Diatessaron (c. A.D. 150), harmonized the four Gospels; Marcion (c. A.D. 140) mutilated Luke and (acknowledging ten Pauline Epistles) rejected the three Pastoral Epistles.—(e) Catalogues: e.g. the Muratorian fragment (composed c. A.D. 160), which, according to Westcott, gives 'a summary of the opinion of the Western Church on the Canon shortly after the middle of the 2nd century.'

(2) The second stage is that of unique authority.—(a) A succession of contrasts is drawn by Christian writers. (α) Apostles and themselves: cf. all the Apostolic Fathers—Clem. Rom. vii. xlvii.; Polyc. ad Ph. iii.; Ign. ad Rom. iv. ('not as Peter and Paul'); Barn. i, iv ('not as a teacher'). (β) Apostolic records and traditions: Justin M., Ap. i. 33, says the Memoirs of the Apostles relate 'all things concerning Jesus Christ.' 'These words (Westcott observes) mark the presence of a new age. . . Tradition was definitely cast aside as a new source of information.' (γ) Canonical (ἐνδιάθηκοι) and uncanonical (ἀπὸ κρυφῶν) books: generally, e.g. Dionysius of Corinth (c. A.D. 176), ap. Eus. HE iv. 23, says, 'the Scriptures of the Lord . . . and those that are not of the same character'; and in detail, e.g. Clem. Alex. (c. A.D. 165–200) ib. vi. 14; Origen (A.D. 286–353), ib. vi. 25; Dionys. Alex. (c. A.D. 248) ib. vii. 25—representing the opinion of Alexandria; Tertullian (c. A.D. 160–240), de Pudic. 20, that of Latin Africa; Caius (c. A.D. 213), ap. Eus. HE vi. 20, that of Rome; Irenæus (c. A.D. 135–200), ib. v. 8, cf. Iren. Her. iii. 7, that of Asia Minor and Gaul; Serapion (c. A.D. 190), ap. Eus. HE vi. 12, that of Syria. These exhibit substantial agreement, together with variety in detail. From Tertullian's time the general estimate was much as it is to-day.

(b) Illustrations of this developing consciousness are seen in two matters arising from constant use of the books. (i.) The descriptive titles. Barnabas, Ep. iv., is the first to use the formula 'as it is written' in quoting words taken from the N.T. [=Mt 22¹⁴]. In Justin M., Ap. i. 66, the term 'Gospels' is first applied to books. Melito of Sardis (c. A.D. 170), ap. Eus. HE iv. 26, refers to 'the books of the Old Testament,' implying undoubtedly by contrast 'the books of the New.' The latter description is expressly used by Irenæus, Her. ii. 58, and the two Testaments are from that time on a level. Chrysostom is said to have been the first to adopt the expression 'Bible' (τὰ βιβλία) for the two Testaments as one whole. (ii.) Public reading. For some considerable time (varying much in different places) profitableness seems to have been the only absolute test required. Dionys. of Corinth (c. A.D. 170–175), ap. Eus. HE iv. 23, refers to the public reading of a letter from Soter, as well as to the better known instance of the Ep. of Clem. of Rome. Eusebius (ib. iii. 3) relates that Hermas had formerly been read in public on account of its usefulness for 'elementary instruction.' Apostolic nature (i.e. practically 'inspiration') was subsequently the regular test: cf. Eus. Z.c. and Cyril of Jerus. (c. A.D. 340), Catech. iv. 33-36. Hence δημοσιεύεσθαι under the former conditions refers merely to the fact of public reading; under the latter it is a declaration of canonical authority.

(3) The third stage is that of formal definition.—Diocletian's persecution (A.D. 303-311), directed against the Christian Scriptures, proves that their unique position and influence was a matter known to the heathen throughout the Roman Empire. It also made the identification of those Scriptures, as distinct from other Christian books, a vital matter (cf. the history of the Donatist schism on the question of 'traditores'). Eusebius, writing A.D. 313-325, sums up the general consent of that time (HE iii. 3, 24, 25), in three classes of books—'acknowledged,' i.e. of undisputed authenticity and Apostolic power; 'disputed,' i.e. defective in either of those qualities; and 'heretical.' The Emperor Constantine (A.D. 331) caused to be prepared, under the direction of Eusebius, fifty copies of the Divine Scriptures for use in the churches of Constantinople (cf. Eus. Vit. Const. iv. 36). These must have become a standard in the Greek Church. It may be added that the evidence of ancient versions, old Latin, Syriac, and Egyptian, is of great importance; but it is of too complicated a nature to be briefly discussed. Succeeding Councils dealt with the Canon, esp. that of Laodicea (c. A.D. 363) and the third of Carthage (A.D. 397). The catalogue of canonical books which bears the name of the former is held to be spurious: to the catalogue of Carthage Christendom adheres to-day.

LITERATURE.—The NT (as a whole or its separate portions) forms the subject of well-known 'Introductions,' Commentaries, etc. For special information see Sanday, Inspiration; Wright, Synopsis (oral theory); Westcott, Canon of NT and Bible in the Church; Moffatt, The Historical NT. F. S. RANKEN.

NICODEMUS.—One of the persons mentioned only in the Fourth Gospel. He is described as a Pharisee and a ruler of the Jews. He had an interview with Jesus by night (Jn 3¹⁶); and though he did not become an avowed disciple, he protested in the Sanhedrin against the hasty condemnation of Jesus (7⁵⁰); and after the Crucifixion he brought spices to embalm the body of the Lord (19³⁹).

The name Nicodemus is Greek (from νίκη and δῆμος—'conqueror of the people'). Josephus (Ant. xiv. iii. 2) gives Nicodemus as the name of an ambassador from Aristobolus to Pompey. In the Talmud we have the form נִיקֵימָן as the name given to a certain Bunai ben Gorion, because, it is said, of a miraculous answer to his prayer. This ben Gorion was a rich man, and is reported to have spent a vast sum on the marriage of his daughter, who afterwards sank into abject poverty. He appears to have had charge of the supply of water to the pilgrims at Jerusalem; and he was accused of being a Christian. Some have identified this man with the Nicodemus of the Gospel; but the positive grounds of identification are insufficient; and there is the negative consideration that ben Gorion is spoken of as living till the siege of Jerusalem, whereas Nicodemus, already in Jn 3 an elderly man (γῆρας, v. 4), could hardly have survived to so late a period. Some writers, who regard the Fourth Gospel as unhistorical, suggest that our Nicodemus is simply a typical character, constructed by the Evangelist from the traditions of ben Gorion, with the aid of the Synoptic references to Joseph of Arimathea. Thus E. A. Abbott (Ency. Bib. art. 'Nicodemus') says: 'Nicodemus ben Gorion passes into the Gospel under the shadow of Joseph of Arimathea'; and speaks of 'a conflated development of Joseph into two persons.' He says that N. ben Gorion was one of three or four who were sometimes called βουστρωται, 'rich men,' 'great men of the city,' and suggests that as an official provider of water he was an appropriate character for a dialogue on regeneration. He concludes that Nicodemus is 'a Johannine conception representing the liberal, moderate, and well-meaning Pharisee, whose fate it was to be crushed out of existence in the conflict between Judaism and its Roman and Christian adversaries.' This reconstruction can hardly be persuasive except to those who on other grounds have already judged the Fourth Gospel to be without historic value. The general discussion goes beyond the limit of this article. It is enough to say here that there is nothing in what is related of Nicodemus, or in the circumstances of his connexion with Jesus, which is in itself improbable, or out of harmony with what we are told elsewhere. It is altogether probable that some men of the upper classes and of the Pharisees would be attracted by the personality and teaching of Jesus, and that they would seek with varying degrees of caution to know more of Him. To a certain extent the Synoptics confirm this (cf. Lk 7³⁶ 39 195). We may add that the personality of Nicodemus stands out clearly in spite of the brevity of the reference to him. The protest in the Sanhedrin shows the same blending of courage with caution as the interview by night. There was a sufficient sense of truth and justice, and of personal interest in Jesus, to enable him to risk the anger of the majority by a protest, but enough of caution or timidity to put the protest into an indirect and tentative form rather than into a bold defence of the Master. The personality of Nicodemus and the conduct ascribed to him do not weaken the case for the historic credibility of the Evangelist.

It has been urged with some measure of plausibility that the conversation in Jn 3 bears the marks of artificial construction. It is said that it is really a brief sermon by the Evangelist, and follows the regular plan of the Johannine discourses:—a pregnant saying by the Master; a remark by an interlocutor who misunderstands the text by taking it literally and not spiritually; then a further exposition by the speaker: the whole being 'a thoroughly artificial construction on a set plan' (Gardner, A Historic View of the NT, sec. vi.). There is a very general agreement that the discourses in the Fourth Gospel owe something of their form to the Evangelist. Differences of opinion on that point are almost entirely confined to the question of the extent to which the writer has gone in condensing or re-shaping the Master's utterances. Without surrendering the conviction that we have a faithful report of the substance of a real conversation, we may readily admit that the Evangelist has put his material into the form which seemed best fitted to make the truth clear to his readers. He is, we may suppose, chiefly interested in Nicodemus 'as instrumental in eliciting from Jesus' the sayings which he records. But this does not make Nicodemus a mere lay figure, and his questions mere 'rhetorical artifice.'

Dr. Gardner says of the question in v. 4: 'Such crassness is scarcely in human nature.' Yet when we give due weight to the prejudices of a Pharisee and allow for the deadening effect of respectable religious legalism, it is not hard to understand the sheer bewilderment of Nicodemus at the idea that he—no Gentile, no publican—needed to be born anew. How common it is for men of such a type to be utterly unable to understand even an elementary spiritual truth, if it cuts across their conventions and challenges their privileges. Nicodemus did not at all suppose that a second physical birth was meant. He was simply unable to conceive what kind of new birth could be needed by one who was already a Jew and a keeper of the Law. His questions are simply his bewilderment beating the air.

The last reference to Nicodemus (Jn 19³⁹) appears to show greater boldness and a more definite discipleship on his part. His gift of spices was certainly an expression of respect and reverence for the Master, and its amount is the lavish gift of a rich man. Whether it expressed faith in the Messiahship of the Crucified, 'the Saviour typified by the brazen serpent which Jesus had explained to him beforehand (3¹⁴)' (Godet), is less certain. Nicodemus may have regarded Jesus simply as a martyred teacher, whose cause had perished, but who deserved to be held in loving memory. He could hardly at that moment have anticipated the Resurrection. He may even have been encouraged to bring his gift by the thought that Jesus dead was no longer feared by the authorities, and that it was no longer a serious risk to show respect to His name.

Christian tradition records many legends of Nicodemus, and his name is associated with one of the Apocryphal Gospels; but nothing further is recorded that has any historical value.

NIGHT.—1. Associations of the word 'night.'—

(a) It was the season for all that demanded secrecy. Travellers on a dangerous errand went by night, as Joseph did, after he had received warning in a dream (Mt 2¹⁴). Nicodemus for fear of his colleagues came to Jesus by night at the Passover season; the interview may have been on the roof of some friendly house, or in one of the tents used by the pilgrims (Jn 3² 19³⁹); night was also the time for theft, and drunkenness, and revelling (Lk 12³⁹, cf. 1 Th 5^{2, 7}, Ro 13¹²), and was convenient for plots and stratagems (Mk 14¹¹). The chief priests bribed the guard to say that the disciples had taken away the body of Jesus by night (Mt 28¹³).

(b) Night had its peculiar dangers and annoyances (cf. Ps 91⁵). Travellers might be delayed through stress of circumstances till after nightfall, and even till midnight (Lk 11⁵), and such journeys were not without danger; 'if any man walk in the night, he stumbleth' (Jn 11¹⁰, cf. Job 5¹⁴). A modern traveller has spoken of 'the villages by night, without a light, when you stumble on them in the darkness, and all the dogs begin barking' (G. A. Smith, HGHL, p. 99). Such annoyances would be encountered by the host in the parable, who, coming to beg bread, arrived at midnight after stumbling through the narrow streets of the village (Lk 11⁵ etc.).

(c) It was the season when Divine guidance might be looked for. Joseph and the Magi were warned in dreams (Mt 2^{12, 13, 19}). Pilate's wife suffered many things in a dream because of Jesus (Mt 27¹⁹). To the Israelites the thought of night would always bring the memory of visions and revelations of God, given to their seers, beginning from the nights when Jacob saw the ladder, and wrestled with the angel.

(d) It was the season of rest (Jn 11⁹ 9⁴), but not for all men; shepherds guarded their flocks by night (Lk 2⁸); though from November to March the sheep were probably in the fold. The fishermen toiled all night (Lk 5⁵, Jn 21³), when the Lake was often swept by sudden gales (Mk 4³⁷); the men who could not watch one hour in Gethsemane were accustomed to sleepless nights. In Palestine, as in all Eastern lands, the marriage ceremony was celebrated after nightfall; lamps and torches were always the accompaniment of weddings (cf. Rev 18²³, where the light of the lamp and the voice of the bridegroom are mentioned together). In the parable of the Ten Virgins the guests assembled at nightfall, but they had to tarry till midnight before the bridegroom came, the hour being chosen for the purpose of the parable, because then they would most likely be off their guard (Mt 25⁶).

(e) Night was the season of surprises. The day of the Lord was to come as a thief in the night (1 Th 5²). In the night the soul of the rich fool was required of him (Lk 12²⁰). At the coming of the Son of Man 'in that night,' it is said, 'there shall be two in one bed; the one shall be taken, the other shall be left' (Lk 17³⁴). The disciples must guard against a surprise: 'for ye know not when the Lord cometh, whether at even, or at midnight, or at cock-crowing, or in the morning; lest coming suddenly he find you sleeping' (Mk 13³⁵). Especial stress is laid upon the mid-watches (Lk 12³⁸); it would be easy to keep the first watch, and almost impossible to sleep during the watch before the dawn.

(f) The phrases 'day and night,' 'days and nights,' are used to give a comprehensive idea of time (Mt 4²); or to give an impression of a continuous practice [as when we read that Anna served God night and day (Lk 2³⁷)], or to indicate the monotonous passage of time; the sower 'sleeps and rises night and day,' and nothing happens day after day (Mk 4²⁷).

2. Divisions of the night.—It is important not to seek the scientific accuracy of modern usage in the NT. Time was divided by natural phenomena. The night varied in length with the seasons of the year; and the length of the four watches into which the night was divided must also have varied (Mt 14²⁵, Mk 6⁴⁸, Lk 12³⁸). In NT times four watches were recognized, in the OT only three. The division into hours could not be made for the night-season.

'The division of the day into hours sprang from the use of the sundial, and its peculiar character, the varying length of the hour, was conditioned by its origin; hours of the night could be measured only by water-glass or some similar means, which would give divisions of equal length during all seasons of the year, and not varying hours like those of the day' (Ramsay, Expos. iv. vii. [1893] p. 210).

The watches of the night are indicated in Mk 13³⁵: evening (δύρα)—midnight—cock-crowing—full morning. It was at eventide, for example, that Jesus sat down with His disciples; before 'cock-crowing' Peter denied Him; and in the 'morning' Jesus was carried away to Pilate.

3. In the life of Jesus.—Before Jesus called His disciples, He went out into a mountain to pray, and continued all night in prayer (διανυκτερεύων, Lk 6¹²). After the 'feeding of the five thousand' also He departed into a mountain to pray (Mk 6⁴⁶ || Mt 14²³), and not till the fourth watch did He come to the disciples, spent with their 'bootless toil.' From these and other references it is clear that Jesus often made the night His season of prayer. He whose mind was saturated with the OT may have recalled how the prophets had withdrawn to the mountains.

'So, separate from the world, his breast Might duly take and strongly keep The print of Heaven.'—(Keble, Chr. Year, 13th Sund. after Trin.)

In the neighbourhood of the Lake, night was the only time of solitude.

'Save in the recorded hours of our Lord's praying, the history of Galilee has no intervals of silence and loneliness; the noise of a close and busy life is always audible; and to every crisis in the Gospels and in Josephus we see crowds immediately swarm' (G. A. Smith, HGHL p. 421).

It may be urged that Jesus teaches by His example the value of prayer in the silence of night. There are many references to such prayer in the Psalms (cf. Ps 119⁶²); and it is not without significance that the time is midnight in the parable in which Jesus teaches the lesson of 'shameless' prayer (ἀναιδία, Lk 11⁸). 'The thing could never have taken place in the daytime. It is a story of midnight importunity' (Whyte).

There is no reason to doubt the preference of Jesus for an abode where He would be sure of mountain solitude; we have no record that He entered Tiberias, which was a walled city (HGHL p. 449). 'He entered Jericho only to pass through it.' 'This freedom Jesus had from childhood' in Nazareth, Capernaum, Bethany, and other resting-places. When men did not need Him, He must be free to leave them. It is substantially true that 'Jesus never slept in a walled city' (see Expos. III. iii. [1886] p. 146). The scenes of rescue on the Lake were in the night-time; then it was He walked upon the sea and stilled the waves (Mk 6⁴⁹, cf. 4³⁹).

The closing incidents of the life of Jesus cannot be pictured except against the background of night. It was dark when they sang a hymn, and went to the Mount of Olives (Mt 26³⁰). The approach of the soldiers was marked by their lanterns (Jn 18³). Peter warmed himself in the chilly air before a fire of coals (Jn 18¹⁸). It was possible in the dark to follow undetected afar off (Mt 26⁵⁸). The panic of the disciples owed something to the night. It was at cock-crowing that Peter remembered his Master's warning, and wept bitterly. The air of night is over all these scenes. It was 'the night in which Jesus was betrayed' (1 Co 11²³).

After the Resurrection, night was falling when Jesus revealed Himself to the two at Emmaus in the breaking of the bread (Lk 24³¹). They, on returning to Jerusalem, found the disciples gathered together, and Jesus appeared amongst them. When, for fear of the Jews, the disciples met at eventide, Jesus came to them (Jn 20¹⁹); and it was when the day was breaking that He welcomed His weary disciples to the shore (21⁴).

It is impossible to discover with accuracy the character of these Syrian nights, so wide is the variation in the climate between place and place, season and season; it is not clear whether, for example, it is literally true to say, 'For thee I trembled in the nightly frost.' Even when we know the impression made upon the Western traveller, we cannot tell how Jesus and His disciples, hardened by the bracing uplands of Galilee, endured the cold and the mists of night. It is clear that the nights are often as cold as the days are hot (cf. Gn 31⁴⁰, Jer 36³⁰; see Geikie, The Holy Land and the Bible, i. 73). At certain seasons in late summer Jesus would be exposed in His nightly vigils to the dense chilly clouds of mist of which the Song of Songs (5²) speaks: 'For my head is filled with dew, and my locks with the drops of the night.' For modern descriptions of nights spent in the sacred scenes, reference may be made to Warburton's Crescent and the Cross, and Kinglake's Eothen. But in order to discover the colours, the lights and the half-lights of the Syrian night, those modern painters are the best guides who, like Holman Hunt and William Hole, have studied the Holy Land in the lights and shadows, which are the same as when Jesus watched through the hours of night.

4. Metaphorical applications of 'night.'—The contrast between night and day, darkness and light, belongs to the stock of ideas common to all religions, to the most ancient vocabulary of thought. It is freely used in the OT and NT.

(a) In the opening of the Synoptic Gospels, quotations are used to depict as darkness the state of the world before the dawn of Christ (Mt 4¹⁶, Lk 1⁷⁹, cf. 2 Co 4⁶). It is upon such darkness that the gospel shines; and at the consummation of the Kingdom it is the outer darkness that awaits the evil-doers (Mt 8¹² 25⁵⁰). Between the two areas of darkness there is the kingdom of light brought in by Jesus, whose disciples were to be the light of the world (Mt 5¹⁴). When Jesus was arrested, He said that the darkness had prevailed (Lk 22⁵³), for the high priests were the emissaries of darkness. The night was therefore an emblem of all that was set against the Kingdom of God, of the ignorance and corruption of the world which crucified Christ.

(b) The Fourth Gospel has a certain framework of contrasts, amongst which is the opposition between the light of Christ and the darkness (1⁵ 8¹² 11¹⁰ 12³⁵⁻³⁶, 1 Jn 2⁹⁻¹¹). While Christ is revealed as the source of light, His enemies are unmasked as the story proceeds. Though 'darkness' is used in this connexion, it is impossible to escape from the thought of this conflict when we read of 'night' in this Gospel. It is used to denote the close of the divinely appointed day of service (Jn 9⁴). The healing of the man born blind was part of the manifestation of God, for which there was a set time. This day being past, neither Jesus nor His disciples could work. 'In the application to Jesus the night is His death, and His retreat into the invisible world' (Loisy). When Jesus persisted, in spite of the warnings of His disciples, in returning to Judea, He said that the hours of the day were given for work; so long as it was the appointed time, He would be safe. The one danger was lest the day should be prolonged 'beyond God's appointment.' So prolonged, the day would be as night, in which the traveller stumbles. With both these passages Lk 22⁵³ should be compared. Night stands also for the close of the day of grace in the life of Judas (Jn 13³⁰). Judas went out, 'and it was night.' The darkness is his place. Across the darkness 'less deep than his own soul' he moves from the light of Christ. Night stands for the new environment which he has chosen, 'loving darkness because his deeds were evil.'

(c) In the Apostolic writings the night stands for the waning order, which will be ended by the coming of Christ. The day was at hand; the disciples must put off the garments of night, and put on the armour of light (Ro 13¹² etc.). The difference in the metaphorical use of the night may be seen by a comparison of the word of Jesus, 'the night cometh,' with St. Paul's 'the night is far spent.' For those who are of the fellowship of Christ the darkness is already past (Eph 5⁸, 1 Th 5⁴, 1 P 2⁹): 'Some daylight it is, and is every moment growing.' The darkness and the light are alternatives, and contemporary.

'But he that hides a dark soul, and foul thoughts, Benighted walks under the midday sun.'

Night has other associations for the modern mind. It is still the emblem of peril and evil, but it speaks also of quietness and peace; this value it has had for poets from Milton to Whitman.

'Dear night! This world's defeat;
The stop to busy foals; care's check and curb;
The day of spirits; my soul's calm retreat,
Which none disturb!'

—(Vaughan).

It is important that the reader should not carry such associations into the study of the NT. There, night has always a sinister suggestion. It speaks of all that is hostile to God, who is light, and in whom there is no darkness at all. The word has changed its value in the commerce of ideas. It is with the night as with the sea. In the OT and NT both are emblems of fear and evil: in the City there will be no night (Rev 21²⁵), and the sea is no more (21¹). But in the modern mind they awaken other thoughts of attraction and kindness. The writers and teachers of the NT use the coinage of their age; and though we may conjecture that Jesus had other memories of night than those of fear, yet He did not depart from the customary usage, in which the men of His time took night as significant of terror and evil.

EDWARD SHILLITO.

NINEVEH, NINEVITES.—The great city of Nineveh was on the eastern bank of the Tigris, opposite the modern city of Mosul. (For account of it see art. in Hastings' DB iii. 553 f.). In Mt 12 and Lk 11 are grouped several logia of our Lord, short pithy passages, each of which appears to be a whole in itself. Two of these contain references to Jonah and the Ninevites.

1. Mt 12³⁸⁻⁴⁰ || Lk 11^{29, 30}. It would seem that on two occasions, the second of which is narrated in these passages, the Pharisees asked for a sign. Christ's preaching and miracles were not enough for them. They wanted Him to prove His Divine mission by some overwhelming marvel that would force them to believe in it, if it were truly Divine. The first occasion is in Mk 8¹¹ || Mt 16¹⁻⁴, where they asked for 'a sign from heaven.' This He met with a definite refusal (Mk.). St. Matthew, however, adds to the answer words which really belonged to the second occasion—'except the sign of Jonah.' The answer on the second occasion contains this exception in both Gospels. (In St. Matthew the Pharisees are addressed, in St. Luke the multitudes 'when they were coming crowding up,' ἐπαθροισμένων). But the meaning of the explanation which our Lord adds is somewhat obscure: 'for as Jonah became to the Ninevites a sign, so shall also the Son of Man be to this generation' (Lk.). It is important to notice that the 'sign' did not consist in the preaching of Jonah and of the Son of Man. Jesus had been preaching already, whereas the sign was still future ('shall be'). And the story of Jonah in the OT does not, of itself, throw any light on the difficulty. Jonah started from Joppa to sail westward (Tarshish), and the storm occurred near enough to the shore to make the sailors try to row back for safety. When Jonah, therefore, was vomited up by the fish on to the dry land, it was presumably near Joppa. Then he received the second command to go to Nineveh. According to the story, therefore, Jonah was in no sense a sign to the Ninevites. One of two conclusions is inevitable; either that there was a current Haggadic tradition about Jonah and Nineveh which was known to our Lord and His hearers but has been lost to us, or that the word 'Ninevites' has supplanted some other word in the original text of St. Luke, having been introduced by the influence of v. 32. St. Matthew obviates the difficulty by omitting the name altogether; but he (or some later writer, cf. Sanday, Bampton Lectures, p. 433) represents our Lord as teaching that 'as "Jonah was three days and three nights in the belly of the whale" (=Jon 1¹⁷), so shall the Son of Man be in the heart of the earth three days and three nights.' The 'sign of Jonah' is thus the sign of the resurrection. That, and that only, will be the supreme vindication of Christ's Divine mission. [In St. Luke's passage, after v. 30 D and some Latin MSS add the harmonistic statement καὶ καθὼς Ἰωνᾶς ἐν τῇ κοιλίᾳ τοῦ κήτους ἐγένετο τρεῖς ἡμέρας καὶ τρεῖς νύκτας οὕτως καὶ ὁ υἱὸς τοῦ ἀνθρώπου ἐν τῇ γῆ, 'and as Jonah (was) in the belly of the whale three days and three nights, so also (is, or shall be) the Son of Man in the earth.' It is conceivable that this was the more original form of the words in St. Matthew]. The question whether this passage necessitates the belief that our Lord accepted the story of Jonah as historically true is dealt with in art. JONAH.

2. Mt 12³¹ || Lk 11³². The words in the two Gospels are identical. [D omits the whole passage in St. Luke]. St. Matthew places side by side the two logia relating to Jonah, and then introduces the one that relates to Solomon and 'the queen of the south.' St. Luke transposes the latter two, 'either for chronology, or effect, or both' (Plummer). Our Lord again addresses the 'evil generation,' 'Ninevites (ἄνδρες Νινευίται, no article; EV 'the men of Nineveh') shall stand up (as witnesses) in the judgment with this generation and shall condemn it, because they repented in accordance with the message preached by Jonah (εἰς τὸ κήρυγμα Ἰωνᾶ), whereas this generation has not repented though a far greater than Jonah is preaching to it; 'something greater (πλείον, cf. v. 31, Mt 12²⁸) than Jonah is here.' A. H. M'NEILE.

NOAH.—The hero of the Hebrew version of the Semitic tradition of the Flood; mentioned twice in the Gospels. In the genealogy of Jesus (Lk 3³⁶) he appears in the ninth generation after Adam, as in the OT narrative. The second mention is in Lk 17^{26, 27} || Mt 24^{37, 38}, where Jesus uses the Flood in the days of Noah to illustrate the sudden and unexpected coming of the Son of Man; the indifference of the people in the time of Noah is paralleled by the indifference of men to this approaching event.

The use of the illustration shows the familiarity of the Jews with the story of Noah. In the OT there is but the slightest mention of him outside of the immediate Flood-story in Genesis. The writer of Is 54⁹ describes the present distresses of Israel 'as the waters of Noah,' to be followed by peace, according to the unchangeable covenant of peace, as surely as the promise and the covenant followed the Flood. Ezekiel (14^{14, 20}) knows of three men, Noah, Daniel, and Job, efficient mediators to deliver the people by their righteousness; but in the present case, even the three shall be able to deliver only themselves (see also He 11⁷).

O. H. GATES.

NOBLEMAN.—This word is derived from the Lat. nobilis (= gnō-bilis), 'well-known,' 'notable.' In usage the ennobling which makes a man notable may come (a) from rank inherited or conferred, (b) from office, or (c) from character. With the meaning (c) 'nobleman' does not occur in the NT, nor has it often this significance in English authors. 'A noble man' should be used, when it is desired to convey the thought expressed in Dryden's lines:

'A nobleman is he whose noble mind
Is filled with inborn worth.'

In the EV 'a certain nobleman' is the translation of two different Gr. phrases, viz. (1) ἀθροαπὸς τῆς εὐγενείας, Lk 19¹²; (2) τῆς βασιλικῆς, Jn 4^{46, 49}.

1. In the parable of the Pounds (Lk 19^{11ff.}) the literal rendering of the Gr. phrase is 'a certain well-born man,' or, more idiomatically expressed, 'a man of noble family' (Weymouth). The nobility comes from inherited rank. Inadequate translations are those of Wyclif 'a worthi man,' and of most early English versions 'a noble man.' The 'nobleman' of this parable is probably Archelaus, who, on the death of his father, Herod the Great, went to Rome in order to urge his claims to the kingdom. An 'ambassage' of fifty Jews followed Archelaus from Jerusalem to the 'far country' in order to protest against his being made king; in other words, they went to Rome to say, 'We will not that this man reign over us' (Lk 19¹³).

2. The Gr. word used in Jn 4^{46, 49} means 'belonging to a king' (cf. Ja 2⁸ 'royal'). Wyclif 'a litil kyng,' like the Vulg. regulus, follows the false reading βασιλικος. More adequate renderings are Avm 'courtier,' or 'ruler'; RVm 'king's officer.' The nobility comes from office. Weymouth expresses the meaning well: 'a certain officer of the king's court.' Josephus (BJ VII. v. 2, Ant. XV. viii. 4) uses the word to distinguish the courtiers and other officers of the king from those of Rome. The 'king' in whose court this officer served was Herod Antipas, tetrarch of Galilee. The title 'king' was not his by right, but was given to him in courtesy (Mt 14⁹). It is not known who this king's officer was, nor whether his duties were civil or military. He has wrongly been identified with the 'centurion' (ἐκατόνταρχος) referred to in Mt 8⁹ and Lk 7²,—a Gentile officer in the army of Antipas. To identify the healing of the nobleman's son with the healing of the centurion's servant is not only to manufacture discrepancies, but also to lose the light which the earlier miracle casts upon the later one. This is well brought out by Chadwick (Expositor, 4th series, v. 443 ff.); the strong faith of the centurion (Mt 8¹⁰) 'becomes intelligible, without ceasing to be admirable, when we reflect that he was evidently aware of the miracle formerly wrought for another inhabitant of the same city, an eminent person, one of the court which his own sword protected.' J. G. TASKER.

NON-RESISTANCE.—See RETALIATION.

NUMBERS.—In this article it is above all things necessary to distinguish carefully between passages in which numbers are used only in the ordinary way and those in which they are connected with some custom or belief, or have for any reason symbolic significance, whether secular or sacred.

Three facts must be borne in mind throughout the inquiry: (1) the Oriental preference of round numbers to indefinite statements; (2) the close association in Western Asia from early times of numbers and religion. It seems to be proved that each of the chief Babylonian gods had his number: Anu, for example, 60, Bel 50, Ea 40, Sin 30, Marduk, as identified with Jupiter, 11, etc. (KAT[ZW]454). And it is equally certain that number often played an important part in ritual. (3) The gradual obliteration of the original reference from the popular consciousness. By the time of Christ the process by which certain numbers had acquired special significance would be wholly or partially forgotten by most of the Jews resident in Palestine. They had received their use from their fathers, and found it expressed in literature and ceremonial and daily life, but knew little, if anything, of the way in which it had originated, so that it is very unsafe to credit them with conscious application of ideas current elsewhere. The Jews who lived in Babylonia from about B.C. 600 to the completion of the Babylonian Talmud unquestionably adopted in course of time many Babylonian thoughts and expressions; but this cannot be assumed, at any rate in the same degree, of the Jews of the Holy Land.

Seven.—Of the significant numbers met with in the Gospels the most prominent is that so freely used in the OT and the other literature of the Semitic area—the number seven, represented in the Gr. Test. by ἑπτὰ, ἑπτάκις, ἑπταπλασίον, ἑβδομος. In three contexts it must be understood literally, although perhaps in the first two with an underlying reference to another use: in the statement that Anna's married life lasted 7 years (Lk 2²⁶), in the accounts of the feeding of the 4000 (7 loaves, 7 baskets, Mt 15^{34, 36f.}, Mk 8^{5, 6, 8}; cf. also the references in Mt 16¹⁰ and Mk 8²⁰), and in a note of time, 'the seventh hour' (Jn 4⁵²). In all other passages: Mt 12⁴⁵ 13^{31f.} 22^{25f.} 28, Mk 12^{20, 22f.} 16^{9f.}, Lk 8² 11²⁶ 17⁴ 18³⁰ (a doubtful reading) 20^{29, 31, 33}; in the number of the Beatitudes relating to character (Mt 5³⁻⁹); in the 7 disciples at the Lake (Jn 21²); and in the grouping together of 7 parables of the Kingdom in Mt 13—it has some kind of special significance. In the Apocalyptic passages which come within the scope of this study, the literal meaning combined with the symbolic may be recognized in the 7 churches (Rev 1^{11, 20}), the 7 candlesticks (1^{12, 20} 2¹), the 7 stars (1^{16, 20} 2¹ 3¹), and the 7 angels (1²⁰). Elsewhere, in the 7 seals (5^{1, 5}), the 7 horns, the 7 eyes, and the 7 spirits (4⁵ 5⁶), the use is purely symbolic.

This symbolic or, to speak more generally, non-literal use is very frequent in the Jewish literature of the period extending from about B.C. 150 to about A.D. 100, the period which includes the time covered by the Gospels. The following are a few examples out of many. We read of 7 heavens (Slav. Enoch 3 f.; Test. of Levi, 2 f.; cf. Charles in Expt vii. [1895] 57 ff.), 7 angels (To 12¹⁵, Eth. Enoch 81⁵), and 7 high mountains, 7 large rivers, and 7 great islands (Eth. Enoch 77^{4, 5, 8}). Man is said to have been made by the Divine Wisdom of 7 substances (Slav. Enoch 30⁸), and to have received 7 natures (30⁹). Seven great works were made on the first day of creation (Jub 23); Adam and Eve lived 7 years in Paradise (31⁹); at the Deluge 7 sluices were opened in heaven, and 7 fountains of the great deep in earth (52⁴); and Jacob is said to have kissed his dying grandfather 7 times (22²⁸).

In this non-literal use of the number, three shades of significance can perhaps be traced. (a) It was a favourite round number. Instead of 'many' or 'a considerable number,' an Oriental in many cases preferred to say 'seven.' This is probably the force of the number in Peter's question about forgiveness (Mt 18²¹); in our Lord's command of sevenfold forgiveness for sevenfold injury (Lk 17⁴); in the promise (Lk 18³⁰, according to some MSS) of sevenfold reward (ἑπταπλασίονα instead of the usual reading πολλαπλασίονα); in the references to the 7 evil spirits (Mt 12⁴⁵, Mk 16^{9f.}, Lk 8² 11²⁶); in the question of the Sadducees about the 7 brothers (Mt 22²⁵ etc.); and in the passages alluded to in the Book of Jubilees.—(b) Seven often expressed the idea of completeness. So in 7 churches, 7 parables of the Kingdom, the 7 Beatitudes above mentioned, perhaps in the 7 loaves and the 7 disciples, and some of the passages referred to in the Books of Enoch. This use of 7 in the ancient East is directly attested by some cuneiform texts which explain a sign consisting of 7 wedges as meaning 'totality,' 'whole' (Zimmern in Busspsalmen, p. 73).—(c) Seven was for the Jews and all their neighbours from early times a sacred number. In our Lord's day there were many features of Jewish religious life which kept the sacredness of 7 continually before the mind: the observance of the 7th day and the 7th year; the 7 days of unleavened bread and of the Feast of Tabernacles; the 7 sprinklings of the leper (Lv 14⁷); the 7 sprinklings of the blood of the bullock in the Holy of Holies on the Day of Atonement (Lv 16¹⁴); the 7 lambs prescribed as an offering for several important occasions (Nu 28^{11, 19, 27} 29³⁶); the 7 days of seclusion for uncleanness or suspected uncleanness (Lv 13^{4, 6, 26} 14⁹ 15^{13, 19, 24, 28}, Nu 12^{14, 15} etc.); the sevenfold march round the altar on the 7th day of the Feast of Tabernacles (Mishna, Sukkah iv. 4); and the seven-branched candlestick in the Temple (Jos. Ant. III. vi. 7, the Arch of Titus). For all classes of Jewish society in the period of our Lord's ministry the number 7 was inseparably associated with the most solemn seasons and the most important acts of worship. There is no direct illustration of this sacredness of 7 in the Gospels, but it can be confidently traced in Apocalyptic imagery: in the 7 candlesticks (Rev 1^{12, 20} 2¹) which evidently allude to the seven-branched candlestick in the Temple, and in the 7 horns of the Lamb, and the 7 eyes which are the 7 spirits of God sent out into all the earth (Rev 5⁶, cf. 4⁵). In non-canonical literature it is found in the 7 heavens and the 7 angels, and in the remarkable description in the so-called Fourth Book of Maccabees of the 7 brothers put to death by Antiochus Epiphanes as a most holy 7 (παναγία συμφώνων ἀδελφῶν ἑβδομάς), who circled round piety in choral dance like the 7 days of creation round the number 7 (14⁷⁶, according to the emended text followed by Deissmann in Kautzsch's Pseudepigraphen, p. 169). The rise and development of these shades of meaning, which to some extent melt into one another (for the use of 7 as the number of completeness was probably connected with its sacred use, and its employment as a round number may have been facilitated by the other uses), are questions which hardly come within the range of this article, as the process must have been completed millenniums before the Christian era. Seven is distinctly a sacred number in the inscriptions of Gudea the ruler of Lagash some centuries before the time of Abraham (RP, new series, ii. 83, 94 ff.). Whatever the primary impulse, whether the observation of the phases of the moon, or of the 7 planets, or of the 7 brightest stars of the Pleiades, or of the 7 stars of Arcturus, or of the 7 stars of the Great Bear, which all attracted the attention of early star-gazers, the Jews of our Lord's age (with a few exceptions) will have used the number simply as their fathers had used it for many generations, as they found it in ritual, in proverbial lore (Pr 6^{16, 31} 9¹ 26^{16, 25}, Sir 7³ 20¹² 35¹¹ 37¹⁴ 40⁸), in other literature, in history (Jos 6⁴, Jg 6¹ 16^{7, 13}, 2 S 24¹³, 2 K 5¹⁰ etc.), and in common life (7 days of the marriage feast, To 11¹⁹; and 7 days of fasting and mourning, 1 S 31¹³, Job 2¹³, Moed Katon 27^b). A few highly educated men associated the number with astral phenomena; the pseudo-Enoch, for example (Slav. Enoch 30³), and Josephus, who affirms that the 7 lamps of the candlestick imitated the number of the 7 planets (τῶν πλανητῶν τὸν ἀριθμὸν μειμιμημένοι, Ant. III. vi. 7); but most will have had little or no acquaintance with such speculations.

One use of the number in the Gospels which has been already briefly referred to needs fuller treatment. In three or four passages, which are really but two, mention is made of 7 evil spirits. Our Lord cast 7 devils or demons out of Mary Magdalene (Lk 8², Mk 16⁹), and He spoke of an evil spirit which had been cast out as returning with 7 other spirits worse than himself (Mt 12⁴⁵, Lk 11²⁶). It has been suggested, cautiously by Zimmern (KAT[ZW] 462-463), positively by R. C. Thompson of the British Museum (Devils and Evil Spirits of Babylonia, I. xliii.), that these 7 are connected in some way with the evil 7 so often referred to in Babylonian incantations, and identified to some extent with winds and storms. That the Babylonian belief was widely diffused in the regions affected by Babylonian civilization is probable enough, and that it lingered in one district at any rate into Christian times is attested by a curious Syrian charm cited by Thompson; but there seems to be no clear allusion to it in the extant Jewish literature of the period inclusive of the time of Christ. The 7 spirits put by Beliar into man, according to the Test. of Reuben (2f.), are mere abstractions. The whole passage seems to be a sort of allegory. And it must be remembered that the Test., as we have it, has been manipulated by a Christian, who would be familiar with the passages in the Gospels under consideration. The use of 7 in the latter can be fully accounted for without any reference to Babylonia.

In the Holy Land and amongst the Arabs there are still many echoes of the ancient use of 7 as shown in the preceding paragraphs. Dalman's Diwan contains several examples of it as a round number in popular poetry (pp. 260, 287, 305, 309). Mourning for relatives and marriage rejoicings extend amongst the Arabs over 7 days (Forder's With the Arabs in Tent and Town, 216, 218). If the person is stained with blood, the stain is washed 7 times (Robinson Lees, Village Life in Palestine, 2nd ed. 218). A festival at Nebi Musa lasts 7 days (Curtiss, Primitive Semitic Religion To-day, 163). These illustrations show that the modern Oriental not only employs 7 as a round number, but sometimes associates it in some measure with the ideas of completeness and sanctity.

Three and a half.—Of the symbolic use of the half of seven there is one instance in the Gospels, viz. the reference to the famine in the time of Elijah as lasting three years and six months (Lk 4²⁵, cf. Ja 5¹⁷). This number, the half of the number of completeness, seems to have been often used by the Jews of periods of trial and judgment. According to Josephus (BJ I. i. 1, v. ix. 4), the worship of the Temple was discontinued in the time of Antiochus Epiphanes for three years and six months; and, according to the Midrash on La 1⁵, the siege by Vespasian continued for the same period (cf. Dn 7²⁵ 9²⁷ 12⁷, Rev 11², and Wetstein's note on the last passage).

Fourteen.—The double of 7 in the genealogy at the beginning of Matthew can hardly be accidental. When the Evangelist carefully divides the generations from Abraham to Christ into three groups of 14 each (Mt 1⁷), he must intend the number to have some meaning. He does not forget that it is the double of a favourite round number which is at the same time suggestive of completeness. This multiple of 7 seems to have been common in old Canaan, for scores of the Tell el-Amarna Letters from Canaanites to the Pharaoh have some form of the salutation: 'Seven and seven times I fall at the feet of the king my lord.' A striking example of the use of a multiple of 7 in a scheme of history is supplied by a writing composed probably within a hundred years of our Lord's ministry, 'the Book of Jubilees' or 'Little Genesis.' The writer arranges the whole period from Adam to the giving of the Law in about 7 times 7 jubilees, the interval between two jubilees being 7 times 7 years (50⁴).

Seventy.—Of another much used multiple of 7, 7 × 10 = 70, there is only one instance in the Gospel narrative, the sending out by Jesus of the 70 disciples (Lk 10¹⁻¹⁷). It must be noted, however, that WH read (with BD, some OL, Vulg., Syr^{cur} and Syr^{sin}) 72, the multiple of 6 by 12. In either case the use of 70, of which there are so many examples in the OT and elsewhere (Gn 50³, Ex 1⁵ 15²⁷, Nu 11¹⁶, Jg 17 8³⁰, 2 K 10¹, 2 Ch 29³², Ps 90¹⁰, Jer 25¹², Ezk 8¹¹, Dn 9²⁴, Eth. Enoch 89⁵⁹ 'the 70 shepherds,' Test. of Levi, c. 8, 2 Es 14⁴⁶; Jos. Vita, 11, BJ II. xx. 5; Bk. of Jub 11²⁰ clouds of ravens returned 70 times; Sanhedrin i. 6 the high court of justice with 70 members and president) as a round number for 'very many,' with perhaps the added idea of comprehensiveness, may be safely recognized as influential.

The Rabbinic idea of 70 languages for the 70 peoples is found in the Mishna (Sota vii. 5), and so may be as old as the time of Christ, but can hardly be alluded to in a mission intended only for Jews. Dr. A. Jeremias (Babylonisches im NT, 93) regards 70 as used in the Gospels 'a round number with astral character,' but any reference to the stars is unnecessary and improbable. Babylonian astrologers might be credited with it, but not the Galilaean Jews of our Lord's time and the Evangelists.

Seventy times seven.—The 70 times 7 of Mt 18²², the multiple of 10 times 7 by 7, is a very strong way of saying 'very many times,' almost equivalent to 'without limit.' The alternative rendering of RVM 'seventy times and seven,' which yields a much less emphatic meaning, rests on the LXX tr. of Gn 4²⁴ where the same Greek ἑβδομηκοντάκις ἑπτὰ represents Hebrew words which clearly mean 77. In Mt. the familiar rendering is distinctly preferable. Wellhausen (Das Evangelium Matthaei, 94) notes that D reads ἑπτάκις for ἑπτὰ, which is strictly correct (but cf. Moulton, Proleg. Gr. Gram. 98).

Ten (δέκα, δέκατος, ἀποδεκατῶν ἀποδεκατῶ).—The number ten is probably a round number in the parables of the 10 virgins (Mt 25¹), the 10 pieces of silver (Lk 15⁸), the talents (Mt 25²⁸), and the 10 servants who received 10 pounds (Lk 19¹³, 16f. 24f.); and in the prediction to the Church of Smyrna of tribulation 10 days (Rev 2¹⁰). In other passages (Mt 20²⁴, Mk 10⁴¹, Lk 14³¹ 17¹²⁻¹⁷, and the references to the payment of a tenth to God, Mt 23²³, Lk 11⁴² 18¹²) it is used literally. As a round number significant of completeness (although without the idea of sacredness associated with 7), its use was facilitated by the decimal system, which may have been suggested in the first instance by the number of fingers on the two hands. Be that as it may, the Jews of our Lord's day found 10 again and again in their sacred books and in history; for example, in the 10 patriarchs from Adam to Noah (Gn 5); the 10 righteous men whose presence would have saved Sodom (Gn 18²²); the 10 commandments (Ex 34¹²⁻²⁶ and 20²⁻¹⁷, Dt 5⁶⁻²¹); the 10 temptations with which Israel tempted God in the wilderness (Nu 14²²); the 10 curtains of the tabernacle (Ex 26¹); the 10 lavers (2 Ch 4⁶); the 10 candlesticks (v. 7) and the 10 tables (v. 8) in Solomon's temple; the 10 servants of Gideon (Jg 6²⁷), and the 10 elders of Boaz (Ru 4²).

The non-canonical literature of later times supplies many additional examples. The Book of Jubilees knows of 10 temptations of Abraham (19⁸), a thought found also in the Mishna (Aboth v. 4), and the Test. of Joseph of 10 temptations of Joseph (ch. 2). The fondness of the Rabbis for the number receives striking illustration from the long series of significant tens in Aboth v. 1-9. The number was also applied in daily life. Ten persons constituted the minimum required for a community or congregation (Mishna, Sanhedrin i. 6), and for a company at a Paschal supper (Jos. BJ vi. ix. 3). Later authorities fix 10 as the number of persons drawn up in a row to comfort mourners (Sanh. 19a) and as the number requisite for the utterance of the nuptial benediction (Kethuboth, 7b). The 10 virgins of the parable may possibly receive illustration from an Arab custom mentioned by some mediaeval Jewish writers. They affirm that in the land of the Ishmaelites, when the bride was taken from her father's house to her new home on the evening preceding the completion of the marriage festivities, 10 torches or lamps were borne in front of her. The authority is, it is true, very late, but the custom described may have been of ancient origin (given in the gloss to Ketiv ii. 8, 96, and in Latin in Wetstein's note on Mt 25¹). The payment of a tithe or tenth to the Deity, referred to twice by our Lord (Lk 18¹², Mt 23²³ [Lk 11⁴⁹]), must have been connected in the first instance with the symbolic use of 10. The custom has been traced among Hebrews, Babylonians, Phœnicians, Greeks and Romans. The prominence of the subject in later Judaism is attested by the great space devoted to it in the Mishna, three treatises with 150 halakhôth.

Five.—Five, the half of ten, is met with in a considerable number of passages in the Gospels, in some of which it may have more than mere numerical significance. So perhaps in the 5 loaves (Mt 14¹⁷, 16⁹, Mk 6³⁸, 41 8¹⁹, Lk 9¹³, 16, Jn 6⁹, 13), a great multitude fed by an amount of food strongly suggestive of smallness and incompleteness; the 5 talents which bring in 5 more (Mt 25¹⁵, 20); the fivefold profit of the second servant in the parable of the Pounds contrasted with the tenfold profit of the first (Lk 19¹⁶); perhaps the 5 sparrows worth two farthings (Lk 12⁹); and the 5 disciples of Jesus at the beginning of His ministry (Jn 1³⁵⁻⁵¹); cf. the 5 disciples of R. Jochanan ben Zakai, c. 80 A.D. [Abôth ii. 10], and the 5 disciples ascribed to Jesus in a baraita removed from the censored editions of the Talmud [Sanh. 43a, see Laible's Jesus Christus im Talmud, Anhang 15]. In the other passages (Mt 25², Lk 12⁴ 12⁵² 14¹⁹ 16²⁸, Jn 4¹⁸ 5²) it is safest to find only the ordinary meaning. Five, as a small round number, is repeatedly met with in the OT (Gn 43³⁴ 45²², Lv 26⁸, Is 30¹⁷ etc.) and in the Tell el-Amarna letters. In one of the latter (ix. 20 in Winckler's edition) it seems to be regarded as a number so small as to need an apology.

Forty.—An important multiple of ten is 40, found in the accounts of the Temptation (Mt 4², Mk 1¹³, Lk 4²) and of the period intervening between the Passion and the Ascension (Ac 1³). That it is in both cases more than a mere number is evident. The 40 days of fasting in the wilderness clearly point back to the 40 days spent by Moses on Sinai (Ex 24¹⁸ 34²⁸) and the 40 days' journey of Elijah in the same region (1 K 19⁸). The 40 days of temptation remind us of the repeated use in the OT of the number 40 of periods of testing or punishment. The rain at the Flood fell 40 days and 40 nights (Gn 7¹⁷). The spies were absent 40 days (Nu 13²⁵). The punishment and proving of the people extended over 40 years (Nu 14³⁴). Nineveh was granted 40 days of respite (Jon 3⁴). The Philistine oppression lasted 40 years (Jg 13¹), and Ezekiel predicted that Egypt should be desolate 40 years (Ezk 29¹¹). That this application of the number was not confined to Israel is probable from the statement on the Moabite Stone (lines 7 f.), that the occupation of Mehedeba by Israel lasted 40 years. Even if king Mesha intended the number to be understood literally, which is very doubtful, he may have recorded it with a view to its special significance. In another group of passages, also, 40 seems to be a normal or ideal number. Three periods of rest from foreign invasion, each of 40 years, are mentioned in the Book of Judges (3¹¹ 5³¹ 8²⁸). Eli was judge for 40 years (1 S 4¹⁸); and the reigns of David and Solomon are reckoned at 40 years each (2 S 5⁴, 1 K 11⁴²; add from tradition the reign of Saul, Ac 13²¹, Jos. Ant. vi. xiv. 9).

How did 40 come to be used in this way? The most satisfactory answer is suggested by the following passages in the OT and other Oriental literature and history. Isaac and Esau married at 40 (Gn 25²⁰ 26³⁴). Moses came forward as a friend of his people about 40 (tradition recorded in Ac 7²³; cf. Ex 2¹¹ 'when Moses was grown up'), and began his work as their divinely appointed leader 40 years later (Ac 7³⁰ and Ex 7⁷).

Caleb was 40 years old when sent out as one of the spies (Jos 14⁷). Hillel is said to have entered on his Rabbinc career at 40 (Sifre referred to in Jewish Encyc. art. 'Forty'), and Jochanan ben Zakai to have exchanged commerce for study at 40 (Rosh ha-shanah, 31b: the same is affirmed of 'Akiba in the late writing, the 'Abôth of Rabbi Nathan, c. 6). Mohammed, according to a tradition referred to by König (Hastings' DB iii. 563^b, Stilistik, 55; cf. Muir, The Coran, its Composition and Teaching, 11), appeared as a prophet at or about 40. These passages suggest that 40 was regarded in the ancient East as the age of intellectual maturity, and there are not wanting direct declarations of that belief. In the addendum to the fifth chapter of 'Abôth, 40 is described as the age of reason or understanding (רַבֵּן אַרְבָּעִים [בן], and a passage in the Qoran cited by König (U.c.) runs: 'until he reached his full strength and attained the age of 40 years.' Forty years, therefore, represented a generation, and thus the number 40 became a round number for a full period, a complete epoch, and more generally for 'many.'

It is still used in this way to some extent in the modern East. There is a Syrian proverb: 'If you live 40 days with people, you will then either leave them or become like them' (Mackie, Bible Manners and Customs, 111; Bauer, Völkchen im Lande der Bibel, 236, gives it rather differently, but with the same use of 40). As the ancient star-gazers noted the disappearance of the Pleiades for 40 days, some recent writers (Cheyne, perhaps, Bible Problems and their Solution, 114 f., and Winckler cited there; Zimmern, too, in KATZW), 389, thinks the reference possible) connect the interval between the Passion and the Ascension, through a pre-Christian myth, with this astronomical period. This need not be seriously debated. The explanation given above is quite sufficient to account for the 40 days of the Temptation and 'the Great Forty Days.'

A Hundred (ἐκατόν, ἐκατοῦνταπλάσιον).—That the product of 10 by 10 should be frequently used in a general way to express a large number, could be expected only in a civilization which was acquainted with the decimal as well as the sexagesimal system. There are instances in the OT, etc.: Lv 26⁸, 2 S 24³, Pr 17¹⁰, Ec 6³ 8¹², Sir 18⁹ (RV: 'The number of man's days at the most are 100 years'), and the Moabite Stone (lines 28 f.: 'I reigned over 100 chiefs'). In the Gospels the number is used mainly in this way: in the parable of the Sower (Mt 13⁸, Mk 4⁸, 20, Lk 8⁸), in the parable of the Lost Sheep (Mt 18¹², Lk 15⁴), and in Mt 18²⁹ 19²⁹ (not WH), Mk 10³⁰, Lk 16⁶. In Mk 6⁴⁰, Jn 19³⁹ it is employed in the ordinary way.

The division of 100 into 99 and 1 (Mt 18²⁶, Lk 15⁴ 7), with the preference of the 1, is found in the Mishna, Peah iv. 1 f. The same division is also met with in a remarkable passage in the Jerus. Talmud (Shabbath xiv. 3), which, however, is not earlier than the 3rd cent. A.D. Perhaps the contrast of 99 and 1 was not unknown to the Rabbinc teaching of our Lord's day.

Ten Thousand.—In the two passages in the Gospels in which the multiple of 10 by 1000 occurs (μυρία, Mt 18²⁴; μυριάς, Lk 12¹), it is best regarded as hyperbolic. The intention in the one case is to name an amount quite inconceivable in ordinary life, a debt which could not possibly be discharged by a private person; in the other, to impress on the reader the enormous magnitude of the crowds which gathered round Jesus at that period of His ministry. There are many examples of this use in the OT (Lv 26⁸, Dt 32³⁰, 1 S 18⁷, Ca 5¹⁰, Ezk 16⁷ RVm, Dn 11¹², Mic 6⁷ etc.). In the Tell el-Amarna letters 100,000 is used in this way. Dushratta, king of Mitani, prayed that Ishtar might protect him and his royal brother the Pharaoh for a hundred thousand years (No. xx. in Winckler's edition).

Two.—There seems to be no special significance of the number 2 in the Gospels, unless, with König (Stilistik, 51 f.), we regard it as, in some passages, an equivalent for 'a few.' This idiom seems to be proved for the OT. 'Two days,' in Nu 9²², may well mean 'a few days'; and 'the 2 sticks' of the widow of Zarephath (1 K 17¹²) can hardly be understood literally. It may be illustrated in the NT by the 2 fishes (Mt 14^{17, 19}, Mk 6^{38, 41}, Lk 9^{13, 16}, Jn 6⁹), and the 2 who agree in prayer concerning anything (Mt 18¹⁹); but the ordinary interpretation seems not inadmissible in both these cases. The custom of sending out representatives in pairs, of which there are several examples in the Gospel story (the 2 disciples sent by the Baptist to Jesus [Lk 7¹⁹], the 12 sent out by two and two [Mk 6⁷], the 70 sent out by two and two [Lk 10¹], the 2 sent out near Jerusalem [Mt 21¹, Mk 11¹, Lk 19²⁹], and the 2 sent out to make preparations for the Paschal supper [Mk 14¹³, Lk 22³; cf. the 2 going to Emmaus, Lk 24¹³, Mk 16¹²], the 2 angels at the sepulchre [Lk 24⁴, Jn 20¹²], and the 2 on Olivet [Ac 1¹⁰]), was probably known to the Jewish society of our Lord's time.

A comparatively early tradition enjoined that the collectors of charity should travel in couples (Baba Bathra, 8b). When the son of Rabban Gamaliel (the grandson of St. Paul's Gamaliel) was ill, the distressed father sent two of his disciples to R. Chanina ben Dosa to request his prayers (Berak., 34b). The 5 zúgôth or couples of eminent teachers, the last of which consisted of Hillel and Shammai, referred to in the Mishna (Peah ii. 6, 'Abôth i. 4-10), may also be mentioned. The expression 'pairs' was probably used of them in Rabbinic circles in the time of Christ.

The two ways of Mt 7¹³ probably represent a widely current mode of teaching. They are met with in Jer 21⁸ (cf. Dt 30¹⁵, Sir 15¹⁷), Slav. Enoch 30¹⁵ 'I showed him the two ways, the light and the darkness' (cf. the note of Charles), in the Jewish manual probably incorporated in the early chapters of the Didache (cf. Ep. of Barnabas, 18 ff.), and in a remarkable passage in the Talmud. When R. Jochanan ben Zakai (c. 80 A.D.) was on his deathbed, he said to his disciples, who wondered at his tears: 'There are two ways before me: one leading to the Garden of Eden and the other leading to Gehenna, and I do not know in which I am about to be led' (Berak. 28b).

Three.—A number of peculiar interest to the student of the Gospels is three—τρεις, τρίς, τρίτων, τρίτος. It is purely numerical in the following passages: Mt 15³², Mk 8²; Peter's words about the three tabernacles on the Mount of Transfiguration (Mt 17⁴, Mk 9⁵, Lk 9³³); Mt 18¹⁶⁻²⁰ 20³ 22²⁶, Mk 12²¹ 15²⁵, Lk 15⁶ 24⁶ 12^{38, 52} 20^{12, 31} 23³², Jn 21⁶. In a much greater number of passages it obviously or probably means more: in the allusion to Jonah (Mt 12⁴⁰), in the parables of the 3 measures of meal (Mt 13³³, Lk 13²¹), the friend asking for 3 loaves (Lk 11⁵), the Good Samaritan (Lk 10³⁶), and the barren fig-tree (Lk 13⁷), in the 3 temptations (Mt 4¹), and the 3 prayers of Jesus (Mt 26⁴¹, Mk 14⁴¹), in the references to Peter's threefold denial (Mt 26^{34, 75}, Mk 14^{30, 72}, Lk 22^{34, 61}, Jn 13³⁸), in the allusions to the 3 days' interval between the Passion and the Resurrection (Mt 12⁴⁰ 16²¹ 17²³ 20¹⁹ 26⁶¹ 27^{40, 63}, Mk 8³¹ 9³¹ 10³⁴ 14⁵⁸ 15²⁹, Lk 9²² 13³² 18³³ 24^{7, 21, 46}, Jn 2¹⁹; add Ac 10⁴⁰, 1 Co 15⁴), in the 3 manifestations of the risen Lord recorded in the Fourth Gospel (Jn 21¹⁴), and in the threefold question, 'Lovest thou me?' addressed to Peter (v. 15¹⁷). In this latter and larger group can be traced a reference to the use of 3 as a significant number, of which there is a multitude of examples in the OT and other Jewish literature: the 3 feasts (Ex 23¹⁴), Job's 3 friends (Job 2¹¹), the 3 times of prayer (Ps 55¹⁷, Dn 6¹⁰), the threefold shooting of Joash (2 K 13¹⁸), the 3 sanctuaries—Eden, Mount Sinai, Mount Zion (Bk. of Jub 8¹⁹), the 3 branches of a vine and the 3 baskets representing 3 days (Gn 40^{10, 12, 16, 19}), 3 days' journey (Ex 3¹⁸, Nu 10³³, Jon 3³), the 3 days' search for the body of Elijah (2 K 2¹⁷), Esther's 3 days' fast (Est 4¹⁶), the 3 days of rejoicing for the honour done to Enoch (Slav. Enoch 68⁷), the perfuming and anointing of the body of Abraham for 3 days (Test. of Abr. text A, ch. 20), the 3 sayings of the men of the Great Synagogue ('Abôth i. 1), the 3 things on which the world standeth (Shim'on the Righteous in 'Abôth i. 2, and Shim'on ben Gamaliel in 'Abôth i. 19), and the 3 sayings ascribed to each of the 5 disciples of Rabban Jochanan ben Zakai ('Abôth ii. 14 ff.).

It is not difficult to see how the number came to be used in this manner. Several wholes which are often met with can be readily divided into 3 parts: the head, trunk, and legs of a body; the source, stream, and mouth of a river; the root, trunk, and corona of a tree (König, DB iii. 562^b); the van, centre, and rear of an army; morning, noon, and evening. Early Eastern speculation grouped all things under three heads; heaven, earth, and the abyss (cf. the Babylonian triad of gods, Anu, Bel, Ea). It will have been noticed in very early times that 3 is the smallest number with beginning, middle, and end. So it naturally came to be used on a small, well-rounded total, especially, as shown above, in reference to time.

The 3 days' interval between the Passion and the Resurrection may perhaps receive additional illustration from the Jewish rule that evidence for the identification of a corpse could not be received after 3 days (Yebamôth xvi. 3). A reason for the rule is given in a tradition ascribed to Bar Kappara, who was associated with the compiler of the Mishna (c. A.D. 200). This Rabbi is reported to have said that for 3 days the soul hovers near the body, waiting for an opportunity of returning into it, but that at the end of that period, seeing that the features are altered, it goes away (Midrash on Genesis, c. 100; Midrash on Ecclesiastes 12⁶; cf. Bousset, Die Religion des Judenthums, 285 note). The resurrection of Jesus evidently took place before the close of the period of identification. Be that as it may, there can hardly be a doubt that the belief expressed by Bar Kappara, or something like it, underlay the words of Martha: 'Lord, by this time he stinketh: for he hath been dead four days' (Jn 11³⁹). The 3 days were ended, and decay, she thought, had advanced so far that the features would be unrecognizable. That the 3 days between the Passion and the Resurrection had even the remotest connexion with the 3 days' disappearance of the new moon in spring (Zimmern in KAT[ZW], 389), is highly improbable.

Two other passages cannot be entirely passed over, although little or nothing can be said in illustration: the reference to the Father, the Son, and the Holy Ghost in the baptismal formula (Mt 28¹⁹), and the words ascribed to the risen Lord in the Apocalypse: 'I am the first, and the last, and the living one' (Rev 1⁷). There is no parallel to the use of the number in the former in pre-Christian Jewish literature, and connexion with Babylonian and Egyptian triads is out of the question. The triple priestly blessing (Nu 6²⁴⁻²⁶) and the Thrice Holy in the song of the seraphim (Is 6³) are remarkable, but cannot be safely regarded as foreshadowings of the doctrine of the Trinity. The number 3 is in both cases strongly emphatic, but it is not advisable to find more than emphasis. 'Holy, holy, holy' is a very strong superlative. The passage in the Apocalypse is, no doubt, like the preceding words 'him which is, and which was, and which is to come' (Rev 1⁴), an expansion or interpretation of the name I AM THAT I AM (Ex 3¹⁴), and has a partial parallel in Plato, de Legibus, 716: ὁ μὲν δὴ θεὸς (ὡς περ καὶ ὁ παλαιὸς λόγος) ἀρχὴν τε καὶ τελευτὴν καὶ μέσα τῶν ὄντων ἀπάντων ἔχων, but must not be connected with it.

Four.—The number 4 (τέσσαρες, τετραταῖος, τέταρτος, τετράμηνος, τετραπλῆτος) is found in the Gospels in the following passages: in the 4 months before harvest (Jn 4³⁵), the 4 bearers of the paralytic (Mk 2³), the 4th watch (Mt 14²⁵, Mk 6⁴⁸), the fourfold restitution promised by Zacchæus (Lk 19⁵), the 4 days of Lazarus in the grave (Jn 11^{17, 39}), the division of the garments of Jesus among the 4 soldiers (Jn 19²⁴), the 4 winds (Mt 24³¹, Mk 13²⁷), and the 4 kinds of soil in the parable of the Sower, with the types of character which they represent (Mt 13^{4ff.} and parallels). We may add the 4 Gospels, the number of which was early regarded as significant. The four last references constitute a group. The four winds, associated with the 4 points of the compass, are met with in the OT and elsewhere in Oriental literature and symbolism: 1 Ch 9²⁴ RVm, Jer 49³⁶, Ezk 37⁹ 42²⁰ RVm, Dn 8⁸ 11⁴, Zec 2⁶ 6⁵, Babylonian Flood Story, col. iii. line 42, Book of the Dead, c. 161 (in Budge's smaller edition, p. 531 f.). This use of 4 suggested world-wide extent and then comprehensiveness. So we find in the OT: 4 heads of the river going out of Eden (Gn 2¹⁰), 4 cherubim each with 4 faces and 4 wings (Ezk 1^{5f.}, cf. Rev 4^{6ff.}), 4 horns (Zec 1¹⁸), 4 smiths (1²⁰), 4 chariots (6¹), and 4 empires (Dn 2⁴⁰ 7^{3ff.} 17^{3ff.}). An Assyrian royal title ran 'king of the 4 quarters,' that is, of the world. Some of the divine figures in Assyrian sculptures have 4 wings, for example No. 1 in the Nimroud Gallery of the British Museum. Adam's name is said to have been given from 4 substances, that is, the east, the west, the north, and the south (Sl. Enoch 30¹³). Abraham is said to have pitched his tent where 4 roads met (Test. of Ab. text A 1). The 4 kinds of soil in the parable, therefore, and the 4 types of character which they represent, cover the whole area of human life; and the 4 Gospels give a complete outline-portrait of Christ. The use of 4 in the grouping of persons or things seems to have been a favourite method with Jewish teachers. There are several examples of it in Amos (1³. 6. 9. 11. 13 21. 4. 6) and in Proverbs (30^{15f.} 18⁶ 21^{1f.} 24⁷ 29^{1f.}). Later instances are Sir 37¹⁸ 'good and evil, life and death,' Test. of Judah, ch. 16, '4 spirits in wine,' and the remarkable series of paragraphs in 'Abôth v. 16-21, in which people generally, dispositions, scholars, almsgivers, college-goers, and those who sit under the wise, are in each case grouped in 4 classes. May we suppose that our Lord, in accordance with His habit of utilizing current methods, adopted in the parable a familiar mode of classification?

Twelve.—Twelve, as the number of the tribes of Israel according to ancient tradition, became naturally a favourite number among the Jews, especially as it carried with it the suggestion of Divine choice and Divine faithfulness. So it figured in religious ritual, symbolism, and history. There were 12 jewels in the high priest's breastplate (Ex 28²¹), and 12 cakes of shewbread (Lv 24⁵). Solomon's sea stood on 12 oxen (1 K 7²⁵), Elijah's altar on Carmel consisted of 12 stones (1 K 18³¹), and the altar-hearth in Ezekiel's visionary temple was 12 cubits long by 12 cubits broad (Ezk 43¹⁶). It is, therefore, not surprising that the number 12 is prominent in the Gospels. The 12 disciples referred to in Mt 10^{1f.} 5 11¹ 20¹⁷ 26¹⁴. 20. 47, Mk 3¹⁴ 4¹⁰ 6⁷ 9³⁵ 10³² 11¹¹ 14¹⁰. 17. 20. 43, Lk 6¹³ 8¹ 9^{1. 12} 18³¹ 22^{3. 47}, Jn 6^{7. 70f.} 20²⁴ (in 22 of these passages simply as οἱ δώδεκα, 'the Twelve'; cf. also Ac 6², 1 Co 15⁵, Rev 21¹⁴), the 12 baskets of broken pieces (Mt 14²⁰, Mk 6⁴³ 8¹⁹, Lk 9¹⁷, Jn 6¹³), the 12 legions of angels (Mt 26⁵³), are all more or less reminiscent of the 12 tribes. In the promise in Mt 19²⁸ || Lk 22³⁰ is a direct reference which puts beyond doubt the association of the number in our Lord's day with the tribes.

This use may have been aided by the constant recurrence of the 12 months of the year, but it is not safe to follow Dr. A. Jeremias (Babylonisches in NT, 88) in connecting the number of the Apostles even indirectly with the 12 signs of the zodiac. He does not, indeed, venture to affirm that this lay in the consciousness of Jesus, although he thinks the promise of the 12 thrones (Mt 19²⁸, Lk 22³⁰) might point at that; but he is confident that 'the mystical cosmological reference,' as he calls it, lies in the words of the writer of the Apocalypse about the 12 Apostles of the Lamb (Rev 21¹⁴). However it may be with the latter, it is unnecessary to find any allusion of the kind in the Gospels. Men familiar in some degree with Gentile culture and the astrological-astronomical speculations which were in vogue about this time, such as Philo and Josephus, might connect the 12 gems of the high priest's breastplate with the signs of the zodiac, and might therefore regard 12 as a perfect number (Philo, de Profugis, § 33, cited by König, DB iii. 563a, τῆλειος δ' ἀριθμὸς ὁ δώδεκα; Josephus, Ant. iii. vii. 7) without the idea ever entering the minds of the majority.
